

For Reference

Not to be taken from this room

J220780

July 6, 1940

520780

5¢ A COPY

Collier's

THE NATION

ALAN
FOSTER

© THE CROWELL-COLLIER PUBLISHING COMPANY—PUBLISHERS OF COLLIER'S—
THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE—WOMAN'S HOME COMPANION

Today's Germany in a novel by WILLIAM C. WHITE

The making of a Gentleman begins early

WHEN he is about three, Mother gently points out that it isn't good form to knock down a baby or to hit her over the head with her own teddy bear. Nor is it courtly, as Father suggests a year or so later, to run her down with his velocipede.

Now, as the boy grows older, comes dancing school (oh hated thought!) where, between emotional awakening and patient teaching, the rough social edges begin to wear off.

The little girls he used to belabor are now strangely changed . . . mysterious, delicate, and beautiful things, to be attended, cared for, and protected. For the small reward of their smile, his tie must be straight, his shoes aglow, his trousers pressed. For them he must rise, he must bow and perform a hundred other little gallantries which once he scorned. And while he learns that these gestures are the keys which unlock a woman's heart, he learns also one of the most important truths of all:

That good looks, agreeable manners and charm count for little when the breath is "off color," and that the nicest precaution against this offensive condition* is Listerine Antiseptic.

Start Him Early, Mother

If his mother is smart, she will start him on this delightful daily routine as early as she can.

It's a breath freshening habit that may pay him rich dividends in health and popularity his whole life through . . . the standby of countless attractive men and women in the business and social world. A pretty sensible precaution for anyone to take, don't you think?

*Although systemic conditions sometimes cause halitosis (bad breath), fortunately, the most common cause, say some authorities, is fermentation of tiny food particles on the surfaces of the teeth, gums, and mouth. Listerine Antiseptic, used as a mouth rinse, quickly halts such fermentation and overcomes its odors. The breath quickly becomes sweeter, fresher, purer . . . less likely to offend. Use Listerine Antiseptic always before business and social engagements at which you want to appear at your best. Lambert Pharmacal Co., St. Louis, Mo.

LISTERINE for Halitosis (BAD BREATH)

Collier's

WILLIAM L. CHENERY Editor
CHARLES COLEBAUGH Managing Editor
THOMAS H. BECK Editorial Director

WALTER DAVENPORT
AIMEE LARKIN
QUENTIN REYNOLDS
KYLE CRICHTON
KENNETH LITTAUER
JAMES N. YOUNG
MAX WILKINSON

Politics
Drama
Sports
Screen and Theater
Fiction
Fiction
Fiction

WM. O. CHESSMAN
HENRY L. JACKSON
GURNEY WILLIAMS
DENVER LINDLEY
FRANK D. MORRIS
IFOR THOMAS
CLARENCE H. ROY

Art
Fine Feathers
Humor
Articles
Articles
Photographs
Syntax

W. B. COURTNEY
FRANK GERVASI
MARTHA GELLHORN
JIM MARSHALL
WM. HILLMAN
ROBERT McCORMICK
JOHN T. FLYNN

Ger
Mediterr
Scandi
The C European Ma
Washi
Associate

THIS WEEK

JULY 6, 1940

SHORT STORIES

ROARK BRADFORD

The Mule-Angel. People are easy to handle if you know mules. Page 15

JEFFERS GODFREY

Where Credit was Due. Mr. Beemish Todd learns about business—from a blonde. Page 16

WILLIAM FAY

Down Went McGinty. To the bottom of his bank roll—and back. Page 20

THE SHORT SHORT STORY

Plenty of Experience, by Meyer Levin. Page 12

SERIAL STORIES

WILLIAM C. WHITE

Occupation: Widow. The first of nine parts. The new serial—as modern and dramatic as the new world war. Page 9

JOHN AUGUST

Rain Before Seven. The seventh of ten parts. Broken engagement. Page 22

ARTICLES

FRANK GERVASI

Mexico Must Choose. Our southern neighbor heading for trouble. Page 11

QUENTIN REYNOLDS

Front Seat in Flanders. A Collier's correspondent spends a day in No Man's Land. Page 13

HENRY L. JACKSON and HELEN HILCKEN

When It's a Date. Clothes are more fun than ever. Page 14

DR. R. M. LANGER

Fast New World: How atomic power will change your life. Page 18

GEORGE H. SISLER

Batting Averages are Cockeyed. And what to do about it. Page 23

JOHN T. FLYNN

These Our Rulers. The second of four parts. Chicago's money magicians. Page 24

FRELING FOSTER

Keep Up with the World. Page 6

EDITORIALS

U. S. Help for the Allies.

Some Cats, Your Life and You.

Why Hound the Alien?

Page 62

COVER

ALAN FOSTER

ANY WEEK

WE'D just returned from Washington. For hours we'd been scared in the solemn, portentous hush of the State Department, in the rodeo of militarists in the War Department, in the swash-buckle of the Navy offices and the close rooms of quacking politicians who ask you to shudder at the prospect that they might not be elected or re-elected. Trying to pull ourselves together, we sat on a park bench trying hard not to be sick at our stomach. And we were rewarded by the sight of six large, contented fellows manning the handle of one small pump. A sign told us that they labored under the aegis of WPA, and as we watched it occurred to us that we were indeed silly to let ourselves become physically and emotionally depleted by government colliding with itself. There was scarcely room on that pump handle for all six of those workers and yet they were blissfully happy. They were pumping water out of a sewer and so joyfully that they did not notice that it ran right back into the sewer through a near-by drain. As we watched, charmed perhaps as Robert Bruce was by the persevering spider, we thought of calling upon others to enjoy the scene.

A GENTLEMAN named Graff was watching from a near-by bench. "Pay no attention to it," sniffed Mr. Graff. "If you told those boys they'd probably feel awfully bad. Maybe they'd refuse to accept their wages. Why, down where I live the government is running a household-assistance project. It occupies a six-room house. Well, they've got four watchmen in the place. Four watchmen! And this morning between nine and half past ten, my wife and I watched six different people come out of that house and, one at a time, sweep the sidewalk. No, not any watchmen. They just watched and talked politics. Now these boys here manning that pump—"

BUT WE had to be getting on. We paused but once—to talk to Mr. Robert Cook, the geneticist. Mr. Cook said he'd been looking everywhere for us because that afternoon he had passed the Aunt Elsie Pie Baking Company, which was being picketed. The pickets, said Mr. Cook, carried the following signs: "This Pie Baking Company, Makers of Those Delicious Aunt Elsie's Home Made Apple Pies, is Unfair to Organized Labor."

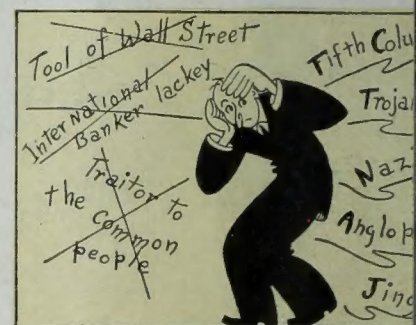

BEFORE we left Washington, Mr. George B. McCahan told us about some experience his sister was having on her first visit to the capital. She's from Ogden, Utah. Anyway, she was passing the new Supreme Court Building and, properly impressed, asked her taxi chauffeur what it was. "Sorry, lady," he said, "but I ain't allowed to tell you." A trifle nettled, she said: "Think I'm a spy?" Said he: "No, ma'am, I don't. But I ain't allowed to tell a fare what any place is without I got a sight-seeing license for fifteen bucks." And then, as if it had suddenly occurred to him that the authorities were much too busy worrying about national defense to bother about lesser sights, he added: But I'll call 'em as I pass 'em like I was practicing to be a sight-seeing jallopy."

BUT HE was wrong if he thought that the defense of the United States monopolized the minds of his betters. In our pursuit of military chills, we ran into one huddle of statesmen who were wringing their hands to think that the President had kicked the bottom out of their pork barrel by vetoing the $110,000,000 River and Harbors Bill. They told us that, after all, a mere $110,000,000 would never be missed what with billions being thrown around as they are. And think of an election coming and constituents to grease! It saddened us almost as much as the reproaches another group was heaping upon General Frank T. Hines, the Veterans Bureau Administrator, for saying that this country couldn't afford a bale of new veteran legislation—a shakedown to pension the families of veterans of 1918 whether the veteran's demise was traceable to his war services or not. Why, it would cost us only $28,000,000 the first year. And it wouldn't amount to fifty or a hundred millions annually for a long, long time. And an election coming on and constituents to grease!

SO WE called at the home of friends, thinking that a drink in pleasant surroundings would do us good. After dinner our hostess suggested the movies. She telephoned to ask what was showing. A weary male voice at the other end asked her to wait a minute while he took a look at the marquee. Presently he came back and told her what the show was. "Honest, lady," he sighed, "the damn' things come and go so fast that I can't keep track."

NOR CAN we. In the dear, dead pre-Munich days the worst we were ever called by irate customers was "tool of Wall Street" and "international banker lackey" and "traitor to the common people." We got so used to it that we became rather fond of such gentle abuse. But now those we displease have discovered that we're a fifth columnist, a Trojan horse, a Nazi, an Anglophile, a quisling and a jingo;

and Mr. Ben Hilling of Boston, Massachusetts, is prepared to punch us in the nose. "Go ahead and holler for bosses, the munitions makers," Mr. Hilling. "See what it gets you. You are doing us a favor. Demo is finished. The dictator of the United States is already picked, the great American of all, Father Coughlin. And we were about to ask what he would become of him."

BUT ENOUGH of that. What do I think of this—a letter from Mr. J. Patterson whose address is "On A Service with the Canadian Forces." He writes: "As soon as war was declared I offered my services to the Allied cause. Because I was an American it was an endless maze of red tape. When I was enlisted, I lost a citizenship which you know I treasured dearly. It is because of the editorial in Collier's for April 20th, and the fact that I still cherish that citizenship that I am writing you. For eighteen years I have been a private school and college graduate from Princeton in 1938, have won a national intercollegiate championship in the pole vault and received honorable mention for the given in political science to the graduating class. I've had all I could ask for and more; yet I have given up that up to fill a bounden duty. The only three of us Americans up here in this first class of air crews to be up—two of us pilots, the third a navigator. There will be countless others following in our wake. Why should we be penalized for what we're doing? Certainly it is a just cause. I believe, however, that those of us who believe in a vital act rather than a verbal display should take such action from our own country, which obviously believes as we do. It is hard for us to believe that we are without a country (having lost our American citizenship without getting any in return) simply because we are willing to lay down our lives for justice and freedom. . . . For most of us we are already on the move it will be a final smashup; but just in case of a fortunate enough to return, let the lie lie see to it that my father gives me a square deal. The editorial mentioned is a step in that direction. Many thanks. You carry on and we will do our bit."

GOOD LUCK, kid. . . .

Vol. 106, No. 1. Entered as second-class matter at Post Office, Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A., under Act of March 3, 1879, and at Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Springfield, Ohio. Publishers of Women's Home Companion, The American Magazine, Collier's. Copyright, 1940, The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, in the United States, Canada and Great Britain. Executive and Editorial Offices: 250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.; 6 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London. Published weekly at Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A. Joseph P. Knapp, Chairman of the Board; Thomas H. Beck, President; Albert E. Winger, Executive Vice President and Treasurer; Gertrude B. Lane, Vice President; John S. Brehm, Vice President; William P. Larkin, Vice President; J. A. Welch, Vice President; Denis O'Sullivan, Secretary. Manuscripts or art submitted to Collier's, The National Weekly, should be accompanied by addressed envelopes and sufficient postage for their return. The Publisher assumes no responsibility for return of unsolicited manuscripts or art. Price, 5 cents a copy in the United States and Canada; $2.00 a year, $3.50 for two years, in the United States and possessions, also in Argentina, Balearic Islands, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Canary Islands, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Labrador, Mexico, Newfoundland, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Spain and Colonies, Uruguay and Venezuela. Foreign rates including postage: $5.50 a year to all other countries. Remit by postal or express money order or check in United States. The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Springfield, Ohio. To avoid delay in delivery, subscribers should notify us of change of address five weeks in advance. Give both old and new addresses.

No need to get LOST!

THERE'S no guesswork about where you're going these days. If you stay on main routes you can travel easily through the biggest and busiest of cities. Modern road-markers take the doubt out of driving. All you have to do is follow the main route.

How often you have heard people say—"We came all the way on Route 30." Or, "We never missed a turn." And how often you have said it yourself!

Straight through on a main highway!

When you're out on a tire-buying tour it's equally important to keep to the main road. Otherwise you're apt to run into end-of-the-road bargains, unimproved tires and confusing tire claims. . . . Too many times you have to travel at your own risk.

Before you buy tires, find out who made them, how long they have been making tires, how many tires they have made, and how those tires have performed in service. Find out what their production facilities are and how they are making quality tires to sell at low prices.

The experience gained by Goodyear in making more than 300 million tires now brings you a complete line of Goodyear Tires—for every driving requirement—at low prices. For example, Goodyear's Great "G-3" All-Weather Tire, road-proved favorite of millions, is now made better—priced lower—in all popular sizes. And you get the same values in all Goodyear Tires.

You can't pay less than Goodyear's low prices and get the same safety and the same service—and you don't need to pay more!

Today, as for 25 years, it is still true: More people ride on Goodyear Tires than on any other kind. Are you one of them? Ask your nearby Goodyear Dealer about his "90-10" Offer and his Easy-Pay Plan.

THE GREATEST NAME IN RUBBER
GOODYEAR
"ALL-WEATHER"—T.M. THE GOODYEAR TIRE & RUBBER CO.

Goodyear's "All-Weather" Tread — Proved for Driving Safety — Under
All Conditions — By More People —
Over More Miles — Than Any Other.

GOODYEAR TIRES

*Always as good as you think.
Now cost less than you imagine.*

Builds Up Your Car's Beauty!

... Besides Saving the Finish

Your car's beauty is always safe under Simoniz. It takes all the wear and tear the finish ordinarily gets. Weather, dirt, and the sun's rays can't dull and destroy the lacquer or enamel . . . so it lasts longer. And Simoniz, with each application, adds more beauty. It keeps your car new-looking for years. Does away with endless washing and polishing. A dry cloth easily wipes off dust and dirt without scratching. Think of the time and money you'll save by Simonizing your car! Do it today . . . it's easier than ever the new quick way!

If Your Car is Dull, clean the finish first with Simoniz Kleener to restore its natural lustre and color.

MOTORISTS WISE
SIMONIZ
MAKES CARS STAY BEAUTIFUL

Insist on the world-famous Simoniz and the wonderful Simoniz Kleener for your car. Sold at hardware, drug, grocery, and auto supply stores, filling stations and garages everywhere.

THE SIMONIZ COMPANY CHICAGO, U. S. A.

KEEP UP WITH THE WORLD

By Freling Foster

New York City's bird lovers who, equipped with binoculars, make regular tours through Central Park to study the free bird life in its trees have seen and recorded, in a single spring season, as many as two hundred different species of migratory and local birds.—By Mrs. R. W. Beardslee, Scarsdale, New York.

A new city ordinance in Indianapolis requires pawnbrokers to turn over to the police, within a few hours, a complete description of pawned articles, including the pawnor's signature, address, appearance and thumbprint. Shortly after this law became effective, much stolen property was recovered and many burglaries were solved.

Many of the twenty-two amino acids, now produced in chemical laboratories for use in nutritional research, are made from such things as chicken feathers, sunflower seeds, cottage cheese, wheat, gelatin, dried blood and human hair—and cost from $5 to $1,000 a pound.

The Abyssinian Baptist Church in the Harlem section of New York City has 13,000 Negro members and is the largest church of this denomination in the world.—By Mabel Clayton, New York, New York.

Thirty-two states of the United States still are without a civil-service system.

Only one make of revolver—a German Mauser—is a true automatic, or a revolver that fires all chambers with one pull of the trigger. All other revolvers and pistols are either self-loaders or semiautomatics, which require manual trigger action for each shot.—By J. Bruce Cameron, San Juan, Puerto Rico.

The ultraviolet rays of the sun, which cause sunburn, are endurable because they have been "filtered" by the earth's atmosphere. But at an altitude of 75,000 feet, these rays would destroy the human skin in two or three minutes.—By G. M. Relyea, Salt Lake City, Utah.

In the United States the life expectancy of Jews—at every age—is twenty per cent longer than that of Gentiles.—By Myrtle Hooten, Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Law courts in Arkansas allow a witness to be disqualified on the credibility attacked if he admits that he is an atheist.

One of the largest sums of money ever paid to an author in advance was the $100,000 that was given to Thomas Macaulay in 1846, almost a year before he was pledged to deliver the first volume of his "History of England."—By A. Bradford, New York, New York.

The Japanese observe a "Good Month" each year during which time few of them go to the temples as the gods and lesser divinities are said to be absent, paying their annual visit of homage to the Mikado at his imperial palace in Tokyo.—By Edith Wise, Snoqualmie, Washington.

The telegraph plant, desmodium gyrans, of tropical Asia, still puzzles scientists, who cannot explain why its lateral leaflets spontaneously jerk up and down every few minutes, even in still air.

More than one quarter of all the people in the world are primarily dependent on food raised on land that, once arid or semiarid, has been made fertile through irrigation.

A new kind of paper, possessing much of the feel and appearance of cloth, is now being used to make curtains, bedspreads, pillowcases and slip covers. It is expected to increase appreciably both the present 9,000 uses of paper and the average family's consumption of about 100 pounds a year.—By Homer H. Huysman, Kalamazoo, Michigan.

Five dollars will be paid for each interesting or unusual fact accepted for this column. Contributions must be accompanied by factory proof. Address Keep Up with the World, Collier's, 250 Park Avenue, New York City. This column is copyrighted by Collier's. The National Weekly. None of the items be reproduced without express permission of the publisher.

CHAMPION AGAIN!

WILBUR SHAW, WINNER—9 OF FIRST 10 CARS TO FINISH—1940 INDIANAPOLIS 500-MILE RACE USED CHAMPION SPARK PLUGS

CHAMPION SPARK PLUGS once again proved that they make every engine a better performing engine, with a sweeping victory in the 1940 Indianapolis 500-Mile Race. This year, as for 17 years past, Champions have proved their right to a place in the engine of every motorist who values maximum performance and dependability.

Champion Spark Plugs progress with the times. That's why their record of supremacy in open competition is so outstanding. Today spark plugs more definitely determine the degree and quality of engine performance than ever before.

High speed, high-compression engines using highly developed anti-knock fuels, require spark plugs that are free from leakage, and practically immune to the ravages of the complex chemistry of modern combustion.

The combination of Champion's exclusive Sillimanite insulators and patented Sillment seal is the perfect answer to these problems. Insist on Champion Spark Plugs for your car. Have your spark plugs, regardless of make, tested and cleaned at regular intervals, and replace with new ones every 10,000 miles for maximum economy and dependability.

"Many thanks for the splendid performance of Champion Spark Plugs when I won the Indianapolis 500-Mile Race for the third time. The Champions functioned perfectly in my car throughout the entire race—never missed firing once."

Wilbur Shaw

USE THE SPARK PLUG CHAMPIONS USE

BACK FROM HAVANA:

Johnny Mize discovers true Havana taste in NEW WHITE OWLS

OWL: Have a good time in Havana, Johnny?

MIZE: Yes, it's a great place—I'd like to go again.

OWL: You're considered quite an expert on cigars, Johnny. I suppose you smoked only Havanas in Cuba.

MIZE: Yes, it was quite an experience—real Havana cigars whenever I wanted them!

OWL: Then you should be an expert judge of these new White Owls. Try this one—tell me if it has the authentic Havana taste.

MIZE (smoking): Yes, I like this cigar! It's not as strong as an all-Havana cigar . . . but it sure has the real Havana taste!

NOW BLENDED WITH HAVANA!

Try a

NEW WHITE OWL—Today 5¢

JOHNNY MIZE, first baseman of the St. Louis Cardinals, member of the famous Gas House Gang and 1939 champion batter of the National League, recently gave us an interview at the Cards' training camp in Florida.

Johnny was just back from a vacation in Havana. He's a great cigar smoker, and the taste of Havana cigars was still fresh in his mind. We had him try a new Blended-with-Havana White Owl—and he vouched at once for its true Havana taste.

And when you discover that fine, rich Havana flavor, you'll join the thousands of men who enjoy new White Owls. They cost only 5¢ . . . a rare value in smoking pleasure.

Treat yourself soon to a new White Owl!

Beginning a novel of our times, the unforgettable story of a German girl who committed the crime of loving a man whom the Nazis marked as an enemy

Occupation: Widow

By William C. White

ILLUSTRATED BY GEORGE HOWE

THE newsboy on the Piazza dei Cinquecento saw the girl hurrying toward him, as eager to get a morning paper as she had been the day before. She was the kind of girl that a man likes to smile at. Small, almost petite, with blue eyes and golden hair neat under a little black hat, she looked just twenty. She wore a gray flannel suit with a white blouse and a little mauve tie at the throat. Everything about her was as brisk as the December morning. December in Rome sometimes brings mornings that are sharp, like freshly minted silver; this was one.

The girl reached in her purse. "Give me a Corriere, please." She spoke with a slight foreign accent.

The newsboy handed her the paper. "A pleasant morning, Signorina."

She nodded and smiled, but looked at the newspaper. The lead stories about the war did not concern her. She turned quickly to the want ads and searched for two lines of type, the only two that stood out for her on the whole crowded page. They read: "German lessons by cultured Berliner. Ten lire per hour. Fräulein Klein." The address given was a flat on a small street near the Stazione Centrale.

There it was, for the second and last day, her own ad, worded calmly, not desperately, without any clue to the story behind it.

The girl crossed the Piazza without hurrying but with no air of leisure. She looked at the faces of passing people. Some one of them, some person somewhere, must want to learn German. Ten lire an hour; ten hours, one hundred lire. That would be twenty-five marks, twenty-five shillings, five dollars; it did not sound like very much in any language. But it would pay room rent and leave a little to lengthen the small store of money in the savings account. Pupils were hard to find and all the harder for a person who knew no one in Rome. But someone, somewhere, would see the advertisement. It was better to imagine that than to try to guess what might happen if no one answered. The money in the savings bank would not last beyond two months.

SHE came to the house in which she lived. It was a pleasant morning for walking but it was better to stay home; someone bound for work might call about the advertisement. Yesterday it had been hard to sit, waiting. It would be harder today.

To wait, doing nothing, meant to think and she could think only of the money in the bank. She went to the mirror, took down her hair and began to comb it. Her hair was long and golden. The light on the mirror was poor but it showed a face paler than it should have been, less full, less beautiful than it could have been, a face thinned by worry. It was vaguely shadowed, its contours too well defined.

She arranged her hair, drawing it tight and smooth around her head. Then she turned to the dresser and for the tenth time in a week rearranged the drawers. They contained few clothes, a box of letters, a packet of newspaper clippings, and in one small box, by itself, one letter. One drawer had a small pile of sheet music, all German songs. A large suitcase would have held everything.

She walked away from the dresser to the window. The bell below rang and she went to her door to listen. She heard a man ask, "Does Fräulein Klein live here?"

"Upstairs, Signor, last door on the left," the landlady answered.

The girl went to the mirror, straightened the bow at her collar and waited. The man's voice had sounded friendly but his knock was hard and insistent.

She opened the door. A middle-aged man was

She was frightened now, frightened cold. If he had guessed her thoughts about Paul's death then she had better run quickly. She looked up there, smiling at her. He was stout and his face was large. She noticed immediately that his small eyes took in everything at once.

"Fräulein Klein? Good morning." He spoke Italian but his accent was heavy. "My name is Stockmann. I saw your advertisement in this morning's paper." He gestured carelessly at a newspaper he had in his hand. "Your advertisement interested me, Fräulein." For some reason he smiled. "Do you find many people here who want to study German?"

"My advertisement only appeared yesterday," she said.

The man smiled. "Pupils will be fortunate to have so attractive a teacher."

The clumsy heaviness of the compliment was annoying. "Have you come to arrange for lessons?"

"Well, yes and no."

His accent was so clearly that of a German that the girl stopped. "Surely the lessons are not for yourself?"

He laughed and said in German, "No, of course not." He showed no hurry to get to business. "You were born in Berlin—yes? Have you been in Rome long, Fräulein?"

"Three years."

"Where were you before you came here?"

"In Berlin. Really, Herr Stockmann, I do not understand why—"

"In time, in time, Fräulein." Stockmann was enjoying his little mystery. "Why did you leave Berlin?"

The girl was sure that he knew the answer to that question already, but wanted to see if she would tell the truth. This whole interview could be false, a trap of some sort, and she ought to get up now and tell the man to go. Yet that might mean losing a chance to earn money. Possibly his was just the curiosity of an elderly man. Not meeting his glance but knowing that it never wavered on her face, she said steadily, "I left Berlin after the death of my husband."

STOCKMANN smiled as if that honesty pleased him. "Who was your husband?" The faint smile on his face implied that he already knew the answer.

She straightened up a little. "I do not think that concerns my ability to teach German."

"Of course it doesn't," Stockmann said comfortingly.

"I think it impertinent and I must ask you to go."

Stockmann did not move. "Now, Fräulein Dirling—!"

The girl stepped back. "How do you know my name?"

Stockmann laughed. "I should be remiss if I did not remember Carola Dirling. I have heard you sing so many times at the Krokodil Café in Berlin."

Carola stared at him, trying to guess what he wanted.

"I was only one of the thousands who were sorry when you left Berlin." He smiled clumsily.

But Carola sat rigid, her face paler than before. She could guess from where this man came. "Please go," she said weakly. "Please."

"I come only as a friend—"

She almost screamed "Go!"

"You must not be upset." Stockmann tried to be friendly. "I know much about you, Fräulein Dirling. You came here three years ago and you had a little money saved. It has not been easy for you since. You live in this small room not like the lovely apartment you used to have on Kurfürstendamm."

"I have suspected for some time that I was being watched here." Her voice was bitter. "And when you saw my advertisement, you decided that it was a call for help?"

"You put it unfairly," he said, cajoling. "You have been watched but in no unfriendly way. You want work nicht wahr? I offer you work."

Hatred flashed in Carola's face. "I want none of the work you have to offer." Then, in pain that was very real, "Why haven't you let me alone?"

There was a perverted kindness in Stockmann's face. "You misunderstand. Let me be blunt, and pardon me. You used to be attractive. You used to have a few of the nice things in life. I offer you an opportunity to earn money regularly, easily, simply."

She knew the kind of work he was offering. "I do not want any of it."

Stockmann looked at her, surprised. "Your answer is 'No'?"

Carola nodded. "I would rather live with peace of mind."

"I THINK you are foolish," Stockmann said sternly. "We only wanted you to dress yourself attractively, to live in comfortable surroundings here in Rome to endeavor to meet certain people—"

"And report their conversations to you! Filthy spying!"

Stockmann shrugged his shoulders. "Others, of necessity, might choose other adjectives." Ever so slightly his manner changed. "You make it very difficult for me, Fräulein."

"Difficult?"

"You are alone here, with a German passport."

"I do not understand," she said feebly knowing well what he meant.

"There are ways of persuading the Italian police to ask you to leave the country."

Carola looked up defiantly. "I will go to Athens or Constantinople."

"Pardon me, Fräulein, you have scarcely enough money."

"You know about that?" Carola asked, alarmed.

"We know about that." He paused.

"I shall find work here, somewhere."

"No, no," he said apologetically, as if she had offered to do some favor. "I can save you the trouble. I will tell you what will happen. You will find a job, yes? You will work for one day, perhaps less. Then the police will visit your employer and—!" He gestured the ending. "We have much influence in Italy today, Fräulein."

That was true and Carola knew it. A solid wall of threats had risen before her, not only cutting off retreat but pushing her from solid ground.

"There is one alternative," Stockmann said after a pause. "You can return to Berlin."

"What should I do there?"

"Friends there are eager to help you."

"Who are they?" Carola asked desperately.

"For instance, there is Herr Blaerchen."

She knew now who had sent this man and why she had been threatened. As colorlessly as possible she asked, "Is he in Berlin?"

"He has been there for a year," Stockmann said. "If you'll pardon me, he and your husband were friends, weren't they?"

Carola smiled. "Yes, good friends." The return of Rolf Blaerchen to Berlin was news. She added: "I haven't heard of him for a long time. It was he who asked you to look me up?"

"Because he was a friend of your husband!" Stockmann began.

(Continued on page 42)

He stood there for a half-hour saying whatever came into his mind. A roar came at him from the audience, and then another

Mexico Must Choose

By Frank Gervasi

Mexico is heading for the polls—and probably for some shooting—in an election that will decide its future. The real issue is Democracy vs. Totalitarianism, and all Americans are vitally concerned

IN THE range country of Sonora and Chihuahua, the ganaderos, the bourgeois of cattlemen, are selling their animals. That is an ominous sign to those who know Mexico. It means trouble. In that unhappy country where there have been 18 changes of chief executives in 29 years of bullets and blood, trouble means revolution.

Of all the generals and of all the Dons who've cut their way to power with machete and rifle and machine gun, only one, strongman Plutarco Elias Calles, completed the institutional six-year term of office. Present President General Lazaro Cardenas still has some months to go, until November 30th. So much can happen between now and the expiration of his term. That's why the bookmen are selling their cattle. Their instinct tells them that it is better to have silver in their money belts than to have their barrels emptied by foraging revolutionaries. For the elements of revolution—peonism, poverty and politics—are as palpable as the threat of catastrophe in the Mexican sky, as real as the stamp of suffering on the face of the Indio. The true-blooded native seems never to have smiled in the generations since his Aztec forebears were slaughtered for their gold.

Upon the land where every Commandment was violated in man's quest for gold and its power there seems to have fallen the curse of the Aztec sun gods, an eternal sentence to strife. Mexico has wealth to give, but Mexico's people are poor.

Poverty Amid Abundance

Nature poured gold and silver, zinc, lead, iron, manganese, copper, antimony, mercury and molybdenum, all that man needs for an abundant life, into Mexico's mountains. She hid great pools of petroleum under its deserts and plains. Some valleys give two and three crops a year of corn, beans and all manner of grain. Tobacco and coffee and cotton may grow there for the planting, but somehow there is no abundance.

Of the 250 million acres of cultivable land, many millions are virgin.

The climate Nature gave Mexico is part of the curse that clings to the land. In the highlands that rise 8,000 feet and more above sea level, the air is thin and debilitating. On the lowlands a hot sun burns and the mixed estizo race of Spaniard and Indian that stemmed from the natives and conquerors. Old Mexico is an indolent, sun-drunken people, ridden with tuberculosis, racked by seasons of malnutrition.

There is mahogany and rosewood in the forests, and more than 30,000,000 head of all variety of cattle, sheep, goats and pigs, range the plains. Forty per cent of the world's entire silver supply comes from Mexico, but the Mexican currency falters and stumbles, and there is poverty in the land.

But Politicians Grow Fat

Two thirds, by official admission, of Mexico's 20,000,000 men, women, and children over ten years old cannot read or write. One third of that entire population is concentrated in the slums of the large cities or in the adobe towns of the interior. The ignorant and the poor are the peons, uncaring of what mañana may bring, and for a peso in silver and a bottle of tequila they will vote as their masters dictate.

The politicians fatten. They acquire automobiles and haciendas and they live where it is cool and green and they have bank accounts in foreign countries where their money is safe from the uncertainties of internal Mexican politics.

The peons are the despair of those Mexicans who hope for a great future for their country as a respected republic. But if they are the despair then the campesinos, the peasants, are Mexico's hope. A cut above the peons socially and intellectually, they are the farmers of that potentially rich land. Their ancestors held the hills against the armies of France and they followed their Washington, Miguel Hidalgo, and their Lincoln, Benito Juarez, and later the godly but gullible Francisco Madero. Their cry was "Land—give us land . . ." And it is their cry today as Mexico goes to the polls in an election that will mark the turning point in the history of the republic, for the country is at the fork in the road. To the right lies the easy path to totalitarianism, to the left the hard road to reconstruction and democracy.

In the very poverty of Mexico rests the one hope there won't be a revolution. In the days of that Robin Hood renegade, Pancho Villa, the revolutionaries could live off the land. But Mexico has been so reduced economically and materially that it would be hard for rebel bands to feed as they march and ride.

Disillusionment is part of the story of that land of many revolutions where, quipsters say, Leon Trotsky came not for refuge but to learn the art of rebellion. Peasants followed Juarez because he promised them land. He died before he could give them land. Successive administrations have used the agrarian battle cry of "acres for the peasants" to win the elections, and never have they kept their promises.

That was one of the broadest, stoutest planks in the campaign of General Cardenas but, after his election, the peasants saw more than 50,000,000 acres of land confiscated, in September, 1938, and not one acre was given to them. Most of that land was owned by foreigners. Here was a perfect opportunity for the government, the peasants felt, to justify a persistent antiforeign campaign by giving the confiscated or expropriated lands to the voters.

But the government invested title to the land not in individuals, but in rural villages. It was made common public land. Even to the peasant this smacked of Communism. Sentiment against Cardenas grew. It rose steadily in proportion to the rise in the price of frioles and corn and meat. Beans that you could buy for four or five centavos for two pounds a few years ago cost 30 centavos now. It is the same with corn and tortillas and salt.

The people are expressing the gnawing in their bellies as Latins always express such sentiments. On the adobe walls of the villages, in neon signs in the cities, with black paint on the marble exteriors of public buildings, the scrawls read: "Long live Almazan. Down with the Government of the Imposition."

(Continued on page 46)

General Juan Andreu Almazan is the Mexican "People's Choice" to succeed President Cardenas. He stands for agrarian reform, church rehabilitation and for better relations with the U. S.

Opposing Almazan is General Avila Camacho (saluting), candidate of the powerful Partido Revolucionario Mexicano, the Mexican equivalent of the C.I.O. which is controlled by President Cardenas

Plenty of Experience

By Meyer Levin

THE touchiest moment always came with the coffee. As Rick lifted the cup, Lil would wait for the speech. According to how far back he started, she knew how bad it was, and how irritating his day had been. She never drank coffee herself.

Pretty bad was when he went back to high-school days: "Four years of domestic science, and can't even make a cup of coffee! Ye gods!" A woman who could concoct the most complicated five-piece bridge-party sandwiches. Yet day after day, month after month, into the second year now she could go on spoiling the one thing, the one little thing he needed made right. She knew how he depended on coffee.

Then Rick bought her the trick glass brewing pot. This was foolproof. A baby could make good coffee in this thing.

Well—she was no baby. Lil simply couldn't get herself to stand there like a chemist measuring precise cups of water into the flask.

Another item of contention was meals on time. This sermon always came from a weary, exasperated Rick who had been tracing lost shipments all day. He would march directly into the kitchen and glare at the unprepared food. Then he would look at his watch.

Okay! So dinner was late! Other girls had maids to do their shopping, and cooking too.

The most exasperating thing of all, though, was the way he expected her to pick up after him—leaving his socks on the floor, and his stuff scattered around the bathroom.

So the time Rick got sore about the bookcase, there was an explosion. Lil had bought an unpainted little stand, to put by the bed, as she liked to read rental-library mysteries in the mornings. The delivery man left the thing in the middle of the bedroom. Some time soon Lil intended to paint it and put it in place. Once or twice Rick, getting up at night, bumped into the rack. You'd imagine a man would take the trouble to move such a thing out of his way; but not Richard Edmonds. He went on bumping his shin, until one night he rushed barefoot into it and stubbed his toes, hard. "Of all the stupid, slattern tricks!" he howled.

Lil could scarcely believe her ears. Slattern! When he was too lazy to move a little bookcase— But what came afterward was even more astounding. Rick accused her of laziness!

Well, that was enough for Lil. Coffee, to the hair measure! Meals, to the minute! Lazy! So she told him a few. It wasn't a wife he wanted, oh, no! What he wanted was a servant, a drudge, a slavey, a housekeeper! Well, not for her—

Drudge! he shouted. Did she think he had a picnic? Slaving at a desk! Then out he came with the craziest accusations about the lousy way she had been doing her job. Her shopping was wasteful! She left closet lights on for weeks at a time! She threw away enough food to feed a family! He hadn't wanted to kick because he was fond of her, but—

He would glare at the unprepared food. Then he would look at his watch. Okay! So dinner was late.

Fond! A charwoman was all he could be fond of, Lil declared. Nickel nurse! So he grabbed some clothes and stormed out of the house.

By morning Lil had packed; unslept, she took the 7:10 for Indianapolis. She'd stay with sister Helen, until she got a job.

She'd show Rick—she'd get divorced and marry again; someone who appreciated her. She'd show him!

HELEN had a six-room apartment and three kids but made room for Lil by having one of the kids sleep on the sun porch. Every day, Lil had to store the child's bedding on a high closet shelf, teetering on a chair.

Lil went job hunting; but, getting home, she couldn't sit idle while Helen slaved, so though her feet were falling off, she helped in the kitchen. What a family! Warm milk for the youngest, and Junior was thin and had to be coaxed to drink chocolate, and hubby liked tea, and Helen herself was on a vitamin diet; each meal was four meals.

The windows hadn't been washed in a month; Helen couldn't even afford help one day a week, for the heavy cleaning. Her husband was a postal clerk and with three kids it was a tight squeeze. Lil did the windows. She had to admit her sister made a great deal of extra work for herself, like ironing in the bedroom instead of the kitchen, and having to run back and forth to her cooking.

One day Lil sent her sister to a movie, while she undertook the shopping and cooking. But instead of being pleased when she got home, Helen nearly cried. Lil had bought out-of-season strawberries and the sealed-tin coffee Rick used instead of the loose kind that was ten cents cheaper, and Lil had thrown away some veal scraps Helen had been saving for a meat loaf. That was when it really hit Lil, how her sister had to watch every penny. She couldn't be a drain on them, any longer.

She wired her brother Phil, in Chicago.

Phil's suburban cottage was spick and span. His wife looked fresh as a magazine ad. Even their baby had a polished appearance.

But the extra men Phil's wife Beatrice invited for Lil, at her little dinner parties, were always washouts. Maybe Rick was no Fred Astaire, but at least he could keep off a girl's feet. And when he put his arm around you, dancing, you felt he wanted to hold you, not tear you apart.

Then, Phil and his wife took to going out, evenings, leaving Lil to sit with the sleeping baby. Though Beatrice kidded Lil about her getting the home-town paper, always referring to it as "news from the big city," Lil would cuddle up with the Rock City Gazette as soon as they were gone, reading it from front to back, even the silly old want ads. Rick's name was never in the Seen About Town column.

Lil was there four weeks. Altogether she had been away from home nearly two months. Surely he knew where she was. Oh, surely he was missing her too. Oh, why was he so stubborn?

She had to admit her sister-in-law was a good wife. Bea made old-fashioned breakfasts for Phil; the house shone, yet she did all her work in a few hours in the morning, efficiently, with horrible efficiency—just as she cooked with laboratory exactitude.

What finally got Lil, about her sister-in-law, was the coffeepot. It was a glass affair like the one Rick had bought and Beatrice had gone to work and marked the cup levels on the glass so she would always get the proportions. Lil tried it. It made good coffee.

ONE evening, the third time in a row Phil and Beatrice went out. Lil was simply going mad with boredom and loneliness. So she settled down with the Gazette.

It was only nine-twenty and she had even read the long editorial about extending the county fair. Now she only had the two columns of want ads; she read the ads, one by one. And there was a new one.

"Wanted," it said. "Housekeeper. Elderly woman. Experienced. Address: Richard Edmonds, Merchants Shipping Service, 120 Main."

Lil was almost laughing as she opened her pen. Elderly. The darling in her heart, a swing band was playing as she wrote:

"Though I am not so elderly I am sure I can qualify, having had plenty of experience. . . ."

PIERRE laughed and said, "The fools, they missed again. That is two hundred and five shells today."

We were in an advanced observation post on a hill and some distance away was another hill. A German battery was on that hill. It kept firing at the farmhouse in the valley. The farmhouse had a red roof and its sides were pure white. Only the chimney had suffered, but the farmhouse wore its crooked chimney in a very jaunty manner, as an amiable drunk wears a battered hat. This was a gallant farmhouse, perhaps because it knew that it had a whole German division worried.

Our little concrete-and-steel observation post was fooling everyone but the sun. It had been dug into the side of the hill and evergreens had been placed over the steel and the concrete. Sturdy scrub oak and fir trees had been planted in front of it. For the moment this post was the eyes of the army; at least of that part of the army that was defending this sector. Behind us were heavy French tanks and light, quick tanks, machine-gun detachments, heavy 155's and lighter 75's.

We knew what was behind us all right. We knew too that the Germans were in front of us. We could see the flashes from their guns and sometimes through our glasses we could see something move for a moment, but against the dark green foilage of the woods we couldn't tell whether we had seen a tank or an ammunition wagon.

Technically we were in what army people still call No Man's Land. But we were very snug and comfortable in our little pillbox and very safe too. Pierre sat on one side of me and André on the other. Bright young artillery sergeants, these two. There were two slits through the steel and the concrete. Each one was a foot long and ten inches wide. Pierre and André talked and laughed but their eyes never strayed from those slits. Hardly ever. I mentioned that our little nest was fooling everyone but the sun.

André said, "In English you say it like this, you say it is hot like hell?"

"You said it, kid, it is hot like hell." I wiped the sweat from my forehead. André laughed and then Pierre laughed as though they shared some secret joke. They did share a joke. A swell joke. Pierre got up and went back through the dark tunnel that led to another part of our observation post.

Pierre came back. He had a large aluminum canteen with him and its sides were gleaming with cold sweat. He had three tin cups with him. He laughed and poured cold wine into the cups. I had met Pierre and André an hour before but we were pals now. They had accepted me.

"To what shall we drink?" Pierre said.

"To the little farmhouse," I said, and we all laughed and drank to the little farmhouse. We looked and it was still almost intact. The wine was cold and it was beautiful.

Face to Face with 15,000 Germans

We sat in companionable silence watching the scene below us. The German guns were firing fast. We knew that a division of Germans had orders to break through. A division is 15,000 men. That's a lot of men. They were all there in front of us. Some were to the right, thousands of them were behind the hill from which the battery was firing. Thousands were to the left. The French guns were firing fast but we couldn't hear them as well; we were so much closer to the German guns. When a shell leaves a gun it whistles for perhaps five seconds. We could see the flashes of the German guns, hear the whistle and then hear the dull boom.

The story of how I got into that pillbox beyond the front would take too long to tell. A reporter has to know a thousand tricks to get anywhere near the front these days. The last six miles of the trip had to be made on foot. That wasn't good because it had rained the night before and the paths were ankle-deep in mud. The last two miles weren't easy. But they were interesting. A young lieutenant was with me. We'd cross a road and bump into a queer-looking concrete object; a pillbox commanding every horizon. Guns would bristle from a dozen slits in the concrete. An antitank ditch would stop us then. It meant destruction for any German tank that blundered into it. The closer to the front you approached the more your admiration for (Continued on page 50)

"I've never seen anyone like this anonymous French pilot. He was up against superior speed and superior maneuverability. And yet he wasn't getting hurt"

Front Seat in Flanders

By Quentin Reynolds

BY RADIO FROM PARIS AND CENSORED AT THE SOURCE

From an advanced observation post, the French army behind him and before him a German division with written orders to retreat under no circumstances, Quentin Reynolds watched a day's action on the fighting front. Here's what he saw, heard and felt

WHEN IT'S A DATE

By Henry L. Jackson

By Helen Hilck

THE noncombatant in upper left, in squatting position, is wearing a coconut-colored shirt and slack combination, with thick-soled sneakers. His wool hose absorb perspiration, which is exactly what wool hose are supposed to do. He's wearing a short-sleeved shirt, you will notice, but he's also got one just like it with long sleeves. These three-piece outfits and accessories are calculated to blitzkrieg any dame. Anyway, short of a uniform, there's nothing gets the gals like the proper clothes for the proper occasion.

A date for a sail gives our hero an opportunity to show off striped lisle shirt—like the Basques used to wear before they took up khaki—yachting cap and shorts. Canvas shoes with nonskid soles are an essential unless you prefer to go barefoot, which is really more sensible on any boat although, of course, it doesn't look so good. Not if you've got feet like mine. Lower right illustrates the general idea.

And again (lighting the lady's cigarette) he's all set for a swim, because judging from the way his hair is neatly combed he hasn't been near the water yet. He's wearing a wool lastex swim trunk—not recommended for fat guys, potbellies or other loose livers. For most of us it would be better to wear shorts, just shorts, loosely cut. He is also wearing a mesh shirt—it's air-conditioned and permits the sun to snipe through and do a gentle bit of tanning.

At lower left we see our boy friend in Palm Beach cloth jacket and slacks. Notice how tweedy he looks as he spears a weenie. His shirt is a chamois-colored Oxford and he's wearing with it a foulard bow tie, short, rust-colored socks, Norwegian style shoes. The straw hat is a Pandang.

WITH a gay swing of the sh... ders girls today stride... ready for fun, flirtatious... free in clothes cut for action. The... learned that the quickest way to... out of a man's life is to shiver on... boat so he has to take off his... warm sweater and offer it to... or say you're tired, because... can't walk around all day on th... high heels, or tell him that... dress you're wearing will be ru... if you indulge in a bit of real e... cise.

Our Collier's girl has solved... bowling problem with her stri... blue silk shirtwaist dress. The n... here is a sleeve with a fabric in... which allows the most violent... motion without fear of ripping sea... It buttons down the front too... gives her plenty of leg room.

On the boat she wears yel... corduroy slacks and sweatshirt ca... gan that can take the salt spray... are both warm and washable. A... fect frame too for golden beauty.

A bright tricolored midriff in... white celanese rayon bathing... and the turkish toweling shawl... definitely summer 1940.

Ready for the picnic in her b... red and yellow gingham dress t... won't show grass stains and sh... boyish topper in blue flannel v... brass buttons.

And remember the crispness... white gloves, the trimness of l... bound in a mesh turban or bri... scarf. It's the attention you give... the little details in your wardr... that makes it a joy to you and th... who see you.

He wants to play and so do y... but make yourself stand out agai... the background, and the light in... eyes when he smiles approval... mean you're going to have a won... ful time.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY LAWRENCE MONAHAN AND IFOR THOMAS

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY
Berkeley, Calif.

"Ringo wa'n't good enough for a fine gal like Carrie," Dave said. "So I and Carrie hauled off an' divo'ced him. Didn't us, baby?"

The Mule-Angel

By Roark Bradford

ILLUSTRATED BY WILLIAM MEADE PRINCE

Uncle Henry knew about mules. That made him an authority on any subject—especially on theology

GILES had been tactful and Uncle Henry appreciated it. The foreman of Little Bee Bend plantation put on an awful fuss about having to send Ringo to help the aging lotman are for the eighty-odd mules. "You runs around too much at night," the foreman stormed in mock rage. "You ole goat! I bet quick as de sun go down ev'y night, you gits out and wawks de bayou. Den when daylight come, you's too tired to lift de cawn basket. You claim you got a gimp in yo' back. Efn you don't watch out, some lady gonter bus' yo' back!"

Uncle Henry laughed. "I jest can't he'p gittin' about wid de ladies, Mist' Giles," he lied.

"Well," the foreman said, "I'm gonter send Ringo to he'p you tote dem baskets ontwell you settle down."

The blow had fallen, though it had not been as bad as Uncle Henry feared. For some time now, he had expected Ringo to take over the duties at the lot, but Giles had made a good joke about it. Uncle Henry seldom went anywhere except to his cabin across the road, because there was no knowing when something might happen in the lot and he ought to be close at hand. And any mule in the lot would tell you how, many was the time, Uncle Henry had rolled out of bed and grabbed his "drench bottle" at old Sadie's first groan when her bellyaches set in. Or how he had braved flashing heels and milling feet to rescue the arrogant Miss Patsy every time Jude and Queen hemmed her against the trough and began giving her the "heel tonic" she deserved. Yes, the mules knew that Uncle Henry had not neglected them. And Giles knew the same.

But Giles knew and Uncle Henry knew that age was slowing down the lotman.

"Daidhaid," Uncle Henry mumbled to himself. "Hit's bad but hit's a fack." He had told many an old mule just that. He remembered when old Deemus got too old to work and was turned into the pasture. He had seen Deemus watch the other mules go to the field and, instead of eating grass and getting fat, Deemus just stood up and looked sorry.

"You eat yo' grass and forgit dem mules," Uncle Henry told Deemus. "You know good as me you can't drag yo' end er de doubletree all day in de field, like a young mule. You's too old. You's a daidhaid, now. Deemus."

He wouldn't eat, though, and he died off that summer. All the deadheads usually died off soon after being turned into pasture. Once, Uncle Henry experimented with an old mule named Blue. He caught Blue from the pasture and put him to light plowing in the vegetable garden, just to keep up the

(Continued on page 27)

Where Credit was Due

By Jeffers Godfrey

The rise of Beemish Todd, who found love a more complicated matter than business

THERE'S been a mile of stories in newspapers and magazines about the rise of Beemish Todd, but they tell only half the story. . . .

Our town is a town of ten thousand population, and it has a high school of three hundred pupils, and I went through the high school with Beemish. He was an energetic boy, tall for his age, and I suppose was just as good-looking in a steady-eyed, dark-complexioned way as he is as a man today in the newsreels and magazines. But we never noticed his looks much, for his outstanding feature was a kind of cash-mindedness that made him a decided pain in the neck as treasurer of the class, a job he managed to wangle every one of our four years.

Whenever the ice-cream cones at the school cafeteria were looking their largest, there was Beemish to jog the elbow and confiscate the nickel for class dues; and when for a graduation essay he took "Grab the cash and let the credit go" as his theme, we all agreed he certainly was preaching what he always practiced.

About a dozen of us got store jobs around town after graduation, and Beemish Todd was very happy in the cash-only atmosphere of one of the big grocery chains where he could bounce quarters and halves into the till from morning to night. Then his Uncle Dan died and left Beemish alone in the world with an estate that netted a little over eleven hundred dollars cash money.

Beemish immediately enrolled in a night-school course in merchandising, and began to look around town for a business to buy into with his legacy. Several local merchants were receptive to his partnership, for Beemish was a good worker and they could use his money; but Beemish found the stigma of credit attached to their various businesses, and he passed them all up. So he had to look beyond our town, for only the chain concerns were on the strictly cash basis that he demanded.

HE SENT out perhaps thirty letters over a period of a year to small firms in the city of which our town is a suburb, but got no answers. Then he asked me to let him use my father's typewriter; and on Dad's machine he ran off this letter:

Pollard Hardware Co.
27 Canal Street
Pottsburg, State

Dear Sirs:

The STRICTLY CASH sign in the rear of your store pleased me, but the rest of the store is all wrong. For instance: you have tables of low-priced, quick-turnover hardware right down through the center of the store. Now I read that myself on page 36 of Bloom's Modern Merchandising, just the way you did; but the trouble is you didn't read far enough, and a little knowledge is a dangerous thing. Let me quote Bloom, page 211: "Get your traffic into the store. Sales are in direct ratio to customer penetration. The farther in the customer walks, the farther out he has to walk. And every customer step is a potential sale."

I am ready to invest $1143.32 in Pollard Hardware when and if:

1. You remove those tables that bounce a customer back on the sidewalk before he's in the store, and:
2. You fire the cashier.

Yours truly,
BEEMISH TODD

An answer came with surprising promptness.

Dear Mr. Todd:

The tables are out, and if you really have $1143.32 to invest, you'd better hurry up.

But the cashier has to stay. What's wrong with her?

Yours truly,
POLLARD HARDWARE CO.

Pollard Hardware Co.
27 Canal Street
Pottsburg, State

Dear Sirs:

This is what's wrong with her, as found out when in your store. I bought a five-cent article, and went over to her with the sales slip. She was reading a love mag. I gave her a dollar bill and the five-cent slip. She gave me back a dollar and five cents in silver. I gave her back the extra dime. She looked at the slip and gave me back a nickel. I gave her back the nickel. She looked at the slip and looked at the nickel. She said: "What are you waiting for?—it's nickel sale."

Now, being a man of the world, I know the biological effect of a baby-faced blonde with the probable conformation of a bubble dancer. But in successful cash business you have to be objective, and there are two necessities for a hardware cashier:

1. The ability to make change and say "thank you," and keep her nose out of a love book, and:
2. Brains.

Your blonde has neither. However, I agree to let her stay, if she has to, and I will be in at 11:30 A.M. the 28th inst.

Yours truly,
BEEMISH TODD

My dear Mr. Todd:

Never mind coming in.
Very truly yours,
POLLARD HARDWARE CO.

Pollard Hardware Co.
27 Canal Street
Pottsburg, State

Dear Sirs:

I will be in at 11:30 A.M. the 28th inst.
Yours truly,
BEEMISH TODD

On the next Monday, Beemish walked into Pollard Hardware. The middle floor of the little store was empty of tables and stock; but, unless you could call a few pounds of loose nails scattered over shelves and floor stock, there wasn't any stock anywhere.

Beemish said: "You've overdone it. No one answered him. He looked around and saw there wasn't a clerk in the store. There was no one in the store."

"Do you know how many times I've asked her to quit cashiering and marry me, Beemish?" Harry asked. "I don't want to hear about it," Beemish said pt the blonde in the cashier's cage, in she was too busy reading a love oc to pay any attention to him. Beemish walked over to her.

"Where's Mr. Pollard, or whoever was Pollard Hardware?" he asked her. "I'm Rita Pollard," the girl said, going on with her reading, "and I'm Pollard Hardware—what's left of it." "Where's all the stock?" Beemish asked, gulping down his natural chagrin finding anyone like her was Pollard Hardware.

The jobbers took out whatever belonged to them, and let it go at that. Harry Harmon got them to agree to it so there wouldn't be any bankruptcy, and Pollard Hardware would be a going concern when you were up with your money."

"You call an empty store like this a going concern?"

He turned a page.

"SURE, it's going," she said, "but you can figure for yourself which way it's headed."

Beemish asked: "Who's this Harry Harmon?"

She stopped reading.

"What do you want to know for?" she asked.

"He seems to have an unhealthy interest in you and this business," Beemish said darkly, letting his natural chagrin get the better of him.

"He's the son of Harmon and Son, the biggest wholesale hardware house in Pottsburg," she said, "and don't kid yourself that he has any interest in Pollard Hardware as a business." She giggled suddenly, slapped shut her magazine, stopped giggling and came walking out of the cage. She was a little bump for bubble-dancing, but she had that was Beemish's idea of a perfect type. She demanded: "Just what's healthy in a fellow's having an interest in a girl like me?"

Beemish couldn't answer that. At the moment, he was suffering a vital interest in her himself. He was tingling through every inch of his circulatory system; it was, if anything, too healthy a tingle; and it certainly had nothing to do with the hardware business.

"You'd better keep away from that Harry just the same," he said.

"Say, you've got a nerve! You'd think you owned—"

"I own half the business, don't I?"

She stared at him. Her blue eyes, widening, were very blue and very beautiful. "You don't mean you're going to put your eleven hundred dollars to a defunct concern!"

Beemish chided: "You said yourself it was a going concern."

"It's been going for fifty years, sure—but right now Pollard Hardware hasn't a nickel's worth of assets to its name."

"You're wrong," Beemish said. "It has my money, it has fifty years of good will, it has my brains."

She grinned at him.

"Oh, well, in that case it's got me, too—in the cage."

"I was speaking of assets," Beemish said.

"Is that so, wise guy! Well, let me tell you something. As long as Pollard Hardware has a cashier, I'm it, and don't kid yourself it'll ever be anyone different!"

Beemish nodded in resignation.

"I know that," he said. "I agreed to that in my letter."

"Your letter!" Then she went so fast from indignation into a dulcet giggle that Beemish was a little dizzy. "That reminds me that I'm late for a date to eat lunch at the Brass Rail with Harry Harmon. Here—take the keys. I can't seem to get away from Harry since you put that about the bubble dancer in your letter."

She tossed over the keys, she got out a dainty compact and accentuated her beauty, and she walked out the door. Beemish's heart went right along with her.

However, Beemish lost no time indulging his jealousy. He hustled into the back office and got down the ledgers to get a true picture of Pollard Hardware. It was a bad picture. No funds—and a thousand unpaid customer accounts dating back as far as fifty years. So the sign in the store about Strictly Cash didn't mean anything. Well, it would in the future.

He grabbed his hat, locked up the store and set out for the Brass Rail.

He found Rita and Harry in a rear booth, and he sat down and had lunch with them. Harry was so pleasant and well-groomed and smilingly sophisticated that Beemish was suspicious of him from the outset. However, he ordered seven hundred dollars' worth of basic hardware from Harry during the meal, cash on delivery and cancellable in part or in toto at the buyer's will, and Harry reciprocated by paying the three lunch checks.

While Rita was weighing herself on the free scales on the way out, Harry said: "I tell you one thing, Beemish. You'll never get anywhere with Rita handling the cash. That was the trouble the last time."

(Continued on page 48)

"You figure you're keeping within the terms of our partnership agreement, Beemish?" she said

ILLUSTRATED BY ROBERT O. REID

ROBERT O. REID

Here, as Dr. Langer envisions it, is the new and fascinating way of life that lies within the immediate grasp of man through utilization of Uranium-235, the long-sought, practical source of atomic power. It's a world that is changed socially as well as physically, and a world of ease, comfort, luxury and security for everybody in it

Fast New World

By Dr. R. M. Langer

RESEARCH ASSOCIATE IN PHYSICS, CALIFORNIA INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY

Science unleashes a tremendous new source of energy. Here are the things, fantastic only yesterday, that you'll probably live to see

IN NO war of the past has the average man had more reason than he has right now to look forward toward the inevitable peace with greater faith in the eventual prosperity, security and happiness of himself and his family. In no other year of despair and suffering among men has there been a kinder and brighter light on the horizon ahead. This is not a promise of Utopia centuries away. It is a statement of facts that will profoundly change for the better the daily lives of you and yours.

Despite current headlines we are about to enter a period of unparalleled richness and opportunities for all. Privilege and class distinctions and the other sources of social uneasiness and bitterness will become relics because things that make up the good life will be so abundant and inexpensive. War itself will become obsolete because of the disappearance of those economic stresses that immemorably have caused it. Industrious, powerful nations and clever, aggressive races can win at peace far more than could ever be won at war.

This is not visionary. The foundations of the happy era have already been laid. The driving force is within our grasp. Reality is about to be handed from the scientists in their laboratories to the engineers in their factories for application to your daily life. It is a new form of power—atomic power. It will change our lives in a thousand ways. On the basis of how you live today you cannot make the chart of how you will live tomorrow. You must draw a wholly new picture.

Transportation anywhere on, over or beyond the earth will be at your personal touch. The face of the earth will be changed—with rails, houses and roads gone. Your social and cultural and recreational life will have infinite variety. Everything—your clothes, food, health—will be touched by the wand.

The source of this new power lies in the element called U-235. This is a special kind of Uranium, which, until recently, was the ninety-second, or last and heaviest, in the scale of known elements. (Now the discovery of a ninety-third and a ninety-fourth has been reported.)

Uranium is derived from pitchblende, a mineral found in many parts of the world from Connecticut to Norway and Germany. Ninety-nine per cent of the Uranium is uninteresting for us here, but in a ton of pitchblende there are some ten pounds of a special kind of Uranium. Concentrated and disposed a suitable manner, already known, special Uranium, called U-235, is a fuel of remarkable intensity and flexibility. One pound of U-235 can be made give out as much heat as can be obtained from 1,000 tons of coal. If coal is worth $5 a ton as fuel, then a pound of U-235 is worth $5,000 as fuel. But this does not do justice to U-235. Coal is bulky and limited in the temperatures at which it burns, U-235 is marvelously compact and incredibly easy to manage. It can be made to maintain a constant temperature, high or low. It could be used to incubate eggs, or to give white-hot incandescence. It can be turned on and off like an electric light. It can be exploded with a violence beyond anything known on earth, and it can be stored, without deterioration, indefinitely.

ROLF KLEP

Now I have said that as cheap and simple fuel, compared with coal at $5 a ton, U-235 is worth $5,000 a pound. But it would also do what is required of gasoline. Compared with the production cost of gasoline, at four cents a gallon for the best quality, U-235 is worth at least $10,000 a pound. When substituted for electricity at one cent per kilowatt hour it is worth $100,000 a pound. As a competitor for the storage battery; or for radium, in treating cancer; or as fuel for rocket ships; it is vastly more valuable than any of the rates quoted.

But so far this picture has been drawn upside down. It is nonsense to discuss the dollar value of U-235. If veins containing 1 per cent of the Uranium in the earth's crust are discovered, and when refineries are developed for extraction of U-235 from the Uranium ore, then U-235 will, itself, be the standard of value. It will furnish the true energy dollar. The gold standard will have become incomprehensible. It is not too soon to begin adjusting ourselves to the situation that will exist then.

The Age of U-235

As a physicist, perhaps, I ought to be devoting myself now to a deeper study of U-235, itself, and leave to the new generation of businessmen and housewives the design for the civilization of the next era: "The Age of U-235." But the subject is fascinating. I have dabbled in it and I present without shame a look across the threshold of a new and startling world:

Your "Sunday driving" will be in a propellerless plane 50 miles above the surface of the earth. When you make a trip to see a fine display of the aurora borealis you make a note, on the way, of the weather that is moving toward your home so that you can make plans for the next few days. A little practice at a height of 50 miles makes you practically infallible about the weather.

In your home the big problem is entertainment. You have access to everything produced anywhere in the world—so too have your friends. But it is harder than ever to provide something interesting, new, unexpected, colorful. With universal facilities at command, people have become experts on colors, sounds and flavors. They have everything and still they must keep on their toes. They have the best of everything, but tradition forbids them to be too easily satisfied. They are driven to achievement.

Energy has become so cheap that it isn't worth making a charge for it. It is so convenient there are no distribution costs. That means that freight as well as passenger transportation are public utilities; like the heat and light and water in your house, you don't have to pay for them at all. But the big, sudden change brought about by U-235 is that man is no longer dependent upon the sun for his cheapest and most essential manufacture—the production of food. This means that any country, with any climate, at any time of the year, on very small acreage, indoors, can grow what it needs to feed and clothe and provide shelter for its citizens. The citizens need only contribute according to their talents: administrative, manipulative or technical services for a small fraction of their time.

Real Steps Toward Utopia

The notion that food will become less important, or less attractive, or less palatable than it is nowadays is obvious nonsense. There may be artificial foods, but they will have to compete with Nature's products, improved by all that genetics and complete control of environment can contribute. Surely we can expect to accelerate the growth of plants and animals, to improve breeds, to generate new species.

We shall be able to satiate ourselves with all the plastics our ingenuity can discover. Textiles and building materials would be scarcely worth charging for, and we shall have to invent luxuries sufficiently interesting to occupy the

(Continued on page 54)

Then Montana came again. A left hook blazed again and didn't miss. McGinty heard the thunder in his head

Down Went McGinty

By William Fay

ILLUSTRATED BY GILBERT DARLING

It's easy to give up the title when you're still champion, but it's tough to get it back if you should change your mind

BUSINESS was hot cakes within the Midnight Club. The trumpets blew the dinner music higher than the rhythm of the piano and the strings, but kept it soft and disciplined with mutes. Some people danced. McGinty drained his drink. "The sweetest little girl in all the world is what you are," McGinty said. "Just let me have the fifty bucks."

The girl said, "No."

McGinty laughed and watched the girl. The drinks he had inside of him were multiple and fine, of rum and lemon juice and goodly things he'd never had in quantity before. "True love is not a matter of accountancy," he said. "Fifty bucks is corn flakes to a guy like me."

"Where I live it's the rent," she said. "Oh, Barney, cut it out. You're such a clown. Don't make a face like that. It wasn't my idea, you know. You said we'd put aside so much each week. You took a hundred yesterday."

"I knew a guy who needed it," he said.

"You knew a horse. A milk-wagon horse. He must have been dragging the wagon. He was ninth."

McGinty was startled. His eyes found refuge from her wise and pious glance, and viewed, instead, his knobbed and lumpy hands. But McGinty wore no lumps upon his head. He was a clean and very pleasant-looking gent. "How'd you know?" he asked the girl. "Where'd you hear a thing like that?"

"I hear a lot of things I'm not supposed to hear. I wouldn't care," she said. "I wouldn't care a bit if you hadn't promised me. It was your idea, Barney, and your money, too. It's not mine. You can mind it yourself. I wish you would."

Mary wore her anger quite attractively, he thought. It gave new color to her strong and lovely face; it gave live meaning to the dark depths of her eyes that were so large and soft and deeply blue, now gleaming with the moisture of the tears she hadn't shed. He'd never seen her cry, but she'd come close a time or two, as when one time he'd been hit cleanly on the chin, or that other time, more ghastly still, when their marriage plans were made, then dissolved with quick disaster in an all-night game of craps.

"I'm gonna buy you a rock as big as your eye," he said. "A five-thousand-dollar rock. A headlight, wait and see."

THE words just made him foolish, he supposed. He'd said them all so many times, and so sincerely he would swear to all the saints they would come true. "Tonight's the night," he said. "Tonight my pal the Sailor becomes a golden goose. He even looks like a goose. Just wait'll you see his nose."

She only smiled a little bit, her soft lips breaking slowly from her white and perfect teeth. She might have been Miss America, if she tried to be. He placed a finger firmly on one nostril, and then nasally intoned, "Them — wedding — bells—are—"

"Barney—be sensible!" she said, then nudged him gently with a toe beneath the table set for two. "Paul will be coming over," Mary told him then. "People can hear you. They're looking at you."

"They're looking at you," he said. "Because you are so pretty." He placed the finger on his nose again and threatened to renew the song. "Gimme the fifty bucks," he said. "Gimme; gimme; gimme."

She concealed the money in her pocket and managed to get it under the rumpled napkin next to him. McGinty said, "You're a great big bag of sugar."

"I'm a what?"

"You're sweet," he said, but believing she was better than that, and hoped did not consider him a worm for wanting all the money he had firmly resolved to save, through the simple measure of placing it in her more trustworthy hands. Except McGinty was in hock, and knew it well.

Paul Keegan stopped to ask them if the service was all right, and if the ste-

just exactly as they should be, and drinks. Paul was a tall and serious young man whose face was just as honest as the tinkle of a silver dime. He owned the Midnight Club and all the costly things therein. He used to be a dancer in some clubs around the town, but everybody said his brain was nimbler than his feet. He used to dance with Mary, who was eleven years ago, when both of them, aged nineteen years, saw Barney in the Golden Gloves.

Paul sat and drank some claret wine. He never used the stronger stuff. He said to Mary, "You're the finest decoration in the place." He always said something like that when Mary was around, and he wore a slightly punchy look until she went away. Paul was a noble gentleman, McGinty was convinced, but he knew that sheer nobility was not so easily starched. He never felt quite comfortable with characters of tested metal. He had another drink, a habit very strange to him. The fights at the garden were scheduled to begin, and he went to the checkroom together. He chose this moment for the fixing of his hair. "Great little girl," Paul Keegan said. "The best in the world," McGinty said. "It always went like this. 'You've got a nice place, Paul. You're doing pretty swell.'"

"I'd be lying if I said things weren't good. You know I'm opening up another fight in a little while."

McGinty said he'd heard.

"I'll have to plug the other place," said Paul. "It's going to be uptown a bit. I have to give it all my time."

"You'll find time, Paul. You always get things done."

"I thought that you might like the job to manage this place here. People like you, Barney. You know that. It's worth a hundred dollars every week to you."

McGINTY feared something like this.

He knew that Paul was being nice to him, being big, and stretching his nobly content heart as long as a city block.

He looked at Paul. He said, "No, thanks." The way he said no, thanks, he meant no, thanks. "But it's nice of you, Paul, and things are not as fourteen-year-old as they might be, pal. Mary and I are getting married soon, you know, but I guess the Sailor's gonna pull us tough. The man is tough."

Paul made no further offers through the kindness of his heart. He said, "Best luck to the Sailor, Barney. How's the fight he's going to fight?"

"Delaney? A pretty smart boy, Paul. He's been around. Nice boxer, but no teacher. Sailor should eat the guy."

"Eat him?"

"A slip of the tongue," McGinty said. "The Sailor will eat anything, regardless of race, color or creed. He's a sporting fellow. He bit a guy's ear in Boston. Lookit, Paul—" Mention of the Sailor's appetite reminded McGinty of further indebtedness. Being an indulgent man, he had permitted his heavyweight to be fed the two-dollar lunches at the Midnight Club—special rations of rare meats and spinach for the Sailor, but strictly no sweets, except a cup of custard now and then, a little ice cream, a chocolate bar. "What do I owe you for the Sailor's meals, Paul?"

"That's all right, Barney. See me after the fight." The implication was that McGinty had no scratch. It was a state of mind he wished to leave with no one other than Mary, and certainly not with Paul, who used to have a bank account of twenty bucks a week. He drew the fifty dollars from his pocket. "I meant to speak to you before. How much?"

"Oh—oh, let me see. Maybe twenty-five, twenty-six—say twenty-five, Barney. No rush about the thing at all."

McGinty saw his fifty dollars cut in half. He hoped the Sailor enjoyed the meals. It would be all right if the Sailor won tonight, and, naturally, there was no doubt that he would win tonight. But just suppose—suppose he lost tonight!

"Great guy, the Sailor. Nothing but the best," McGinty said. "I'll tell ya, Paul—I'll tell ya what I'll do." He flipped a nickel lightly in the air, then held it flat and covered on his hand. "For a gag," he said. "It's fifty bucks or on the house." His careless smile said this would be the sporting thing to do, but his hand upon the nickel was wet with sudden sweat.

Paul didn't smile. He just said, "Tails."

The nickel showed the buffalo. "Tails is right," McGinty said. "Some day I'm gonna shoot a buffalo. I'm goin' up to the zoo in the Bronx and shoot one in the head." He gave the fifty bucks to Paul.

"You'd probably bring the buffalo home for ham and eggs. Or pawn him for his hide." The voice was just in back of him. The voice belonged to Mary, no one else, and no doubt she had stood silent there while he lost the fifty bucks.

Their cab moved slowly in the rain. (Continued on page 38)

"For a gag," he said, "it's fifty bucks or on the house." His hand was wet with sudden sweat

No poetic nonsense bothered Greg, who snatched the paper from her and wolfed through it with his eyes

Rain Before Seven

By John August

ILLUSTRATED BY C. C. BEALL

The Story Thus Far:

BITTER enemies, in the little city of Wallisport, Massachusetts, John Gabriel (whose machine-tool company is feverishly filling war orders) and Caleb Thatcher are in love with the same girl: Hope Shaler; and Hope is engaged to John.

Because Caleb had fought on the Loyalist side in Spain, John believes that he is a dangerous "Red." . . . Bert Hendricks, a labor leader, comes to Wallisport. Caleb had served with him in Spain and gives him a warm welcome; and when one of John Gabriel's factory buildings is burned and John accuses Hendricks of incendiarism, Caleb helps him to make his getaway. . . . Meanwhile, Natalie Gabriel (widow of John's brother) has become infatuated with a British industrial spy: Greg Ashburn. From her, Ashburn is obtaining much valuable secret data. . . .

Hendricks returns to Wallisport. Unable to find Caleb, he approaches Hope and implores her to ask Caleb to meet him in Boston. Then, knowing that the police are after him, he steals away, disappears. . . . Hope delivers the message. Later, learning that John is on the point of calling in the G-men, she hurries to Boston, succeeds in finding Caleb (whom she warns). But Hendricks does not show up—before he can meet Caleb, he is drowned. . . .

Bert Hendricks drowned? Caleb does not believe it. He feels sure that his friend has been murdered. And, interpreting something that Hendricks had said to Hope, he is certain that he can name the murderer: a person named Heinemann.

Caleb and Hendricks had served under Heinemann, in Spain. Heinemann, a Nazi member of the fifth column in the Loyalist army, had betrayed his unit to the enemy. Many men, cruelly trapped, had died. Caleb and Hendricks had escaped, miraculously. Whereupon, Caleb and Hendricks had vowed that, some day, they would "get" Heinemann. But, coming to America, Heinemann had somehow succeeded in bringing about the death of Hendricks. . . .

Following a serious quarrel with Caleb—a quarrel in which Hope, who is present, takes Caleb's side—John Gabriel goes to his home. Entering, he finds the house dark. Hearing someone in the library, he steps into the room, seizes the intruder—Natalie! Natalie asserts that she, too, had heard someone in the room, and had come downstairs to investigate.

John goes to a safe. In it, undisturbed, is a copy of some important "mobilization plans." He turns to Natalie. "You saved it," he says. Then Natalie faints.

VII

NO ONE had counted how often Caleb had said, "Oh, damn the police!" This time there was sharpness in Hope's voice when she answered, "If you don't tell them anything, you can't expect anything from them."

She was right—and she had been right oftener than he throughout these weeks. But when, this morning, he had tried to make Jim Dowdy believe that Bert had been murdered, it had been absolutely clear that he must not tell anything of what he knew. He had to make sure of the crucial day or two when there must be no sign anywhere that he suspected anything. So, naturally, Jim Dowdy had stood on what he knew. There was no mark on Bert's body, there was water in his lungs—it was a drowning and there was no reason to suspect anything else. And Caleb, telling the union that he would put off the funeral for twenty-four hours more in the hope of locating relatives, had repulsively had another physician verify the findings. Nothing. A drowned man—who had been murdered. . . . That crucial day or two of apparent ignorance might very well, he knew, serve the unseen antagonist as much as it served him. Or more. The risk had to be taken.

"You've got to tell them everything," Hope said. "I know all the arguments and I still say you've got to tell them everything. At once—now—before . . . Her voice trailed off.

But she was composed, and it was amazing how, these last weeks, the exquisiteness of her features had become strength as well. Only a little more than a month ago he had seen her lying on the same scuffed couch she was sitting on now, and had told her with an inconceivable casualness that a tomboy had grown up into a beautiful woman. And

(Continued on page 30)

Batting Averages are Cockeyed

by George H. Sisler

Is the ballplayer who cleans the bases rate a better batting average than one who barely beats a bunt? George Sisler, former batting star, thinks the entire rating system should be changed

WHEN I was playing in the big leagues I never had any reason to kick about the way the scoring was done but even then I realized that something was wrong with the system. Then, when I became manager of the St. Louis Browns, I was even more convinced of it. I knew, for instance, that Al Severeid, our catcher, was the best to have up there at the plate in the world, but if we rewarded him on the basis of his official batting record, he would have been about the worst paid player on the squad.

The situation was bad in this instance because of the faults of the scoring method, the most glaring during last year's World Series. Certainly a team like the New York Yankees, winning the series in four straight games, ought to have a decided edge in the statistics. On the contrary, the present system of computing averages miserably failed to reflect this difference. The powerhouse Yankees had a batting average of .206 against a mark hung up by the Cincinnati Reds of .203. Does this explain why the Yanks whipped the Reds so severely? The difference of three points in the averages would seem to indicate that the teams were evenly matched in batting. Yet anybody who saw that game knows that the Reds were overwhelmed by the heavy-hitting New Yorkers.

It is obvious that a hitter who slams a home run with the bases loaded would have a higher rating than a man who beats out a bunt with the bases empty. One day with the Browns, Harry Williams, our edition of Babe Ruth, hit three home runs and drove in four runs. In the same game Herschel Bennett, a sub outfielder, had four singles in four times at bat, two of the infield scratch variety and none of them entering into the outcome of the game. According to the records, Bennett hit 1.000 for the day and Williams, who won the game for us, had to be content with .750.

Likewise, a runner who scores from first base on a double or one who goes from first to third on a single is of more offensive value to the club than a slow-footed individual who can't get those extra bases. During one of my late years I hit .340 with the Boston Braves and appeared, on paper, to be a great success, but in reality I was about through. My legs had begun to go and I found I couldn't get from first to third on a single, as I had easily done in the past. As an effective ballplayer I was about half as good as I had formerly been but you would never have known it from looking at the averages.

In short, the present method of computing baseball batting averages is all cockeyed. It simply doesn't give a just or fair or even sensible picture of the situation.

There are literally hundreds of examples every season to bear this statement out. Take this one: In New York the bases are filled in the last half of the ninth, with the score tied at 4-4. Two are out and Mel Harder, the Cleveland ace, is facing Joe DiMaggio, the hitting wonder. The crowd is tense in anticipation because this is the test of a true hitter. Spurning the first two offerings, DiMaggio swings lustily on the third and drives a sharp single into left, winning the game.

The scene changes to Detroit where DiMaggio is facing Buck Newsom, the Right: Joe DiMaggio, Yankee headliner. He would almost certainly retain his supremacy under the author's efficiency-rating system

Left: Frank McCormick of the Reds, who hit .400 in the World Series. His rating under Sisler's system would not be as impressive

ANGUTI

THOMAS

These Our Rulers

By John T. Flynn

Lesson Number Two in practical politics: How to make a million dollars in ten easy years on an annual salary of $15,000. Long-suffering patience and uncomplaining co-operation are what it takes. Not from you, of course. From the taxpayers

ON THE thirteenth day of April, 1933, there was great excitement at Clark and Randolph streets. Crowds were streaming into City Hall. Edward F. Kelly was being crowned as mayor to succeed the dead Tony Cermak. Only a few were admitted to the Council Chamber for the induction. But it was a gala event. It was a notable event in Chicago history—notable for the odd assortment of celebrities there, celebrities who would before long add strange and even tragic draperies to their fame.

There were all the men who ruled that powerful machine which held—and holds—Chicago in the hollow of its hands. There was Kelly, handsome, strong, capable—just being made mayor—smiling, showing a trace of gravity over the somewhat less friendly demonstrations outside. There was Nash—old P. A.—titular boss, co-partner in what has come to be the Kelly-Nash machine—squat, broad-shouldered, past seventy. At the door, exercising discretion on who should be admitted to the great scene, was Moe Rosenberg—good old Moe!—boss of the Twenty-fourth Ward, the man who, with Tony Cermak, picked up the wreck of the Democratic party in Cook County when George Brennan

Pay-off man for Chicago utilities was Junkman Moe Rosenberg, who handed politicians, judges and other officials $500,000 in cash in two years

County Clerk Robert Sweitzer was $400,000 short in his accounts because his office was a loan agency for politicians. He was tried and was acquitted

William Harding Johnson, above, Chicago's superintendent of schools and storm center of the controversy over the principals' examinations that provided jobs for Kelly-Nash political favorites. Johnson's recent re-election has started a new wave of indignation among Chicago's rebellious teachers died, bailed it out of debt and put it on the road to power. There was Bob Sweitzer—genial, dapper, popular Bob Sweitzer, twice Democratic candidate for mayor and one of the great chieftains of the party. There was Frank V. Zintak, another one of the inner bund or ruling class. And there was old Bathhouse John Coughlin and Hinky-Dink Mike Kenna—the Hink and the Bath—for almost fifty years lords of the Loop, rulers of the mighty First Ward.

There was Jake Arvey, headman of the council, Number Three man or deputy assistant boss, smilingly managing the proceedings. There was William J. Conners (Bottsie Conners), Big Chief of the Forty-second, and John J. Touhy, equally Big Chief of the Twenty-seventh Ward, yet to be tried on the Sanitary District charges. And Tom Courtney, the young state's attorney, who would bring tears to Kelly's eyes ere long. Here was the cast of characters in the big show that was about to open as the Kelly-Nash bus tuned up, took off the brakes that April morning and set off on its career.

Before long there would be the darnedest, biggest "gittin'-up" day of skeletons—skeletons popping up out of various old closets to bedevil Mr. Kelly and Mr. Nash. And they are important to us because these skeletons help to answer the questions—who pays the bills? Where does the dough come from? What is it makes a machine possible?

One of the first skeletons to pop up rose from that biggest of all skeleton closets, the Internal Revenue Bureau in Washington. It hit Moe Rosenberg. You've never heard of Moe—but if you'll take a look around your town you will probably find you have a little Moe of your own right there.

Moe Rosenberg was just one of the best fellows that ever lived. Any number of people in Chicago have assured me that he "was just a hell of a swell guy." A fellow could go to Moe practically any time and put the bee on him for a grand or two, or even ten grand if the need was great. Moe went around always with a big roll of what Kelly's lawyer called "frogskins." And he would peel off a healthy wad for anybody who was a "right guy." In Chicago there are "right guys" and "wrong guys." A right guy is a fellow who is in your own racket and plays the game straight whether it is politics, dope or homicide. A wrong guy is one who can't be trusted. Personally, Moe was a junkman. Which was nothing against him socially—for right at this moment there's a gentleman in Chicago who is nothing less than a tycoon—Billy Skidmore—who is a junkman. Billy Skidmore is good enough to be indicted for owing the government $300,000 in taxes—and Billy is a junkman. Moe was personally a junkman, but publicly boss of the Twenty-fourth Ward. "But Moe wasn't one to draw ward lines," a politician assured me. "I seen Moe pass out $250 a precinct to every precinct captain for a half a dozen wards in a judicial election." He was big-hearted like that—not the least provincial.

Moe was one of three brothers. His pa was in the junk business before him and passed that enterprise on to Mike and Moe—brothers. There was another brother, Itchy—a fine man too. He was part of a gang that knocked over Eddie Loux, Western Electric inspector. Then he ran a black-and-tan joint in Cottage Grove Avenue known as the Ritz Carlton, until Judge Wilkerson put a padlock on it. This was all excellent training for Itchy's real career, for after this he became Morals Inspector of the Police Department. Fine boys, those Rosenbergs!

Mike ran the junk yard, but Moe knocked around a bit at first. He tried his hand at one thing and another—running a saloon for one thing, and arson

(Continued on page 56)

LUCKIES' FINER TOBACCO MEANS LESS NICOTINE

Authoritative tests reveal that Luckies' finer tobaccos contain less nicotine than any other leading brand!

Here's the natural result of buying finer, selected cigarette tobacco for Lucky Strike. The average nicotine content of Luckies, for over two years, has been 12% less than the average of the four other leading brands*—less than any one of them.

This fact is proven by authoritative tests and confirmed, from time to time, by independent laboratories.

You see, each year we exhaustively analyze tobaccos before purchase. Thus our buyers can select the leaf that is rich and mellow, yet mild and low in nicotine content—then buy it up.

The result—a cigarette of finer, rich and mellow tobaccos with a naturally lower nicotine content. Have you tried a Lucky lately?

With men who know tobacco best—it's *LUCKIES 2 TO 1

Copyright 1940, The American Tobacco Company

*NICOTINE CONTENT OF LEADING BRANDS

From January 1938 through March 1940, Lucky Strike has had an average nicotine content of 2.02 parts per hundred—averaging 9.82% less nicotine content than Brand A; 21.09% less than Brand B; 15.48% less than Brand C; 3.81% less than Brand D.

Mobilgas

SOCONY-VACUUM

The Sign of Friendly Service

"Great 'Brand' on any Range!"

No wonder Mobilgas suits so many motorists! It's balanced to give all good gasoline qualities...not just one or two. Drive in for Mobilgas, Mobiloil and famous Friendly Service!

COWBOY OR TENDERFOOT—wrangler or dude...everybody knows the Red Horse "brand"!

From coast to coast, it identifies Mobilgas, America's favorite gasoline!

This modern motor fuel is packed with all the punch, power, and smooth mileage today's fast-firing cars need.

It's made with all 8 great gasoline qualities...every one of them essential for clean, smooth firing...full, quiet power...good, all-round performance!

You'll see what we mean when you get a tankful of Mobilgas for your car.

Visit your Mobilgas Dealer. Enjoy this exciting "Balanced Performance":

1. Quick starts despite cool engine.
2. Fast warm-up—rapid acceleration.
3. Freedom from vapor-lock—no stalls.
4. Minimum crankcase oil dilution.
5. High anti-knock value.
6. Cleanliness—freedom from gum.
7. Full, smooth power under all conditions.
8. Long mileage—economical operation.

SOCONY-VACUUM OIL COMPANY, INC.
AND AFFILIATES
Magnolia Petroleum Co.—General Petroleum Corp. of Calif.

The Mule-Angel

Continued from page 15

tion that the mule was still useful. Old Blue was too accustomed to plowing in big cotton fields and too contrary to listen to reason, so, after destroying a whole row of butter beans and knocking down tomato sticks, Uncle Henry gave up and turned the mule back to pasture. Blue didn't die off until the following winter but he did die.

If Giles had been a man of less understanding, Uncle Henry knew that he, too, would probably have died of a broken heart as soon as Ringo came to the lot. This humbug of bayou-rambling and neglecting the stock—that made it easy.

"Giles is all right," Uncle Henry decided. "He ack mo' like a mule den any an I ever knowed."

B'R CHARLIE was not so tactful. B'R Charlie was the one-legged blacksmith who was also the plantation's teacher. His shop, not far from the barn, was a dull enough place to idle time away, but with Ringo doing all the heavy work in the lot and mules off in the field dragging plows, Uncle Henry had to talk to somebody.

"Set on de kaig," the blacksmith offered. "I figgered you'd do a heap er ettin' over hyar, whilst Ringo feed de cock."

Uncle Henry sat. "Yeah," he said. Ringo handle de cawn basket and de ump handle real good. So I'm gonter t him learn. Den when I git ole and ove up, he be able to go right ahaid id de mules, good as me."

"When you gits ole and stove up?" B'r Charlie repeated.

"Yeah. I was bawn endurin' de year er de surrender, dey tells me. And one er dese days—"

"One er dese days, nothin'!" B'r Charlie snorted. "You a daidhaid, right ow, and you know hit. Efn Giles a'n't skeered er de Widow Duck, he'd urn you a-loose and run you up in de hills. He know Mis' Duck is partial to ou, cause you a deacon in de church."

Being a deadhead was not a pleasant future to contemplate and the lotman was never a one to contemplate unpleasant futures. As a matter of fact, he was beginning to feel capricious, what with no work to do and nothing to worry about. "So," he said now, as if he idea had been with him a long time, "I'm fixin' to take up preachin'."

"Preachin'!" B'r Charlie exclaimed. "Whar you gonter preach at?"

"At de church. Ole Ship er Zion."

"Dat's my church!" B'r Charlie shouted. "Ain't nobody kin preach in dat church unless I say."

"I figgered," Uncle Henry blandly pointed out, "dat hit was de Lawd's church."

With that he abruptly walked out, leaving B'r Charlie in complete mental disorganization. Back at the lot, Uncle Henry saw that Ringo had placed the proper amount of corn in the long troughs, had the hayrack filled and the pump running. He gave detailed instructions on methods of getting the work done.

"And you got to start fussin' at Dave quick as he git in de lot to make him scrape de sweat off'n ole Bug-Eye's collar. Dave jest won't scrape a collar efn you don't fuss at him."

Ringo protested. "I don't like to fuss at Dave. Whyn't you stay hyar and fuss?"

"I got to git up de bayou along about sundown," Uncle Henry said airily, "and speak wid a lady."

Assured that the mules would be cared for properly, Uncle Henry decided to go fishing. He dug a canful of worms and got his pole.

"Hit ain't de right season for fishin'," Ringo warned him. "You jest might as well stay in de lot. You ain't gonter ketch no fish."

"Didn't say I want to ketch a fish," snorted Uncle Henry. "I say I was fixin' to go fishin'. I'm 'way behind wid my fishin' and I'm fixin' to ketch up."

At the bayou bank, Uncle Henry found a comfortable seat next to an old willow tree. He unwound the line, adjusted the cork, threaded a worm on the hook and threw it into the water.

The afternoon sun was warm and pleasant, the sluggish flow of the bayou soothing.

After a while, he chuckled softly to himself. "I be dog!" he exclaimed. "Dat sho was nice er Giles to put dat bayou-wawkin' humbug on me. And den I turned right around and tole Ringo I couldn't be at de lot at sundown, on account er I was gonter bayou-wawk a

"I bet dey would. And I bet I'm gonter ax some lady to do jest dat for me."

The decision brought gaiety to his soul. It had been a long time since any woman had done anything for him, but this was a mighty fine fish. Uncle Henry began to sing, in a cracked voice:

"Gonter roll my britches up-a to my knees

And wade up de bayou, far as I please.
Cause hit's oh me and hit's oh my,
Gonter wawk up de bayou 'fore I die."

He shouldered his pole and started up the path. A feeling of complete lack of responsibility came over him.

He laughed to himself. "Hod-do-mighty!" he exclaimed. "I'm de he-coon er de camp and I'm fixin' to git about!"

He was strolling happily past the Widow Duck's cabin when he was halted by an enraged yell from B'r Charlie.

"Dar he go, now! I'm tellin' you, he fixin' to go lyin' on de church!"

lady." He slapped his leg. "I bet dat was a humbug!"

The idea amused him until he recalled his conversation with B'r Charlie. "I bet I put a humbug off on him, too," he laughed. "Me, fixin' to preach!" The idea was ridiculous. "I kin out-tawk any deacon dat ever hit de church, but I couldn't preach a tex' efn I had to."

FURTHER contemplation was interrupted by a sudden bobbing of the cork and before Uncle Henry could adjust himself to the idea of a nibble, the cork described a wide arc on the water and went down. Uncle Henry yanked.

A four-pound yellow-bellied catfish landed on the bank. If Uncle Henry was surprised by the off-season catch, he did not show it. He caught the fish by the head, expertly putting the dagger-like fins between the proper fingers and removed the hook. He spent a long, comfortable afternoon.

It was nearly sundown when Uncle Henry stopped fishing and picked up his catch. It was a handsome fish, long-bodied and fat. "I bet," Uncle Henry speculated, "dat hit's a heap er ladies along dis hyar bayou would be glad to fry dis fish for my supper." He chuckled.

"You Henry!" The Widow Duck's voice had the sound of authority.

"Yas'm, Mis' Duck," Uncle Henry replied.

The Widow Duck was on her porch and B'r Charlie was sitting on the step. "What dis tawk-tawk B'r Charlie givin' me?"

"B'r Charlie li'ble to give you any kind er tawk," Uncle Henry answered evasively.

"He claim you's fixin' to go to preachin' over at Ole Ship."

Brought to his attention again, Uncle Henry thought it an even pleasanter idea.

"Well," he admitted, "I'm got me a tex' in my mind I'm fixin' to preach about."

"You ain't got nothin'!" B'r Charlie exploded.

"Hit's about what happen to a one-laigged man on de Rizzy-riktion Day," Uncle Henry explained. "Now you take a two-laigged man—"

"Dat ain't no tex'," B'r Charlie snorted. "De Book say all de bones gonter rise and march, bone to bone."

"Hit's a fack," the Widow Duck agreed. "De Book say jest dat and hit ain't no tex'. De Book say, 'Come a day and time, de bones will rise among de righteous and march to glory.'"

"Righteous bones, yas," Uncle Henry pointed out. "But what about de sinful bones? B'r Charlie was a sinner when he lost his yuther laig."

"I wa'n't neither no sinner," B'r Charlie denied.

"I never did b'lieve dat lie about a mule kickin' dat laig off," Uncle Henry put in. "Yo' laig was broke off below de knee and no mule don't kick dat low. Efn a mule kick you, he'd 'a' got you up close to de hip."

"Hit's a lie," the preacher insisted. "Henry know a heap about mules," the Widow Duck said.

"And a heap about mens," Uncle Henry added. "I bet dat laig got shot off in a sinful gamblin' game. I bet Charlie was gamblin' wid spot cyards."

"A mule!" yelled B'r Charlie. "He kicked me!"

Privately, the Widow Duck had long doubted the mule-kicking story, but out of respect for the office of pastor she had publicly accepted it for fear the truth would be less dignified.

"Hit's a p'int," she admitted now. "but you had ought to git a better tex' den Charlie's yuther laig. Speak on, Henry."

UNCLE HENRY had practically exhausted his stock of texts but his mind was working hard. He looked heavenward for an inspiration and found one. "Angels?" he suggested.

"Angels ain't no tex'," B'r Charlie challenged. "I preaches about angels in might' nigh ev'y tex' I got. Angels ain't—"

"Dey is," Uncle Henry stated, "de way I'm fixin' to preach about 'em." How, he didn't know, but he hoped to have an idea by the time it was demanded of him.

"How you fixin' to preach about angels?" the Widow Duck wanted to know.

Uncle Henry thought hard. Then, "What de angels do at night," he said.

"Dey shine de stars up," B'r Charlie said.

"Nawp," Uncle Henry shook his head. "Dey shine de stars in de daytime. Dey sleeps at night."

"Yep," the Widow Duck agreed, "dey would do jest dat. Shine up de stars all day long and den sleep at night."

"Sho," B'r Charlie nodded. "I knowed dat. Angels don't ramble about at night. Dey sleeps."

"Whar 'bouts?" Uncle Henry demanded.

"In heaven."

"Whar 'bouts in heaven?"

B'r Charlie looked appealingly to the Widow Duck. None too certain, herself, she suggested that angels might have fine beds to sleep in. "But de Book don't say," she admitted.

"Dat's my tex'," Uncle Henry announced. "My tex' gonter be about do de angels sleep in de bed at night, or do dey fold up dey wings and roost on a cloud. Hit's a question, souls. Amen."

The Widow Duck was impressed. The preacher was flabbergasted. Uncle Henry bowed and grinned. "And now," he told them, "I'm fixin' to git up de bayou a piece."

Uncle Henry knew he would have no trouble finding a woman to cook the catfish. But of all the women on the bayou, he decided to go to Ringo's wife, Carrie. Not that he particularly liked Carrie but he did want to hear how Ringo had got on with the mules.

Carrie was none too friendly, but Uncle Henry brushed that aside. "Go

They never thought she'd land him!

BUT HERE'S WHAT HAPPENED...

I HEAR TOM AND CLAIRE'S ENGAGEMENT IS ON THE ROCKS

DEFINITELY! BUT YOU CAN'T BLAME TOM.
TOO BAD NOBODY EVER TOLD CLAIRE TO SEE HER DENTIST
ABOUT HER BREATH

CLAIRE SEES HER DENTIST...

TESTS SHOW THAT MUCH BAD BREATH COMES FROM DECAYING FOOD PARTICLES AND STAGNANT SALIVA AROUND TEETH THAT AREN'T CLEANED PROPERLY. I RECOMMEND COLGATE DENTAL CREAM. ITS SPECIAL PENETRATING FOAM REMOVES THESE ODOR-BREEDING DEPOSITS.
AND THAT'S WHY...

COLGATE'S COMBATS BAD BREATH
...MAKES TEETH SPARKLE!

"Colgate's special penetrating foam gets into the hidden crevices between your teeth . . . helps your toothbrush clean out decaying food particles and stop the stagnant saliva odors that cause much bad breath. And Colgate's safe polishing agent makes teeth naturally bright and sparkling! Always use Colgate Dental Cream—regularly and frequently. No other dentifrice is exactly like it."

AND THANKS TO COLGATE DENTAL CREAM...

SAY! DON'T YOU KNOW
IT'S LEAP YEAR, TOM?
YOU SHOULD HAVE MADE CLAIRE PROPOSE TO YOU!

I MADE CLAIRE SAY YES--AND THAT'S ALL THAT MATTERS
TO ME!

DON'T RISK OFFENDING!
KEEP BAD BREATH AWAY!
USE COLGATE DENTAL CREAM, TWICE EVERY DAY!

NOW—NO BAD BREATH BEHIND HER SPARKLING SMILE

"haid, brown-skin," he told her. "Git me a nail and a hammer and dem wire-pliers, whilst I skin dis catfish. Maybe you don't like a good bait er catfish?"

"Sho, I likes catfish," Carrie said. "But—"

"Don't but me, gal," Uncle Henry said. "Don't Ringo like fish?"

"Yeah, I reckon so," Carrie admitted, "but you see—"

"Yeah, I know," Uncle Henry said. "Ringo learnin' how to take keer de stock, now, on account er I'm gettin' to be a daidhaid. But dat don't make me mad at Ringo. Now git dat fire goin' and git de skillet hotted up good."

Carrie went in the house while Uncle Henry cleaned the fish. When it was skinned, washed and sliced into cutlets, he took it to the kitchen.

"Th'ow a handful er dat yaller cawn meal on de breadboa'd," he said. "Ain't never yit been no woman c'd roll a fish in meal to suit me. You got to give hit dat certain roll." He proceeded to demonstrate, discussing the art as he worked.

"Ringo ain't comin'—" Carrie began, but Uncle Henry interrupted her. "Don't tawk so much," he said. "Hit's bad luck to tawk over hot lard. I know Ringo ain't comin' ontwell late."

A man's step sounded on the porch and a man's voice said, "I swear, honey, I smells fish cookin'. Did you git out and ketch me one for supper?" The voice was not Ringo's. It was Dave's.

"What you doin' hyar, Dave?" demanded Uncle Henry.

"You axin' me?" Dave answered, as he stepped into the kitchen. "I live hyar now. I thought I missed you at de barn. What you doin' hyar?"

"Did Ringo make you scrape de sweat off'n Bug-Eye's collar?" Uncle Henry wanted to know.

"Ringo ain't been speakin' wid me since I and Carrie divo'ced him off, last spring," Dave told him.

"And he didn't make you scrape Bug-Eye's collar?"

"I bet I forgot to scrape dat collar," Dave admitted ruefully. "You always reminds me and I bet hit slipped my mind."

"Dis batch er fish might' nigh done," Carrie interrupted. "Y'all set whilst I takes hit off and draps de rest in de skillet."

UNCLE HENRY and Dave sat down at the kitchen table. Dave ate and talked. Uncle Henry ate and brooded. If Bug-Eye went to the field with a sweaty collar tomorrow a sore shoulder would probably result.

"Ringo is a nice boy," Dave was saying. "But he wa'n't good enough for a fine gal like Carrie. So I and Carrie hauled off and divo'ced him. Didn't us, baby?"

"You ain't jest sayin' hit," grinned Carrie.

"Bug-Eye is a special friend er mine," Uncle Henry said. "And I don't like for my special friends to git a sore shoulder."

"I'll scrape dat collar off in de mawnin'," Dave promised.

"Nawp," said Uncle Henry. "You'll forget. You go scrape hit off, tonight."

Carrie looked first at Uncle Henry and then to her husband. Her eyes rolled and her mouth tightened. "Dave don't wawk about at night," she said.

"Jest to de barn," Uncle Henry said. "Dave don't wawk about at night,"

Carrie repeated firmly. "Not to de barn and not nowhars else. He tole me he wouldn't wawk at night and dat's how come I married up wid him."

"Hit ain't no harm in goin' to de barn," Dave protested.

"No harm stayin' in de house, too," Carrie assured him, "and you's fixin' to stay in de house."

Uncle Henry discreetly stayed out of the controversy. Had it been a pair mules, he would have known exact what to do about it. But people we funny. A man never could tell what do when two people started arguing ar going on.

Presently, Uncle Henry came to a d. cision. He, himself, might be a dea head and responsibility for the mul might belong to Ringo, but even an o deadhead owed it to a good friend lil Bug-Eye to scrape his collar for hir. With a word of thanks, Uncle Hen left.

ALONG the moonlit bayou path tried to capture a sense of usefulne but the best he could do was to rece the fact that the old deadhead, Blu had lasted only a few months longe than the others. And with that realiz tion, all of his exuberance and irrespo sibility left him. The peace of th afternoon was gone and the whimsic humor with which he had plagued B Charlie had seeped out of his soul.

By the time he reached the barn he felt almost too feeble to scrape Bug Eye's collar. He stopped in the midd of the road trying to decide whether t turn to the left and work on the sweat collar or turn to the right and go to h cabin and lie down.

As it happened, Giles made the de cision for him. "You Henry!" the fore man roared. "You come hyar! Wha you been at? I been huntin' for you."

The gimp went out of Uncle Henry back and the shuffle left his feet. He pu both hands on top of the lot gate an sprang over it. "Comin', Mist' Giles," h called. He knew instinctively what th trouble was. Old Sadie was having on of her chronic bellyaches. As he passe the gear room, he snatched up th drench bottle and the liniment.

He found the foreman and Ring struggling with the sick mule, trying t make her walk close enough to a cros beam to get a hackamore line over i

"Step up, Sadie," Uncle Henry sai softly, slapping the mule's rump; an Sadie moved docilely forward. "Pitc dat rope over de beam and h'ist he haid," he continued.

The old lotman worked the long nee of the bottle into Sadie's mouth an poured a quart of salts solution down her gullet. "Now, Ringo," he instructed "you take and rub her belly wid da liniment, whilst I tie up her tongue palate." He twisted a knot of hair be tween the mule's ears, spat upon the knot and then gave it a short jerk "Now, dat'll fix you up," he concluded "Turn her a-loose, Giles."

The foreman released the hacka more. "I swear!" he exclaimed. "I wa jokin' dis mawnin' when I 'cused you e wawkin' de bayou, and den I turns my back and I be doggone efn dat ain't jes what you's doin'!"

"I was steppin' about a little," Uncle Henry admitted.

Giles was not joking. "You kin jes quit steppin' about," he said. "Hyar figgered I was sendin' a man to he'p you cause you was gittin' too old, and you you ole goat, was jest gittin' yo' second wind. But when you gits so you'e druther wawk de bayou den to 'tend to business, I'm gonter run you off and git me somebody else. Understand?"

"Yassuh," Uncle Henry said meekly.

After the foreman left, Ringo fol lowed Uncle Henry to the gear room. "I knowed how to drench her," Ringo apologized, "but ole Sadie wouldn't budge. Fust, I tawked to her, den I begged her and den I cussed her."

"Sadie won't do nothin' for you," ex plained the old man, "onless she likes you good. She just ain't been acquainted wid you long enough."

In the gear room they found Dave scraping Bug-Eye's collar free of sweat and grime. Dave grinned sheepishly. "I jest made up my mind," he explained, "dat I'd druther have Carrie fussin' at me fo goin' out at night, den havin' Giles fuss at me for lettin' my mule git a sore shoulder."

"Carrie kin fuss purty good," Ringo recalled amiably. "You ain't never hyared her git strung out, real good."

"And you," Dave told him, "ain't never hyared Giles cuss when a mule come in wid a sore shoulder."

Uncle Henry inspected the collar when Dave was finished. Then he crossed the road to his house. B'r Charlie was waiting for him.

"Henry," the preacher almost pleaded, "I didn't git my laig shot off in no gamblin' game, like you said. But I did git hit shot off in sin. My Book say I got to confess my sin befo' mankind, and I'm confessin' hit to you."

"CONFESS on," said Uncle Henry with more patience than interest.

"I was at a man's house," the preacher continued. "Hit was when I was a sinner. And I was at dis man's house, a-sinnin'. And den, dis man comed in on me and I run out de do'. But 'bout de time I got to de gate, dis man th'owed his britch-loader on me and shot me in de laig. And de doctor had to cut hit off." B'r Charlie's recital had been accompanied by violent dramatic gestures, and as he finished he was almost winded. "But don't tell de Widow Duck. She wouldn't like to know dat about her pastor."

Uncle Henry studied his mind for a minute. Then, "Did you drap dem chickens when de buckshot hit you?" he asked.

"Sho, I drapped 'em," B'r Charlie answered before he realized what he was saying. He tried to deny it a moment later, but Uncle Henry held him to it and the preacher finally admitted he had received his infirmity through chicken-stealing.

"I might not say nothin' 'bout hit," Uncle Henry promised. "And den I might. I'll study hit over in my mind." When B'r Charlie left, Uncle Henry chuckled, "He called me a daidhaid and it ain't good to call me dat when I ain't."

He entered his cabin and went to bed. But the events of the night were not over. Just as he was about to drop off to sleep, he heard a scratching at his window. "Who dat?" he called.

"Hit's me. Duckie Miller."

"What you doin' at my window, Widow Duck?" he demanded. "You, a senior usher in de church, scratchin' at my window at night! Woman, I's a deacon. Not a hyppercrit!"

"Aw, you ole goat!" the Widow Duck snapped. "Stop dat kind er tawk and speak sense."

"Dat's all I speaks," the lotman said shortly. "And you?"

"Well," the Widow Duck confessed, "when I went to bed, I got to studdin' my mind about dem angels."

"What about de angels?"

"I was studdin' 'bout efn dey goes to bed at night or went to roost on a cloud. I jest laid dar, and studied and studied. Some time hit seem like dey'd lay down on a fine white bed, and fold dey hands and sleep; and den some time hit seem like dey'd scrunch up on a cloud and fold dey wings. I couldn't git to sleep."

"Humph!" Uncle Henry snorted. "How do I know how angels sleep?"

"But you said—" the Widow Duck began.

"I don't know nothin' 'bout angels," Uncle Henry grumbled. "All I know is mules. Some mules lay down and sleep, and some of 'em stand up and sleep. And I reckon angels got as much sense about dey sleepin' as a mule. I reckon dey sleeps to suit deyse'ves. I bet mule-angels do, anyhow. And if men-angels don't know how to sleep, dey kin watch de mule-angels and learn. Hit's plenty er good mule-angels. Ole Deemus went up last summer, and ole Blue drapped off in de winter. Now, go 'haid and let me be. I got to be in de lot befo' sunup."

How's your "Pep Appeal"?

—by Bundy

The photographer: Say! You'll never do for a PEP ad. Where's that old "oomph"? You know—that pep appeal!

The photographer: There! There! It's nothing personal. Maybe you just haven't been feeling right lately. And—that reminds me. Why don't we try a little KELLOGG'S PEP?

The photographer: It says in the ad here: "None of us can have pep unless we get all our vitamins. And right in this crisp nut-sweet cereal—KELLOGG'S PEP—are extra-rich sources of two of the most important vitamins, B<sub>1</sub> and D."

The model: Wait a minute! This is the most delicious cereal I ever tasted.

The model: If getting started on vitamins can be this much fun, just watch me become the "pep appeal" girl of 1940!

The photographer: Hold it, baby, hold it! There's a picture that will really tell America what we want to say.

Vitamins for pep! Kellogg's Pep for vitamins!

Pep contains per serving: 4/5 to 1/5 the minimum daily need of vitamin B<sub>1</sub>, according to age; 1/2 the daily need of vitamin D. For sources of other vitamins, see the Pep package.

MADE BY KELLOGG'S IN BATTLE CREEK

COPYRIGHT, 1940, BY KELLOGG COMPANY

"I hate to bother you, Mr. Grigsby—but it's about that raise again!"

FRANK OWEN

Rain Before Seven

Continued from page 22

all the strain and fear that overshadowed the spring that should have been the spring of her flowering had been entirely of his inflicting.

He said, "Hope, go on home. Don't see me any more, don't phone me, don't think about me. Begin to repair some of the damage I've done you."

Blue eyes held his. "You've got your choice, Caleb. You can let me go on with this, or you can shut me out of it. If you do, you'll just convince me that you're lying when you say you're in no danger."

At any cost he had to head her away from that idea. "Whatever brought Heinemann to Wallisport, the one sure thing is that he's far away now."

"Then let's get to work." She came to stand beside him, so close that her shoulder softly touched his. She made it worse by taking his hand. "Nothing counts except that Bert was killed." Mercifully she dropped his hand to pick up, from the array of Bert's possessions on his desk, the snapshot they had discussed so fruitlessly. A pertly pretty blonde in a bathing suit, laughing over her shoulder. She might be a sister—if Bert had a sister—or a fiancée, or a pickup. "You've got to tell the police, if only to follow this up," she said.

"Not yet. There's just one chance—I've got to go it alone for a day or two. If I don't seem suspicious, whoever is looking on will—"

"Yes. You haven't admitted that before."

"Of course there's someone. If Heinemann was here, he came to see someone. If he's gone away, he's left someone to keep an open and desperate eye busy."

Scornfully, "So you're as safe as you would be anywhere!"

THAT was precisely the idea he must root out. "You see, the man is a Nazi agent—a spy. He dare not let himself be known. The whole cumbersome thing hinged on that—he had to maneuver somebody else into putting Bert away. Maybe he originally intended something at the Gabriel mills, but he gave it up when he found Bert here and tried to frame him so the mills would get him. That was the whole idea—to make it look as if Bert had set that fire, so that Bert would be taken care of."

"In the end he didn't maneuver someone else into getting Bert."

Glibly, "That makes me safer still—he won't dare take another chance. . . . It all comes back to the night of the fire. He must have been here then—or just before. That's what I've got to work on."

"So you've got to tell the police everything."

"Why not tell Greg Ashburn?" Surprise came to her face, then urgent denial. "I'd stake my soul he's a British intelligence man. It may even be that Heinemann came here on Greg's trail—counterespionage. Maybe not. But it's Greg's job to find out things—maybe he can find this blonde for me, maybe he can find Heinemann. If he's what I think, he'd be glad to try."

Her hands fastened on his arm. "Whatever you do, don't say a word to Greg Ashburn! He isn't—Caleb, don't let him know anything at all."

"Sure, you don't like him. But we've passed the place where that can count."

"Don't say a word to him!"

Her intensity was irrational, resting on Greg's unwelcome advances, and he did not intend to yield to it. "It's tell Greg or tell John Gabriel," he said calmly.

"Why not tell the people who ought to know and can do something?"

"That would be the FBI. How would I tell a G-man—what would I tell him? He'd think I was drunk, coked up or crazy! Who are we? Just a couple of people with a story no one could possibly believe. A story like somebody's nightmare."

"All right," she said gravely, "we'll tell John."

THREE minutes in Gabriel's chromium and red-leather office at the mills was enough to make clear that nothing could be accomplished. Caleb was detached enough to realize how preposterous the story sounded, to find no blame for John's unshakable disbelief. It was so fantastic that it sounded like a silly, futile lie, even to him, who would have to go out from here and do the job alone. He had no blame for John's skepticism. But he was getting angrier at John's quadrupled anger and at some mysterious triumph that glistened in him.

But he kept at it, laboring his simple points. And Hope sat with her toes together and her hands folded in her lap, putting in a word now and then but only expect that he may have agents in your works, this minute?"

No point to it. Gabriel just sat behind his beautiful desk and looked baleful. "Precisely what is it you want of me?"

Caleb drew a deep breath but Hope said, "You were going to call the government in. It was silly then. Now that Bert has been killed it isn't silly. We think you'd better."

The suggestion released something behind Gabriel's stubbornness. "If I had called the government in then, I might have got somewhere!" He loosed an accusation at Hope. "You wouldn't let me! You were protecting your damned jailbird—"

Caleb was moving forward, but Hope said, "Caleb!" and he stopped. She stood up and came forward, quiet and sure, to stand before Gabriel. "You have fixed ideas, John. Remember, I advised you to consider other explanations. We've got the right one now. You see, it wasn't Bert that set fire to your building. It wasn't Caleb. They weren't conspiring against you. It was exactly the other way. There was a plot but it was

"You should have seen the garden in the spring before it got away from us" making Gabriel more stupidly obstinate. And Gabriel's odd satisfaction steadily increased.

CHARLES PEARSON

But he kept himself in hand with what seemed to him an admirable evenness of temper. "You see spies so facilely where they don't exist, Gabriel, I'd think you'd see a real one when he's pointed out. You've started so many phantoms who were supposed to be plotting against you, I'd think you would recognize a real plot when it proves you fell for it. . . . God knows what this Nazi was doing in Wallisport to begin with. I'd suppose you'd leap to the conclusion that he was trying to sabotage your mill, which was making machines that make munitions that could be used against his country. Very likely he was. But he found Hendricks here—and for his own sake, Hendricks came first. He couldn't act against him directly—"

"But you claim he did."

"That was—afterward. . . . What did he do? He had your building fired—pretty carelessly, conspicuously carelessly. That was so you'd get rid of Hendricks—which you immediately tried to do. Doesn't that make you sus-against Bert, and it used you—you were a setup. So now you've got your chance. You can stop everything forever. Just be sensible, just use your head, just be a little more than twelve years old."

CALEB could not stand her pleading with this incompetent, but restrained his protest. But Gabriel turned away from her, to him. "You've played on her as a musician plays on a violin. You've deluded her out of her loyalty out of her dignity and responsibility, out of her good sense. You've systematically used her for your own purposes. And"—the harsh voice shook—"that she was engaged to be married meant nothing to you. You've made love to her." He glared at Caleb, momentarily voiceless, then shot his absurd question, "Haven't you?"

"Yes," Caleb said.

More furiously still, "You're in love with her!"

"Yes."

Hope's quiet bearing did not change at all. But Gabriel released a sigh that was charged with satisfaction, and the triumph he had been half repressing all along now spread over his face. He was easy, assured; he was enjoying himself. "I always underestimate you, Thatcher. I wanted to see how far your effrontery would carry you." He turned back to Hope. "Are you too infatuated to see that he must be in a desperate corner in order to try a bluff like this? Why, yes, I've intended to call in the FBI. You stopped me once but no one could stop me after last night. If you want Thatcher to make love to you some more, that's too bad—he won't be able to."

An intended drama must have failed. Gabriel had obviously expected some sensation; he waited for some expression of consternation, perhaps some plea. When none came, annoyance tarnished his triumph, and he was goaded to say, "The bluff doesn't work, Thatcher. What we'll get the government to find out is who was at my house last night."

Someone at Castle Gabriel last night? Instantly Caleb began to analyze the information. Wait! This could be—

But Hope had analyzed it too. "Is there some notion Caleb was?" she said.

A smug shrewdness blended with his pleasure. "I was forced to take back one premature accusation. I don't know. We'll ask the FBI."

"Well, he wasn't. He was with me."

So now there was one more kind of fool Gabriel could become, a vicious fool. "You've had to lie for him a lot. Are you willing to say he was with you all night?"

"No," Hope said. "But if that's what you mean, why, he was with me quite long enough. What time are you interested in?"

The fool was exulting. "Let's make it as hard as we can."

HE WAS with me up till about two o'clock. And, yes, John, an awful lot could happen between eight o'clock and two. Out there in the darkness, by the sea, away from everyone. Why, maybe we've been lovers all along, maybe we—

"Maybe it would be a pleasure to wring his neck," Caleb said, "but I haven't got time. . . . Does this mean that somebody broke into your house?"

"I'll let your lawyer ask that."

Remember he wasn't a responsible adult, remember the fool was also a child! "Then that would be—the answer to everything. The man who set fire to your factory. The man who killed Bert. The man we want to find. What did he do? What did he want? What did he come for?"

"That's between me and the United States government." That was with the same juvenile canniness, and Gabriel was being the man who had the answers. But it couldn't last—he had to let his enormous jubilation free. "You were certain to dig your own grave in the end! The bluff would break down somewhere, the great intelligence would slip up, the man who can use women for his own purposes was bound to make a misstep before he was done. I've got you now!"

"Then for heaven's sake, get the government in!" If a fool was all you had to work with, then you must make folly serve your purposes. "Get them in fast! Tell them I broke into your house last night. If you can't see your own interests, do what you can to ruin mine. But get started!" He turned to Hope. "That's all a damned fool can do for us. Let's go."

"You go," Hope said. "I'll see you

HAVE YOU READ your life insurance policies carefully—recently?

If not, we urge you to do so, before another day goes by. Examine each policy you own and, when you come to the part about method of final settlement, ask yourself this important question:

"Have I chosen the method of payment, available under my policy, which will be best suited to my own needs and those of my family?"

Most Ordinary policies, as you know, offer a choice of several methods of payment. In the first place, the amount due may be paid to your beneficiary in one lump sum. You may prefer, however, to select one of the other methods, commonly known as "optional modes of settlement."

These options or choices can be divided into three types:

Type 1. Interest Payments. The life insurance company retains the amount due under your policy and pays interest on this sum either for a number of years agreed upon, or for as long as the person to whom it is payable may live. At the end of this period, the principal itself is payable in one sum, to whomever has been named to receive it.

Type 2. Instalment Payments. The company pays from the amount due under your policy, and the interest earnings thereon, stated sums in equal instalments for a specified number of years agreed upon. At the end of the instalment period, the principal will have been used up. Most policies contain a table showing the amount of instalments payable over various periods of time.

Type 3. Life Annuity Income. The company retains the amount due under your policy, and pays a life income to your beneficiary.

There are several forms of life annuity income settlement. Some of them provide for additional payments if the person receiving life income dies before such payments total a certain amount, or before they have been received for a certain length of time. The amount of income is determined by several factors, including the age of the beneficiary at the time payments begin, and the form of settlement which is selected.

In your policy, if it is not a very old one, you will probably find tables illustrating the benefits obtainable under one or more of the life annuity income methods of settlement.

• • • • •

The entire amount due under your policy need not be placed under any one option. Part of the amount due can be paid in a lump sum, and the balance left with the company under one or more of the options. The income is payable, at your selection, either annually, semi-annually, quarterly, or monthly, provided only that each payment is at least $10.

The use of "optional modes of settlement" is not restricted to payments to your beneficiary. Under certain conditions, they may also be applied to payments which may become due to yourself in accordance with the provisions of your policy and in final settlement thereof.

Your Metropolitan agent will gladly help and advise you in determining which of the methods available under most Metropolitan Ordinary life insurance policies seem best suited to your needs and to those of your beneficiaries.

COPYRIGHT 1940—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE CO.

This is Number 27 in a series of advertisements designed to give the public a clearer understanding of how a life insurance company operates. In Canada the privileges outlined in this advertisement must be exercised in conformity with the laws concerning the rights of beneficiaries in the various Provinces. Copies of preceding advertisements in this series will be mailed upon request.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

Frederick H. Ecker, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD

Leroy A. Lincoln, PRESIDENT

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Plan to visit the Metropolitan's exhibits at the New York World's Fair and at the Golden Gate International Exposition in San Francisco.

New kind of Overseas Wave-Band

Brings in Europe
5 times stronger!

New built-in American and Overseas Aerial System!

Just plug in and play!

Most beautiful cabinets ever designed!

PHILCO
brings you Sensa

280x*

NEW RADIOS OF EVERY SIZE AND PRICE

FROM THE LABORATORIES of the world's greatest of radio engineers, Philco for 1941 brings spectacular inventions so sweeping in importance new and different that they begin a new era of enjoyment in your home.

In Radio . . . a New Kind of Overseas Wave-Band, never known radio before, makes foreign reception 500% stronger and 5 times easier to tune! In these stirring, historic times, it makes capitals of Europe as much a part of your daily radio fare favorite chain programs or local stations. It's brand-new . . .
tional . . . and only Philco has it!

A brand-new circuit, dreamed of but never before achieved by science, reduces noise by 5 to 1, reduces "cross talk" by 20 to 1, increases selectivity by more than 2 to 1. A new Built-In American and Overseas Aerial System gives you far greater sensitivity of wave and standard reception, all without aerial or ground just plug in anywhere and play!

*PHILCO 280X, Only $6.95 Down. **PHILCO 608P, Only $12.95
Any 1941 PHILCO is yours on easiest monthly terms.

FOR 1941 New Inventions

608 P**

AMAZING INVENTIONS IN RADIO-PHONOGRAPHS

Photo-Phonographs . . . Philco engineers present the first basic element in record reproduction since the invention of the phonograph. The amazing Philco Photo-Electric Radio-Phonograph transmits sound on a beam of light . . . reproduces records through the lens of a floating jewel on a photo-electric cell!

No Needles to Change . . . in average normal use the floating jewel Philco Photo-Electric Phonograph lasts for 30,000 to 40,000 hours—8 to 10 years of use! Records Last Ten Times Longer . . . No hoarding your precious records! Play them, now, as much as you want without fear of wear. And, for the first time, you hear the beauty of every record. Needle talk and surface noise no more! Its purity. The most glorious record tone in history!

New Philco Tilt-Front Cabinet brings you new beauty and convenience. Plenty of room on the solid top for decorations. No heavy lid and no dark, awkward, unsightly compartments.

New 1941 Philco Radios and Radio-Phonographs from $9.95 and up, now on display at your nearest Philco dealer.

For Europe, direct, in your car! Philco Auto Radio Model AR9 brings you clear, strong, enjoyable short-wave reception. Only $4.95 Down.

Records reproduced on a Beam of Light!
Amazing new Philco
Photo-Electric Phonograph!

No Needles to change!
Floating Jewel lasts 8 years!

Records last 10 times longer!

Make your own recordings!

New Tilt-Front Cabinet!

Permanent top!
No lid to open!
No unhandy
turntable compartment!

"I sell Men— and I am sold on MUM!"

"Perspiration odor is just about job suicide," says Mr. Karl M. Wehinger, President of Wehinger Service Inc., New York City.

"I'VE HAD a lot of experience with men and jobs," says Mr. Wehinger, through whose firm industry engages thousands of employees and executives. "And it's incredible how often an active, intelligent citizen will let a fault like perspiration odor come between him and his future."

"Too many men trust their morning shower alone to keep them acceptable—socially and in business—the entire day."

"The tragedy is that a man can offend and never know he's guilty. He's avoided—penalized—and never knows why. That's why I play safe with Mum. It's a good habit and good business for any man!"

* * *

That's sound advice for success—and thousands of men are following it. For Mum is quick and easy. A dab under each arm after your shower takes only 30 seconds and you definitely veto perspiration odor for hours! Remember a bath may only take care of past perspiration, but Mum prevents risk of odor to come.

Mum can't harm your shirts... won't irritate your skin... prevents underarm odor without attempting to stop the perspiration itself.

Ask the ladies, they know! Your wife, sister or mother uses a deodorant—probably Mum. But shy away from daily arguments and don't try to "borrow" theirs. Druggists are selling jars to thousands of men who like the self-confidence Mum brings—safety from perspiration odor. Try Mum, today!

MUM

takes the Odor out of Perspiration

[ Socially or in business — Play safe with Mum! ]

Your morning shower takes care of yesterday's perspiration—but Mum prevents odor to come—carries on where your bath leaves off.

The people you meet in business—and your family and friends—like you better when you avoid risk of underarm odor with Mum.

later. I've got a job to do. Here. With John." . . .

Natalie said, "You took your time."

In the last week Greg seemed to have shrunk—his cheeks were hollow, his skin stretched tight, his eyes mobile and feverish, his nerves bared. But the astonishing thing was that the explanation no longer troubled her. She felt exactly nothing. Was she anesthetized? Had the capacity for pain gone, along with the capacity for self-respect?

"I can't come the moment your whim is to call me," Greg said. The sitting room in John's house was as familiar to him as his own, but his gaze kept moving about it, and he had to struggle to maintain the imperturbability that had always been natural to him. No matter. "You've got what I told—you've got that copy?"

"What you told me to get. Yes. You could count on my being as obedient as Radnor." There was only a remote and passionless irony, crystal clear, omnipresent, which she breathed like air. An antique mirror on the wall—rich young woman at leisure, beautifully groomed, dressed expensively. Dressed, to be precise, in a black thin wool dress with a gold zipper at the throat. "Mata Hari had so few places for concealment," she said, and delicately pulled the zipper down, reached under her brassiere, and took out the folded paper. In this crystalline irony it was appropriate that the paper that climaxed her ignominy, that she was giving to her lover in a final parody of decency, had been molded by hours of concealment to the shape of her breast. Most poetic, she thought, as pretty as a love song in a book.

NO POETIC nonsense bothered Greg, who snatched it from her and wolfed through it with his eyes. He had it, she had done it, and might the anesthetic last forever! "It's all there," she said, "it's quite authentic. I copied it from the original with my own hands, in my own room, on my own typewriter, last night."

When the anesthetic faded—well, she was going to live a long time, probably, and all the moments of last night would have a long time to torture her. The moment when, with the door of the safe just closed after she got the original back again, she had heard John in the hall. The moment when, in the darkness, her raw nerves had felt his presence. The terror of that sensation, and the inconceivable shock when he had seized her. The inconceivable relief when, the lights on, he had accepted desperate lie and decided that some must have tried to force his safe but he been frightened away by her. A space dizzy nothingness and then she woke his arms, he was carrying her upstairs and she had realized that if he carried her to her room he would see what was beside her typewriter.

She thought: You don't believe in him but you find out.

Greg folded the paper. "I knew could depend on you. Thanks."

Exactly there was the deepest bottom of her degradation: that he could depend on it. It's a little thing. I had no honor left to lose. So that's all right.

HE WAS eager to get away. With dry curiosity, she wondered if he would assume the obligation of making a little love to her—a kind of tip services rendered. But what he said was, "You look dreadful."

No doubt. "You do, too. People on our line of business must expect to."

He wasn't here at all, really, he had already moved on to whatever was next. If it was true that they had loved each other, clearly this was no time for him to remember it and there was no point in her remembering it. Then inattention fell away from him, he came back from whatever plans he had been making and said abruptly, "Don't come see me tonight. Or tomorrow. Be absolutely sure. Don't come near my place."

How ingenious and manifold were the designs of irony! Blind and tone-deaf all she had felt, all she had done, all the finality that had been worked in her, could stand there and say that—and say it warningly, even commandingly. In his mind, she was altogether his slave.

"I'm not likely to try, if Sir Eric still there."

"He'll be there till I leave. It's not certain that I'm going to."

Doubtless that should pulverize her the ending. She had dreaded it as certain to come in thunder and turbulence but really it came like a tiny dust flurry faraway. "Then," she said coldly, "the last memory I'll have of our—shall I call it our honeymoon cottage?—will be a memory of an intolerable brute whom it would be a great pleasure to kill."

"You are not permitted to criticize me—" Greg said instantly, with a rasping violence, his face contorted. Almost as instantly, with the rapid thinking that never failed him, he became pen-

"Well, if you say no one here called the plumber, it must have been the people who lived here before" and pleading. "It should not happen like this! You can't know how I hate I am. I mean no unkindness. I would make it up to you—I would—" He let his arms go around her. Would he feel any emotion when he kissed her? . . . No, not even contempt. But at last she did feel something, an oblivion, and she drew away from him. To her it clear, to get it said—for her sake, hardly at all for his.

DAVE BREGER

Things never happen with the right timing, or the proper music, or people going the way they ought," she said sadly. Yes, she was feeling a faint sadness now, a grave regret. "I got it for Greg. I got it—well, when a woman has done and been what I have, it seems hard to stick at anything. But that's what I stuck at, getting that. It was no less than anything else—I'd been false to everything decent in my life long before that. When that happens, it's silly to think that anything is worse than anything else. But that was the one thing I couldn't do. No reason. Just there was where I had to stop."

He was remembering John Gabriel, who believed in her, bending over her in an anguish of alarm and gentleness. Not it. You see, we had been in love. It was pointless to say that being in love with you was a kind of progressive corruption. If I was corrupted, I wanted to be. . . . You've had—oh, whatever there is that's worth anything in a worthless man—whatever eagerness there is in a trivial woman's life. You had what no other man had had. That's true. That's why I had to do what I couldn't do. You wanted it and I got it for you and it's in your pocket. Call it a kind of memorial to a twisted love that was gentle enough. Call it a valentine with the best sentiments. I got it—and that shed me. It finished us. It's over. Nothing we could say now would just annoy. Don't wait for any ceremonies—just go home."

With the last word her will leaped up, and its resurgence carried him into the hall, hat in hand like any casual visitor saying goodbye. But suddenly he turned to her, pure fury: "You didn't find out that Thatcher saw the night of the fire. Order you to—"

"Now I can despise both of us," Natalie said.

There was a torrent of words and he caught her arm but she wrenched free and went upstairs. After a while she came back to the head of the stairs, and he was gone.

ALL that the end.

While she stood there, John came in. It was not possible for her to meet him with any assurance, it was hardly possible to meet him at all, but she must. The terror and alarm of last night's drama and of a consultation they had had this morning roused in her as she went down the stairs. But they were extinguished when she saw his face. It was lined and gray, it was exhausted, it was . . .

"John!"

It was pitiful to see him try to smile, for he had always seemed as unshakable as the fundamental rock. He muttered something about detectives, and shame came flooding over her. He had been tortured all day long, fruitlessly trying to find out who had made an attempt on his safe.

Not the end but the beginning—now he could feel the knife beginning to twist that was going to twist in her forever.

She said, "There comes a point where it's wisest to give up altogether. You've given yourself till you can't any more. You've got to rest."

He submitted to her, let her lead him into the library, sat heavily in a chair, watched her with gratitude wakening in his eyes. She brought a lounging coat and helped him into it. She said, "A drink will help—a little—for a while." She charged some Scotch with soda and said, "Drink this, my dear." She pulled the shades against the afternoon sun and touched a match to the logs in the fireplace—why, certainly, bring a fictitious cheer to this room which she had dishonored. He looked around him and she saw he wanted a cigarette, so she found one and held a match for him, and the gratitude that robbed her of her last strength kept growing in his eyes.

The worst of all was that he did take comfort from her. . . . She sat on the floor beside his knees. She had done this to him. So, now that it had been done, she could be sweet, consoling, the woman who had ruined him making him feel that she was the woman he wanted her to be.

The anesthetic was quite gone. This was where payment started. John began to tell her of the scene with Caleb and Hope, of their defiance, of the sequel, after Caleb had left and Hope had stayed to break her engagement. John's voice was husky; almost broken. It was the voice of a man in pain. Not the pain of grief. No, the pain of outraged vanity, of broken pride, of confidence destroyed. For the first time in his life John Gabriel was tasting the bitterness of defeat. For the first time his strength had been scorned, his love rejected, his righteousness impeached. He had failed, so he was fallible. The agony of lost assurance overwhelmed him. It meant that Natalie was all he had left. His betrayer was appointed to sustain him. This was her penance.

IT WAS Aunt Elinor's inconceivable innocence that made horror precipitate out of solution. Up to then there had been such a swift succession of impacts that Hope had been unable to feel anything but the exalted solemnity that had begun when Caleb's long story ended the night before. The truth was that, at John's, she had even felt encouraged. . . . It had been simple enough after Caleb went out. There had been John looking at her and she looking at John while the office grew quiet, the way a great wind ends. She had said, "Will you feel better if you say it, or do you want me to?" Hesitating among rages, John had begun a heated speech which she cut off. "No. We won't have any more accusations. There are a lot you could make. We won't have any more confessions. There are a lot I could make. Only, will it gratify you to say, 'Begone, unworthy woman!?' Or will your gallantry insist on my saying, 'Sorry, there seems to have been some mistake?' Or should we just say, 'So long, stranger?'"

He didn't say anything. His face was an angry child's face, and she remembered that Caleb had wanted help from him and she had too, and that was just too bad. Should she remark politely that the best intentions could be mistaken? No. She took off the big diamond and laid it on his desk—and there went her first love affair and there went that hallucination that she could be the mistress of Castle Gabriel. She laid it on his desk, just the way women did in the movies, and a sudden, unholy impulse made her say, "Stick to pure girls, John." She went out on the crest of a momentary but exhilarating joy—it was ended, the mistake was corrected, the delusion was blown away.

It had taken so little time that she ought to be able to catch up with Caleb. But his car was gone from the curb. She took a taxi home and on the way she remembered that, despite that conventional scene with the diamond, she still had John's signet ring. Finish it off, get everything fumigated! She went to get it—and began to shake, suddenly sick with the thought of what that jewel case

DODGE Job-Rated TRUCKS

LET'S TALK IT OVER

FROM PRICE TO PERFORMANCE!

1 A TRUCK that fits your job—a Dodge Job-Rated truck—is easy to buy—priced with the lowest!

2 A TRUCK that fits your job puts you money ahead with the right sized engine, clutch, rear axle.

3 A TRUCK that fits your job costs less to operate—saves all along the line—on gas, oil and tires!

4 A TRUCK that fits your job stands up better on the job—less upkeep cost . . . and it lasts longer too!

DODGE DIVISION, CHRYSLER CORPORATION, DETROIT, MICH.

LOOK! COMPARE DODGE TRUCKS WITH THOSE MADE BY TWO OTHER COMPANIES MANUFACTURING LOW-PRICED TRUCKS DODGE OFFERS FAR WIDER SELECTION

COMPARISON	DODGE TRUCKS	COMPANY "A"	COMPANY "B"
Number of ENGINES	6	1	3
Number of WHEELBASES	17	9	6
Number of GEAR RATIOS	16	6	9
Number of CAPACITIES	6	3	4
Number of STD. CHASSIS and BODY MODELS	106	58	42
PRICES begin at	$465	$450	$474 <sup>18</sup>

Prices shown are for 1/2-ton chassis with flat face cowl delivered at Main Factory, federal taxes included—state and local taxes extra. Prices subject to change without notice. Figures used in the above chart are based on published data.

New Dodge 2-Ton Cab-Over-Engine Trucks now offered in addition to the 1 1/2-Ton C.O.E. series.

SEE YOUR DODGE DEALER FOR A GOOD DEAL

Dependable DODGE TRUCK SERVICE Everywhere

SEE YOUR DODGE DEALER FOR DEPENDABLE USED TRUCKS

DEPEND ON DODGE Job-Rated TRUCKS

3-2-1 1/2-1-1/4-1/2-TON CAPACITIES. 106 STANDARD CHASSIS AND BODY MODELS ON 17 WHEELBASES

Job-Rated MEANS: A TRUCK THAT FITS YOUR JOB

had held. She was still shaking when Aunt Elinor came in.

Clearly some explanation had to be made. "It's just me with my pressed primrose and my memories. I took this ring on approval but it's going back."

Aunt Elinor nodded. "Of course. I've never been much disturbed—obviously it would take more than John Gabriel to hold you very long. I suppose this happened over Caleb? That's excellent. But you needn't be tremulous about it."

Right there was where the little horrors began to fuse into one great horror, and where it was no longer possible to dam back her terror. Aunt Elinor thought she was shaking because her engagement was broken. Aunt Elinor lived in a sweet, unshadowed world, a world where—where it was just "odd" that Bert should be drowned. She didn't know that Bert had been murdered. She didn't know about Bert and Caleb in Spain. She thought that now an unfortunate mistake had been cleared up, Hope and Caleb were going to fall in love and get married and have some cute babies. In Aunt Elinor's world there could be nobody like Heinemann, Bert Hendricks could not be murdered, Caleb could not—or, don't, don't! And there was no possible way of making her comprehend. She was like the police, who just had a drowning. Like John Gabriel, who thought Caleb had made up a nonsensical story to hide his unspeakable crimes. To all of them the whole thing would be just a silly yarn, less sensible than a fairy tale; they couldn't begin even to imagine it, still less believe it, least of all realize it. Stark horror was walking the streets of Wallisport and they could not even see it.

SHE had to get out! . . . She got out, saying something meant to be gay and airy. It was pure carry-over that made her drive to the mills. She had intended to take that signet ring to John and so, in a daze, she did. A guard told her that John had gone home, and she heard him as through thick walls, and in the same trance she turned around and started for Castle Gabriel. Cars and people in the streets were just something in a dream—in a nightmare. One of them was Nate Jenkins, saluting her at a corner. If she stopped and said, "Somebody murdered Bert Hendricks," he would just laugh at that. Jim Dowdy had already laughed at it. If she said, "Somebody may kill Caleb, I'm afraid Caleb may kill somebody," he wouldn't laugh, he'd tell her to see a doctor, so would anyone else, anyone would think she was going crazy. . . . And not far wrong at that.

She went up the imposing steps of Castle Gabriel and rang the bell and said she wanted to see John. Natalie came out of the library and said that John didn't want to see her. Hope handed her the signet ring, said, "I just wanted to give him this," and was a mile away before she bothered to think that she must seem queer to Natalie, and come to think of it, was it gallantry or just childishness that made John say he wouldn't see her? And Natalie didn't look any too happy herself. Who did?

She stopped the car. Hands on the wheel, foot on the brake, knees, shoulders—she was shaking all over. And her stomach was writhing. . . . A little before sunset. Here she was on a winding drive in North Wallisport, and people were going home from work, and the bay was turning purple. No chance that this was a nightmare—it was real! Heinemann did exist and these things had happened. Nobody would believe them until too late but they were real. . . . One by one the lowest floors had fallen out, and each time you had reached the most terrible place, but there were a lot more floors to go.

She would not faint! But Caleb! She had let him get out of her sight.

She made herself stop trembling. She refused to be either sick or faint. She drove to the common at about sixty, she went through the square at fifty, and once beyond the square she went seventy, seventy-five, eighty, and thank God for a good car and if there were any speed cops around they could speak to her later on. She turned down the side road with a slurring skid and was off again, slowing only a little when she reached Caleb's lane. Then she stopped with the brakes screaming and dust billowing up. For she had reached Greg Ashburn's and had seen Caleb's car in his drive. She was out of her car, running, and a fear that had no meaning was squeezing her. She saw Smurthwaite hurrying toward her but didn't have time for him. She burst through Greg's hall into his living room. And there was Greg smoking in a chair, and there was Caleb smoking in another chair.

She collapsed into a third chair and managed to gasp, "Oh! I've found you! You're all right!"

Caleb said, "Greg thinks he may be able to find the blonde for us." So he the dance, Natalie was with John. Oh, of course, Caleb had told him—Caleb had told him everything. Well, not everything, if he had to ask that—so if anything could be held back, it must be held back. She said, "All we saw was a fire and we never got to that." She was going to get Caleb out of here before he could tell anything more. So she stood up and made a mighty effort to be girlish. "I'm hungry." She caressed his arm. "It's all over, darling, you'll never learn anything more about it." She pinched that forearm as hard as she could. "Please find some food for me."

CALEB accepted it. And Greg, shifting fast again, was no longer thinking furiously but had become a genial family friend. "Take your girl to dinner, Thatcher. I don't promise any results and I'll need a little time to make a start. But come to see me tomorrow." That would have been just lovely, except that his eyes lingered on her. She shuddered, wondering if she had a dress on.

Caleb drove ahead of her to his house, and she came into his living room with an uprush of relief, the first ease she had felt in hours. "What's the idea?" Ca-did he think she was too stupid to know that? Did he think she didn't know? Go carefully!—this was the time to be clever. "What are you going to do," she asked.

"Tomorrow I'll go to Boston and Tanner again—see if he's learned anything. I'll get back for the funeral. At that I'll talk to Ashburn again."

"I'll go to Boston with you."

He shook his head. "No."

She said quietly, "So you are in danger. You won't let me go with you."

Actually, he patted her cheek! Wasn't he offer her a lollipop and tell her to hurry off to school? "If I thought you was in danger of so much as catching cold, I'd hire a bodyguard. I'm just going to be busy seeing what I can do out. Too busy to take you to dinner a while."

Well, try this one. "I broke off with John."

Caleb said, "Of course." He sat down by her and took her hand, just as she would take that schoolgirl's. "It would be nonsense to say I'm either surprised or sorry. I've known you wouldn't be able to take it. I congratulate you on recovering your health."

Just that—sunnily, in the most friendly fashion. He wasn't so bright he didn't seem aware that this would make her absolutely certain. Only a couple of days ago he had said, "I could stop this car and be kissing you a minute that would be forever." The night before that he had been kissing her. . . . What resources did a woman have?

HOW quiet the house was, how far away from everything, how peaceful! The window looked out over Wallisport, flowing through salt meadows to the sea, and in that twilight you might even believe that there were untroubled hours.

What resources? She leaned against him, and he smiled at her. She drew her arm round her shoulder and it stayed there, touching her lightly, with a friendly impersonality. They just sat there on the shabby leather couch. What had he said years and years ago? Something about once she had been about as seductive as a rag doll but that was all changed. It was Caleb who had changed now, and she wasn't seductive enough, she was helpless, the thing was going to happen and she could do nothing at all.

But try! "We could go to California," she said gently. "We could go to the Thousand Islands. There are a lot of places where we could go."

He nodded approvingly. "You ought to get away and forget the whole mess. Now it's over, you're entitled to a good time. Where would Aunt Elinor like to go?"

She shook her head. "I'm worth being honest with, Caleb. I was talking about us. You and me."

His arm did not tighten. He looked at her, and for a moment all that he ever been in his face was in it again, as she had first dreaded and then greatly desired. The moment lengthened on a moment. He didn't move. Then he did move—away. She stood up. He did too. She tried to find his eyes but couldn't. She stepped close to him. She put her arm around his neck and pressed against him. He kissed her. So she had won, it was turned aside, their lips had settled it, it would be California, the Thousand Islands, anywhere at all but it was turned aside and they were safe. . . . No. He kissed her again, lightly and mirthfully this time. "You're a sweet child, Hope," he said, and he had given his voice so that it was almost convincing. "You have the most charming idea but they don't suit the times."

There was nothing she could do about it. Caleb was going to kill a man.

(To be continued next week)

"I have a little surprise for you, honey—I'm going to take you out to dinner tonight!"

had told Greg, after promising her he wouldn't! Smurthwaite came lumbering into the room. Greg waved him out again with an angry gesture, and now that she was coming together she could see that Greg was tense, that there was a quivering sense of disturbance in this room. But, of course—everyone was tense—what did it matter? Caleb was here.

No matter how right she might be about Greg, Caleb had been right too—for she could see how fearfully keen the man was, how aroused and alert. He was thinking hard and fast, he was thinking frantically. He could be dangerous—and dangerous in other ways than as a man who wanted to get his hand on your knee. She had abruptly learned that any man could be dangerous.

"It's an incredible story but how can anyone doubt it?" Greg said to her. Then to Caleb, resuming: "I tell you, not Wallisport. His car was found in Gorham. Everything must have happened there—that's where you've got to concentrate." Then with a sudden shift: "What did you two see the night of the fire?"

How do you know we were together? she thought instantly—you weren't at lebed demanded. "You talked like a debutante. I'm not taking you to dinner. Not this month."

"He scares me. I had to get out."

"But you see, we need him. . . ."

He didn't admit anything, of course. He didn't need to. Yes, his organization was in touch with labor unions. It had no contacts with unauthorized investigators, he wasn't much interested in rumors, but he had, well, call them representatives. He would see if they could learn anything. If I know him, he's got started by now. I gave him the snapshot.

"I hope you won't be sorry."

"We've got to use what tools we find!" he snapped at her. Then he smiled and, come to think of it, she hadn't seen him—or anyone else—smile for a long time. "To go back to where we left off," he said. "Here you are again, cluttering up my house. You shouldn't be. Go on home, darling."

So that was the line he meant to take—to seem to be re-establishing the casual comradeship of that long-ago time when she was the tweeds type and he was the charming loafer without a serious thought. . . . Did he think she wouldn't understand? Time was getting short, the inexorable walls were closing in—their home port is six hundred miles inland. Their busy docks are on the River Rouge . . . yet many of them know salt water, and the Ford house flag is a familiar sight in the distant ports of the world.

ANCHORS AWEIGH ON THE FORD FLEET

The Ford Fleet numbers twenty-nine, a sizable collection of merchant vessels. It includes the two largest Diesel freighters on the Great Lakes, four canal boats of 300 feet, five modern seagoing freighters, as well as many barges and tugs.

But why should the Ford Motor Company own and operate its own fleet of ships? Other shipping lines are at their disposal, just as are the roads and the railroads.

The answer is simple, and of importance to every person who considers the purchase of an automobile. The Ford Fleet stands for economy! It saves in transportation costs, storage costs, in capital tied up. It brings raw materials in quantities needed, when needed. It takes away the finished product thriftily and neatly.

Iron ore by the thousand tons is unloaded in one day at the docks of the Rouge. Ore that enters the plant on Monday morning may emerge as part of a finished car on Tuesday noon. One shipload of fourteen thousand tons of coal is consumed in two and a half days.

Canal boats reach Atlantic coast assembly plants as far south as Norfolk. They carry Ford parts in racks instead of crates, a saving in expense and space. On their return trips they bring rubber for the tire plant, equipment for the steel mill.

The ocean freight ships touch at Buenos Aires with Ford parts and at Venezuela, as well as Florida and the Gulf, with finished cars.

Altogether, the twenty-nine craft of the Ford Fleet save millions of dollars each year, and these millions are not profits for the Ford Motor Company. Instead, they are passed along to the buyers of Ford cars, trucks and tractors in the form of lower prices and better values. Ford economy puts increased quality into the finished product!

FORD MOTOR COMPANY

Down Went McGinty

Continued from page 21

and west on 49th. The alcohol did hand-springs in McGinty now. He wasn't drunk, nor even close to such a merciful condition. He was sharpened by the drinks and quite aware of all his sins, and punished by the silence of the girl who sat beside him in the cab. "It's not that I don't care," he said. "It hurts so much inside it's got me on the ropes. I used to be a champion, can't you see? It isn't easy just to be a tramp, to walk around without two bucks to buy a waiter or a cab. I'd like to save my dough. I know I'm wrong. I know you've waited seven years. I know we're always gettin' married next week, Mary, baby, or the next one after that. It's just—aw, hell with it, it's just—"

He took her in his arms. This was a part of him, this taking Mary in his arms. She fought a little bit. She said, "Let go of me; Barney, please!"

The cab was near Eighth Avenue. He let her go. "You love me, don'tcha, but-tercup?" he asked.

She blew her nose. "Of course I do, you—you—I don't know what you are." He kissed her lightly. The cab had stopped, but not the rain. He paid the guy, then helped her from the cab. They made their way into the lobby of the Garden.

The Garden was sold out. Not to see the Sailor fight, but for the main event. Benny Montana was the man they came to see tonight, the chocolate Puerto Rican who held the middleweight crown.

The Garden lights were on inside and there was some announcement going on, and faces turned around to see McGinty and his girl. They always had bright things to say when McGinty walked the aisle, clutching the priceless tickets that Mike Leonard gave him free. Mike was the promoter, and he never gave things away, except to pals like McGinty who had helped to make him rich.

McGinty liked to hear the fight bugs yell and call his name. It let him know he was alive. He wasn't any dope, they were aware. He'd given up the ring when he was young and in his prime, while his brain cells worked as neatly as his fists.

An usher placed them in the second row, while some preliminary quarrel ground away. The Sailor had the semi-final ten-round bout. "I gotta see the Sailor," Barney said. "You'll like the guy. He hits like Louie Firpo used to hit. He's hay in the sunshine, Mary, doll. Just say a little prayer."

SHE raised two hands, with fingers crossed. "Luck," she said. She smiled the nicest smile she had. "No bets," she said.

"No bets," he lied, but didn't worry for the Sailor's fate. He felt a bit unfaithful to her now, but hell, the bet was made before he'd even thought of what she'd say. The bet was made three weeks ago, when articles were signed. He'd bet Delaney's manager their own cuts of the purse.

Mary saw him walking with the Sailor through the crowd, with a little man named Fatso Berg who bore the burden of the towels and tape and necessary items of repair. Up into the ring they went, with most of the noise for McGinty, and not so much for his fighter, whom they hadn't learned to know.

Sailor Joe Rappaport was a mighty man, with bushy hair that stood like dry wheat upon his head. He was a quiet, unassuming guy, who rubbed his feet in the resin there and listened to the things McGinty had to say. He walked out to the center of the ring and shook the hand of Marty Delaney, the veteran from St. Paul. Marty was tall and nicely made, in the mold of Tommy Loughran and fancy lads like that.

The Sailor moved straight at Delaney and used a shuffle that was for all the world like one that Barney used when he was champ. Delaney found him difficult to solve. There was a brief exchange along the ropes. The Sailor ripped a short right hand inside, and when he walked away Delaney's back was on the floor. The crowd stood up. Delaney shook his head and struggled to his feet. McGinty shouted wise words to his man. The Sailor moved in calmly and measured his skillful foe. Delaney was no puncher and had to use his legs. The Sailor caught him on the ropes and splashed him with a left hook to the chin. Delaney swayed and clutched the atmosphere with drunken hands. The Sailor let one go. Delaney took it high and slipped inside and held with desperate strength until his head could clear.

THE Sailor was a wildcat in the clinch. Delaney moved away. The veteran was brave. His mouth hung open so the mouthpiece showed. He measured with a long left hand. He threw a desperaarms let the fighting gloves hang nearly to his knees.

"Too bad, Mageenty," Montana said. "I guess the Sailor was a bum." Montana's teeth were white and small. They showed a great amount of gum. McGinty didn't know the man so well.

"He's not the only bum I know," McGinty said, and why he spoke like that he couldn't tell. Montana laughed a little bit, then moved along the corridor, looking back.

McGinty slipped inside and had another drink, then slowly made his way up to the ringside gate. He stood behind a cop and saw Paul Keegan sitting in his chair, talking there with Mary, as though the girl were his.

McGinty stood just where he was and watched Montana in the ring, the way he moved, the sudden, burning strength of him, and he was jealous while he watched. The guy Montana fought was quite a slob. He wasn't smart. Mike Leonard, the promoter, came and stood there in the aisle, beside the cop and Barney, looking at the ring.

Mike said, "The boy is good."

"Can be beaten," Barney said, "when the right guy comes along. A matter of

"I really want milk, but they always just laugh and give me this"

WADE MONROE

tion punch as Sailor Joe moved in. It wasn't such a fearsome punch. It wasn't one a sturdy welterweight could not endure. The Sailor's eyes rolled white. His gloves no longer beat the air. His knees went first and then the rest of him. The Sailor lay quite cold upon the deck.

The dust came up from where the Sailor lay. There wasn't any noise within the house. Just for a moment things were still. Just for a moment McGinty's heart had stopped. And then there was the noise. The count was done. McGinty climbed the steps up to the ring. His man lay still. There was no doubt this new Achilles had his weakness in his chin. McGinty was the heel. He kept his eyes away from Mary's eyes, where she sat quite still just two rows from the ring.

McGinty knew that he was through. There were no other straws to clutch for economic life. Somebody had a bottle in the dressing room, and Barney took a shot of glue the like of which he'd never had before. It lifted him a bit. He said, "The hell, the Sailor might've been a champ. It's not his fault his chin is glass. You guys've seen enough of that. You know the way it is."

He knew his eyes were just a little wet. Outside, he met Montana, coming from his dressing room. This year Montana was the champion of the world. Montana was a chunky man with dusky skin and eyes like raisins in a pie. His long style. A long left hand, a pair of legs."

"A guy like you?"

"I didn't say a guy like me."

"That's what you were thinking, though. That's why you mentioned style. You'd have a chance. Two years ago you'd have a chance."

"Today I'd have a chance! I'm only thirty, Mike. Except I'm not a dope. The smart ones stay retired."

Mike said, "You haven't got a dime."

"I got plenty packed away," McGinty said. "I got it livin' with a family of moths. I'll always eat."

"You'll eat at Keegan's, kid. That's where you'll eat. I hear that Paulie offered you a chance to run the other joint he's openin' up."

"Who told you that?"

"There's lotsa things I hear. Paul's a friend of mine."

"Paul is everybody's friend," McGinty laughed, and thought too many people learned too many things they shouldn't know. "See you later, Mike. I got to see some pals."

MARY said that it was tough about the fate of Sailor Joe, and all around the Midnight Club they said that it was tough. McGinty bought three rounds of drinks and signed a tab. The talk was of Montana now.

"A fast left hand will beat him," Barney said. "A guy who really moves can make Montana miss."

"I'd like to see you with him," some one said. "I'd pay a hundred dollars to see a fight like that."

"It's style, that's all," McGinty said. He nearly started in to shadowbox. "Montana might murder a lot of guy who were better men than me. But then you turn the thing around—"

"Your drink is dripping on your neck tie," Mary said. It was about the only thing she'd said for hours now. "Let's not stand at the bar all night," she said. "I'd like a sandwich, Barney. I'd like to talk with you."

HE LET her lead him to a table. Mary said, "You're getting dangerous ideas." Her face was pale. Her eyes were tired. "The boys are selling you a bundle Barney. Don't be a patsy for the boys."

"You're telling me? You know there never was a guy along Broadway was less a slob than me."

"That was just a legend you began when you retired. Just let it stay that way."

"I didn't say—"

"But you were thinking just the same I know." Her hands were nervous on the tablecloth. "You're going to pull some rabbits from your hat," she said. "I'm going back to work. We both can't sit around and live on dreams."

"You're gonna what? But, lookit, Mary, doll. We're gettin' married in a month or so. You know that's what we said."

"That is exactly what we said. Each month for seven years. I know that I'm as foolish as yourself. I know that I am helpless when you start to talk. But talk is not enough."

"I couldn't help it if the Sailor didn't win."

"That's not the point. The Sailor tried. He did his job. I know you bet your portion of the purse. I'm not exactly deaf, you know. I can hear them talking at the bar. You promised me you wouldn't bet. You couldn't do the slow and steady thing for once. You just won't try. Paul offered you a job."

"So I didn't take the job. So what? It's not my line."

"You could have taken it a little while. Until we managed to get on our feet. If you cared." The tears were in her eyes as active as the seltzer in his drink. "Well, he offered the job to me. I'm going to take it while I can. We aren't children any more. I have no weird objections to an honest job."

"Neither has Paul. He'll like it fine," McGinty said.

"Perhaps I'll like it pretty well myself," she said. "You'll have me off your conscience, anyway." He looked and saw the resolution in her face. "It may be that we won't be married ever," Mary said. "We might as well get used to it. Just come around and take me to the movies once in a while." She stood up then. "Montana will probably kill you," Mary said, and went away. He sat there looking dumbly into his drink.

He woke up in the hotel where he lived. He woke up with his head held in his hands, but with his memory in his head. He called the desk downstairs and asked for orange juice, with ice in it, and for a pot of boiling coffee, too, and for the papers. It was afternoon. "Get a coupla papers," McGinty said.

The papers said the things that he had said to Mike. "It's all a matter of style," the papers quoted him. "McGinty promises to regain the crown he gave away."

He telephoned to Mary's place. She wasn't there. "Gone to work," they said.

He called up Fatso Berg, who had a ely sympathy for such mistakes. "You'll make a lot o' money," Fatso said. "You'll fill a ball park with Montana. You an' him will draw them in." "You think I've got a chance?" "You mean frankly, on the level, Champ?"

McGinty said he did. "We'll see the way you go," said Fatso. "We'll see you in the gym."

McGinty was a picture man, the way he stuck his left hand out, the way he moved like music on his feet. That was the same. You couldn't take his style away, when he was punching butterfins around a training ring. He dared work with good men who would bring out his defects. He tired too fast, and punches hurt him more than they had two years ago. He couldn't get the rhythm that he wanted in his hands; he couldn't get that extra juice from smoothly waltzing legs. It all was very flash and was pretty, just to see, but McGinty knew inside that it was movie-picture stuff.

He fought Joe Burns, of Jersey City, in the armory over there. They went eight rounds and Joe was sliced like a ham in a machine. Joe was a pudgy, rather-dusting man who bled beneath punches he absorbed. They stopped the fight and all the critics said that Barney was a master of a long-forgotten art. McGinty was so tired that he could scarcely lift a hand. He didn't let them know how near he was to falling on his face. He signed to fight Montana on Decoration Day, outdoors in a ball park, for twenty per cent of the gate.

McGINTY had some money now, and Mike advanced a generous bit to carry him through his training for the fight. Somehow he had no great desire to spend the dough. He worked along and did the best he could. He beat his body to shape. His weight was right, and all the drinking he had ever done would fit conveniently inside one pail. His eyes were sharp. His limbs were fast. Just didn't have the stuff that made him a champ. He couldn't catch the rhythm that had made him master of his trade. All that was gone, except the picture stuff. He hadn't heard from Mary in the longest while. He knew that she was busy, but he had hoped that she would call. He'd not called her. His need of her was very great, he thought. He talked one dinnertime into the Midnight Club.

She was much better as a hostess than she ever was at wearing tights, or singing songs.

"Hello, Barney," Mary said. She took his hand. You'd think he was a customer who dropped in now and then. She went to fix a problem in the kitchen, then returned. "You're looking fine," she said. "You're looking splendid, Barney, honestly you are. You'll have a drink? A little one?"

"You know that I'm in training for a fight."

"Of course I do. It's just as well," she said. "In deference to Montana, huh?"

"Montana, hell. I'll stab his eyes out. He's a bum." McGinty reached around to find his hat. The way she talked. Who the hell was he, a traveling salesman from Duluth?

"Why, Barney!"

"All right; all right." He tried to grin. "I guess I'm just on edge, that's all. How's Paul?"

"He's fine. He'd like to see you, Barney. Why don't you wait around?"

"I just thought things might be slow tonight," he said. "I thought we might jump in and see the movie down the street."

Mary touched a wine list to her lips. They smiled. "Monday's always slow," she said. "Paul and I are going to show. I'm sorry, though. I know he'd like to have you wait around."

"I haven't got much time to spend in barrooms," Barney said—and left.

Montana was the first man in the ring, and then McGinty came. Montana was an animated chocolate ball. His hair was the kind of wire you use to clean a kitchen pot. He pranced there in his corner like a race horse full of hop.

Sailor Rappaport, vast and unashamed, maintained a pal would always be a pal and came with Fatso Berg into the ring behind McGinty.

McGinty listened to the introductions and the crowd. This time he hadn't bet a nickel on the fight. This time, at least, the lesson had been learned. He would like to make Montana miss, for just a little while. He would like to show Montana what McGinty used to be. He didn't wait for long.

McGinty moved like paper in the wind around his man. He found the champion's nose. Montana slipped inside and threw quick bombs to Barney's sides. The punches hurt.

McGinty stabbed him with a long left hand. He worked it fast and put some thunder in his head. He tried to hold Montana trapped him on the ropes, then hit him with a leather bomb. McGinty hit the canvas floor. McGinty rolled around on hands and knees and heard the count.

He found his feet. He found Montana, too. They stood and punched. This was no fighter-boxer duel. It's hard to be a fancy Dan when your head is full of fog and funny lights. He punched some more. He hit Montana square. He felt the impact on his glove, a nice right hand. He slipped away and danced a bit and hoped that things would clear.

The hard hands found his head again. McGinty had been a champion, himself. He stuck it out. He moved against the leather storm, and then it was a funny thing. He didn't know just where he was. He just kept moving all the time.

THE voice was soft and clucking in his ear. The hands were kind. "You're doin' pretty all the time. You got 'im blind. The guy can't see so good no more." The voice was quick and soft, as though there wasn't time. The voice be-meat behind the jabs. A little bit of claret moved along Montana's lips. A left hook hit McGinty's chin. The ring lights were a sheet of gold, the swift and pretty lightning of a summer night. McGinty gave a deadpan to the damage done. His left hand was a hissing snake that took a quick reprisal as it burned Montana's flesh. There was the bell. There were so many rounds to go, McGinty thought.

MONTANA moved the beat up in the second round. The Puerto Rican burned his energy because he had so much. He carried six or seven hands. McGinty thought, and it was very hard to block them all.

"I stink in there," he said to Fatso Berg. "Can't box, can't do a thing."

"Keep movin' fast and make him miss." There wasn't any other thing a man could say. McGinty moved out for the third and found Montana boring always in, relentless as a steady rain. McGinty caught the rhythm of the fight for just a while. He tied the sweating brown man in a clinch, then punished him inside with tricks Montana never learned.

All this was fine, and then Montana came again. A left hook blazed again and didn't miss. McGinty heard the longed to Fatso, and the Sailor rubbed McGinty's legs. The Sailor wore a look of quiet worship on his face.

McGinty heard the bell and moved on out. He saw Montana with the patches on his eyes that weren't there before, still coming in, but heavily, as though he walked in sand. McGinty shoved a left hand out. It made a soggy contact at the point where it was aimed. Montana shook the cobwebs from his eyes. McGinty tried again. It wasn't hard. Just stick it out, and then some more, although his arm seemed weighted with a thousand pounds. The blood was on the dark man now. There wasn't too much damage in the punches that he threw. McGinty really couldn't understand. He fought his fight on just the little strength he had until the bell. He sat down on the stool. "What round is this?" was all he wished to know.

Fatso said, "You got the fourteenth comin' up."

It's happened once to Dempsey and to several other guys, it really has. A punch comes up and memory goes away. A man fights on. It's not a gag. It's happened lots of times. It happened to McGinty. He said, "This guy's a tramp, but I can't throw no punches any more. I can't even walk two rounds."

"Go walk 'em," Fatso told him. "The other guy is dead. You were a champion once yourself."

They moved with soggy resolution. McGinty wore a grin. He faked some deftness with a wooden arm. He used long seconds just for tugging at his tights. He let Montana start a desperation punch, then moved away and left Montana stumbling by the ropes. McGinty did the gracious thing and helped him straighten out. The crowd thought this was wonderful and said so with its heavy voice. McGinty thought that he would die. He clowned the last two rounds away. He heard the final bell and kept his feet. He saw the judges write upon their slips of paper, the referee do the same. He saw them all collected and he heard the winner's name—his own. He held onto the ropes and said some pleasant things for those who called his name.

They led him through the crowd and to his dressing room. He wouldn't let them see the way he felt. Mike Leonard crowded after him and several writers worked their way inside. The clamor was too great. They shook his bandaged hands too much. Mike Leonard said, "It was the greatest fight you ever fought."

McGinty moved his swollen lips until they made a sick and little laugh. "It's just a matter of style," he said, and stumbled toward the showers. Then they saw the great McGinty topple over on his face.

His friends and telegrams kept coming in all through the following afternoon, to shake his hand and wish him well, to see the rainbow colors he displayed around his eyes. Then Mary came.

She wore a tailored suit and summer furs, a little hat that merely held her lovely hair in place. He thought she looked like the sweetheart of a thriving national bank. She wore a smile. She put her furs aside, then labored at the fingers of her gloves. "At least you'd think a gentleman would stand."

"I'd like to stand," McGinty said, "except that I'd fall down. It's nice to see you, Mary." He really couldn't tell her how it felt. "You look like all the pretty lights I saw last night."

"Last night you were tremendous," Mary said. "Today you are a flop. Just look at you." She had her gloves off now. She wore a diamond that looked bigger than a dime. It was the sort of diamond he had hoped to put upon her hand. "Paul must be doing extra-special fine," was all he said. He thought she didn't have to wave that ice beneath his nose.

"He's opening up a third place," Mary said. "He wants a place in Brooklyn, too. You can't be up to Paul. He's much too practical for me. I quit. I didn't want to be reformed."

"The rock," McGinty said. He wasn't quite as stupid as he seemed.

"I ALWAYS wanted one like this," she said. "I got it cheap. From you to me." She looked like all the sunlight in the world. "You gave it to me, Champ. You had some money on account with me that you forgot about. You never were too bright at figures, Barney dear. I had some money of my own, not much, of course. I bet the whole thing on the fight."

"I didn't even bet myself," he said. "I wouldn't bet a dime. You really didn't think I'd win the fight?"

"I thought I'd find your body in the morgue," she said. "It was a sentimental little bet. Of course, we all can make mistakes."

He kissed her on her warm and willing lips. "We'll do it now," he said. "We won't wait seven years. I'll quit this game before they pack me in a box." He kissed her once again. "And then what will I do?"

"That's up to you, McGinty," Mary said. "I haven't got the least idea."

Occupation: Widow

Continued from page 10

NON-SLIP!

Miss Joan Anderson, popular fashion model, inspects the transmission of a new car. The salesman explains how power reaches the wheels through gears, for gears can't slip . . .

NON-SKID!

By the same can't-slip gear principle, Miller Tires really gear the car to the road. Actually, 1453 gear-like edges grip the road surface, to give you sure starting and quick stopping—positive protection against skids and slips and slides, even when roads are wet.

Miller Geared-to-the-Road Tires are much safer and longer wearing, on both crowded streets and open roads. Naturally, such fine treads are built on tires that are good all through—extra strength and cooler running for blowout protection—quiet running—and more flexible for a softer, smoother ride. And the Miller dealer's economy prices will surprise you.

MILLER TIRES

GEARED TO THE ROAD

1940 IS MILLER'S 48TH YEAR IN RUBBER

The man seemed to see nothing ridiculous in using that friendship as a reason for making threats.

"Would he find work for me in Berlin?"

"At once, Fräulein. You may rest assured!"

Carola walked to the window. She had a desperate choice here and she knew it. Stockmann's visit was planned to force her back to Berlin. It might be best to go, no matter what work Blaerchen might offer. Either she had to return or be hunted from city to city by an organization that would never let her rest.

She turned to Stockmann slowly: "You may tell Herr Blaerchen that I shall return to Berlin."

Stockmann smiled broadly and his fat cheeks wrinkled. "He will be delighted."

When he had gone Carola recalled what he had said. Blaerchen would be delighted! She smiled to herself. She remembered how she had fled Berlin in panic the night that she had heard of her husband's death. She had fled in grief and panic but she could return cool and clearheaded. By continuing cool she might find in Berlin the answer to a question that had made the years of her widowhood more miserable than most.

AT NOON on a January day Karl Dietrich stepped from a third-class carriage at the Friedrichstrasse station and walked away, as if to a certain destination.

In his early thirties, he was a tall man with broad shoulders and long, swinging arms. His face showed that he had once been much stouter. His gait was peculiar. He walked with a slight stiffness as if his back pained him. At each step he could not swing quite freely from the waist. His face was a large, round face, reddened, not unattractive, rather comic, for his features were oddly assorted, like the window of an odds-and-ends store. His clothes were of the cheapest.

On a bus platform outside the station, he took a few coins from his pocket and fingered them, as if they were his last. Then he boarded a bus.

At the corner on which Café Buda, with its neat blue-and-white awnings, stands, he got off and stood indecisively at the curb. Then, with that unbending walk, he entered the café, and went directly to a large round table at the rear.

A waitress brought water, a napkin, and a menu. She greeted him mechanically; then as if she had seen him first through a screen and now clearly, she stammered, "Herr Dietrich!"

"It has been long, Marie," Dietrich said. His voice was surprisingly deep, pleasant and musical.

"Yes, Herr Dietrich. What may I bring you?"

He saw her nervousness and smiled. "You get younger, Marie. You haven't married yet?"

"Oh, no, no sir." The girl was confused now. "What may I bring you?"

"There's no hurry, Marie," Dietrich said kindly. "Tell me, do the same people come to this table?"

"Few of them, mein Herr. You have not been here for how long, Herr Dietrich?"

"Three years, Marie."

"There are many changes in that time." She was eager to get away. "What may I bring you?"

"Coffee will do," Dietrich said, remembering how little money he had. Marie left.

A heavy-set man of fifty came down the aisle, hurrying a little, looking neither right nor left, as if anticipating a pleasant lunch. Two or three steps from the table he stopped, recognizing Dietrich and was flustered.

"Dietrich!" He came forward, smiling with hurried, forced warmth. "How nice to see you."

"It's nice to be seen."

"Strange to see you here." The man did not sit down.

"Strange to be here."

"You've just returned to Berlin?"

"I've just returned."

For a moment the man was embarrassed, then he said nervously, "Well, must be going. I just came in to look for someone." He turned and hurried toward the door.

Karl was not left long alone. On his way to the kitchen Marie had stopped and spoken to the proprietor. Now he came to the table with the slightest trace of a smile.

"Herr Dietrich!" He was formal and cordial. "It's like old times to see you here."

"Hello, Herr Hoynig."

"Waiting for someone?" Hoynig tried to be casual.

Dietrich smiled as if he understood what was behind the question. "No, just hoped to see some of my old friends."

"The table is almost always empty."

Karl nodded. "Times change. Remember the day Blitzstein from the Philharmonic put his bass viol on the table so that no one would steal it?"

Hoynig nodded but did not laugh. He walked away uneasily.

Marie brought coffee and Karl sipped it slowly. He did not notice a third young man, rather tastelessly dressed, coming to the table. He was nervous but from shyness, not uneasiness. His voice wavered slightly as he said, "Excuse me, but aren't you Herr Karl Dietrich? My name is Schimpf, Wilhelm Schimpf."

"Good evening, Herr Schimpf." Karl had never seen him before.

"Pardon my speaking to you. I have always admired you, Herr Dietrich. I always thought that you were one of the best comedians we have ever had in Berlin."

"You are kind, Herr Schimpf."

"No, no, I mean it." Schimpf's forehead was perspired. "I have admired you so much at the Krokodil Café."

"We had good times there," Karl said pleasantly. "Won't you sit down?"

"I'm not detaining you?"

"I have no other appointment."

"THEN I am fortunate," Schimpf went on quickly. "I'm a clerk in the Agricultural Ministry here but a student of the theater, especially comedy. I remember an act you used to do at the Krokodil, the one in which you played the village butcher."

Dietrich smiled. "The Butcher and the Policeman! I had almost forgotten it."

"I have not seen you perform for some time."

"It's been a long time since I was on a stage."

"I can tell you exactly," Schimpf said triumphantly. "Just three years!" Then he dropped his voice: "I remember the Krokodil so well. It is not the same place today."

"Still open?" Karl was surprised.

"There is just a dance orchestra, nothing more. By the way, do you remember Carola Dirling?"

Karl nodded.

"I'll never forget the way she sang," Schimpf said as if the memory were something precious. "She used to stand on the platform in just a simple home-made dress. You know, when she sang those sea songs you could feel in them the terror of the sharp rocks off Skagerrak and the fog off Kattegat."

"There was no one like her," Karl said.

"She disappeared so quickly from Berlin after her husband died," Schimpf said. "I never did know how he died."

"An automobile accident."

"For a moment Schimpf was silent, as he were still thumbing over his memories of the Krokodil. "I remember one of the stories you used to tell, Herr Dietrich." He laughed to himself. "The owner of the Krokodil was Herr Blaerchen, nicht wahr?"

"One of the owners."

"He's an important government official now, in the foreign office."

Karl frowned, then nodded.

"He's an important Nazi, too."

"I know that," Karl said with abrupt sternness.

Schimpf looked surprised. Then, almost timidly: "By the way, if you aren't busy this evening, Herr Dietrich, perhaps you would dine with me. I should be honored."

"I would like that," Karl said frankly.

"There's that Hungarian place across the street if that would suit. At seven?"

"Anywhere. Anytime."

From a short distance off, Hoynig, the proprietor, was watching. Schimpf saw him gesture and turned to Karl: "Excuse me. I think Herr Hoynig wants you."

A few minutes later he came to the table, his manner shattered in embarrassment. "I am so sorry," he stammered. "Herr Hoynig has reminded me of an engagement I had this evening."

Dietrich nodded: "Don't be embarrassed, Herr Schimpf. You were kind to invite me. I shall remember that."

Schimpf's face showed his confusion.

"I assume that Herr Hoynig told you that it was not wise to be seen with me?"

Schimpf said nothing.

Karl was not concerned. "Just two questions—"

Schimpf interrupted: "First, Herr Dietrich, be good enough to let me help you."

He reached in his pocket. "You just need money."

He offered a hundred-mark note.

Karl hesitated. To hear that and to know it was true was a new kind of pain.

The few coins he had in his pocket made him feel ridiculous. "I shall take it as a loan."

"As a debt owed you, please," Schimpf said, "and long overdue, for the many times you have made me happy."

"Thank you. Now, two questions. Is the Krokodil at the same place?"

"Yes."

"I'll go there tonight."

"You're new in Berlin," Schimpf said, as if eager to give every help. "It's hard to get around the city at night. Everything is blacked out. You'll find the Krokodil a popular afternoon tea-dancing place."

"Then I'll go this afternoon." He hesitated.

"You had another question?"

"Yes." Karl still hesitated. "From which concentration camp did Hoynig tell you I had just returned?"

"From Sachsenhausen, Herr Dietrich."

"He was wrong. I was in Buchenwald. It's by far the worse!"

IT WAS harder than Karl had imagined it would be to turn into Martin Lutherstrasse and go toward the Krokodil. A thousand times he had seen ahead the small sign over steps that led down to a basement. He could remember the time in 1933 that he and Blaerchen had hung up that small painted board. In those days cellar cabarets were opening all over Berlin. The formula for them was simple: a small stage, some tables and chairs, a piano, a few sandwiches, some beer, some entertainers and unlimited hopes. Blaerchen had interested a young wealthy man, Paul Lesser, in the Krokodil. With his backing it could run for more than a month, the usual life of the cellar cabaret.

As Karl came down the street he saw a gaudy sign ahead, with the word KROKODIL. The entrance was deserted. Karl could remember nights when police were stationed at the door to prevent more people from pushing in. To go down the steps into the cabaret now took force of will. He was sure that everyone connected with the place was new and that he would not be recognized. It would be better that way.

A headwaiter greeted him, and led him to a table. Several dozen people were at other tables. Most of the men were in uniform.

In a moment he realized that he would not be uneasy and pained here; he would only be bored. The little stage was now a useless small platform protruding slightly into the room. A curtain, streaked and shoddy, hid most of it. Sometimes he had stood there for a half-hour, sometimes longer, saying whatever came into his mind, an ad-lib

"HOUDINI" JONES and the great "hair" trick

Observe, ladies and gentlemen, he plays nine innings of softball in the burning sun. Look at that hair, dry and dusty as the desert.

Now he takes a swim and the water washes away natural hair oils. The top of his head is beginning to look like a bird's nest.

He makes a thorough job of it; mows the lawn and lets the sun put on the finishing touches. Looks pretty hopeless, doesn't it?

Now watch closely. Nothing up his sleeves except a bottle of Kreml. He applies a little and behold! Hair looking its natural best. All the oil it needs—without that greasy look.

When the sun, wind, and water dry out your hair, use Kreml, the famous tonic-dressing. Gives hair that neat, clean, lustrous look—not sticky or greasy. Removes dandruff scales—checks excessive falling hair.

Women tell us that Kreml puts the hair in splendid condition for a permanent—makes permanents look lovelier.

Ask for Kreml at your drug store or barber shop.

Kreml Shampoo is a splendid ally of Kreml Hair Tonic. Made from an 80% olive oil base, it cleanses thoroughly, rinses out quickly, leaves hair soft and easy to manage.

KREML

REMOVES DANDRUFF SCALES—
CHECKS EXCESSIVE FALLING HAIR NOT GREASY—MAKES THE HAIR BEHAVE

"They'll think some li'l pixies has been here"

JAY IRVING

SALE

75¢ value

ALL 3 FOR

49¢

LISTERINE TOOTH PASTE

IT'S WORTH YOUR WHILE AND AN EXTRA MILE TO Stop over in St. Louis

EVER SEE MONKEYS RIDE BIKES?
Thrill to our Zoo stars.

EVER SEE LINDBERGH'S TROPHIES?
St. Louis is their home.

EVER SEE OPERA UNDER THE STARS?
Our Mummy Opera is world-famous.

EVER SEE OL' MAN RIVER?
He's right on our doorstep.

EVER SEE A PANDA?
We have two... stop and see them.

Historic as the Mason Dixon Line... modern as the Yankee Clipper. Going north, east, south, west, St. Louis is worth your while.

To assure the success of your visit, let Hotel Lennox be your host. Here you'll find hospitality to warm your heart... guest-controlled air-conditioned rooms to cool your night's rest... famous food and drink... bath, radio, ice water in every room.

At Hotel Lennox, the town's at your doorstep. Circle St. Louis on your roadmap or time table... and stop at the Lennox.

Rates—50% of all rooms for $3.50 or less, single; $5.00 or less, double. Special rates for families.

COMPLETELY AIR-CONDITIONED HOTEL
Lennox
9th & Washington • St. Louis, Mo.
Nearby Parking and Garages

comedian whose remarks went around the city the next day. A roar came at him from the audience, then another and another.

The crowd laughed, too, when he said, "You know, my friends, we should be grateful to our friend Hermann Goering. He says that after five years of Nazi rule every German citizen will have an automobile and at the end of ten years an airplane. Think, my friends, with an automobile and an airplane we can hunt that much farther for a pound of butter!"

Today no man could get on a platform and say such things. Once a man could laugh in Germany. Today no one could laugh lest some flea-skinned Nazi think he was being laughed at.

Karl looked slowly around the room. It was difficult to see the stage without thinking of Carola. No one else had ever left such a clear-cut shining memory. He never understood her effect on him; before her, he was always one of an audience, watching as a child watches, never able to break through the distance between them. Other men, he knew, felt the same way. Later, he realized that what he had interpreted as aloofness was only shyness and that was the greater part of her charm. She baffled him the more because he had grown up in the theater and was used to theater people.

He had taught her much about stage presence and stage timing and she had once said, "I should die from stage fright sometimes, Karl, if it were not for you." He remembered that remark always, because it was the most closely personal remark she ever made to him.

HE TOOK one more look around the room. Like so many other things in Germany, the Krokodil had changed.

He rose from the chair and started toward the door, but he had only taken one step forward when he stopped. At the doorway, looking around the room with a sort of blinking unbelief, was Carola. He told himself instantly that he did not want to see anyone from the past, even Carola, but he could not restrain himself. He went to her.

"Carola!"

"Karl!"

As Karl led her to a table he realized that he had not seen her since that night, three years ago, when men had come to this room, even as she was singing, with a message about her husband's death. She had finished her song and gone out, alone. Later he heard she had left the city.

It would be hard to pick up from there. It was harder than he thought. The girl seemed nervous, uncomfortable. "I've only been in Berlin a week," she said. "Every day I wanted enough courage to come here. If I hadn't, I should always have known I was cowardly. Now that I've come, the place is so changed that it's completely impersonal."

Karl nodded. "I felt the same way."

"You've been in Berlin all the time, Karl?"

He was startled. Obviously, she knew nothing of his recent history. She had left Berlin in a hurry a month before his arrest, and no one had known where she went. He hesitated about telling her the truth, decided against it and said, "I've been here off and on."

"You've changed, Karl," she said after a moment. "You look as if you hadn't smiled for years."

"Really?" He was tempted to tell her that he had just returned from Buchenwald but a man could not be too careful, even with an old friend. Yet he could not ask questions point-blank about her friends, her opinions, and he was silent, not knowing what to say. For one thing, it was hard to talk in this place. "I feel so awkward here," he said.

"How about having dinner with me tonight?" Carola asked.

"I'm sorry, I can't." He wanted to find a small hotel for the night. "But we could lunch tomorrow." That would give him a chance to ask the sort of questions he had to ask.

"Gladly," Carola smiled. Then she frowned. "I can't tomorrow. The day after? Tomorrow I'm lunching with Rolf Blaerchen."

Karl did not look up. That fact made any question unnecessary.

"Have you seen Rolf?" she asked.

Karl shook his head. It was best now to get away as quickly as possible.

"Suppose you call for me about one o'clock the day after tomorrow? I'll look forward to it, Karl." She gave her address.

"Certainly." Then, brusquely, "Shall we leave?"

They went out together. Carola said,

"But, Bob, I am wearing flat heels!"

GREGORY D'ALESSIO

"You haven't told me where you're living."

"At the Muenster Hotel near Friedrichstrasse."

They separated. It was bitter to have thought of a woman for three years, to have met her, and to have found her a person who was friendly with Blaerchen.

TWICE, while en route to Berlin, Carola had thought of turning back. She did not fear the poignancy of old associations, of having to live alone again in the surroundings where she had once lived with Paul. She did fear having to see old friends, and await their questions. Meeting Karl had set the whole problem afresh. She was grateful to him for not talking of the past. His awkward reserve had puzzled her. She assumed that he had changed with time as had everything else.

Since boarding the train for Berlin she had thought chiefly of Blaerchen. On arrival she found that, as usual, he had been thoughtful. She expected to find no one at the station, but a young man met her, took her to a small hotel and insisted that he be allowed to do anything possible for her comfort. A car was put at her disposal the next day and she found a small apartment.

Blaerchen had telephoned the first day, his voice as ever smooth, gentle and warm. He explained that he would not be able to see her at once but that he would arrange for lunch as soon as he could.

The lunch was tomorrow.

She had felt that their first meeting would not be difficult; with it imminent she was not sure. It would take restraint not to speak of Paul's last letter, the letter that clearly indicated that Paul, who had gone on a confidential government mission to Warsaw, had suspected that he was entering a trap. She had destroyed that letter before leaving Rome but she knew every word of it by memory. It was the sort of last letter that a man facing death would write to the woman he had loved. But its poignancy and its finality were less vivid than the last sentences in which Paul said that he was sure that one man had set the trap that one man was responsible for his death—Blaerchen.

And now, lunch with him on the morrow!

ROLF BLAERCHEN had come to Berlin from Riga. Of his early years in Berlin Carola knew nothing. Because he was attractive, self-possessed and had a kind of boyish enthusiasm, people liked him. His only ambition, as he worked at one job, then another, was to get money, much money, and to meet people, important people. In a few years he was living comfortably and he was completely at ease in the homes of nobility along the Tiergarten, in the theatrical set on Kurfürstendamm or a lunch with the industrial crowd. People were his capital.

Paul Lesser came from an industrialist's family in Westphalia. He did have money. Paul was reserved, uncomfortable among people, lacking Blaerchen's gift for the quick remark, the proper phrase. It was inevitable that he should admire Blaerchen on first meeting. For the next years they were inseparable. It was Blaerchen who interested Paul in the idea of a cabaret, who hired Karl who laid plans for the Krokodil. It was Blaerchen who found Carola singing in a run-down café in Munich, who brought her to Berlin, who introduced her to Paul. When Paul and Carola were married he acted as best man.

It was Blaerchen who interested Paul in politics. Until that time Paul's whole interest, like someone who has found a new plaything, was in the Krokodil. Blaerchen had been a Nazi even before Hitler came to power. Now he began to talk politics to Paul, and soon after nothing but politics. To Carola that did not matter. She did not care what was said so long as she had Paul and her chance to sing.

"What opportunity have we young men of Germany had?" Blaerchen would ask. "With Hitler we have a chance."

To Carola that made no sense, but Paul nodded. Then he began to repeat those things. It did not matter what he said so long as he came to the Krokodil every night and sat at a front table while she sang.

She could remember the first night that he failed to come. He had gone into politics, he explained; he had a position at the Foreign Office. Official business required him to go to Prague. That was the first absence. Then absence became something measured not by nights but by weeks. He was in Bucharest, in Riga, in Paris.

Then, one day, he had gone to Warsaw! It would be hard not to remember that, as she talked to Blaerchen.

The next day she waited nervously through a long morning. She dressed carefully, purposely choosing a black crepe that outlined her figure well. If

They called me 'The Sultan of SWAT'

"I was a Magnet for flies, gnats, mosquitoes. I spent more time swatting pests than I did socking the ball. I tried all kinds of concoctions. But nothing seemed to help."

"Then a Sympathetic Friend told me something new... a remarkable insect repellent that's non-greasy, non-irritating, pleasant smelling. You simply rub it on—and kiss the pests goodbye!"

"It's Called 'Sta-Way' Insect Repellent Lotion. And boy! How it works! Insects simply despise it. One application lasts and lasts. All drug, hardware and sporting goods stores carry it—and it costs only 35¢ a bottle!"

INDOOR comfort OUTDOORS

STA-WAY

TRADE-MARK

INSECT REPELLENT LOTION

NATIONAL CARBON COMPANY, INC.

Unit of Union Carbide and Carbon Corporation
The word "STA-WAY" is a registered trade-mark of National Carbon Co., Inc.

Blaerchen remembered the simple gray, girlish dress she had worn on the stage this new one would be a surprise. At noon her bell rang. A chauffeur was waiting with an automobile. She took a last deliberate look at herself in the mirror as she used to do just before going out to face an audience, and went downstairs.

"I am to drive you to Wandsee," the chauffeur said.

The car headed out from the city. The January morning was too cold for comfortable driving. The roads in the suburbs were empty. The car turned down a side road into a large private estate. Carola had a glimpse of a tennis court, a long lawn that led to a lakeside and a bathing house and greenhouses. The drive led up to a huge, sprawling house of gray stone. On the porch Blaerchen was waiting.

He came running down the steps to greet her. As he helped her from the car his manner was that of a man greeting a close friend from whom he had parted just an hour before. Holding tightly to her arm, he led her to the porch, and into a smartly furnished living room.

"I am so glad you have come back to Berlin," he said. "You belong here."

"I am glad to be back." She had forgotten Blaerchen's skill in putting people at ease. She had to find something to talk about, something that would not lead directly to any question about the past, about the years in Rome. "You have a beautiful home."

"It's nice," Blaerchen said casually.

"Did you design it?"

Blaerchen laughed. "No, I picked it up at a sale—very cheap. The former owner decided that he preferred to move from Berlin, you see."

Because it was vital to be relaxed, to appear perfectly friendly, Carola laughed too. She knew what his remark meant. Many people had fled Berlin in the years of Nazi rule; their homes and their possessions, too, went to the State and the Nazis were the State.

A butler called them to lunch. Food was served that was on no restaurant menu in the city: beef fillet, fresh asparagus, fresh tomatoes. Green bottles of Rhine wine were cooled in a silver pail.

As if Blaerchen realized that Carola might be ill at ease, he asked no questions. He talked about his travels, about changes in Berlin, about the Foreign Office.

"YOU must have an important position," Carola said, hoping to get some clue to the work he wanted her to do.

"It's very interesting." Blaerchen smiled, as if guessing her purpose. "Have you been to the Krokodil?"

"I went there for a few minutes yesterday afternoon. Do you know who I met there? Karl!"

Blaerchen did not appear interested. "Karl Dietrich? Is he back?"

"Where has he been? He looked very ill."

"After you left, things went badly with him," Blaerchen said carelessly. "He was never very discreet, you know. Remember the things he used to say on the stage? After all, there are some things in life that one does not joke about."

"What happened to him?" She was holding a glass at the moment and it trembled in her hand.

"I warned him once or twice but it did no good. The police arrested him and he was sent to prison for a time. I presume he's just out."

She wanted to jump up and run, to run out and through the city at once, remorseful at having failed to recognize yesterday that he needed friends. No person in the world was gentler, more sensitive than he; Paul himself had said that many times.

"I should advise you strongly not to see him again," Blaerchen continued. "People like that are best avoided."

"Yes." She forced herself to sit back in the chair, to seem relaxed, to sip from the glass. "But I made a luncheon engagement with him."

"I should suggest that you break it," Blaerchen said. "For your sake, of course. People might misunderstand."

She wanted to throw the glass at him but she realized that she must appear unconcerned. At the moment her purpose in coming to Berlin was the important thing. She had to change the subject now and she did it awkwardly: "Your friend in Rome spoke to me about possible work here."

"There's plenty of time to talk about that," Blaerchen said.

"I really would like to know what I can do."

He ignored the sincerity in that. "Listen, Carola, I am so glad you are here in Berlin, so glad." He reached across the table for her hand. His voice was suddenly gentle: "I shall never know why you ran away so suddenly. I do know how Paul's death affected you. I wrote you many times urging you to return. You never answered my letters."

"THAT'S all past now," Carola said, grim in spite of herself.

"You could have come back before this. Why didn't you?"

This was to be the subtlest sort of inquisition, a delicate but thorough probing into motive. She was sure he held her hand for a purpose, to sense any reaction. She reached out and put her free hand on top of his and held it tightly so that he could feel no trembling in the hand he held. She answered slowly, "I hated to be reminded of Paul at every turn." Slowly she withdrew her hands, then took a compact from her purse and opened it.

Blaerchen lit a cigar and sat back in his chair. He looked at her intimately. "You're even lovelier than I remembered you. Stockmann told me a curious thing about you."

"Yes?" She held the compact tightly.

"He said that you were disinterested, shall I say, until he told you that I was in Berlin again."

Mechanically, she began to powder her face. She could not have looked at Blaerchen at that moment.

"I wanted to ask you, Carola—did my being here make your decision to return for you?"

She was frightened now, frightened cold. If he had guessed her thoughts about Paul's death then she had better run quickly. She had to look up at him and she saw his face, and fright left her at once. Instead of suspicion she saw silly satisfaction. As he caught her glance he smiled the pleased smile of a man who has guessed an absurdly simple puzzle.

"We can be good friends again," he said gently.

"Of course we can," she said gaily, not sure where the conversation was going now.

Irrelevantly he continued, "I have never married, Carola."

"You must be very lonely at times."

"Not any more," he smiled. "Not any more, with you here."

She could have shuddered at that, at its deliberate implication. This and not any desire to give her work might be his whole reason in having her back in Berlin. Any attempt of his to assume some intimate basis could be checked for a time by reminding him that she still loved Paul. For a time!

He stood up and took her by the arm. She did not like the way he held her. "I'll have to return to my office shortly," he said, "but first let me show you around my place."

She did not follow. If Blaerchen as-

...call a CLEANER

The help you need is right at your fingertips in the classified (yellow) pages of your telephone book. Let them tell you where to find those shops and services you want... the Cleaners & Dyers, Laundries, Employment Agencies, Radio Service & Supplies, Window Cleaners... or who sells that advertised brand.

Look it up in the Classified

CALOX MOVIE QUIZ NUMBER 8

Her
CALOX SMILE
is famous

WHO IS SHE?

Star of "JANUARY HEIGHTS"
A Warner Brothers Production

Peg's "HOLLYWOOD SPARKLE" gets her man!

1 Gwen: "Why Peg! You're mad as a hatter! Where are you going?"
Peg: "Home, that's where. Can you imagine Dick telling me it was a shame the way I neglected my teeth!"

2 Gwen: "He didn't mean it, Peg. My advice is Calox Tooth Powder... its 5 cleansing agents do splendid work in helping to bring out the natural lustre of your teeth!"

3 Peg: "What a marvelous show, Dick! And that new star—didn't she have the loveliest smile?"
Dick: "Sure, but your 'Hollywood Sparkle' can match hers any day!"

Helps your "Teeth shine like
the stars" by bringing out natural lustre

CLUES

By Harrison Carroll
HOLLYWOOD CORRESPONDENT

1. Who played the part of a Confederate spy in "Virginia City"?
2. Who leads a quiet life with her adopted son, Michael?
3. Who has blonde hair, blue eyes and—like so many other stars—a vivacious Calox smile?

(Check your answer below. Star's name is at bottom of page*)

TRY THIS FINGER-NAIL TEST
—PROVE CALOX
POLISHES
SAFELY

MAKE this amazing Calox test: pour a little Calox Tooth Powder on a nail buffer and rub your nails, hard. What a smooth, high polish! That's definite proof Calox contains no harsh abrasives to harm the softest tooth enamel.

Calox Tooth Powder has not only 1 or 2, but FIVE CLEANSING AGENTS that attack ugly film and surface stain. You can feel the surging foam of Calox going into split-second action and new, high polish on your teeth... as Calox helps you win that "Hollywood Sparkle." Brush your teeth with Calox for 30 DAYS! Prove how it helps improve the natural brightness and lustre of your teeth!

CALOX TOOTH POWDER

Try Calox Antiseptic—Refreshes the mouth, sweetens the breath.

*Miriam Hopkins

sumed that some close, intimate relationship was going to develop, that had better be cleared at once. "You have said nothing about the work I am supposed to do."

"We'll discuss it later," Blaerchen said carelessly.

"I cannot accept money unless I know that there is work I can do for you."

"There is work you can do for the Foreign Office," Blaerchen said. "From time to time there may be some slight favor. That's all."

That was scarcely clear. "How would you describe that occupation?"

"Oh, well," he said carelessly. "Occupation: widow. And a very attractive widow. Isn't that sufficient?"

It did not satisfy her at all.

"For instance," Blaerchen said, suddenly matter of fact, "accept every invitation you get. Meet all the people that you can."

"And nothing more?"

He laughed. "Enjoy yourself! Now, come and see the greenhouses. There's a fine collection of orchids in one of them, odontoglossums, and particularly hard to grow. The poor fool who owned this place was crazy about them. Today he wishes he had the price of one plant!" With the air of a proprietor he took Carola by the arm.

She went along, uneasily, troubled by his vagueness, his hints about being "good friends," his request that she avoid Karl. His manner might be that of an employer to a new employee. It would be upset at once by mentioning Paul's last letter. She could question Blaerchen point-blank but that would be the ridiculous question of a silly, hysterical woman and easily denied. Then after Blaerchen would suspect her of her suspicion.

"YOU must see my country estate, Pomerania," Blaerchen was saying. "It's rather large but for a man in my position—!"

No direct question would ever tell her what she wanted to know. If she were to find out the truth about her husband's death, she would have to agree for the present to whatever Blaerchen might say, and do whatever work he wished her to do.

"We'll have many a pleasant weekend in Pomerania," Blaerchen smiled, holding more tightly to her arm.

But it was difficult not to be uneasy, difficult not to shiver now as she felt his hand on her arm. His might be the attitude of proprietor or of an employer. But it might also be that of a man who has caught something unique pleasant and desirable in a clever trap. (To be continued next week)

Mexico Must Choose

Continued from page 11

Almazan—his full name is General Juan Andreu—is the people's choice. His lieutenants say he will sweep the country if there is an "honest election" on July 7th, when every married man over 18 years of age and every unmarried man who has reached his 21st year goes to the polls to vote.

Cardenas, in a statement that is both a confession and a promise, has guaranteed that for the first time in Mexican history there shall be an honest election. The validity of such a promise, of course, is relative in a country where there has never been an accounting of the number eligible to vote, where ballot falsification and box-stuffing and bribery have been as common as terrorism and murder.

Camacho Sans Political Machine

Into the election against middle-aged, vigorous Almazan, the machine of the PRM, Partido Revolucionario Mexicano, controlled by Cardenas, has projected Avila Camacho. Honest enough not to want to be a "machine candidate" and sensitive to the cries of the people against having a candidate thrust upon them by the outgoing president, and mistrustful anyhow of Cardenas, Camacho in his recent campaign speeches has indicated he wants to stand on his own legs. He has said, in effect, that he wears no man's collar. That may split the PRM machinery and, if it does, Almazan may be elected, honest election or not.

There are two other candidates in the election. Neither is important at the moment but when the ballots are finally counted—well, you never can tell. One of them is Rafael Sanchez Tapia, former secretary of national economy. The other is Joaquin Amaro. Like Almazan and Camacho, a former undersecretary of war, they are generals. There are so many generals in Mexico that in 1925 500 were put on the retired list at one stroke.

Sanchez Tapia is a real threat in the election because he may be used by Cardenas, the wise ones say, to double-cross Camacho, by throwing to him the support of the PRM. The Partido Revolucionario Mexicano is in turn supported by Lombardo Toledano's CTM, the Confederacion de Trabajadores Mexicanos, Mexican equivalent of the C.I.O. and all-powerful labor organization. It includes in its dungareed legion the "Eighteenth of March Division," an armed body of men whose pistols are rifles, added to the weapons of that portion of the army controlled by Cardenas may be the deciding element in the balloting. Pulque and pesos will help, of course, as will the free rides on government busses and trucks, but the strong-arm squad is a tower of strength to the PRM and CTM cause.

But it is generally conceded that there will be between Almazan and Camacho that the issue will be decided, barring unpredictable internecine quarrels that cloud Mexican politics with the frequency and violence of the tropical storms that sweep the Eastern Coast. Almazan's platform as enunciated in his campaign speeches to date is a simple one. It consists largely of promises to fulfill the promises of past candidates regarding agrarian reform, the rehabilitation of the church in an officially anticlerical land and the amelioration of relations with the United States.

Almazan's friendship for the United States is one of long standing. Back in 1931, in a report to President Pascual Ortiz Rubio, he wrote:

"In the event of another war, Mexico should unhesitatingly and, with the utmost dignity, place itself beside the United States. That is the only way by which we could derive any advantages."

In a nation that has suddenly become aware of the danger it faces from Communism and Nazi and other foreign forces working for the appropriation of Mexican markets and the rupture of the peaceful life of the country, Almazan's avowed friendship for the protector to the north is certain to gain votes. Personable and powerful of build, Almazan is the figure of the "strong man" the Mexicans love so well.

Almazan is about forty-nine years old and stands well over six feet. He speaks with intelligence and vigor and with ough of demagoguery to cause the ombreroed thousands who gather about im to shout until the burros rear with right.

He is a "general de division" the high-st of the "general" ranks, and comes of n old family of revolutionaries. He is n official leave from the army to make is campaign. He became a revolution-ry at eighteen, when he was studying medicine at the College of Puebla.

As a child he lived in the home of evolutionists. Once when soldiers came o arrest the family he was sneaked out y friends and with them took to the ills. He gathered a group about him nd at one time had a following of 20,- 00 men in the Guerrero hills. He elped the brigand Zapata overthrow yrannical old Porfirio Diaz and bring Madero to power.

To the peasants and the more articuate of the peons, Almazan is Zapata and Madero and Villa. In Cuatla, the headquarters of the former Zapatistas, a laughter of the famous revolutionary made a stirring speech and she wound p by saying: "Almazan picks up the lag of Zapata, the flag of my father," nd you could have heard the cheers all he way to Durango and Monterrey. Zapata was the first to promise the peons nd peasants land.

Almazan's educational program is popular with the latently Catholic and rankly religious masses. Under the Cardenas regime, education was placed directly under control of the State in his socialization program. The constitution was amended along Marxist lines, excluding all private and religious schools. He abolished teaching in convents, monasteries and religious institutions.

Almazan has promised to guarantee the investments of foreign capital in the belief that indolent Mexico needs the aid of foreign investors who have the funds, skill and energy to exploit the nation's resources.

Even Cardenas' enemies admit that his program for socialization of the country was more misguided than evil or intentionally Soviet in aspect. Whoever succeeds him inherits a cockeyed economy and a completely empty till.

Who Gets the Army Support?

In the proportion that Almazan is the big hurly-burly boy of the campaign, Camacho is the smoothie. He's almost as smooth and silky as the olive-skinned, curly-haired Vicente Lombardo Toledano, his pal. Camacho, too, is a "division general." As such he should have the support of a large section of the army but, the experts down there say, he hasn't, except what he picks up from the fact that Cardenas raised the soldiers' pay from one peso per diem, roughly 16 American cents, to one peso 40 centavos.

There are 50,000 soldiers in the Mexican army and since it is not known how many voters there are in the whole country it cannot be estimated how important the soldier vote would be in the elections. There is no commissary department in the Mexican army, by the way, and on that one peso and 40 centavos per day the Mexican infantryman must feed himself and his family. In peace time he lives with his whole family. When on active military service in war, the soldier's wife is the commissary. She forages for her man and has camp ready for him at night after a battle, with the kettle boiling. The children, if old enough, come along to war, too.

Almazan, however, gained the confidence of subalterns and privates while in the army. They say he's their hero in peace as well as war. He's supposed to have a number of "great victories" to his credit, while Camacho was largely a swivel-chair general.

Almazan is personally skeptical of getting a fair break at the polls. This is the way he puts it:

"There is no electoral census in Mexico. Never have the voting lists been published. No one knows how many or who have the right to vote. We are carefully preparing our voting lists and, if necessary, we will install our own polls.
We hope that on Sunday, July 7th, President Cardenas will place the army in charge of watching the polls, not only for the purpose of maintaining order, but, particularly, to count the votes of the citizens and render true affidavits."

Although the election is on July 7th, Mexico will not know who won until late in August. On August 25th, the electoral college of the Federal Congress meets and canvasses the returns and announces the result of the voting. Five days later, the outgoing president makes his valedictory to congress and continues in office with lame-duck powers until November 30th.

Anything Can Happen

If trouble there is to be, it will come between July 6th, pre-election night, and August 25th, the day the election results are announced, with danger of revolt ever present, of course, until the new president takes office at the end of November. Mexico, anybody will tell you, is a country where anything can happen.

Last December there was a series of political murders, particularly in the state of Puebla, stamping ground—but maybe it's just a coincidence—of Candidate Camacho's well-muscled brother, General Maximo Avila Camacho. Mexicans say the killings, placed as high as twenty, were done by terrorists drafted from among the lower strata of the Spanish refugees.

In recent appearances in the north country, Almazan has been met with stonings and on one occasion the roof of a public building collapsed just before he entered. Two or three of his lieutenants were injured. Another time shots were fired at his party, and aides were wounded. At least three nonpoliticians were killed in a shooting scrape at another Almazanista rally.

On paper Camacho is in—solid. This largely because of the support of the CTM and affiliated labor unions, which are thoroughly thumbled by the able, energetic, reputedly Communist, Toledano. His main union boasts a million members and that's at least a million votes for Camacho. There are no peasants in those unions.

The union members are held together by a political expedient known as the "exclusion clause." This is an article in the bylaws of the union under which a worker who refuses to march in a parade, carry a banner or vote as his leader tells him to is blackballed on some union technicality and loses his job—a practice not altogether Mexican.

That there are some union elements in Mexico who hate Señor Toledano's viscera was exemplified last May Day.
During the big parade down Mexico City's main street, a group of workmen shouted in the teeth of Toledano's gun-equipped thugs: "Down with Camacho.
Viva Almazan." Maybe Toledano's totalitarian troopers aren't exactly solid.
Republican Mexico may march on.

In the event there is an obvious or at least provable skulduggery on the part of the machine, Almazan says he's going to name his own electoral college and set up shop in Monterrey with a rump parliament and everything. This might mean the establishment of a two-party system in Mexico and end the long line of quasi or total totalitarians who've ruled the country for decades.

It might mean revolution, too. Outgoing Mexican politicos die hard.

Stop Squirming

Wear Jockey Underwear

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

On land or sea, keep cool and keep your poise . . . by wearing Jockey. Jockey's patented Y-Front construction gives mild, restful support, fits the male figure everywhere, eliminates squirming. Convenient angled opening won't gap. No bulk, no bind, no buttons to rip off. Knitted to let your skin breathe. Two piece. A leg length, weight and fabric for every occasion. All cotton, rayon and linen-cotton mixtures. Contoured shirts to match. Start your Jockey underward-robe now. Children's sizes down to 6 years.

Price, 50c and up, a garment

EASY TO REMEMBER Jockey

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Insist on Jockey and look for the name on the garment. No other underwear can have the patented construction features which have made Jockey famous. Remember, it isn't Jockey without the Jockey label. If your dealer can't supply you, write us.

Coopers INC.
KENOSHA WISCONSIN

NEW YORK CHICAGO LOS ANGELES SAN FRANCISCO SEATTLE

Made and distributed in Canada by Moodies, Hamilton, Ont.; In Australia by MacRae Knitting Mills, Sydney; In British Isles by Lyle & Scott, Ideal House, London;
In New Zealand by Lane-Walker-Rudkin, Ltd., Christchurch, S 1

Hold that Well-Pressed Appearance

Stop "baggy knees" and protect trousers from perspiration with Jockey Over-Knee. Saves important dollars in cleaning and pressing bills. All Jockey comfort features, plus protection against scratchy suit fabrics. At your dealers or write us. From 75c.

COPYRIGHT 1940 BY COOPERS, INC.

Where Credit was Due

Continued from page 17

Your home is right behind home-plate when you hear the umpire yell "Pl—lay ball!"

The Crosley radio line for 1941 runs from $7.95 to $149.95. It includes table models, consoles, radio-phonograph combinations with and without automatic record players, home recording devices, frequency modulation sets, portables and auto radios.

Visit the Crosley Building at the New York World's Fair

THE CROSBY CORPORATION • Powel Crosby, Jr., President • CINCINNATI, OHIO
THE HOME OF WLW, THE NATION'S STATION—70 ON YOUR DIAL

... The model illustrated has American broadcast and international short wave bands, personal tone control, five tubes and ballast, for A.C. or D.C. and is priced at $19.95. Prices slightly higher in the far West and South.

Beemish had been expecting some such move to break up his and Rita's business proximity, and he knew for sure now that Harry was what he looked like—a snake in the grass.

Beemish said: "You mind your own business, and I'll mind mine, Harry. There'll never be any other cashier in our store but Rita. In fact, that's the main condition of our partnership."

"I was afraid of that," Harry said. "How such a perfect girl as Rita can be such a rotten cashier is beyond me. Do you know how many times I've asked her to quit cashiering and marry me, Beemish?"

"I don't want to hear about it," Beemish said.

BACK at the store, he told Rita that henceforth Pollard Hardware was on a strictly cash basis, and Rita agreed that it might be a good idea. Then Beemish suggested, since an all-cash business meant a busier cashier, that she had better save her eyes by laying off the love books.

She didn't take his head off when he suggested that—she just got superior.

She asked: "Which is more important—love or hardware?"

Beemish nodded in defeat.

They opened their cash business the next Monday, and Beemish did a little advertising and worked up quite a traffic of customers. But the end of the day and the end of the week and the end of the fortnight found Pollard Hardware running behind. Cash and sales never checked. Rita's absent-minded cashiering was costing the business a pretty penny. And there was an argument every ten minutes around the cage that was ruinous to good will.

When a third week took them to the very brim of bankruptcy, Beemish hinted that they might attempt a modification of the partnership agreement as to her being the exclusive all-time cashier of Pollard Hardware. She refused to listen; and Beemish hastily dropped the matter by saying: "There's a good show at the Palace, Rita."

"I know there is," she said. "I'm going with Harry Harmon."

So Beemish just put his nose back on the grindstone, and went on with his losing hardware fight. Day followed day, and loss followed loss. At the end of the fourth week his original investment was chicken feed.

He stepped into the cage with his mind made up.

"Rita," he said.

"Yes," she said.

"I love you, Rita. I want you to marry me."

She looked up at him with her big blue eyes, and her voice was sad and sure. "You'd do anything, wouldn't you," she said, "to get me out of this cage? You'd even prostitute love."

"Prostitute love?" asked Beemish.

"Yes, just like in this story I'm reading. Oh, you can't fool me, Beemish Todd. I may not know as much about business as you do, but I know love. I've read love and studied love—"

"But I love you, Rita!"

"That's what you say. How would ever know you weren't marrying me just to get me out of this cage, the way you've been wanting to do from the very first?"

Beemish had no answer that would go over with one as deeply versed in the mysteries of love as she. He put his nose back on the grindstone for a fifth week and fought desperately to prolong their waning partnership.

On the next Saturday, Harry Harmon came in.

"My father wants to see you, Beemish," he said.

"He wants to see me!" Beemish said.

"Pronto, Beemish—and I'll do the waiting-on-trade for you till you get back."

Beemish slowly removed his store coat and got ready for the trip over to Harmon and Son. This must be the end, and he felt regret only that it would be the end of Rita. He knew his powers and possibilities. There would be other businesses and other money—but never a girl like Rita.

HE FOUND Mr. Harmon a whole lot like Harry—easy to look at and easy to talk to. Mr. Harmon took him into an inner office, made him comfortable in a big easy chair with a cigar, and proceeded to talk to him like a father. His every sentence bespoke hardware erudition, and he voiced a veteran's appreciation of the sheer merchandising genius that must be Beemish's.

"To keep going so long, under such conditions," he explained. "But the present picture of Pollard Hardware, as Harry paints it, has given me pause."

"Pause?" said Beemish.

"Exactly, Beemish—pause. If I didn't have pause, I'd be closing you up this minute. As it is, I'm giving you till the end of next week. But if you'll do one thing for me, I'll back you to the sky, Beemish, for you are a born merchandiser."

"What is that one thing, Mr. Harmon?"

"Get rid of that Rita."

"I can't, Mr. Harmon. It is in our partnership agreement."

"Then I'd better close you up today, so you can open up next week alone with my unlimited backing."

"No, please! Don't do that, Mr. Harmon. I love Rita—and which is more important, love or hardware?"

"Why don't you marry the girl, Beemish?" Mr. Harmon asked reasonably.

"Because she won't marry me, sir."

Mr. Harmon swore a little.

KIDS GET LITTLE CUTS WHEN THEY PLAY ON BEACHES. FOR ANY LITTLE CUT THAT NEEDS BANDAGING---

USE A READY-MADE BAND-AID (AFTER TREATING THE CUT PROPERLY). NO FUSSING WITH AWKWARD, HOME-MADE BANDAGES.

BAND-AID IS NEAT AND CONVENIENT. JUST STICK ONE ON—IT STAYS ON—EVEN ON HARD-TO-BANDAGE PLACES. KEEP A BOX HANDY FOR MINOR CUTS, BURNS & BLISTERS. 19¢ FOR 36 ASSORTED SIZES.

Johnson & Johnson
BAND-AID
Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.
ADHESIVE BANDAGES

EMPTY SADDLE

CROCKETT JOHNSON

"Well, I'll have to close you down a week from today, Beemish," he said. Beemish went back to the store. There were two customers in the store waiting to be waited on, and Harry had his hand stuck through the window of the store talking to Rita.

"I'll right, Harry," Beemish said. "I'll right, Beemish," Harry said. He held his head out of the cage. He said: "Right, Rita—then we're all set for the next show at the Palace tonight." He stepped out of the store.

Trying to rid himself of the awful realization that a week more would sever him and Rita, Beemish rushed over to the customers.

"Who's first?" he asked. The man looking at the electric irons was Beemish. Beemish explained to him the differences in price and guaranteed performance of the three models, and the customer pleased Beemish by deciding on the most expensive iron—a dollar de luxe number that Beemish was afraid he was stuck with for a week or rather until next Saturday now. Beemish wrapped up the iron, and the customer told him to charge Beemish pointed at the CASH ONLY signs all over the store and told the man that nothing was ever charged at Pollard Hardware or ever would.

"You don't trust me, hey?" the customer said, and went stamping out.

Old Mr. Morehouse, the other customer, was handing over an electric light fuse.

"Give me a slip on this fuse, will you, Beemish?" Mr. Morehouse was saying. The radio plug had a short circuit in it and night and blew out all the lights in the right-hand side of the house.

Certainly, Mr. Morehouse," Beemish said.

Beemish gave him the package and a ten-cent sales slip, and said: "Thank you, Mr. Morehouse—come in again, Mr. Morehouse." Then Beemish went to the back office and sat down and the way to gloom and disillusionment. He'd applied every principle of cash merchandising he'd learned at night school, yet in a week he'd be closed up because Rita hadn't been able to handle cash. In one short week she would be gone from him forever. What could he do that he hadn't done? How could he stop the dissolution of their partnership that would drive her into Harry Harmon's waiting arms?

"Listen, Beemish!" Mr. Morehouse said from the doorway. You could fry an egg on Mr. Morehouse's face, and it was the red of astonishment.

"WHAT is it, Mr. Morehouse?" Beemish said, jumping up.

"She gave me this!" He was holding a five-dollar bill. "I gave her a nickel to pay my nickel sales slip. I said: 'Five out, Rita.' She tossed my nickel into the till, said: 'Five is right, Mr. Morehouse,' handed me this five-dollar bill and went on with her reading."

Beemish just stared at Mr. Morehouse, and Mr. Morehouse stared back at him. Mr. Morehouse came out of it first.

"Listen, Beemish," he said. "You'd be far better off with no cashier at all than with a cashier like her."

Beemish kept staring. Then suddenly he jumped.

He put his arm around old Mr. Morehouse and hustled him to the front door. "You keep the five dollars, Mr. Morehouse," he said on the sidewalk. "Put it in a frame and I'll buy it back from you for a thousand dollars one year from now."

"Will you have a thousand a year from now, Beemish?" the old man asked.

"You bet I will!" Beemish exulted.

He went back into the store, locked the front door, and pulled down all the shades.

"Hey, Beemish," Rita kicked. "How can I read with—"

"Rita!" Beemish said.

"Yes, Beemish? What is it?"

"Did you ever hear of a man sacrificing his principles for love?"

"Of course I have—right here in this story I'm reading. Say, you either put up those shades or switch on—"

"Well, that's me, Rita. I'm sacrificing cash for love. There'll be no more cash in Pollard Hardware."

"No more—"

"And I'll triple the business, see if I don't. It's a new idea, born of love and faith—faith, for instance, in that man who almost bought the flatiron just now. No money of any kind will be accepted in this store—everything's to be on credit. Collector goes around once a month like the gas company—wearing Pollard Hardware's special uniform. People won't mind. Neighbors will say: 'It's the man from Pollard's where you can't pay cash even if you want to.' And people will buy more."

He paused, took a long breath and went on: "You hear me, Rita? Everything will be sold on credit. There'll be absolutely no cash, and hence—no cashier!"

He braced himself for the worst.

RITA got down slowly from her chair. She came out of the cage toward Beemish, and in the twilight of the shaded store her golden beauty raised unplumbed havoc with Beemish.

"You figure you're keeping within the terms of our partnership agreement, Beemish?" she asked.

"Absolutely," Beemish said boldly. "It was agreed that only you would do the cashiering in Pollard Hardware. So I've abolished the cashiering—and incidentally got unlimited backing from Harry's father, so the future's rosy."

Rita yawned.

"Thank goodness that job's over," she said.

"You mean you don't mind leaving the cage!"

"Of course I mean it—having my reading interrupted a thousand times a day. Why do you suppose I stayed in there—because I liked it? I stayed in there because I recognized you as my true ideal that day you came snooping around, and I was bound no other girl would get into that cage to be winning you away. And if you were to ask me to marry you again, people certainly couldn't say you were doing it just to get me away from the cash, for there isn't going to be any cash."

Beemish closed in.

"You mean you'll marry—"

"You get away from me, and put up those shades in a hurry, Beemish Todd. We'll see what's what after the movies tonight—"

"But you're going to the show with Harry!"

"Oh, no, I'm not. I'm going with you, Beemish."

And that's the part of his story that Beemish, for business reasons, doesn't tell. Certainly he's revolutionized retailing in America. But I'm sick of reading that the STRICTLY CREDIT slogan of his four hundred twenty-seven stores in three hundred fourteen cities and towns in the forty-eight states of the United States and the nine provinces of Canada and the northern half of the Mexican province of Coahuila was the child of Beemish's vision and Beemish's brains. Sired by a chance remark of old Mr. Morehouse, it sprang into his head at a time when STRICTLY CASH had got his love urge down and only STRICTLY CREDIT could get it up. So let's give credit where credit was due.

John Morrell & Co.
Ottumwa, Iowa

Gentlemen: This sounds unbelievable but it's true. I heard a roaring sound and rushed out to find the roof of our home on fire. We had no phone or near-by neighbors. My husband had gone downtown. I was frantic. Quickly I scribbled a note, "The house is on fire, and tied it to Resolute's collar. Find Harry quick!" I shouted. In a flash Resolute was on his way. How I hoped and prayed he would bring help before it was too late. Soon my husband and the firemen came and put out the fire. Resolute thrives on Red Heart dog food, and you may be sure he gets 3 glasses from a grateful mistress.

Mrs. J. Richards
Marshall, Ill.

More Dogs Eat Red Heart than Any Other Dog Food*

From thousands of appreciative dog owners have come enthusiastic letters about the high quality and stimulating appetite appeal of Red Heart 3-flavor Dog Food.

This well-balanced food is made in federally inspected plants from clean, wholesome meat and meat by-products, vegetable and bone meals, cereals, cod-liver oil, Fleischmann's High-Vitamin Irradiated Yeast. It provides abundant supplies of Anti-infective Vitamin A, Anti-neuritic Vitamin B<sub>1</sub>, Sunshine Vitamin D, Growth Vitamin G, and other essential vitamins. Laboratory-tested and kennel-proved. Always insist on Red Heart... the 3-flavor dog food. Accept no substitutes.

Feed economical Red Heart 3-flavor Dog Biscuits, too. Heart-shaped or kibbled. They furnish abundance of vitamins, vigorous gnawing exercise, and solid nourishment.

*According to independent, nationwide surveys.

FREE!

LOST AND FOUND DOG LOCKET

Limited Offer! Inside this Red Heart dog locket is space for your name, address, phone, dog's name, etc. And with this locket get the Official Obedience Rules taught to dogs at famous Von Motzck Training Kennels, Chicago. Just send 3 Red Heart labels—Diets A, B, and C—to John Morrell & Co., Dept. 37, Ottumwa, Ia.

DIET A—Beef Flavor

DIET B—Fish Flavor

DIET C—Cheese Flavor

RED HEART

THE 3-FLAVOR DOG FOOD

FEED IN ROTATION

Front Seat in Flanders

Continued from page 13

What every motorist should know

When you drive, take some Beech-Nut Gum along. It's always refreshing and restful, especially when you get tired or tense. Your choice of 7 delicious kinds:

Peppermint, Spearmint, Oralgum and 4 flavors of BEECHIES (Candy Coated) Peppermint, Spearmint, Pepsin, Cinnamon Beech-Nut Gum is made in Flavor-town (Canajoharie, New York), famous for Beech-Nut quality and flavor.

Beech-Nut Gum

GOING TO THE N. Y. WORLD'S FAIR? Visit the Beech-Nut Building. If you drive, stop at Canajoharie, in the Mohawk Valley of New York, and see how Beech-Nut products are made.

the French army increased. They had thought of everything and yet if a plane flew over the observer would see nothing but green French woods and fields.

Then came the last mile and the lieutenant laughed and said that from now on we'd be under observation by the Germans. There were two open fields to be crossed. The German shells had been dropping here all morning. There is a technique about crossing open fields at the front. The young lieutenant asks you whether the restaurants in Paris are still as good as ever. You light a cigarette and start walking casually across the field with him. And you tell him about the food in Paris. You start with the pâté maison at Pierre's, then touch on the fish at Armenonville and by the time you are discussing the small wild strawberries that Maxim serves you are safely across. Of course you're sweating a little.

Then finally you are at the last outpost. You go down into a large dugout and for a while watch the colonel in action. He has men at telephones and others with maps and he sits with his staff. His command has the fight of its life on its hands today. Earlier in the day, prisoners had been captured. I had talked to them. I had read instructions taken from their pockets. "Stand fast," they read, "if you retreat you will be court-martialed." The instructions were signed, "Your Fuehrer." Yes, the colonel had a fight on his hands. He knew that 15,000 men had been ordered to break through his lines or else. But he didn't seem worried.

"How long you been here?" Pierre asked me suddenly.

"Four days and four nights."

"You like it?" André asked.

War Correspondent's Mecca

Like it? That wasn't a tough question to answer. At this moment I wouldn't have been anywhere else in the world. I had a front-row seat at the greatest show ever staged. I wasn't with the army, I was in front of the army. A month ago I was listening to Eddy Duchin and loving it; I was having a drink with my colleagues at Collier's and loving that. I was worried about Carl Hubbell's left arm and Mel Ott's legs. Now? Now I was in a steel-and-concrete observation post in No Man's Land, watching flashes from German guns a mile away, listening to the roar of French guns in the rear. Like it? Hell, I loved it.

There are a lot of keen young newspapermen around here now working their hearts out, lying, conniving, manipulating, doing anything to get near the front. But for today the front was mine.

"Le Boche," André said, and there was excitement in his voice.

I haven't met a French army man who ever refers to the Germans as anything but "le Boche." They never say Germans. I looked through the slit and the woods seemed quiet. Then I looked up. It was a Messerschmidt. That's a good plane. He was flying lazily down our valley. By now this valley belonged to us. He flew quite close to us and Pierre swore very indelicately in French. His right wing almost kissed our side of the hill but, of course, he didn't know we were there. He was up for reconnaissance. Then, miraculously, two black specks appeared. I knew where they had come from. I'd spent last night there at that little lopsided ridiculous airdrome. Then they weren't specks. They were French Moranes—small, maneuverable ships. Nothing like the Messerschmidt. But nothing is, except the English Hurricane and the American Curtiss.

The Messerschmidt wheeled quickly. We watched and the guns suddenly stopped. The three planes wheeled all over the valley in front of us. Then one of the French planes seemed to get tired. When planes are shot they invariably blow up in a glorious cloud of flame and smoke. It's always like that in the movies, anyhow. During the past four days I've been living in a place where fights between planes are commonplace. Planes don't die spectacularly. They die slowly. The French plane wobbled and then glided down happily in back of us. It seemed to be well under control, but it was out of the fight.

Now it was one against one. A Messerschmidt against a Morane. The Messerschmidt dove at the Morane and I held my breath. Eight hours ago I sat in a Morane.

"It is simple," the pilot explained,

CAUGHT WITH OUR GUARD DOWN

It will take two years to arm the National Guard. Yesterday you laughed as they awkward-squadded up the armory floor. But with Hitler thinking westward and his agents digging in below the Rio Grande, we've stopped laughing. The world's richest country may have to fight tomorrow's blitzkrieg with yesterday's guns. Walter Davenport gives you the low-down—

In Next Week's Collier's

"You hold the wheel with your left hand. When the Boche gets within the circle of your arm, your right hand presses this button on the dashboard. Simple? That released your two guns, 'Dop, dop, dop.'"

That's what the pilot of that little Morane was doing now. Within two minutes one of these pilots would be dead. It isn't fun seeing men killed. I see men killed quite often, now, but I never get accustomed to it.

The experts could tell you the maneuvers. The Messerschmidt was below the Morane and then suddenly the little French plane raised its nose in the air. He raised his nose and gained altitude and suddenly he was on top of the Messerschmidt. Pierre grabbed my arm. I realized suddenly that my mouth was dry, and that the neckband of my shirt was too small. I've seen all the great fighters of our time but I never saw anyone like this anonymous French pilot. He was up against superior speed, superior armament, superior maneuverability. And yet he wasn't getting hurt.

Then suddenly the Messerschmidt wheeled sharply to the right and passed perhaps within two hundred yards of our little nest. And the Morane was a hundred yards behind him. The Morane had a gun on either wing and both were spurring lead. I couldn't see the lead but I could see smoke trailing from the wings. They hit something. The pilot? I don't know. You aim at the pilot now in air fights. His motor is armored too well. Shoot off half the tail and he can still hobble to the ground; aim for the pilot.

I think the pilot was hit. The Messerschmidt wobbled questioningly, certainly and then dropped rather slowly into the woods a mile away, woods which hid the German battery that had been sending shells at the farmhouse all day.

It was very quiet, the guns of both sides hadn't resumed and, ridiculous birds were singing protestingly above us. There was a phone at Pierre's bow. Every ten minutes he had talked into the phone. He had usually said in French, "Nothing to report."

Now he said it again. He was talking to a dugout two miles back, "Nothing to report, everything is quiet, Captain. He was right, of course. Only a report who didn't know any better would be tense and excited at what he had seen these past few hours.

"We'll Get Them"

My escorting lieutenant had appeared from somewhere. We said goodbye to Pierre and André and started back. It was a long walk and then the darkness fell like a quick, black blanket. It began to rain; slow miserable rain. There was no path to guide us. Now and then one of us would slip and more than once we ran into barbed wire. But we could show a light, couldn't even smoke. Finally we got to a small village where troops were quartered. We went in headquarters. A dozen officers sat around smoking. It had been a hard day for them. One of them grinned and said unexpectedly, "On les aura."

They all smiled and something came back to their faces. "On les aura" is an expression made famous by General Petain during the last war. He was at Verdun and things were bad. He sent one three-word message to Paris: "On les aura." It means "We will get them."

The men around me were smiling now. One finds nothing but supreme confidence at the front. Defeatist talk is the theme song of the loafers in the Paris bars. You never hear that kind of talk from soldiers at the front. They know they are in a tough war but they know too that they are going to win or die. You get to believe them. I did.

I walked outside into the night. The guns were roaring again but that is sound that is unheard after a while. Like the sound of city street traffic, it is a part of the scene.

It was pitch-black, but now and then flashes from the guns would streak upward through the night to light it for a moment. Trucks were rumbling past. Through the blackness I could distinguish a white square of the side of each truck. Inside the white square there was a red cross. These trucks were going away from the front. They were all full. One truck stopped and there was incredibly the sound of swearing in an unmistakable American voice. This was one of a group of ambulances belonging to the American field service. One after another they passed ghostlike through the night. There were a lot of them. They told the story of what had happened. It had been a tough day.

all ways
Enjoy life with Miller's HIGH LIFE
The Champagne of Bottle Beer

MILLER BREWING COMPANY, MILWAUKEE, WISCONSIN

Batting Averages are Cockeyed

Continued from page 23

Tiger speedballer, in the fourth inning. The bases are empty and one man is out. The Yankee slugger tops one of Newsom's fast balls, it dribbles down the third base line and Joe beats it out for the luckiest of scratch hits.

There is every difference in the world in those two hits. The first broke up the ball game while the second merely broke the monotony of a dull game. Yet in the present system of scoring, those hits amount to exactly the same in the percentages.

Or take an even more interesting example: Charlie Gehringer is at bat in the ninth with the score tied at 5-5, two out and the bases filled. Red Ruffing is pitching for the Yankees and the struggle is tense. Ruffing is a great pitcher and Gehringer is one of the keenest-eyed hitters in baseball. Working very cautiously, Ruffing gets the count up to three balls and two strikes. The next pitch means everything. The ball speeds toward the plate and suddenly breaks down toward the inside corner. Gehringer starts his swing, but suddenly checks it and lets the ball go by. Umpire Moriarity calls "Ball Four," gives Gehringer a walk and forces over the winning run.

Later in the season, in Chicago, Gehringer is again the batter. This time there is nobody on base and it is only the first half of the third inning. Two men are out. After fouling the first pitch off, Charlie catches the White Sox infield asleep and dumps a bunt toward third base, easily beating it out for a hit.

Under the present scoring rules, Gehringer's expert judgment in the first case got him nothing but the satisfaction of winning the ball game. In fact, officially, he wasn't even up to bat. In the second instance, his bunt meant just as much in the averages as a home run.

Obviously, something is wrong and another method of scoring is needed. In this article I am suggesting a new plan that I think will establish the true offensive worth of a player to his team.

An Equitable Rating System

The start of a scoring system of this kind must be, of course, from the highest standard. Under my system, a home run with the bases filled is perfection. Since this is a perfect performance, all other offensive actions by a batter are relative to this.

A base on balls with nobody on is actually worth the same as a single with nobody on. A single plus a steal of second is as important as a two-base hit. A single plus a steal of second and third is worth as much as a triple with nobody on. With men on second and third, a single scoring both is worth more than a single that scores nobody. In short, a batter's true worth is dependent not only on the length of his hits and his speed of foot but on the number of bases he has advanced his teammates.

This system of rating is based on the fact that getting to first base is the most important thing of all. If the hitter doesn't get on, there is no chance for a rally and no chance to score a run. The old adage still holds: you can't steal first base. After long investigation I have found that the following ratings are most equitable:

I have rated first base two points; first to second one-half point; second to third one point; third to home  $1\frac{1}{2}$  points.

This may sound complicated but it is really very simple. A batter hitting a home run with the bases loaded would score 12 points, made up as follows: he gets compensation for the bases he makes, 5 points; he scores a man from third,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  points; he scores a man from second,  $2\frac{1}{2}$ ; he scores a man from first ( $\frac{1}{2} + 1 + 1\frac{1}{2}$ ), 3 points. Total: 12 points.

The base runner gets extra points when he achieves an extra base through his own efforts. In the case of the home run with the bases filled, he would get no extra credits because the cause of that success would be due to the hitting exclusively. However, if a runner on first goes to third on a single, he is given credit for one extra point. His advance to second base would be caused by the hit but his progress to third would be his own achievement. A slow man wouldn't attempt it; a fast man will make it. He gets proper value for that feat.

Likewise a batter who sacrifices with runners on first and second gets  $\frac{1}{2}$  point credit for advancing one man to second and one point for advancing a runner to third, or  $1\frac{1}{2}$  points. A batter who hits a long fly and scores a runner from third or advances a runner to another base gets credit for each advance, although he gets no direct credit for his own hitting since he did not reach first.

Should a batter receive a walk with the bases filled, he would get five points; two for his own advance to first base and the others for the advance of each base runner. If hit by the pitcher, the batter would get the same credit as if he had obtained a base on balls.

If a batter gets to first on an error or if runners advance on an error, no credit is given since the success comes from blunders of their opponents rather than from any effective effort of their own. Naturally the hitter would get no credit on an intentional base on balls.

Some Figures Do Lie

That brings us to percentages:

If a batter is up four times in a game and has made as a hitter and base runner three points his first time up; four his second time up; five his third; and none his fourth, he would have accumulated twelve points in his four appearances. Now, if he had a home run with the bases filled on each of the four times up, his total in points would have been 48. Therefore, the total number of points he could have achieved by a perfect performance for the day divided into the number of points he actually made would give his offensive rating or efficiency average.

Well, frankly, I consider this method outshadows the weak and unjust system of averages we now have. For the first time a man really gets credit for every good offensive action he takes. Batting averages under my method take into consideration the kind and length of hits, the number of bases the runners are advanced by these blows and the ability of the hitter as a base runner. If he takes extra bases on hits and steals, he is rewarded for it in the average.

We have talked a great deal for of a "player's player," meaning a man whose fine work did not show in the averages, but it was not always pleasant for that man himself who went into the owner's office and to get a better salary in his next contract. All the owner had to go by the figures he saw in the percentages. Unless the manager, who knew the value of the player, also happened to be a man who set the wages, it was no way so good.

"We'd like to do something for the owner would say, 'but the figures don't lie.'"

The figures do lie and they have for years.

Joe DiMaggio gets most of the headlines for the New York Yankees and is almost certain that he would retain his supremacy under my system because of the timeliness and long range of his hitting, but the offensive value of a man like Joe Gordon would get proper credit. If the records of last year could have been worked out under the system I propose, I am confident that Gordon would be right up around the top. Gordon strikes out a lot and often looks bad but the opposing teams are always scared pie-eyed for fear the little fellow will pop one into the stands in the clutch.

Look at the World Series

The last World Series proved a lot of points for me. According to the official averages, Crosetti batted a mere .067, the classic, which looks horrible. Rolfe, on the other hand, had .167. However, under my system, Crosetti had an efficiency rating of .0347, which placed him three points ahead of Rolfe with .0347. It is further interesting to note that in the same series Bill Dickey, New York catcher, had an official batting average of .267 while Frank McCormick of the Reds hit .400 in the same four games. Dickey, however, was actually more valuable as a hitter. According to my figures, he had a rating of .1196, putting him fifteen points ahead of McCormick at .1042.

Charlie Keller broke up that series with a succession of long-distance slams and happened to win both top rankings in the regular system and in mine, but might easily have been possible for another hitter specializing in innocuous singles to have topped him in the official ratings. One poke from Keller at the proper moment was enough to wipe out five misplaced singles by the Reds but he was only credited with a hit that meant no more than a wasted gesture.

As a matter of fact, the complete futility of the present system of averages was beautifully revealed in the third game of the series. The Reds got two hits and three runs in that contest and the Yanks got five hits and seven runs. The difference was that four of the Yankee slams happened to be home runs, three of them with men on base. You would never know that from the records.

I don't want to be too chesty about the system I have proposed and it is quite possible that there is another one that will be even more effective in correcting the present abuses, but I am convinced that something must be done. The players have always sensed that something was wrong and I think the fans will realize it when it is presented to them.

"Whew! That certainly kept me on the edge of my seat!"

RICHARD TAYLOR

Give your home new style — with paint. You'd be surprised how much attractiveness modern paint styling in effective color combinations can add to your home's appearance. Be sure to insist on white lead paint—for long wear and economy. Consult your painting contractor.

Down here in the lead mines we're working on your next PAINT job

NOW take this lead we're mining. You know how it's used for outdoor metal work because it's so tough weather doesn't seem to harm it any.

But plenty more is used in making white lead that goes into paint. And white lead is no slacker, either, when it comes to standing off rain and sun.

So it's easy to figure why white lead armors paint against the elements—makes it tougher and longer-lasting. It goes on smooth as velvet, too, and lasts for years—without cracking and scaling.

What's more, white lead paint wears away so evenly it doesn't need burning off or scraping when you repaint. And when you figure in its longer life, you make a double saving.

So if you're looking for real satisfaction it's a good idea in buying paint to find out how much white lead it contains. It's a pretty safe rule to follow: the higher the lead content, the better the paint. You can't, for example, get a more durable paint than one containing a hundred per cent white lead. This is the kind good painters mix from lead-in-oil. In many places it is now being sold in prepared ready-to-use form, in white and colors.

Remember, most good painters recommend white lead paint. Try it on your next paint job and you'll find it's one case where the best is cheapest.

LEAD INDUSTRIES ASSOCIATION
420 Lexington Avenue, New York, N. Y.

A GOOD PAINTER IS A GOOD INVESTMENT
—he not only knows all the tricks of doing a first-class job, but he has the proper equipment to protect your shrubbery, steps and walks from spotting.

GOOD PAINTING COSTS LESS THAN YOU THINK
—get the facts and other valuable paint pointers from informative booklet "WHAT TO EXPECT FROM WHITE LEAD PAINT." Send post-card for your free copy.

IN ATLANTIC CITY,
BATHING LEADS

... IN MILWAUKEE,
BLATZ LEADS!

JUST as America looks to Atlantic City for the last word in bathing, it looks to Milwaukee as an authority on beer. It is doubly significant, therefore, that Blatz is Milwaukee's most popular bottle beer. An independent survey made by a great newspaper verifies this fact beyond doubt.

Enjoy Blatz Old Heidelberg, the extra-pale beer with the mellow, thirst-quenching Pilsener flavor.

BLATZ BREWING COMPANY, MILWAUKEE, WIS.

89 years of brewing experience

"FOR THOSE WHO WANT THE BEST"

Blatz

OLD HEIDELBERG BEER

Fast New World

Continued from page 19

attention of those who are naturally fascinated by the activities of business and trade.

The ease of transportation and, still more, the refreshing independence of service and storage made possible by the compactness and convenience of U-235 will cause our cities to spread out all over the countryside, even to territories barren and now uninhabitable. Agricultural lands will be returned to Nature, and wild life will share in the bounties of U-235. Humanity might well become a single, uniformly spread community, sharing as neighbors the whole surface of the world.

The new generation will take much of their recreation out-of-doors; for shelter and rest they may retire to their underground apartment. The problems of air conditioning will be reduced to a minimum by the insulation of the earth and perhaps by a surface swimming pool which would serve as a roof.

Life Goes Underground

Their plants will be grown under artificial heat and light, using the technique of hydroponics, in the water that flows through the rocks just below their underground ranch. Light is generated by fluorescence which occurs around the U-235, and is piped under the house through transparent plastic sheets along the interiors of the rooms.

Normally, the household supply of U-235 is stored, and slowly used, in the chamber where the plants are grown. Appropriate portions are automatically delivered by a tube-distribution system to stations where they are needed to provide heat or power for machinery or cooking.

In a world where energy is free, servants are unobtainable. There will be no excuse in the world of the future to lose our human dexterity, no matter how many ingenious gadgets are invented.

The occupants of the completely private underground home, refreshed from a sleep in perfect quiet under minutely controlled conditions of comfort, may arise to take their baths of water, or vitamins, or perfume, or ultraviolet light, and proceed to their garden to satisfy their taste for fresh fruits which they pick from dust-free, sterile plants, and prepare in a few moments in the high-frequency cooker their favorite breakfast foods.

An elevator to the surface lands them at the door of their automobile. It is a spacious room or rooms of transparent plastic, with drawn blinds overhead to keep out the direct sun. The wheels are big as tractor wheels, to minimize disturbance because of bumps and to prevent damage to lawns or fields. Roads are practically unnecessary, except for main thoroughfares used mostly for freight transportation. There is no conceivable use for a railroad.

The automobile is suspended from an overhead axle so that it banks itself on turns and permits the occupants to write letters or do chores while under way.

Unencumbered by a complicated engine, minus a battery and heavy metal transmission system, your car will be light in weight and delightful in simplicity.

It will be something like a trailer, roomy and able to make long journeys through the wilderness. It might well be built in the monocoque construction developed for airplanes, whereby all the rigidity is obtained through the outside skin. Since this will be a plastic, and transparent where necessary, there need be no windows or other seams in the surface, and the vehicle might even serve as a power boat as well as a yacht.

For long journeys a special type of airplane will be developed. It will depend on a remarkable property of U-235 not yet described. This property, by-product of its energy generation, consists in the ejection of high-speed particles. Such a process can be used as a means of propulsion in the same manner that the ejection of a stream of water can be made to cause a sprinkler to rotate. Such a device would eliminate the necessity for a propeller and would do well what a helicopter can do only badly. It would overcome gravity, and cause an object to move vertically. Airplanes of this character would be able to fly at any height above the earth because they are dependent on the atmosphere to keep them aloft. At a height of, say, 100 miles, the resistance of the air is slight that such craft could attain speeds of several thousand miles an hour.

You can have supper in Paris, and speed across to New York faster than the wind, to see a matinee performance on Broadway. You can see what happens to time scale; and, of course, geographical and national boundaries will lose their meanings too.

In the hands of eccentrics and criminals who might be capable of using U-235 for destructive purposes, a weapon of extraordinary power will be available. The destructive power of a U-235 explosion is even greater than you would judge merely by its energy content. A ton of U-235 might well be made to destroy every creature for hundreds of miles, and the atmospheric concussion it would set off would be heard around the world. Moreover, some of the rays given off through U-235 are deadly in character and imperceptible to the ordinary sense. They could be used to mow people down by destroying their blood corpuscles. However, they would be effective only for a few yards. There is, actually, no indication that U-235 or anything else will ever supply the dreaded death ray.

No Room for Imbeciles

Clearly, in any case, the destructive potentialities of U-235 are great enough to make it imperative that the citizens of the future be educated better than they are now with respect to their social responsibilities. Certain kinds of abnormalities, ordinarily considered lightly, will have to be overcome or their possessors destroyed. At the same time, society will have to keep track of all the Uranium produced and refined and take action at once against any individual who tries to accumulate a dangerous supply.

That, roughly, is a suggestion of the revolution that may be brought about in daily life in our own time.

None of the things mentioned have yet been worked out, but the difficulties are difficulties of detail. I can justify every one of the possibilities that have been indicated. In some senses the picture is an understatement. If anything it is not imaginative enough. Certain things as surprising as all these things will come to pass when U-235 is produced at the rate of ten thousand tons a year.

The story of U-235 is fascinating in itself.

Uranium is white, as most metals are when clean. It is practically as dense as gold but much harder. It forms beautiful compounds, which often fluoresce be sometimes self-luminous. It is a complex atom. It is like a miniature system, with 92 planets swinging in a nucleus. The miniature planets are called electrons; they consist of particles of electricity. Such electrons may be in their orbits many billions of times in a millionth of a second. The force that holds them in their orbits is attraction exerted by positive electric charges located at the center of the orbits. Hydrogen, the simplest of the elements, has one positive electrical charge at its center, or nucleus; Uranium has 92 such positive particles in its nucleus. These positive particles are called protons. The 92 positive protons just balance the negative electrons.

To cement these protons together, it is necessary that there be associated with the 92 protons in Uranium a still larger number of similar particles which are only in the sense that they carry electricity. These particles are called neutrons because they are electrically neutral.

Most Uranium atoms contain 92 protons and 146 neutrons, making 238 particles in all. About one Uranium atom lacks three neutrons, so that it has 235 particles in all. Thus, U-235. Heavy atoms are fairly unstable and that is why so many of them are radioactive and break up spontaneously. Up to the discovery of Element 92, Uranium was the heaviest atom known. U-235 is on the verge of instability, so that if one neutron is added to its nucleus it splits up into simpler and more closely knit parts. The physicist studies the fission of Uranium when it takes on an excess neutron.

There is an important accompaniment of the fission of U-235. Not only do the parts separate with a billion times the energy that an ordinary atom has, but in the process of fission two or three neutrons are born or are thrust from the products of fission. When this fact was discovered physicists became wildly excited. Here is the reaction:

One neutron was put in; one atom of U-235 was destroyed; two atoms with a billion times as much energy were produced, and two new neutrons were made available to repeat the process. A banker would be excited about that of compound interest.

Energy as You Need It

The actual scale of the atom is so small that the neutron can reach its work in much less than a thousandth of a second, provided only that its original high speed is cut down so that it does not rush past its goal too rapidly. Hydrogen in water, wood or paraffin is ideal for the slowing-down process. We can say, then, that neutrons could reduce themselves and double their number a thousand times a second if there were enough U-235 about to produce the necessary fissions.

To control the energy-production process it is necessary only to insert into the Uranium a small percentage of cadmium. The cadmium nucleus has the property of absorbing slow-moving neutrons with exceptional ease, and very often escape to reproduce themselves by fission fissions. By changing the amount or position of the cadmium the rate of production of neutrons, and consequently the rate of generation of energy, can be modified at will.

The power for your automobile of the future probably will be supplied in a tank about the size of a typewriter. This will be filled with water. In this a small chunk of U-235, say a few pounds in weight, will be immersed. For chemical reasons the U-235 will not "burning"—neutrons will begin splitting atoms all over the place. It is as though the tank were crowded with a lighted bunch of invisible but immensely powerful Chinese firecrackers. The water will be turned into steam. This will run turbines, from which the power will be transmitted to your wheels.

Meanwhile, the physicist plies his trade with minute amounts of U-235.

U-235 is so similar to ordinary Uranium that it is extremely difficult to separate them. That, in fact, is the real barrier at present to cheap atomic power. Uranium can be had by the carload for around one dollar per pound. If the one tenth of an ounce of U-235 in a pound of ordinary Uranium could be extracted for one hundred dollars it would still be a fuel several times cheaper than coal at $5 a ton. I estimate that the cost of extracting that much U-235 by methods already known would be less than twenty dollars. Professor Wilhelm Krasny-Ergen of the Wenner-Grens Institute, Stockholm, Sweden, described the design of a suitable plant. He started to build it but had to stop because of the war. The trouble is not the operation cost, but the initial cost, which would run to millions of dollars for a practical plant. It is like an oil well. The first quart it produces might be said to cost $10,000 and that is why many people have done without wells.

It's Only a Beginning

Now it has just been reported that Professor Krasny-Ergen has stepped up the production more than ten thousand fold over the previous rate announced by Professor Nier at the University of Minnesota only a month ago.

The Germans, who take science seriously, were the first in the field. They are quite active but they say nothing about their results if any. Probably no one else is close to getting a useful quantity, although the French under Joliot were doing very well up to the start of the war. I feel that one year of peace would bring a gram of U-235, and two years a ton. If the Germans have production and waste it for bombs, they are madmen for sure because with U-235 a nation could win a peace and no one would be a loser.

Possible developments almost in sight may extend horizons far beyond what has been contemplated in this article. We could, if we liked, send rockets to the moon. A method could be worked out for using the copious supply of neutrons generated through U-235 to reproduce on a small scale the conditions that exist in the interiors of the stars. Under these conditions, the most commonplace form of matter becomes a far richer source of energy than the U-235 dealt with in this article. The kind of civilization we might expect, when technique has reached that far, is so different in kind from anything we know that even guesses about it are futile.

The newly discovered Elements 93 and 94 are produced by neutrons that strike U-238. These elements are almost certainly as subject to fission as U-235.

For the immediate future it is safe to say that the practical applications of U-235 open a new world for invention and ingenuity. A whole generation of bright young men and women will be unable to exhaust the opportunities presented by this universal tool. There will be no end of applications to our wants and needs and they will contribute to the richness of life and bring rewards of wealth and satisfaction to self-made men in the tradition of Duryea, Edison, Kettering, McCormack, Westinghouse, Ford and the Wrights. Only some of the glory must be reserved for the physicists.

What a day to tackle old Forbes for that order!

PHIL'S PERSPIRATION CAUSED B.O. (BODY ODOR) AND HIS NERVOUSNESS MADE IT WORSE!

AN EXCLUSIVE DEODORIZING INGREDIENT TO HELP PROTECT YOU

HOT DAYS are "perspirey" days... "B.O." days. Also, edgy nerves or feelings cause nervous perspiration, later "nervous B.O." So "B.O." is a double threat to your popularity and success in summer.

Use Lifebuoy Health Soap in your daily bath, and put "B.O." out of your life. On a hot day, what a cooling relief! Loads of zippy, purifying lather help relax, refresh you. Time short? Take a Lifebuoy "quickie"—hands, under arms, feet. More folks use Lifebuoy for their bath than any other soap. Get Lifebuoy today. It has an exclusive deodorizing ingredient!

TRY ME—FOR A TANGY, REFRESHING BATH THRILL!

LIFEBUOY HEALTH SOAP

Its crisp odor goes in a Jiffy—Its Protection lasts and lasts

These Our Rulers

Continued from page 24

Jack swapped his mother's cow for some beans and a stick of Dentyne—(that delicious extra chewy gum). His mother, quite mad, threw the beans out the window. Next morning Jack found sky-high bean stalks, climbed and found the giant's castle. Hidden, he saw the giant count his treasures. But the giant sniffed hungrily in Jack's direction.

"Ho," said Jack, stepping out bravely, "Why eat me?"

"It's my teeth," said the giant, "They need exercise."

"Right-O," smiled Jack. "Just try Dentyne. It has a superior cinnamon flavor and an extra firm consistency that gives teeth and jaw muscles just the exercise your dentist would recommend."

The giant tasted and cried, "Jack, you're a killer-diller! Take my treasures—but leave me your Dentyne." So Jack went happily home.

Moral: Even giants need mouth exercise. Dentyne provides it in its pleasantest form.

HELPS KEEP TEETH BRIGHT MOUTH HEALTHY

for another. He gave a fellow named Ben Fink $350 to burn a barn for the insurance—a little matter of $35,000. Moe was indicted for this, but confessed, turned state's evidence and escaped prosecution. Later, in a moment of inadvertence, he was caught stealing 2,800 pounds of copper from a train bound from Utah to New York. For this he did a stretch of thirty months in Leavenworth. This, of course, was a crude job. It was before Moe entered politics and learned that there were more respected ways of lifting more refined metals and accomplishing the same result.

For instance, after graduation from Leavenworth, Moe settled down in the junk business and then organized the Cook County Trust Company. He got some 272 receiverships from some dozen judges and he and his counsel, Jake Arvey—now his successor as boss of the Twenty-fourth—did very well at this. This is one of the fine things about Chicago politics. Little irregularities like copper snatching, arson and such did not prevent an ambitious young fellow like Moe from getting along.

His brother Mike was boss of the Twenty-fourth and a member of the Sanitary District. He died in time to escape indictment, leaving to Moe the junk business and the Twenty-fourth Ward. "Me and Tony Cermak," said Moe, "found the Democratic party flat when Brennan died, owing $200,000. We got the money together and cleaned it up." He meant the deficit, not the party. Thereafter Moe was one of the party's chief lawgivers and its biggest frogskin-giver.

Good Old Generous Moe

Before Tony Cermak died Moe handed him in various sums over $90,000. He peeled off in that same time, to various aldermen, frogskins to the sum of $92,000. They got from $2,500 to $5,000 each in the campaign. He supplied precinct workers with cash to the tune of $300 per precinct on election day alone. On one occasion he gave Tony Cermak $30,000 to pay a Cook County deficit. On another he handed him $25,000 to man the polls at a judicial election. Judicial elections are important in Chicago. After all, justice is an asset not to be sneezed at. But the circuit judges elect the South Park Board commissioners and that board has the dispensing of countless millions in patronage and contracts. Kelly was elected commissioner of the South Park Board by the judges.

Moe handed money to judges, to public officials of all sorts—loans and campaign contributions. And not only did he go outside his ward, but even outside his party, so boundless was his generous heart. Everybody loved him. Henry Horner, the night he was elected governor, went to Moe's headquarters in the Twenty-fourth, embraced Moe and kissed him on the cheek.

Moe seemed to be especially generous when matters affecting the telephone company or the power companies were at stake—in elections, before the aldermen, the legislature.

In two years Moe, according to his own estimate, passed out to politicians in Chicago $500,000—which is quite a sum for a humble junk dealer, whose junk yard was by no means imposing. The question naturally arises—where did all this money come from? It reveals where a lot of politicians got money. From Moe. But where did Moe get it?

One day the Treasury Department indicted Moe for ducking his income tax. They said Moe had failed to report a mere matter of half a million dollars in two years. Moe was heartbroken. And worried. So were Kelly and Nash and others. Nash did all in his power to extricate Moe. Democrats even offered, it is said, to raise $150,000 to pay the tax. Moe and his lawyer, John L. McInerney, Mayor Kelly's counsel, went to Washington. And there Moe told the following story—secretly of course. It was never intended for publication.

The $500,000 referred to as income by the Treasury was not income at all, said Moe. Moe was in the junk business, but that was just a subtle device for providing money for political purposes from the utility corporations, particularly the Insull companies. Insull's companies had immense quantities of old iron, copper and other discarded metals. The companies sold it at a very low price to Moe. He then sold it to the regular scrap trade at the market price. The difference was his—or so the Treasury insisted. But Moe said no. It was for use among the politicians. It was just a way of converting old rails, broken-down trolleys, ancient fly-wheels, old copper wires and dynamos into the precious metals to be handed out to judges, lawmakers, public officials to be in turn converted into laws, orders in council and good will for the power companies. It wasn't Moe's income. It merely passed through his hands. It was just a well-concealed, legal method of equipping Moe to buy the friendship of the boys for their great and good friend Sam Insull and other utility leaders. Having revealed this precious morsel to the tax authorities, he then proceeded to give the names of all the politicians to whom he gave the money. This he did under the careful questioning of Kelly's counsel. Of course Moe was supposed to keep some of the money for himself. He kept plenty. But alas! Moe, whose business was to make suckers out of the voters, was something of a sucker himself. Politics was his game—buying politicians, judges, aldermen. But Moe liked to play other people's games. He bought stocks. He dropped $280,000 with the brokers in two years. He tried his hand at finance—the Commercial Finance and Discount Company—and thus Moe was taken for another ride of $220,000. He had losses in two years of $640,000, besides paying out half a million to the boys.

When Moe told this story Democratic Treasury Department in Washington (he had been indicted by the Republicans) he and his took a train for Chicago. On the train he was taken ill. He died a week later. He was given a grand funeral. Judges, the aldermen, the great town gathered around the bier. Kelly was there. He made a speech.

After Moe's death, somehow—some treachery perhaps—Moe's complete statement to the Treasury Department leaked out and was made public. It helped to explain to students of public affairs where the dough comes from—at least some of it.

When the mayor spoke at Moe's funeral he said tearfully: "Moe was a good man to me." The mayor was not happy in his expressions of gratitude. Unfriendly critics were always to be found. On another occasion he had said: "All that I have I owe to the people of Chicago." But this was not strictly true. It turned out that, like Moe, he took some of it to the people of the United States.

Some Questions for His Honor

In fact, only a few months after Moe Kelly took office, a rumor popped up and danced about the Loop about an "important person" who had been indicted for a hundred grand income tax by the government. Who could it be? Rumors went to Kelly's house. They asked if he knew who the public official was. He said he didn't. And he added that he was not interested in knowing. Then four days later the facts came out. The mayor, it seems, in the years covered by the Sanitary District scandals, had failed to report $450,000 in income.

The Treasury had made the discovery, had gone after Kelly about it instead of indicting him as it did Rosenberg, had permitted him to make the claim. It had all happened before he became mayor. The Treasury settled with him for $105,000 and he paid it with a check from William Kenny, Al Smith's old friend and wealthy Tammany contractor. It all happened during a Republican administration. But it had been done quietly—no court action, no publicity. Some powerful Republican influence in Chicago had managed it. Not a

JOHN A. RUGE

“D-d-darling I just b-b-broke ninety!”

1 “So help me, honey...sober as a judge. Listen, on the 6th I wouldn't've given a dime for my chances. There I was, in the daisies, cussin' my slice. Up pops Tom the Pro, 'Hold everything! Your form's okay. Maybe it's that ball that's making you slice. Here, next hole play this...'”

2 “He hands me a Spalding. Zowie, I hit a screamer lead to the pin. From then on, baby, was I hot! Miracle? Well, says it's that Spalding balance. The old ball I've been using was off balance, sliced or hooked even when I hit it clean.”

3 “Look”, says Tom, showing me a chart. ‘Here's what the driving machine proves. Hit an off-balance ball over 200 yards and it may slice or hook 20 yards. But Spalding balls will vary less than one yard!’ Golly, no wonder I cut 5 strokes off my score. Well, honey, the boys want me... What? Oh, okay, I'll be right along...”

True Solution Center. 100% liquid, plus even wall-thickness, means perfect balance. Why Spalding balls go straight, prevent undeserved hooks, slices. And Spalding Geer patent covers are extra tough, save you money.

DOT AIR-FLITE DASH TOP-FLITE DOUBLE DOT KRO-FLITE

Spalding

GOLF BALLS

A. G. Spalding & Bros. DIVISION OF SPALDING SALES CORP.

about when you discover this grand ready-mixed

French

Dressing that tastes so wonderful and saves

so much bother! It's

KRAFT

FRENCH DRESSING

(America's largest-selling brand)

Of course that means it is skillfully blended of superb ingredients by experts.

If you prefer more tang,
ask for Kraft's other kind—Miracle French Dressing.

All folks admire the teeth of —

ace combs

—AND THEY'RE GENUINE HARD RUBBER

ENDERS SPEED RAZOR

TWA introduces new standards of speed and comfort with its luxurious, 4-motor Stratoliners. Flying faster, smoother at 20,000 feet, yet with sea-level air, these pressurized cabin planes fly coast to coast in 14½ hours.

ENDERS Speed Razor is standard equipment on TWA Stratoliners—and on other leading airlines—because it too introduces new speed and comfort... in shaving.

Send 39¢ for Flying Shave Kit

DURHAM DUPLEX
DURHAM DUPLEX RAZOR CO., Mystic, Conn.

had reached the public ear until now.

Of course the papers demanded to know how a $20,000-a-year engineer got $450,000 in three years. And people asked—what would have happened in the Sanitary trials if it had been known that Kelly had such an income in those years?

At first he refused to say where he got the money. Then he said it was a "lot of hullabaloo about nothing—just a simple business transaction." Then he intimated that he had advanced a lot of money to the Brennan campaign for the Senate and this was a return of that money. But it was pointed out that the total cost of the Brennan campaign was only $97,000. And, moreover, the return of a loan is not income and not taxable. The reporters pushed him cruelly for a better explanation. He said crustily: "I won't talk. Anything I say will be used to put me on the spot."

The Mayor Explains

But finally he decided to explain. And the explanation was even more startling than the original charge.

The mayor said he had had an income in the ten years from 1919 to 1929 of $724,368. In that time he had a salary of $151,000. In other words, he had an income in those ten years of over half a million dollars in excess of his salary.

His salary in that time averaged $15,115 a year. But his total income was $72,436 a year. It was almost five times as great as his salary.

Then he added that this large sum did not include the $450,000 claimed by the Treasury. And he let it go at that. He never did tell where that $450,000 came from. He merely insisted it was not income. But, of course, he had not contested the point when the Treasury called on him to pay $105,000 taxes on it. He had paid up.

Taking his own figures for the years 1926, 1927 and 1928, his income was truly surprising. He had an average of $72,436 in those three years which he admitted, reported and paid income tax on. And in addition to that he had the $450,000 or $150,000 a year that the Treasury unearthed and that he had concealed. The two together gave him an average income for those three years of $222,436 a year.

How much he made in those ten years outside of the $724,000 he reported and the $450,000 he didn't report we do not know. Taking merely the admitted figures, we find that this $15,000-a-year city engineer made over $1,100,000 in ten years. And all this was in spite of losses of several hundred thousands of dollars in the stock market and on real estate.

He was asked to explain the explanation. But he never did. He has never revealed where that $450,000 came from. It may be that it was not income. It may be that it was merely money passing through his hands. But from whom and to whom?

The incident rises now to plague him anew. For now he is the leader of the Roosevelt forces in Illinois—indeed in that whole region. Kelly has said his organization was the spearhead of the whole Roosevelt movement in the West. His enemies—and Roosevelt's—have taken him at his word and are asking him what he thinks of the dictum of Mr. Roosevelt when he was governor of New York.

When Samuel Seabury revealed that Sheriff Farley in New York City had over a hundred thousand dollars in cash in his tin box, Roosevelt removed Farley because he refused to say where it came from. Roosevelt said: "As a matter of general sound policy I am very certain that there is a requirement that where a public official is under inquiry or investigation, especially an elected public official, and it appears that his scale of living or the total of his bank deposits far exceeds the public salary which he is known to receive, he, the elected official, owes a positive public duty to the community to give a reasonable, a credible explanation of the sources of the deposits or the source which enables him to maintain a scale of living beyond the amount of his salary."

The revelations about Kelly produced some revelations about Pat Nash and Jake Arvey. Arvey is a lawyer—a member of the firm of McInerney, Arvey and Epstein. McInerney is Mayor Kelly's personal lawyer. Jake Arvey, in addition to being a lawyer, is also Moe Rosenberg's successor as boss of the Twenty-fourth Ward, Kelly-Nash leader of the Board of Aldermen and vice-chairman of the County Committee. He ranks next to Kelly and Nash—is in fact the Number Three Big Shot. Many say he is the real brains behind the throne. This is all merely by way of dropping in here the fact that the Internal Revenue Bureau in Washington leaked several times more and spilled the information that Pat Nash had been nailed by the Bureau for an unreported and unpaid income. He was charged about the same amount as Kelly—$108,000 for income tax in the same years, 1926-28. Jake Arvey was caught for a very much smaller sum. Another gentleman—Mr. George Chamberlain, a political contractor, head of the United States Electric Company, of which Arvey's partner, McInerney, Umbrella Mike Boyle and George Chamberlain were the organizers—was one of the ring that got juicy contracts from the Sanitary District. And he too was hooked for $110,000 in unpaid taxes and penalties for those same years—1926 to 1928.

Mr. Sweitzer is Persecuted

One of the important mechanics of the Cermak and later the Kelly-Nash machine was the Honorable Robert Sweitzer—genial, jaunty, gay, festive Bob Sweitzer. A prince of a fellow. He had run for mayor twice and had been overwhelmed by Big Bill Thompson. He was in no sense a small potato. In fact he was in every way a big potato. He was made a Knight of St. Gregory by the Pope. He was the glass of fashion and the mold of form—a man to grace any social or ceremonial occasion. He stood out among the hardier and lustier sons of the sod who grew out of the rough soil behind the stockyards. He too, like Moe Rosenberg, was a good fellow. He too was ready to peel off a grand or two for a needy judge or ward committeeman with a fight on his hands.

Mr. Sweitzer was city clerk for years—a post of importance. He was known also as a very considerable investor. Almost any sort of invention or gadget or project looked good to him. He put money into making a new type brick, a new kind of drug chain, a modern streamlined monkey wrench. He invested in a bond house. He took a share in a race track. He entertained lavishly. He loaned money freely to his colleagues in statecraft. As a matter of fact he ran a regular loan business—only without charging any interest, just an accommodation to the numerous members of the guild of mechanics of the Cermak-Kelly-Nash machine.

But where did he get the money? Why, bless you, where but right out of the treasury of the city! His offices collected fees of various kinds that somehow got lost in the maze of municipal bookkeeping or lack of it. Besides, he was in the office so long that he sort of got the notion that the thing belonged to him. And so his office became a kind of loan agency for the politicians. What was the harm? He wasn't stealing

PIPE SMOKER WIN CONFIDENCE

There's an air of rugged honesty about a man with a pipe held firmly between his teeth. Makes you feel he's a person in whom you can have perfect confidence.

This confidence helped put Crosby Square over. For when thousands of pipe smokers recommended this smooth, mellow, fragrant tobacco to their friends—the friends had confidence in their recommendation—and tried it. Result—Crosby Square has won national popularity.

Now advertising brings news of this master blend to you. Get Crosby Square at your tobacconist's. Try it over the Fourth. We rest our case on your opinion.

Only 15¢

A Package

Special Offer

We will send a generous sample of Crosby Square Pipe Mixture for 6¢ in stamps to help cover packing and mailing. Address: CROSBY SQUARE DIV., 102 Delmar BL

CHRISTIAN PEPPER TOBACCO
ST. LOUIS, MO., U. S. A.

REWARD! For a little of your spare time as a special description Representative. WRITE TODAY
Independent Agency Division
THE CROWELL-COLLIER PUBLISHING CO.
250 Park Ave. New York, N. Y.

STOP Itching

For quick relief from itching of eczema, pimples, itchy feet, scales, scabies, and other external skin troubles, use world-famous, cooling, septic, liquid D. D. D. Prescription. Grease, stainless. Soothes irritation and quickly stops itching. 35¢ trial bottle proves it, or money back your druggist today for D. D. D. PRESCRIPTION.

You Can Get Quick Relief From Tired Eyes

MAKE THIS SIMPLE TEST TODAY

EYES OVERWORKED? Do they smart burn? Just put two drops of Murine in your eye. Right away its six extra ingredients start to cleanse and soothe. You get—

QUICK RELIEF! Murine washes away irritations. Your eyes feel refreshed. Murine is a line—pure and gentle. It helps thousands start today to let it help you, too.

MURINE
FOR YOUR EYES
SOOTHES • CLEANSSES • REFRESHES

the money, just lending it. Was it his fault if the boys didn't pay it back? In any case a time came when auditors went over the books and found he was $100,000 short. He had to be indicted and cast out of office. He was very indignant, however. He refused to believe that he had done anything wrong. In fact, he felt deeply wounded by the indictment—he was a very sensitive man. He had a heart-warming philosophy that enabled him to perceive only the good he had done with the funds.

The funds were fees, he complained—fees allocated to no purpose. They really belonged to no one, he argued. In fact the city owed him money. He had been taking care of these and other funds for years as city clerk. That was a treasurer's job. Therefore he would be paid as a treasurer. He demanded about $250,000 from the city. He was tried by a jury of his peers. And the jury seemed to agree with him. Naturally he was triumphantly acquitted.

Tribute to a Hero

The city, however, sued the bonding company that guaranteed him and got judgment against it for $298,000 on the ground that dear old Bob had stolen the money, for the stealing of which he was acquitted by the jury. That is to say, when Bob was tried the jury said he didn't steal it. When the bonding company was sued, the jury said he did. Thus Bob went free, the city got back $298,000, a lot of good political leaders had been aided in distress, and nobody offered but an insurance company which had no soul anyhow. The experience undermined Bob's health. He died. And he, too, like Moe, was given a splendid funeral, as became a great tribal chief, with Governor Horner and the mayor and all the other tribal chieftains present.

Take the case of another one of those grandees who stood around in power the way that Ed Kelly was crowned. That was Frank V. Zintak, a ward boss as well as Clerk of the Superior Court. He too was a prince of a fellow—always good for a loan. In fact, he ran a loan club for judges. And, presently, one day it was discovered that he was operating his private politico-judicial bank with the court's funds. He was $26,000 short when the auditors looked at the till.

Zintak too was indignant at his indictment. He had loaned to the judges—the judges, can't you understand? He was tried on five embezzlement counts in 1937—and triumphantly acquitted.

You ask—how do they do it? Well, this particular jury got into a little trouble. They were hauled up for contempt of court. It seems that when these jurors were supposed to be locked up, buried in profound deliberation on the fate of Mr. Zintak, they were in a tavern enjoying gay drinking parties and banging away at the old slot machines. Five of them were sent to jail for five days, six for three days and one was fined. The bailiff who guarded them got six months and two other bailiffs were fined. A federal receiver, Mr. Robert V. McKinley, a friend of Zintak, was tried for offering to bribe one of the jurors. It is pleasant to record that he was acquitted, but that the juror who told of this proceeding got a year in jail.

Of course most of this, but not all of it, was brought to the attention of the people of Chicago by 1935 when Kelly had to stand for election. But it must be said for Chicago that she did not permit herself to be swayed from the main issue by these irrelevancies. What the main issue was I do not know. But the record shows that Kelly and the Kelly-Nash machine were triumphantly re-elected in 1935. And I am bound to record that such distinguished citizens as the late Bishop Donald Stewart, Protestant Episcopal leader, various other prominent clergymen and such unquestionably good citizens as Harry Barrett Chamberlain, head of the Crime Commission, endorsed Kelly's re-election.

To an outsider it is a little puzzling. I asked two distinguished Chicago Republican leaders about it. One was Judge Robert Crowe, one of Chicago's most famous and audacious Republican leaders—the Crowe arm of the once powerful Thompson-Crowe machine. The other must be nameless.

The nameless analyst put it thus: "First of all," he said, "a machine must have patronage—that is its heart, soul and stomach. No jobs—no machine. Every day in the year the machine has political work to do. It takes men. There must be workers in every precinct. They have to cultivate the voters, do them favors, establish friendly relations with them, keep them registered, round them up at primaries and on election day. It's hard work. No one will do it save one whose bread and butter depends on it and whose bread and butter is controlled by the machine. The only way to create and support an army like that is on the public pay roll. Therefore the machine, by the very law of its nature, must hunt jobs, jobs, jobs. Jobs on the public pay roll. Jobs with private concerns dependent on political aid and protection—public contractors, taverns, bookie joints, gambling houses, race tracks, power companies and so on.

"The Kelly-Nash machine has all the

Easy Arithmetic for educated palates

- Subtract

Subtract from the taste of your whiskey all trace of sweetness, by making sure it's Paul Jones—the famous DRY whiskey. Your very first sip of Paul Jones will demonstrate its crisp, tangy DRYNESS...its complete freedom from sweetness...

+ Add

Add to its brisk DRYNESS the deep, flavorful goodness that tells you Paul Jones is ALL whiskey, whiskey every drop. Add, too, the many other distinguished qualities that have made Paul Jones renowned as "A Gentleman's Whiskey Since 1865"...

x Multiply

Multiply the compliments you receive on your drinks, by making them with Paul Jones, next time you're host. Let its swell DRYNESS point up your highballs...give your Manhattans zest...

÷ Divide

Divide the new low price of Paul Jones by the number of masterful drinks it makes, and you'll see how little it costs to enjoy this magnificent whiskey. In fact, any way you figure it, you'll find that the right answer at drink time is Paul Jones!

Paul Jones

IT'S DRY... AND

WHAT A BUY!

All whiskey. A blend of straight whiskies—90 Proof
Frankfort Distilleries, Inc., Louisville & Baltimore.

"He always gives the second man the honor of breaking the tape"

D. HUFFINE

Fleas and lice—warns U. S. Dept. of Agriculture Circular No. 338—can transmit tapeworms and sarcoptic mange to dogs.

That flea, for which your dog may now be scratching, may be a carrier of tapeworm larva. If your dog snaps at it successfully and swallows him, he may become infested. Don't let your dog continue being exposed to the dangers and torments of fleas and lice. Act at once!

Insure complete eradication by using Pulvex, the powder which will kill every flea on your dog with incredible speed. None ever revive to reinfest. Pulvex also destroys any lice, ticks, sticktites on dog. Kills fleas, too, when put on single spot. Amazing—unbelievable—but true!

As Pulvex is borated, it will help allay itching from scratching. But even more important—

YOUR DOG WILL BE ABSOLUTELY PROTECTED AGAINST FLEA INFESTATIONS if you use Pulvex by the remarkable "minute-a-week" control method. Read about it in folder on can. If your dog is scratching, get Pulvex at once. At leading drug, department and pet stores, 50c.

PULVEX
FLEA POWDER

PULVEX FLEA SOAP oils and grooms the coat, deodorizes, cleans and destroys the fleas, only 25c!

NEURITIS Relieve Pain in Few Minutes

To relieve the torturing pain of Neuritis, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, or Lumbago in few minutes, get NURITO, the fine formula, used by thousands. No opiates. Does the work quickly—must relieve cruel pain to your satisfaction in a few minutes or your money back. Don't suffer. Ask your druggist today for trustworthy NURITO on this guarantee.

Tapatec
"STAY-A-FLOAT"

keeps him SAFE as he plays about the water or learns to swim

Children who can't swim need this protection. Keeps them SAFE! The STAY-A-FLOAT is a life-save belt 6 times more buoyant than cork. Double safety straps in front. Patented leg and shoulder straps prevent slipping up or down. Kapok filled—nothing to inflate, nothing to puncture. Recommended by swimming instructors. Small and medium sizes $1.99. Sold through Sporting Goods and Department Stores. Write For Free Folder jobs—national, state, county, city and a horde on numerous private pay rolls. The Republicans have absolutely none. Therefore the Republicans have no machine. It's a case of a machine against no machine. No one can lick a powerful machine save another powerful machine or an aroused mob. There was no machine against Kelly in 1935 and there was no occasion for a mob.

THE AMERICAN PAD & TEXTILE CO.
6 MAIN STREET, GREENFIELD, OHIO

"The Kelly-Nash machine was pretty bad. But the Republicans had been bad and they offered no alternative that anyone need get excited about."

I asked Bob Crowe, astute, audacious, plain-spoken, Republican Cook County boss or ex-boss. I got a blast from him about the Republicans. "The Republican party of Cook County," he said, paraphrasing a public attack he once made, "is like a fine old house that used to be inhabited by nice people, who have moved away. The neighborhood is run down, the house is empty, the shutters are hanging on one hinge, the windows are all broken, the porch is sagging, the whole place is weed-grown and filthy, is infested by rats and inhabited by tramps. That was the organization that opposed Kelly in 1935."

To the Rescue of the Schools

There was, of course, no uprising in 1935. There was, however, an incipient uprising in 1938 when that powerful machine got a taste of its unsuspected weaknesses. There was a little more of an uprising, right in its own ranks, in 1939 (of which more later). There are grave signs of what might be called discontent, restlessness now. That is the reason given in Chicago for the zeal with which Mr. Kelly leaped on the Roosevelt third-term band wagon in the spring and began whooping it up for "Roosevelt and Humanity." It was really for Roosevelt and Humanity and an unnamed hero named Kelly.

And one of the elements of politics that is causing no end of trouble for Kelly now is this eternal search for jobs. One must stand aghast at the industry with which jobs are created or seized. And at this very moment the school people are in arms because, they say, the Kelly-Nash machine has wrecked the school system and attempted to turn it into a Sanitary District job factory.

There are some professors of bossism who teach that the boss should keep his hands off the schools. The people are funny about them. Dr. Kelly and Dr. Nash are exponents of the other school which teaches that a job in a classroom is just as good as a job on a garbage wagon for political purposes. It is merely a difference in techniques.

Poor Kelly! He has certainly learned that it is better to monkey with a swarm of bees than with an army of school teachers on the warpath. When he took office the schools were in tragic disarray. The town was virtually bankrupt, people had stopped paying taxes, so the school board was broke. There was $22,000,000 in back pay due the teachers. And the ladies were pretty hot about it. The schools were dirty, unpainted and unrepaired. There were hundreds of portable tin classrooms doing duty for a board that had no money to build schools. And there were tax-conscious gentlemen in State, Randolph and LaSalle streets who were talking about closing the schools. Kelly had to cut expenditures, raise revenues to resume pay rolls and raise money to pay the unpaid bills. There wasn't a chance of doing this and getting off with a whole skin.

There are men—particularly what are called State Street Men—who will tell you that Kelly made a good job of this financial snarl. Perhaps so. Kelly has a feeling for money. He has handled a lot of it. He will tell you that he paid that unpaid bill of $22,000,000 in back pay, that he has kept the pay rolls going since, that he has painted and repaired every school and built twenty-two others and all without injuring any essential educational function. There are Chicagoans, however, who will tell you there is another side to the story.

Kelly's critics say he thought only of the money problem. There are values—imponderables—in the schools for which the schoolmen have struggled for years. There are services that took decades to build—services for protection of the system and the teachers from politicians. School leaders say Kelly seemed not to be aware of these; was not in sympathy with them.

The Democrats didn't have control of the board until Kelly was made mayor. He appointed what he called businessmen. The teachers say they were political businessmen. He appointed James B. McCahey president of the board. McCahey is a coal dealer—a political coal man, just as Kelly is a political engineer and Nash a political contractor. McCahey had been a leader of the coal dealers. He had had a good deal of very unpleasant criticism because of his alleged part in founding what Chicago knows as the T.N.T. (Truckers and Transportation Exchange). It was a sort of combination between the coal merchants and the Teamsters' Union to monopolize the coal trade. McCahey was charged with representing the coal merchants; Red Barker and Three-Finger Jack White—two gangsters, subsequently slain—represented the union. But the teachers lifted their eyes and suggested that this was an odd appointment to a school board.

School boards, it seems, must have labor members. So Kelly named Mr. Charles W. Fry, of the Machinists' Union. Whatever might be said of Brother Fry, he was no scholar. Back in 1915 he was indicted for an attempted shakedown along with Mike Galvin and Mike Artery. On that occasion when reporters asked him for comment he said: "Don't youse ask me no questions. I ain't got nuttin' to say."

Mr. Fry on Education

After his appointment to the board, a teachers' and parents' committee listened to the following neat little speech from him on educational policy:

"I ain't got no ax to grind . . . Let me say to you young ladies and gentlemen educators who are so uncouth . . . if you were members of my union you would get disciplined. There probably is never a year that Chicago University ain't facin' a deficit . . . When I ask them (students) that has been receivin' this kind of education that you are advocatin' . . . what they want to be . . . as God is my judge, they don't know what they want to be. They receive so much of this kind of education, it shoved them from spot to spot, that they cannot make up their minds what they want to do. That is no kiddin', boys and girls."

Then he added: "God bless you mothers and fathers. God bless you—that is the only thing I can say—and give you more sense."

For some reason many teachers and educational organizations felt that these new members were not too conscious of what might be called the intellectual and subtler cultural values in education. It seemed to the friends of the schools that since cuts had to be made they should have been made by men with an obvious sympathy for and understanding of the institution. But it was these gentlemen who did the cutting. It seems pretty raw. They abolished the junior college and all the junior high schools, discontinued half the kindergartens, most of the physical education and enormously important supervisory service.

McCahey forced the naming of a gen-

New "COOLER" made with WINE scores SUMMER HIT

NOW REPORTED in high favor all over America is a new hot weather drink called a wine "cooler." You serve it in tall glasses a-tinkle with ice. It looks pretty as a fresh bouquet, has a marvelous refreshing tang. Wine coolers are smart because they're moderate. Set out this gay surprise next time you entertain. Made in a jiffy.

OTHER "COOLER" RECIPES FREE

at the store where you buy the wines of California. California wines are grown to strict standards of quality. True to type. Well developed. Inexpensive. Wine Advisory Board, 85 Second Street, San Francisco

BECOME AN EXPERT ACCOUNTANT

Executive Accountants and C. P. A.'s earn $2,000 to $10,000 a year. Thousands of firms need them. About 20,000 Certified Public Accountants in the U. S. We train you thoroughly at home in spare time for C. P. A. examinations or executive accounting positions. Previous experience unnecessary. Personal training under supervision of staff of C. P. A.'s including members of the American Institute of Accountants. Write for free book, "Accountancy, the Profession That Pays." LaSalle Extension University, Dept. 740-H, Chicago

A Correspondence Institution

FEET HURT, BURN?

For tired, tender, sensitive feet, muscular soreness or burning sensations caused by exertion or fatigue, use this quick relief (vanishing liquid or ointment). Cost but a trifle. For Dr. Scholl's FREE FOOT BOOK, write Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Chicago, Ill.

Dr. Scholl's FOOT BALM

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE — WITHOUT CALOMEL

—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pints of liquid bile onto the food you swallow every day. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food may not digest. You get constipated. You feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pints of bile flowing freely to make you feel "up and up." Amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. 10¢ and 25¢. Stubbornly refuse anything else.

named William Harding Johnson school principal—as assistant superintendent. And when Superintendent died, which he conveniently did soon, they made Johnson superintendent. He has become a storm center. He has just been elected for another year and this has set off another wave of indignation.

Johnson's star performance was a principals' examination. Principals must be chosen by a merit test. The examination is divided into two parts—written and oral. The candidate must get over 70 in both, but the average must be 80.

Written examinations were marked according to accepted standards. But an oral examination may be easily rigged. Examiners could give the candidate a high or low mark arbitrarily in the oral. They could flunk him with a low mark or pull his average up to 80 with a high one. Johnson controlled this examination. And some of the results were turned out. Some teachers took the examinations. Of 155 passed. One curious feature of this: Miss Marie McCahey, the wife of Coal Man Jim McCahey, president of the board, is a teacher. Twice she had taken examinations and this time she not only qualified, but was near the top of the list and was one of the first fifteen appointed immediately. Of these fifteen, eight were friends of McCahey or his sister, six were friends of influential politicians. And another curious incident was that one teacher, universally regarded as one of the most brilliant in his profession, widely esteemed as a scholar and a teacher, flunked.

It was, perhaps, human that teachers should be suspicious. In any case they were. Cain. And then in good time their suspicions were confirmed. One of the examiners who had left the system district superintendent—made a statement under oath describing what happened. The examination, he said, was headed and controlled by Johnson. Before a candidate entered the room for the oral test Johnson would indicate whether he or she was to pass or not. "This lady is out," he would say. "She is not loyal to me." Or "This fellow is a troublemaker. Mark him low enough to fail him." When this rather shocking revelation was made another one of the examiners corroborated it.

It helped explain, for instance, why 122 of the 155 who qualified were pupils of Superintendent Johnson in a class he conducted for pay at Loyola to prepare teachers for the principals' examination. It also brought out the fact that eight out of every ten of the 155 had failing marks until they were boosted to a passing mark on the oral test.

That examination still dogs the steps of Johnson and of Kelly. It is, however, but a single count in the long indictment of the Kelly-Nash domination of the schools. It makes clear what Dean Freeman, of the School of Education of the University of California, means when he says that the Chicago schools are one of the sore spots of the Union. It explains why, as I write, the school system is in an uproar over the sudden snap reappointment of Johnson, in the face of denunciation and protests from almost every civic organization interested in the schools.

However, the machine has the jobs and that, apparently, is what counts. And it is that search for jobs in order to support political machine workers and the hunt for money to lubricate the machine that accounts for so many activities in so many other directions—labor, gambling joints, mob leaders, contractors, banks, power companies—every kind of person or institution that can yield up an honest dollar or a year's work for a faithful soldier. It carries the bosses and their satellites into strange places. We shall presently see some of them.

The third of this series of articles will appear next week.

LAURENCE REYNOLDS

"...above all, the mileage a tire delivers is the one sure gauge of its worth."

IT'S THE THIRD TEN THOUSAND MILES THAT MAKES THE BIG HIT

THE ONE AND ONLY
SQUEEGEE
TIRE

This year, new thousands have come to realize that the famous long mileage of Top-Quality Generals makes them by all odds the economy buy. With this abundance of mileage, Generals give you superlative safety, restful riding and peace of mind that point straight to the wisdom of equipping your car. Let your General Tire dealer show you how little it costs.

STOPS like this
Flexible ribs wrinkle into squeegie-action... hold with super-soft grip... stop you quick and straight, every time.

RUNS like this
No wrinkle when running. Silent riding. Easy steering. No sway on sharp turns. Non-cupping. Slow, even wear.

The General Tire and Rubber Company • Akron, Ohio
In Canada—The General Tire & Rubber Co., Ltd., Toronto

COPYRIGHT 1940, THE GENERAL TIRE & RUBBER CO., AKRON, O.

The GENERAL TIRE

—goes a long way to make friends

U. S. Help for the Allies

ABOUT 24 hours after the fearful battle of Flanders (May 10th), United States majority public opinion veered sharply to the belief that the United States ought to send the Allies every possible form of help short of actually sending another A.E.F. to Europe.

Whether isolationism is right or wrong, if that is the way Americans feel, that is the way Americans feel. Most of us at this writing, so far as the most respected public-opinion indicators show, do want to help the Allies by every means short of going to war ourselves.

So the main question under this head becomes: What is the best way for us to help the Allies?

From a 22-year perspective on the previous big war, it looks as if we helped the Allies that time in about the worst possible way. We rounded up an army of about some 4,000,000 men, and sent about 2,000,000 of them to France. In addition, we financed a considerable part of the whole Allied war effort; it was in that field that we possibly made our big mistake.

Our mistake lay in not foreseeing that the World War was going to bankrupt the Allies, practically, and in confidently expecting to be paid back all our money in due time afterward. The war overhung world money adjustment years, soured relations between ours and Europe and in the end were repaid in large part because our debt simply could not pay.

If we're going to help the Allies this time, why not go the whole route regards the money, while withholding men? We mean simply give the Allies what planes, guns, munitions, food supplies and clothing we can, and forget about repayment, because we shan't be repaid anyway.

If the Allies feel like putting up some real estate as collateral—Bermuda, Jamaica, say, and some of the French West Indies—all right. But if most of them really believe in the justice of their cause it would hardly seem gracious or generous to press them on this score. Of course, though, if Germany wins, they should at once move to make sure that any of that Caribbean real estate changes hands, it shall come to us.)

The main thing, it seems to us, is to get this country to nurse along as much goodwill as it can into a postwar world which at best will be badly crippled with assorted hates and hopes for revenge.

Some Cats, Your Life and You

IT'S well to know that most people can learn things from animals—almost any animal. It comes over us that plenty of people could learn nothing less than a whole way of life from the Siamese cat.

The Siamese is the blue-eyed cat, usually beige-coated with seal-brown points, which was brought to this country in the old days by sailors who ventured up into Siam, and about which numerous legends are told of its having been crossed ages ago with monkeys or rabbits or pandas—such legends being 100% untrue.

But the Siamese does differ from most other cats in one striking respect. Aside from being as affectionate as a dog (most Siamese cats, given any encouragement, will climb all over you, kissing you with their little sandpaper tongues and draping themselves like fur pieces around your neck), the Siamese takes a phenomenal interest in the place where it lives and the people it lives with.

It never seems to tire of exploring its own home, large or small; of studying every little nook and cranny of the place where Fate has elected that it live. And obviously gets endless fun out of the simple practice of taking its own world as it finds it and eternally surveying and resurveying that world.

Isn't there a hint in this for human beings? To know your own job, your own chink in life, your own personal world, to know it thoroughly as you can, and to keep refreshing your interest in it by everlasting study of its details, its changes, its story—that's one road to happiness, and probably to a more and more spacious personal world.

Why Hound the Alien?

WE MUST confess to some alarm over the huge multitude of plans for policing, regulating, restricting or, in plain English, hounding aliens as a part of our national defense drive.

There are now some 3,800,000 unnaturalized foreigners in the United States. From some of the proposals to fingerprint them all, make them all trot around and report to some bureaucrat once a week or month, forbid any of them to possess guns or shoot off firecrackers, etc., etc., you would suppose that every last one of these persons was a whole fifth column, complete with parachute and false whiskers.

We doubt seriously that many of our foreigners are as bad as all that.

There must be a large number of them who are so glad to be living in a relatively happy country that they are more loyal to our government than is many an old time American who takes this country and its liberties for granted. Another large number of our foreigners must be afraid to plot against our institutions even if they wanted to, and still another husky percentage of them must be just too dumb to plot against anything.

Keep professional agitators and members of subversive groups under strict surveillance—certainly. But why make citizenship or noncitizenship the criterion? Let's use some discretion. Our traditional hospitality to newcomers has been responsible for most of our growth as a great nation. Why toss it away?

July 13, 1940

5¢ A COPY

Collier's

ONAL WEEKLY

SUMMER
BOARDERS TAKEN

Caught with Our Guard Down
By Walter Davenport

© THE CROWELL-COLLIER PUBLISHING COMPANY—PUBLISHERS OF COLLIER'S—THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE

1/20X
C 82641
A

21940X
CALIF ILLINOIS
PUN LDR

Trade in Your Old-Car Worries

ON A BRAND NEW GRAND NEW PLYMOUTH

July's the Month to Get Out and Go... Forget about tires, brakes, overhauls, upkeep — Get this Luxurious Car so Economical to Run!

JUST DOWN THE HIGHWAY, maybe ten miles, maybe a hundred, there's a clear, cool stream you'd love to fish... a mountain trail you've been eager to explore... or just the right spot for a picnic.

Get more fun out of life! Put aside your old-car worries... travel in a glorious new Plymouth!

Touch the accelerator, and let Plymouth's big Superfinished engine whisk you along, swiftly, silently — with the smoothness of Floating Power engine mountings. Enjoy the velvet control of double-action hydraulic brakes... the comfort of coiled Amola Steel springs (standard on all models).

Plymouth's 117-inch wheelbase is the longest of "All 3" low-priced cars. And with all its finer quality, this car is remarkably thrifty. So trade now! PLYMOUTH DIVISION OF CHRYSLER CORPORATION.

TUNE IN MAJOR BOWEN'S AMATEUR HOUR, C.B.S. NETWORK, THURS., 9-10 P.M., E.D.S.T.

TRADE BEFORE YOU TRAVEL this summer. Turn in your present car right now... your Plymouth dealer can give you a better deal.

HAVE THE TIME of your life this summer! Remember, a new Plymouth is very easy to buy!

MEAT July Selections OF BETTER USED CARS

Right now, your Dodge, DeSoto, or Chrysler dealer can give you a good trade on a better used car. These dealers are offering wide selections of high-grade, dependable used cars, all ready for July travel. Wherever you go this summer, you'll travel more enjoyably if you're in a car that you know is 100 per cent right. Come in today.

GET A GOOD JULY TRADE-IN ON A

New PLYMOUTH

JULY 1940

July's the Month to Trade and Travel

WILLIAM L. CHENERY Editor
CHARLES COLEBAUGH Managing Editor
THOMAS H. BECK Editorial Director

WALTER DAVENPORT
AIMEE LARKIN
QUENTIN REYNOLDS
KYLE CRICHTON
KENNETH LITTAUER
JAMES N. YOUNG
MAX WILKINSON

Politics
Drama
Sports
Screen and Theater
Fiction
Fiction
Fiction

WM. O. CHESSMAN
HENRY L. JACKSON
GURNEY WILLIAMS
DENVER LINDLEY
FRANK D. MORRIS
IFOR THOMAS
CLARENCE H. ROY

Art
Fine Feathers
Humor
Articles
Articles
Photographs
Syntax

W. B. COURTNEY
FRANK GERVASI
MARTHA GELLHORN
JIM MARSHALL
WM. HILLMAN
ROBERT McCORMICK
JOHN T. FLYNN

Me Europe
Asso

THIS WEEK

JULY 13, 1940

SHORT STORIES

MICHAEL FOSTER

The Gag Man. She didn't think he was funny, and he loved it. Page 10

WILL F. JENKINS

Dusk to Daybreak. The general learns how death should be faced. Page 11

HENRY MEADE WILLIAMS

Girl From Home. Meets boy from home—in New York. Page 14

THE SHORT SHORT STORY

Light in the Window, by Octavus Roy Cohen. Page 13

SERIAL STORIES

JOHN AUGUST

Rain Before Seven. The eighth of ten parts. Don't trust anyone. Page 17

WILLIAM C. WHITE

Occupation: Widow. The second of nine parts. Lovely prisoner. Page 20

ARTICLES

QUENTIN REYNOLDS

The Wounded Don't Cry. A doomed land has no time for tears. Page 9

C. M. BLACK

Nickel Empire. Coney Island and what makes it click. Page 12

KYLE CRICHTON

Comeback. Bill DeLancey returns to the majors. Page 16

WALTER DAVENPORT

Caught with Our Guard Down. Our embryonic Army. Page 18

JOHN T. FLYNN

These Our Rulers. The third of four parts. Why Chicago is ridden with gambling and vice. Page 22

FRELING FOSTER

Keep Up with the World. Page 6

EDITORIALS

Let's Trade for Defense.

Treat the Guard Right.

One for All—or Else. Page 54

OVER

ROBERT O. REID

ANY WEEK

WE'VE been listening lately to the Communists, starting with the acceptance speeches of the Messrs. Browder and Ford, their candidates for President and Vice President. Somehow we doubt that these two self-confessed redeemers of mankind will be successful in the coming elections. And yet the point is that we were never very much interested in what they had to say until we heard all this bellowing about denying them the air. Alas, we've found Mr. Browder and Mr. Ford pretty dull going, quite as dull, in fact, as those who would deny them the right to demonstrate how uninteresting they can be when aroused. Therefore we shall not accept Mr. Dumont D. Aschipe's invitation to join his True American Blues, a violent movement pledged to "the extirpation and ruthless extermination of un-American Reds." There's too much extirpation and extermination going on already. Mr. Aschipe writes from Buffalo, New York, that "We Blues reserve the right to suspect the loyalty of all who refuse to join us in suppressing the Reds." But we think that gentlemen like Mr. Browder and Mr. Ford are valuable. Without their dismal exhortations how would we know how lifeless life would be under their management? We wonder, too, who would pay for the handouts they offer us for our vote. We have listened to eighteen or twenty Communists, always hopeful that at least one of them would suggest that we go to work. But work wouldn't be necessary. We would be educated, fed, housed, warmed, cured, transported and entertained free of charge. Babies would cost us nothing and old age would be Nirvana whilst the years between would be a cultural and well-fed ease. What we really intended to say was "Nuts."

OF MORE substantial stuff are the thoughts of Mr. Toby Wolff of Bismarck, North Dakota. For twelve years Mr. Wolff was Sergeant Wolff, United States Army. And he assures us that he'd still be Sergeant Wolff were it not for Nettie. Nettie finally broke seven of Mr. Wolff's ribs, ending his days as a soldier but not, happily, as an otherwise useful citizen. "That mule," writes Mr. Wolff, "finally met her match. It was a freight train. But if she was around today this problem of what to do for the Allies would be solved. All we'd have to do is send Nettie to France and turn her loose on a blitzkrieg. I'm not trying to be funny. In one afternoon I saw her ruin two field guns, a rolling kitchen, a company street, two lieutenants and four other animals. She was shot several times, fell into a granite quarry and ate twenty heads of cabbage all in one day. The freight train got her when she was asleep on the tracks."

THERE are other evidences that things are not what they used to be. And the answer is not "Thank God." For example, Mr. A. J. Sitton of Pyote, Texas, having seen our mention of that Missouri oasis Ye Olde Rumme Shoppe, is reminded of the pleasant place that Mr. Wills Key used to run in Berlin, Oklahoma. The sign over the door attracted Mr. Sitton—"The Road to Ruin." "I entered," says Mr. Sitton, "partook of one glass of the house's specialty and discovered to my amazement that I was in a revolutionary frame of mind. Thus inspired, I became embroiled with a gentleman whose whiskers indicated that he was carrying at least three dollars of some barber's money. I started the revolution on him. Two minutes later (but what a two minutes, son!) the revolution was over. Regaining consciousness, I made three resolves which I have never broken—never take another drink, stay out of revolutions and never, never again to speak out of turn to a farmer."

WE HAVE a letter from Mr. Eugene H. McManus, chief of police in Columbia, Pennsylvania. Mr. McManus' hearty approval is not given to Frank Gervasi's recent article about Signor Muti, who has done a variety of special political killings for his boss, Benito Mussolini. Mr. McManus fears that this "glorification of Muti" may have a deleterious effect upon the impressionable youth of the country. While we disagree with Mr. McManus that Mr. Gervasi "glorified" Signor Muti and agree that mobsters have been overromanticized, it is the chief's last sentence that gives us hope. "If you must praise mobsters," says he, "the least you can do, it seems to me, is to have them American."

BUT LESS understandable is a complaint received from Mr. Cornelius F. Fachalle of Atlanta, Georgia. Doubtless Mr. Fachalle has a reason for his assault upon us but we don't think we're being unreasonable in regretting that he doesn't tell us what it is. "Why I read your rotten magazine I don't know except it is that I ain't got any more brains than you have," chides Mr. Fachalle. "You used to be a guide post, now you're a hitching post. I used to be able to read what you print and forget it. Now you ain't fit for even a Republican to read. I have sent a marked copy to Congressman Dies. If you ain't in jail soon, there's something crooked somewhere."

WE'RE inclined to agree with Stevens L. Wethwinn of Washington, D. C., that there is too much in Democracy's military manuals. "Too many antis he," and too many Aunties them. We spend millions tank guns, antiaircraft guns, gas respirators, antififth snoopers, antitorpedo gadgets, propaganda propaganda and Only Hitler, may his end be distressing, fights positively defense against such as he tanks, more planes, more bombs, torpedoes, more gas, better columnists working the other the street, more energetic and propaganda. How about putting on the anti side? How much we need that the only thing a spect is a tougher guy. Let's of Anti."

IF YOU have a few moments and feel in the humor for a go you might look up something Mrs. Lauretta Dozy of Ann Arbor, Michigan. "What has become the Marines?" demands Mrs. "They're building up the Army, calling out the National Guard and they're talking about building big navies. But neither in my paper nor over my radio have I a word about the Marines landing where getting anything under And what has happened to Se Ickes? Not a word lately about Ickes. Has he gone the way of Florida Canal, Passamaquoddy hundred-mile belt of trees from Canada to Mexico and those training camps for the great American Anyway what's happened to Marines?"

WITH some sadness we note a from Mr. Ed Kullop of Chicago. Mr. Kullop tells us that the best restless minds of the National Youth Congress has deserted an over to the economic royalists. Kullop assures us that "this you low was a true revolutionary, the loudest hissers on the White lawn during the Youth Congress meeting in Washington last fall chances of becoming president Congress next year were excellent the poor dope has resigned and a job in a factory."

THE dirty scab. . .

Vol. 106, No. 2. Entered as second-class matter at Post Office, Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A., under Act of March 3, 1879, and at Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Springfield, Ohio, Publishers of Woman's Home Companion, The American Magazine, Collier's. Copyright, 1940, The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, in the United States, Canada and Great Britain. Executive and Editorial Offices: 250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.; 6 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W. C. 2. Published weekly at Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A. Joseph F. Knapp, Chairman of the Board; Thomas H. Beck, President; Albert E. Winger, Executive Vice President and Treasurer; Gertrude B. Lane, Vice President; John S. Brehm, Vice President; William P. Larkin, Vice President; J. A. Welch, Vice President; Denis O. Sullivan, Secretary. Manuscripts or art submitted to Collier's, The National Weekly, should be accompanied by addressed envelopes and sufficient postage for their return. The Publisher assumes no responsibility for return of unsolicited manuscripts or art. Price, 5 cents a copy in the United States and Canada; $2.00 a year, $3.50 for two years, in the United States and possessions, also in Argentina, Balearic Islands, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Canary Islands, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Labrador, Mexico, Newfoundland, Nicaragua, Paraguay, Peru, Spain and Colonies, Uruguay and Venezuela. Foreign subscriptions including postage: $5.50 a year to all other countries. Remit by postal or express money order or check in United States to The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Springfield, Ohio. To avoid delay in delivery, subscribers should notify us of change of address five weeks in advance. Give both old and new addresses.

"IS IT FOR ME?"

You kind of hope it is—for a lot of good news and good times come your way by telephone.

Maybe it's a date for Sister Sue. Or a golf call for Dad. Or Bill asking if Jimmie can go to the movies. Or Grandma calling Mother to find out if things are all right.

And everything is more likely to be all right when there's a telephone in the home. In many, many ways, it is a real friend of the family.

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

The Bell System cordially invites you to visit its exhibits at the New York World's Fair and the Golden Gate International Exposition, San Francisco.

Voted most likely to succeed

And remember, anyone may have halitosis. You might be offending at this very moment without realizing it. That's the insidious thing about it.

Why Gamble?

Take the sensible and delightful precaution regularly followed by so many men who are "going places." Use Listerine Antiseptic night and morning and before appointments. Its antiseptic and deodorant effect is simply amazing.

Halts Mouth Fermentation Odors

Some cases of halitosis (bad breath) are due to systemic conditions. But usually, say some authorities, it is due to the fermentation of tiny food particles in the mouth.

Listerine Antiseptic halts such fermentation and quickly overcomes the odors it causes. Your breath becomes sweeter, purer, more agreeable, and less likely to offend. Keep this wonderful antiseptic and deodorant in home and office, and carry it with you when you travel—it pays.

LAMBERT PHARMACAL CO., St. Louis, Mo.

Before all engagements, use LISTERINE to combat
halitosis (BAD BREATH)

IN college how bright the future looked... but today he's just called Old John, a low pay hack in a fourth rate firm. "How come?" you naturally ask.

For every man who plunges headlong down the rickety steps to failure through a big mistake, there are dozens who go the route because of some small trait of character or a personal fault irritating to others.

That was Johnson's trouble. One little fault* cost him his best job after he was several years out of school. After that, he went from one small job to another until he hit bottom.

A Big Handicap

If you want to get ahead... if you want to be welcome to those you do business with, guard against halitosis* (bad breath). At its worst it may keep you out of things, impair your contacts, jeopardize your business relations. Merely its presence can stamp you as a careless and objectionable person.

KEEP UP WITH THE WORLD

By Freling Foster

In some parts of China, weight instead of price of food fluctuates with market conditions. For example, a housewife always pays the same price for rice, but she gets a "big pound" when it is plentiful and "a little pound" when it is scarce.—By Frederick Farran, Oceanport, New Jersey.

About half of the population of the world does not kiss or shake hands when meeting or leaving relatives and friends.—By Ruth Tag, Paterson, New Jersey.

More than 150,000 men and women in the United States are seeking wives and husbands through matrimonial magazines, bureaus and clubs.

Such places as old city warehouses, factories, breweries, churches and hotels provide housing for more than 40,000,000 egg-laying chickens in tiers of individual cages equipped with feed, water and egg-transportation troughs. For instance, a $1,000,000 Florida hotel that failed a short time ago is now a "chicken coop" with 60,000 caged hens.

When witnesses are sworn in the law courts of Germany, all other persons in the room, including the judges, likewise rise and raise their right hand.—By Alice Phebe Ward, City Island, New York.

An expert in jujitsu, the Japanese art of self-defense without weapons, can successfully take on and disable, at one time, as many as twelve untrained men.

The identity of the chief of the British Secret Service is officially known to three men only—the king, the head of the treasury and the diplomatic adviser to the cabinet.

Of the 3,500,000 aliens who live in the United States and still owe allegiance to the country of their birth, about 1,500,000 are Germans, Russians and Italians.

So many quadroons, octorons and quintroons, or persons who are respectively, one fourth, one eighth and one sixteenth Negro, are white in appearance that about thousand a month pass "the color line" surreptitiously and become members of white society.

Men who do considerable smelling, such as perfume mixers, frequently revive their tired olfactory nerve by sniffing gum camphor while those who do much tasting, such as wine testers, usually clean their palates by eating cheese.

A new make of outdoor eyeglasses blocks out all reflected glare and permits the wearer to control the brilliance of the view. A second movable lens gradually decreases the transmission of light upon being rotated over the axis of the stationary lens. In other words, the "adjustable sunglasses" can be regulated to suit any pair of eyes any degree of brightness.

Horses have been known to die from seasickness, female apes have grieved themselves to death over the loss of a baby and human beings have developed such intense melancholia from homesickness that it has proved fatal.

Several phonograph companies now make recordings of trios, quartets and quintets in which the part of one instrument is omitted so that the amateur musician may accompany it. Similar records of famous arias, carrying only the accompaniment, are available for singers.

Under normal and comparable conditions, a woman's heart beats from five to seven per cent faster than that of a man.—By Alice Luckstone, New York, New York.

Five dollars will be paid for each interesting or unusual fact accepted for this column. Contributions must be accompanied by satisfactory proof. Address Keep Up with the World, Collier's, 250 Park Avenue, New York City. This column is copyrighted by Collier's The National Weekly. None of the items may be reproduced without express permission of the publisher.

Snapshots of our Fair Vacation— What a Trip!

We got off to a great start!
Pennsylvania Railroad's "Direct"
—can't beat that!

Washington saw us first! You get a free stop-over. How do you like our White House pose?

Real Patriots, we folks
—before the Liberty Bell in Philadelphia;
another free stop-over.

Hello, World's Fair! You glide right to the gate on the Pennsylvvania's "Direct Route"—great!

Our Railroads on Parade and what a show! Wish we could pilot of those swell new engines!

Those Foreign Buildings
—round-the-world in a mile! We're going to have a lot of fun with these shots.

Looked Pretty Tiny in this "snap" against the trylon and perisphere
—but this Fair is a big place!

This Night Life gets you!
Fountains playing in color . . . fireworks
. . . man! you're in Fairyland.

Make your vacation days Fair days! And go as America goes . . . by Pennsylvania Railroad's "Direct Route." Avoid all highway and driving worries. Relax in a private room of your own on the Luxury Fleet, where you enjoy the newest Pullman appointments . . . or in a soft reclining seat in a cool air-conditioned Luxury Coach. Either way costs you little, as fares are so low. From Chicago you can ride the de luxe all-coach Trail Blazer—that's a real pre-Fair thrill! The "Direct Route" goes through historic Philadelphia, so you can stop off and see the many patriotic shrines. Or you can go via Washington and return by Niagara Falls at no extra cost, if traveling from the mid-West. So consult your nearest ticket or travel agent now about a trip to the Fair over the Pennsylvania —and be sure to ask him about the new low all-expense tours!

Look into new Easy Payment Plan for purchasing Railroad Tickets

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD

BEST ROUTE BETWEEN WEST AND EAST . . . DIRECT ROUTE TO THE WORLD'S FAIR . . . STATION ON FAIR GROUNDS

See The Golden Gate International Exposition at San Francisco, too! Take a Grand Circle Tour. Coast to coast . . . from your home station and back again . . . $90 in Coaches, $135 in Pullmans, plus reduced Pullman charge. And be sure to see Pennsylvania Railroad's "Magic Movies" at the San Francisco Fair.

Here's the way Straight to the Gate!

As your Pennsylvania Railroad train glides into Pennsylvania Station, New York, merely step to a waiting electric train . . . in 10 minutes, for 10 cents, you're at the Fair. No complications!

And here's how little it costs

Examples of Coach Fares to New York

	One-Way	Round-Trip
From Chicago . . . . .	$18.20	$27.25
From Cleveland . . . . .	$11.45	$17.15
From St. Louis . . . . .	$21.15	$31.75
From Cincinnati . . . . .	$15.05	$22.55

Round-Trip Tickets good 60 Days

STILL LOWER FARES on week-end Excursions from Detroit, Dayton, Cincinnati and intermediate points; also on 1-day and week-end Excursions from Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh and nearby points. Practically all trains carry coaches.

ASK ABOUT LOW PULLMAN FARES

The loneliest town in America

THIS IS A LOVELY LITTLE TOWN, quiet, comfortable, not unlike many other restful spots throughout the U. S. A.

Happy, neighborly people live there. Children laugh. Dogs play in the streets. Birds sing.

But if it is not your home town and you happen to get into an automobile accident there, it can be, for you, the loneliest town in America.

You can be detained there, alone and troubled, with no friend to talk to or vouch for you, until many aggravating matters are cleared up. You may be deprived of the use of your car, temporarily or perhaps permanently. You may be required to make a deposit with the authorities of the state and it may be necessary for you to send home for more money. You can, in short, be made to feel like an unwanted stranger in a foreign land.

If you have automobile liability insurance in The Travelers, the town drops its cloak of loneliness. In such insurance you have the key to friendly assistance no matter how far you are from home, for you will find a Travelers representative within easy reach, anywhere you are in this country or in Canada. He will come to your aid promptly, whenever, wherever you have an accident. The moment he arrives, he takes over your responsibilities and arranges it so that you can continue your journey in peace and comfort.

Call in your Travelers agent or insurance broker today. Get his experienced counsel on the type and amounts of automobile insurance that you should have.

New features such as the Classification Rating Plan and Safe Driver Rewards make such insurance surprisingly economical to own.

Moral: Insure in The Travelers. All forms of insurance. The Travelers Insurance Company, The Travelers Indemnity Company, The Travelers Fire Insurance Company, Hartford, Connecticut.

The Wounded Don't Cry

By Quentin Reynolds

DRAWING BY HARDIE GRAMATKY

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY
FOR JULY 13, 1940

Collier's correspondent France radios a poignant unforgettable story of wounded and of the less men and women who cared for them

FIRST it is hard to watch men die but after a while you get quite accustomed to it. Actually they die it easier for you because they die quietly. The wounded don't cry. In any way it is harder to watch a city die. As a middle-aged city still in the prime of life and it died very gallantly, not at all quietly. Perhaps the story of the life and death of this city and of the manner in which it was killed might be worth the telling.

It was an ordinary French city, proud of its beautiful cathedral and of its home for the aged. It boasted a little, too, of a large school for boys which was on top of a hill overlooking the city. The Germans will not let me name the city for fear that doesn't matter now because after all the city is dead. The city was very close to the front, so close that the sounds were brought directly to the front.

I met the city at ten o'clock one night. I came to it sitting in the front seat of an ambulance. The city was very beautiful at night but perhaps that was because nearly a third of it was in flames. The Germans had been bombing it all day and, quite by chance, not only had they scored a direct hit on the home for the aged. They had also scored a direct hit on a hospital in the center of the town, which was unfortunate because the hospital had been full of badly wounded. The school for boys on top of the hill had been turned into a first-line hospital and we brought our wounded there.

The two ambulance drivers happened to be Americans. One was a tall, lean, red-headed man with very blue eyes—Jack James, a terrific man. His partner was a slightly built, wiry man who needed a cane badly and who looked very tired. Well, he hadn't slept for some time. His name was Bob Montgomery and he used to live in Hollywood and act in pictures. When he would wear a white tie in pictures. He looked very much at home in a white tie. Here at the top of the small hill in the midst of 2,000 badly wounded he looked very much at home too. He and James were a good pair.

Now orders had been given for the ambulances to move the wounded out of the hospital to the railroad station. There was a train there to take the wounded south. Twenty American ambulances did the work. They worked nearly all night loading up, then in pitch-darkness crawling down the winding road to the station and afterward returning for more.

I stayed at the hospital. I went into the operating room and it was very busy. There were two surgeons and three operating tables. A surgeon would look at the wound and then nod to an assistant. The wounded man would be lifted on the table and an ether cone would be placed over his face. Then his clothes would be ripped off and the surgeons would work quickly, deftly. Each surgeon had three assistants who weren't doctors at all.

A French artilleryman was on the table waiting and he was smiling gently and talking very fast. "It was good. It was good." The captain caught my questioning eye and he smiled. "Ten to one we got. There were only a few of us with our seventy-fives. The tanks came at us and we fired and fired and we destroyed those tanks as fast as they came to us. Each of our seventy-fives got ten tanks before they got us. The general had said, Hold your place or die. We did. Only I am left, but each of us got ten tanks."

Then this captain raised his hand to his lips and kissed it. "I tasted Boche blood," he said quietly, and then he laughed much too loudly and repeated, "I tasted Boche blood." He kept laughing and the surgeon put a needle into the fleshy part of his arm and then the surgeon shook his head and motioned to the orderlies to take the captain off the table. It was a pity the surgeon couldn't have done anything for this man but the surgeon knew what he was doing.

Both surgeons had been doing this ten hours now and they looked tired. Everything about them was tired except their hands, which were quick and fine and sure. They had run out of rubber gloves and they worked barehanded, occasionally dipping their hands into a pail of disinfectant. This operating room had been a playroom when the hospital had been a school for boys. There were pictures painted on the wall.

And the Surgeons Work On

They brought in a huge Senegalese. They lifted him to the table and his eyes glanced at the wall to his left. Mickey Mouse was playing on that wall and near him was Popeye the Sailor eating a can of spinach. I caught the eye of the big Senegalese and grinned and he grinned back. Then I looked down at his leg which the doctor was examining and I stopped grinning. It wasn't a pretty wound. It was just above the ankle. The surgeon felt of the thigh and nodded. It was firm there. Then he took a pot of iodine and swabbed the man's thigh with it and at first I didn't understand. They started to tie the hands of the black man to the table and he didn't like that. They do that because often the wounded get delirious as they are getting the ether and they thrash their arms around. But he let down quietly enough and they put the ether cone on his face. Then the doctor reached for something and he held the man's thigh with one hand and I walked to the next table.

I stayed there an hour, and it wasn't morbid curiosity because no one in his right mind would be curious about the reactions of men in a first-line operating room. I was there because this was my trade. I mean my trade is to find out everything it is possible to find out about war: How men react when they are hurt and how surgeons react when they have to work without sleep.

One by one, men were brought in and then a little later brought out again and not once was there a sound in the room except for the crisp directions from the surgeons and, of course, the sound of the guns, if you count that as a sound.

I left when they brought two women in who had been hurt in the bombing of the home for the aged. Both were very old but neither said anything. The wounded don't cry, not even the civilian wounded. But I left.

Outside the night was heavy with darkness. Except, of course, for the

(Continued on page 41)

They brought in a huge Senegalese and his eyes glanced at the wall. Mickey Mouse was playing there

The Gag Man

By Michael Foster

ILLUSTRATED BY C. C. BEALL

Tom Berens and his ex-wife. He couldn't breathe in the aura of glamor

He saw her suddenly, standing there. She was tall, in an ermine wrap, and her eyelids were still mysterious

THIS fellow Tom Berens—you know, Mona Karrow's ex-husband—had lived in his house all winter before he met even his next-door neighbor.

He was standing at the foot of his garden one evening watching a cold February sunset, lemon-yellow with a bright gold bar, behind the hill. The thickets, which for months had been hard and bare against the snow, were smoky now with the first dimness of approaching spring. Hearing a footfall, he turned sharply just as a man walked out of the fir plantation on the other side of the stone wall. He stopped, as if he, too, were startled, and for a moment stood in the darkness of the branches. Then he strolled over to the wall.

"Soon be planting time," he said. He was middle-aged, a big man whose shoulders looked thin under his shabby Norfolk jacket. He was smoking a blackened old brier pipe and the ends of his gray mustache were faintly pointed.

"Oh, yes," Tom said.

The man bent over and picked up a clod, which he crumbled slowly between his long, delicate-looking fingers. It was still crisp with frost. "You a gardener?" he said.

"No," Tom said. "I'm going to try it, though, this spring."

The man dropped the loose earth from his hand and said: "Really?"

"This was my first winter in the country," Tom said. "I've always lived in the city. But I—I thought I'd try gardening this spring." He didn't say that it would be something to fill his empty days, nor that it seemed to be what people did here in this Connecticut countryside—the kind of people he wanted to be, people living quietly and with dignity in the country.

"Ah. Mmm," the man said. "My name's Vibart. I have this place here." He jerked his head back over his shoulder, toward the house which was somewhere beyond the trees.

"Mine's Berens," Tom said, and watched the man's eyes. There was no flicker of recognition at the name, only a cool, evaluating glance as they shook hands. With relief, with an almost childish relief, Tom suddenly felt very friendly toward the man.

"Well, p'raps I can give you some pointers," Vibart said. He glanced at his wrist watch. "It's too late now, but drop over some afternoon and I'll show you how I winter my bulbs. Root cellar south of the house—there's a path."

"Oh. Thank you," Tom said. "I'd like to."

"And look here," Vibart said. "Soon as the frost is out, I'll come over for a day. Help you get things started, anyway." He nodded abruptly and walked away, into the fir plantation.

ON HIS way back to his house, Tom still had the same pleased little glow of friendliness. He didn't know anything about Vibart, except that he had heard somewhere during the winter that the family next door had announced the engagement of a daughter to some man in New York. Then later he'd heard that the engagement had been broken—some sort of scandal, he hadn't paid any attention. But he liked Vibart, and he liked him especially because of the look that had not come into his eyes when he heard the name "Berens."

It was a look that was as familiar as a bunion to Tom; in its primary and crudest form, he had seen it first in Hollywood, after the divorce, and after that it had been almost as bad in New York. And even up here, in Connecticut, people—especially women—looked at him that way when he went into the village after his mail. He had overheard too many scraps of such low-voiced conversations not to know what they said to one another after he had passed: "Why, don't you know who he is? My dear! It's Mona Karrow's ex-husband. . . ." But the worst was when he had heard one pleasant-faced woman whisper to another: "They say he was a Hollywood gag man before she married him. . . ."

The fire was burning brightly in the primrose colors of spring, and the hearth in his library. Tom walked to the desk, where his new play was done of it, was strewn in a disorderly scatter of papers. He picked up the page he had been writing, but he put it down again without reading it. He had a heavy sort of feeling about this play—some very soggy touches with the sickness of defeat. It was dark, ugly writing; probably swung too far toward bitter grandeur out of overcorrection. But there was a gag in it, not a damn' one. He thought. . . .

Gag man. They didn't remember his first play, the one that had taken him to Hollywood. Six years ago; and his play hadn't had any gags in it. It was serious, in the way that serious only when they first began writing, before they began to make a living out of it. And hardly anybody realized how thoughtlessly easy it is for a serious young man to become a wit in Hollywood, where nearly everyone spends too much time in cafes and other people's houses. Because he ought to say something, he made a timid nifty about something or other, and people laugh, and maybe it's printed in one of the leading thirty-two columns—and after that he has a reputation to support. Then, he finds that he can make a very nice living by needing innumerable "funny" scenes. And people begin to laugh automatically at everything he says, he hasn't common sense enough left to get out quickly to get his old job back on the desk of the Tacoma Ledger. . . . I remember, Duck, his Chinaman, appeared in the library doorway to mention that the play was ready.

IT WAS nearly a month before he met his neighbor, Vibart, again. It was a blowy March day. Swinging a Malacca stick, he had trudged up a muddy and muddy country road to a high hill where a sort of informal horse show, an annual neighborhood event, was going on.

Vibart was standing beside a white rail, smoking his pipe and with his hands in the pockets of an old tweed ulster that looked at it had been with the rains of many springtides. Facing him, rocking back on his heels to peer up into that remote, thin face with its slightly twisted mustaches, was a dumpy little man nervously fingering a flower in his lapel: Major W. L. Schauer, the excessively wealthy rather new country gentleman whose interest in horses had made him the chief patron of this annual gentlemen's show.

Tom pulled his upper lip down over a grin of fellow feeling and waited until the major strode horsily away, swinging plump knees with a riding crop. Then Tom started to go forward with a deliberately casual "Hello, Mr. Vibart." But he stopped suddenly, in mid-stride, almost in mid-breath. Because a girl had turned to Vibart and said in a clear voice: "You know, Dad. That colt Prell's. Shows his conquistador strain. A girl who had been standing a little way apart, her hands shoved deep in the pockets of a brown polo coat, pointed old felt hat with a pheasant feather in it pulled low over her eyes.

"Conquistador. Yes," Vibart said, turning. He saw Tom and nodded.

"Hello, Berens," he said.

The girl turned too, and looked at Tom. (Continued on page 26)

He fought deliberately, emptying his revolver to good effect before they had him fast

Dusk to Daybreak

By Will F. Jenkins

ILLUSTRATED BY MARIO COOPER

Freedom comes, but only for a brief interlude, to a man who has spent his lifetime in search of it

THEY caught General Moreno at dusk, neatly wiping out his cavalry escort with a blast of rifle fire from ambush and laying hands upon him after he had freed himself from his stricken horse. At that he fought deliberately, emptying his revolver to good effect before they had him fast. But when it was not dignified to struggle further. He submitted composedly when the raiding party gagged him in preparation for the dash back through the lines of his own troops.

He was composed as he was rushed through the deepening darkness toward the lines and the headquarters of his enemy, the dictator. He even found himself taking note, from sheer habit, that Viznega had placed one battery very badly behind that hill crest, and that Cervera's system of outposts was at this one point inadequate.

All of which was futile, but the result of habit. He had, however, no habits to guide him when he was brought bound into the presence of the man against whom he had fought in open rebellion for so many years. The interview was typical both of the dictator and of General Moreno. It was very brief. General Moreno composedly refused to make the craven submission which, in published and publicized form, might have weakened the revolutionary cause a little, but would merely have delayed his own fate by days.

He took the expected sentence of death without emotion, and without any sign of unease he accompanied his guards to the cell in which he was to wait for sunrise. There they released his arms. He thanked them politely and waited, standing, for them to leave him.

WHEN he was alone he flexed his muscles, cramped by the hours of their fettering. Then he lighted a cigarette and sat down comfortably on the cot in his death cell. He was grateful that at least they had given him cigarettes. He had several hours yet, and it occurred to him as an amusingly ironic fact that these next few hours would be the only ones in years when he was really free. Free of the demands of duty as he conceived it and of the requirement that he make innumerable decisions, whose importance now seemed to have been considerably exaggerated.

He looked at his watch. Not anxiously. It was simply interesting to reflect that he had six—seven and a half hours of absolute freedom from any conceivable demands. Freedom. It was quaint. He had fancied, all these years, that he was fighting for freedom. And all the while that he fought for freedom he was not himself free. He was bound in chains as confining as the utmost tyranny could impose. And now that he was caught and was to be shot in a relatively few hours he felt an expansive leisure, a restful liberation from all obligations to be omniscient or indomitable or persuasive or stern. He had no longer to accomplish the almost impossible with the wholly inadequate, on pain of defeat for his followers with all its consequences. He was—to be brief about it—as free as any man can be in a stone cell some six feet by ten and with only a little over seven hours to live.

The cigarette smoke was soothing. He understood, suddenly, the enjoyment with which he had seen other men smoke even at the last instant with their hands tied behind their backs—even sometimes after the blindfold had been put on and they were waiting for the firing squad's volley. They had nothing more to worry about. They did not have to think or plan. They had literally nothing to do but enjoy themselves, to savor the feel of living—and

(Continued on page 49)

Nickel Empire

By C. M. Black

Every summer millions of dollars pour into gay, noisy Coney Island, the biggest, gaudiest amusement park in the world, where it's fun to be fooled and a nickel is money

PHOTOS FOR COLLIER'S BY IFOR THOMAS

Part of the 3½-mile boardwalk and the beach at Coney Island. As many as 1,000,000 people may visit them on a summer Sunday. Below, the Island at night, with steep roller coasters and the giant Wonder Wheel dominating CONEY ISLAND operates the well-known theory of salaried ship that people like to be entertained—if it doesn't cost them too much. Every summer 300,000 people visit the Nickel Empire every day, and on gala occasions as July Fourth and Memorial Day a million men, women, children and dogs came to the two-mile strip of sand that has been the world's largest amusement park for more than fifty years.

Last summer a city editor and a young, conscientious reporter to Coney Island to get a story. "Take your hat," he said, "go on every ride in the park. Eat your heads off and write a story about what happened. And be sure to keep track of your expenses."

The reporter and his wife enjoyed their assignment. They went for a walk, visited Steeplechase, threw hoops, played with china dolls, rode the roller coaster, and munched happily on hot dogs and ice cream the while. Back at the office the reporter wrote his story and then itemized his expense account. It came to $1.00. That is part of Coney Island's story. A nickel goes a long way on Surf Avenue. Visitors coming to New York for the first time may forget to see the Metropolitan Museum, the Polo Grounds, the Hayden Planetarium and the LaGuardia Airport, but they never forget to see Coney Island.

Coney was once the greatest gambling place in the East, and three-card monte men plied their persuasive trade to the splitting profits with neighboring gamblers, spiritual ancestors of the modern racketeer of today. Today not a card is turned and the only wheel that spins is the Ferris wheel.

Once upon a time Coney Island featured the ultimate in undraped entertainment. Today not a strip tease, even a seminude show is allowed—by law but by edict of the concession owners themselves. That is the strange, contradictory two-mile-long strip of sand which is Coney Island.

Playground for the Millions

Suppose we take a walk down Surf Avenue, the Island's Main Street, where we find seven hundred of the nine hundred assorted amusements at Coney Island. It's noisy and it's crowded and it's alive. There are barkers and blarney men, merry-go-rounds whirling, the calliopes that call attention to the games, and the shrill songs. In the heart of Surf Avenue, running parallel to it is the Bowery. Properly, the Bowery is not a street at all, but an alley ten blocks long, and its only traffic is people. Old people, young people, fat people, thin people; sailors on leave; whole families out for a day's fun. In back of the Bowery is the Atlantic Ocean, two miles of which belong absolutely to the Nickel Empire.

The boardwalk, thronged with half a million people on a warm Sunday, runs all the way from Sea Gate to Brighton Beach—a distance of three and a half miles. This year it's bigger and better than ever. Robert Moses, the genius who builds highways, beaches and parks for New York on practically a moment's notice, took a week off last winter to build and enlarge the boardwalk. Like everything else at Coney Island, it's the biggest in the world.

Between the boardwalk and the Bowery is the Wonder Wheel—you guessed it—it's the largest. You get in a swinging compartment and are hoisted

(Continued on page 24)

Steeplechase Park provides a vast number of thrills on one admission

Light in the Window

By Octavus Roy Cohen

He was tall and blond, and against a lighter background—that of a glittering night club, for instance—you have said that she was beautiful. The patch of sunlight that shone over the roofs of adjoining houses was not merciful. It showed that he was no longer young, and that he was a heavy-set man in the faded red shirt stretched his legs comfortably in doing so, flipped back his head so that she could see the police in his vest. His words were enough, but his manner was unimpressive. He said, again, "It doesn't matter to me if you play or not, Rita. It's the percentage in not stringing me along with me?" He said sharply: "I'm not ratting on you and that's final." "You know where he is." "It's my idea. You were his gal, weren't you?" "I suppose I was, that don't prove anything." "I never said it did. I'm only asking you to get you. I'm asking why you got a guy you'll never see again. He may tie up with some dame somewhere, sometime—but it'll never happen. You're out of the picture from now on—because you'll be watched, makes you bad medicine for him. It doesn't seem reasonable you'd be crazy about a guy that bumped you off—for dough." "I said he didn't do it." "Steve Mason said flatly, 'He did it, Rita. I saw the shooting myself. Why I'm so anxious to pick him up.' I said, 'I don't wonder. You drift an arm time to see a man murdered in a satchel of money grabbed. But he gets away. Smart dick you are.' He nodded placidly. 'Have your gun, Rita. I've learned to take it. The cops been ribbing me plenty down at headquarters. The chief has been giving me hell. I've got everything it takes to convict Eddie—except Eddie. I want to nab him. Which is half the battle. I'd be sitting pretty if I could nab him. Which is half the battle. I'm talking turkey to you. The other half is the dough. I could use five hundred and dollars. And from what I see of his hard eyes swept the room—he could use the same amount.' He said, 'You're wasting your time.' But Steve Mason wasn't so sure about that. He kept plugging. 'He was your sweetie. So what? He was the first, and he wouldn't have the last.' 'I skip it. I was crazy about Eddie.' 'That was before he had somebody.' 'I seated herself and leaned forward. The gray-green eyes were hard calculating. She said, 'I ain't having any—but I'm curious. What's your plan?' 'You can get in touch with him . . . no, I'm mind denying it. Call it a guess. You want, but let it ride that way for a while. So you do. You tell him you want to see him, you tell him it's safe. He'll come to see you and I pick him up.' 'And then?' 'My own testimony would convict him. I seen him do that shooting. And the chances are a hundred to one he'd have the gun on him."

She gave a short, derisive laugh. "How'd you figure that one out?"

"Easy. Eddie'd come to see you, but he'd come heeled. And I'm playing the hunch that he's still got the gun he used on that messenger. If I'm wrong, we've still got him hooked. If I'm right, a ballistics test will clinch it. I get the ten thousand reward, and give you half." He puffed deeply. "It adds up fine."

She said, "I'd feel pretty lousy, doing something like that."

His eyes bored into her. "If I was you—I'd do it." He rose and shrugged into his coat. "I'll be drifting, Rita. If five thousand cold cash don't mean anything to you . . ."

"But it does!" she broke out suddenly. "I've scrimped and suffered and half-starved for so long. Damn it, you've got no right putting me on the spot this way. You got the cards all stacked against me."

"Uh-huh," he agreed mildly. "I'm trying to deal myself the winning hand. Only I'm cutting you in. So for the last time: 'Is it Yes or No?'"

She walked to the window and looked down on the shabby vista of family washing, garbage barrels, unkempt housewives and ill-clad, noisy children. She hated the whole thing. No decent clothes. None of the things a girl wants—especially a girl who was created to look pretty and to have fun. She snapped around suddenly and said:

"I'm playing it your way. What do I do now?"

Steve Mason was too smart to show his elation. His voice remained calm and unemotional. He said: "Get in touch with Eddie. Tell him you got to see him—here."

WITH Eddie's arms around her, this way, she could look straight into his eyes. Just the same height, they were, which made him kind of short for a man. Short and slender. You couldn't feel his arms around you, and see those eyes of his, and believe he'd ever killed anybody. You couldn't believe anything about Eddie that wasn't all right.

Steve Mason knew what she was thinking. He knew women could go blah all of a sudden: change their minds and do crazy things. So he stepped out of the kitchenette and grabbed Eddie. He said, "Jig's up, kid—so take it easy."

Eddie backed away. He put his hands up defensively, and Steve Mason acted. He said, "No, you don't . . ." and he swung. His fist caught Eddie high on the forehead and Eddie went down. Hard.

Steve was on top of him, there on the floor. Eddie couldn't do anything about it, but he tried. They wrestled around, and Rita screamed, and then something clicked and when Steve got up, there were cuffs on Eddie's wrists.

"Get tough with me," grunted Steve. "I'll show you. . . ."

There was a banging on the door and Rita opened it. Three men barged in, and Steve said, "Hello, boys. What gives?"

The other three plain-clothesmen looked at him and said that was just exactly what they wanted to know, too.

"This is Eddie Gregor." Steve explained. "He's the guy I saw bump off that messenger a couple months back."

Detective-sergeant Wallen said yes, he guessed it was—and all the time Eddie was trembling and Rita was standing there tense and rigid.

Wallen said, "You sure this is the guy, Steve?"

"Positive. I saw him do the shooting and run away. I been laying for him." He even smiled a little. "Why don't you search him?"

THEY searched him. Wallen himself found the gun. He held it in the palm of his hand and showed it to the others.

"That'll be the clincher," exulted Steve Mason. "I'm betting that's the gun that killed the messenger."

Wallen nodded. "I think you got something there, Steve." He shook his head slowly. "There's only one hitch. We got this gun off Eddie, but it don't belong there."

"How about talking some sense," suggested Steve.

"All right. Try to answer this one. Me and the boys brought Eddie right to this door. We frisked him thorough. He didn't have any gun on him. Now we find one. What does that mean to you?"

Steve Mason felt cold inside. He said, in a voice that was not too assured, "What is this: a gag?"

"No-o. I wouldn't call it that. But since we're all sure that a test will prove that this gun killed the messenger, we got to ask where it came from. Eddie didn't have it when he came in here, and—"

Rita said, "That's why Mason slugged Eddie and jumped him. He planted the gun when they were wrestling around on the floor."

"Nice figuring," said Detective-sergeant Wallen. "In fact, you've played a neat game all 'round, Rita. We know that Steve saw the shooting because he said he did. That plants him at the scene. Now we've tied him up with the gun—and cleared Eddie at the same time. . . . And you and Eddie—you've got a neat slice of coin coming."

They took the cuffs off Eddie, and he put his arms around Rita. He didn't look like anybody you might have suspected of murder, because he was crying and he didn't care who noticed. Sergeant Wallen said: "Look, Rita—you played it straight across the board, and you won. But what made you so sure Steve Mason would try to plant the gun on Eddie?"

Her eyes flicked Steve Mason. "He just the same as told me so," she explained, "when he wanted to bet that Eddie would have the gun with him. I've had a tough time, Sergeant, but right along I've managed to think straight when it concerned Eddie. You see, the trouble with Steve is that he knows a lot of things . . . but he's awful dumb about a woman in love."

"You've got no right putting me on the spot," she said. "You got the cards all stacked"

Girl from Home

By Henry Meade Williams

ILLUSTRATED BY HENRY HEIER

A small-town boy finds what makes a big-town romance—a pretty girl

HUGH BARLOW walked across his room in the Hotel Randon—once, twice—and then stopped at the writing desk. On the green blotter his notebook was opened to a page on which was written: "Dora Appleby—ASHland 6-3246." He picked it up, looked at it, chucked it down. He stretched and walked to the window.

Already the sun, at eight o'clock in the morning, was so hot he could feel its reflected waves from the red tin roof of the short buildings two floors below him. A July haze dulled the line of buildings down Eighth Avenue. From across the Hudson River the wind carried the oily smell of factory metal.

Hugh Barlow looked out on the city. "Hi, New York!" he said.

Last night from the Chicago plane he had seen the World's Fair on flat Long Island. Two men and their wives clicked tongues over the color arrangement of the Fair. "What will they think of next!" Hugh Barlow said to the stewardess. "How are the crowds? Still packing them in?" People from his country in Iowa made him feel solid with the city idea—made him feel that his twice-yearly business trips to the city admitted him into the ways of the city. The stewardess said, "Oh, yes, Mr. Barlow," and looked at him as a woman looks at a fine horse. Last night the telephone operator in the hotel remembered his voice and said so with warmth. That was when he was calling Ed Manton's home.

Manton had purred in his thick voice that he was damn' glad to hear from Hugh Barlow. "Come around to the office at four tomorrow—something big is stirring for you, old man."

The third time Hugh walked across the green rug of the hotel room, he picked up the notebook and brought it to the telephone on the table beside his bed. He sat down on the edge of the mattress, and lifted the phone.

Four days ago in Clinton, Iowa, he had stood in Martin Appleby's drugstore and promised the little gray man that he would look up Dora, Martin's only daughter who had gone to the city two years before. "You won't forget this time, will you, Hugh? Just call her up and see how she's getting on, will you?" And Hugh remembered that he had thought then, as he listened to Martin talk, that he'd call her up, find out how she was and let it go at that. Why should he waste his time with a home-town girl while he was in New York?

He heard the brisk, airy voice of a girl say in a hurry, "Hello!"

"Dora. This is Hugh Barlow, you remember, from Clinton? I'm in town on business and—"

"Why, Hugh Barlow!" The voice changed, became intimate. "Of course I remember. I'm so glad to hear from you."

Her voice now helped him to remember her—the little blond head busy with high-school things—the sudden way of looking around to catch you looking at her. She had hero-worshiped him as the great football player and she wrote about him in the school paper.

Hugh recognized a catch in her conversation which told him that she was afraid of being too enthusiastic. So she added more carefully, "Why don't you drop around this afternoon—if you're not too rushed?"

AS HE heard her words, Hugh let his mind pick its way to a decision he knew he had already made when he first heard her voice vibrate in the darkness of the receiver against his ear. But, after he hung up, he didn't think about her again until about four o'clock that afternoon when he was in Ed Manton's office. He had called on Johnson Carr & Company in the Graybar Building and had kidded with Donald Streeter, the sales manager. Hugh had bought, on October delivery, about ten thousand dollars' worth of glassware and chinaware for his people, Ericson & Livermore—the BIG store of Clinton. He had lunched with Dunlop's man at the Brayton and had defended old man Ericson's conservative policy. Hugh Barlow put loyalty above everything.

The reason Hugh remembered Dora was a chromium paperweight in the shape of the Trylon and Perisphere on Manton's desk. Before he had started talking to her that morning, he had thought that maybe he would take her to the Fair, which he hadn't seen yet, and in that way kill two birds with one stone.

Manton sat on the edge of his desk, swinging his round, short-shinned legs, his gray eyes studying Hugh. Finally he said, "Look, Hugh, I mentioned last night on the phone about something big. Remember? Well, it came about this way." He smoothed down the light gray vest of his suit, which fitted tightly over his stomach. Then he looked at Hugh Barlow.

He began talking. He pushed his words slowly, feeling his way, as a man works gently toward a skittish horse. He told Hugh Barlow that he and Connett, the head of L. J. Connett Company, had watched him grow into a man who knew his way around—who had lost the wide-eyed glimmer of the Midwesterner. "Hugh," Manton said, "things are breaking pretty good for Connett & Company."

It took Manton ten minutes by the clock on his desk to get to the point. And then it came as gently as a sleepy dog poking its nose into your hand.

"So," Manton concluded, "we're holding out a block of stock for you. It's sort of in recognition of our three years' association."

The two men regarded each other silently for a minute. Then Manton said casually, "It's about five thousand dollars in stock."

Hugh whistled. He looked at Manton. Manton said, "Well?"

Hugh Barlow said, without thinking, said instinctively, as he might act if he saw a man about to beat a dog, "Thanks, I guess not, Ed."

Manton's eyebrows went up. "Be a fool, Hugh," he said gently; then, "Of course, you could register stock in some name other than Leaves you free to serve Ericson—out prejudice."

"That's right," Hugh said, "but I'm sort of funny that way. It was nice of you and Connett to think—"

"Suit yourself," Manton said, "hard feelings, heh, Hugh?"

They went down to the bar Comando and drank Scotch. Manton told Barlow that the L. J. Connett Company had a swell exhibit at the World's Fair. "Run out tomorrow at ten. L. J. will be there with me. I'll have a couple of passes left for you at the hotel," Hugh said, "Good—I'd like that." They went to work on an order for immediate delivery to the Ericson & Livermore Co., in Clinton, Iowa. It was a solid, well-balanced order—typical of Hugh Barlow's usual orders.

An hour later, Hugh Barlow, one hundred and eighty pounds, solid, burned, long-striding, left the bar Comando. He walked to the East 100th Street address and pushed the little

He saw Doris leaning against the pillow, looking at him. For a second, he saw a curious, astray expression on her face. Then she smiled at him quickly disk below the neat calling card bearing the name, "Miss D. Appleby." The disk clicked and he shoved it open into a doorway smelling of carpets.

She was standing outside her apartment on the third floor. She was wearing one of those little-girl things—gingham skirt that was full and a fun old-fashioned-looking shirtwaist, and her honey-colored hair was piled into a knot on the top of her head. She said, "Well, Hugh Barlow, I thought you never come. Did you get lost?"

He laughed and took her hand. "Not in little old New York," he said. "I swell to see you, Dora."

He saw her glance quickly at him and he thought he saw color come into her cheeks. "Oh," she said, "Dora! I gave up Dora long ago. It seems so funny to hear someone call me that. It's Doris now. Don't you like that better?"

Hugh said he thought he did, but Doris was all right out in Clinton.

She smiled. She looked pretty when she smiled.

"Come in," she said, "I have cocktails waiting. You do drink cocktails?"

HE MUST have shown his surprise, for Doris put her hand on his arm and said, "You're the same Hugh Barry, aren't you? Always thinking I am a kid. That's because I was two years below you in High."

It was a small room with lots of things in it. Fragile, useless things—easily knocked over. Aluminum and glass figurines, colored leather chairs, a coffee table with woven grass coasters. There was a smell of cigarette smoke and powder.

Hugh said politely, "You have a nice place here, Doris."

"I like it . . . What'll you have to drink, Hugh?"

For the first time he noticed the three glasses set out on the coffee table. He said, "I'd better stick to Scotch. I've been absorbing it pretty steadily this afternoon talking business."

Doris stepped into the kitchenette.

On the wall over the sofa Hugh saw a striking photograph of Doris—one of those with a very black background, very white flesh, curiously lighted from below. He went over to the wall and looked closely at the picture. "Who's the candid camera around here?" he asked.

"That?" Doris came out with a tall glass tinkling on the tray. "Wade Sturgess did it. Do you like it?"

"Sure. It's all right."

"Wade's one of the best of the younger

(Continued on page 43)

COMEBACK

By Kyle Crichton

IF THE audience will kindly refrain from breaking down in maudlin gulps of sentimentality, we will tell you the story of Bill DeLancey, the man who came back. This is not an ordinary comeback—some player who was shunted off to the Nebraska State League and then recalled in time to win the world series for the Yankees. DeLancey is the first man in history who ever conquered a lung disease and returned to active service in the big leagues.

His previous period of servitude in the prison camp of the St. Louis Cardinals ended in 1935 when he blew up with a loud report and was lugged off to Arizona on a shutter. This is no mere form of rhetoric; he was on a stretcher when he landed in Phoenix. He stayed in bed the next eight months without putting foot to the floor. Some specialists say he had tuberculosis; others maintain that it was a bad case of pleurisy. In any event it was pleurisy of such virulent nature that he had to be tapped and drained every second day for the next four years.

When Bill DeLancey was carried off to Arizona on a stretcher five years ago no one expected to see him in a baseball uniform again. But he's back and we hope he stays.

This spring, when he reported to the Cards camp at St. Petersburg, only Pepper Martin and Joe Medwick remained of the fabulous 1934 Gas House Gang that licked Detroit in a tumultuous seven-game series in the world classic and almost chased the Tigers into Lake Michigan in the deciding game. Delancey was a first-year wonder on that outfit—a player who came up from Columbus and became first-string catcher almost immediately, something unknown in major-league annals. He handled the shots of Dizzy Dean, Paul Dean and Wild Bill Hallahan, whanged the apple for a season record of .317 and was accounted the find of the year.

Along about the middle of the 1935 season, he began to feel woozy. His pep was gone, he couldn't eat, he couldn't sleep. But he pushed himself through the season and it was only when he was fooling around in a post-season game with a bunch of kids at Westville, Illinois, the home town of his wife, that the blow fell. It was a hot day, Bill was pitching and it went to sixteen innings. He became overheated, caught cold and it developed into pneumonia.

"Everybody thinks that game did it," says Bill, "but I know now it had been coming on for months. If it hadn't been that, something else would have smacked me."

The newspapers toyed around with the idea that Bill would be on hand for spring training in 1936 but instead he was resting on the back of his neck in Phoenix and the outlook was dark. One lucky break was the fact that Branch Rickey, general manager of the Cardinal chain, had been through the mill with tuberculosis himself. On one of his trips west he stopped in to see DeLancey. "Don't you say a word," he admonished Bill. "I'll do all the talking."

A Break for Bill

So Rickey sat on the edge of DeLancey's bed and talked for five hours straight, relating his own story, discussing baseball, letting fall advice about life. "Never gave me a bit of hope," says Bill. "Just sorta let it drop that if somebody could do it, maybe somebody else could."

The Cards were not paying anything toward Bill's keep and medical expenses and the $10,000 he had saved from his salary and world series cut was going fast, so it was something of a break for him when St. Louis took over the club at Albuquerque in the Arizona-Texas League and put DeLancey in as manager. That was two years after he reached Phoenix and, in the meantime, he had bought himself a little ranch and was raising chickens and growing grapefruit. He was able to be halfway active but the pleurisy and the tappings went on and he was as much surprised as the next one when the baseball offer came.

Albuquerque turned out to be a great town. In his last year there, 1939, the home admissions were 110,000 in a town of 35,000 population, an entirely remarkable record. What gave Bill hope about himself, however, was that he could keep up with the road trips of the club. In the circuit were Tucson, Bisbee and El Paso. The shortest jump was to El Paso, three hundred miles away. From Albuquerque to Tucson was a mere jaunt of five hundred miles.

taken in a bus with the Southwest beating down.

"Three hundred and fourteen in shade," reports DeLancey. "I know I lived through that, I could stand anything."

DeLancey ran a temperature streak that first year but only missed one on the coaching lines. He occasionally took batting practice with the team in 1937, but it was August in 1938 when he shoved his nose into a box score and slammed one up against the fence and drove in two runs at El Paso, winning the game. It would have been a lot more if he barely walked down to first base. After that he did a few more stints as pinch hitter but otherwise confined his occasional appearances to work on the mound after a game was beyond repair. It was a stunt by Bill, intended for clowning purposes exclusively.

His greatest discovery at Albuque was Bobby Sturgeon, who picked up by DeLancey at the Samento camp at the age of fifteen was later sold by the Cards to the cago Cubs for a reported $35,000. I who is now with DeLancey on the Louis club, was another find.

On the Road Back

When the 1939 season ended he had thoughts only for his managing in Albuquerque. Rickey would come at intervals but he never said anything about the big leagues. Then, during winter, Bill saw an item in the paper that said the Cardinals were considering bringing him back for a tryout. There had been stories of this kind every since he had left but DeLancey decided this time he'd try to get in shape for a comeback. He set himself a regimen of training. For two weeks he walked ten miles every day. It was tough at first but it got easier. Encouraged by this Bill started running two miles a day. On the second day, he collapsed and was barely able to get back home.

"I thought that was the end," he said. "I lost my nerve completely."

He was in bed for ten days and kept from writing Rickey that he couldn't come back only by the fact Rickey had never urged him to come. Eventually he regained his confidence and started training again. Then he wrote Rickey, asking for a chance.

"I'd been hoping you'd do that," answered Rickey. "I've talked it with Sam Breadon and he says right."

The hardest thing he encountered in training camp were the sympathetic looks of his teammates. Most of the rookies had never heard of him and the old-timers had to be shown before they would believe he could do it. Because they were afraid if they talked about his case it would only make it worse for him, they said nothing about it.

"That really made it tough," says Lancey.

The first day out, tragedy over-him when the middle finger of his thing hand was stove in by a pitch-thing like that wouldn't happen to a player once in a lifetime. In his an-to look good, he got his meat harahead of the glove.

"Couldn't have done anything but if I tried," says Bill sorrowfully. "I could barely throw as far as the pitcher's box; when I tried to hit, I couldn't hit the bat."

(Continued on page 53)

Rain Before Seven

by John August

ILLUSTRATED BY C. C. BEALL

History Thus Far:

Caleb Thatcher, of Wallisport, Massachusetts, is fighting on the Loyalist side in Spain, he and his closest friend, Bert Hendricks, have a narrow escape when a Nazi columnist—one Heinemann—betrays them to the enemy. They vow that, if they ever have the chance, they will kill Heinemann.

After the war ends, Caleb returns to Wallisport. There he presently falls in love with Hope Shaler, who is engaged to John Gabriel, the wealthy head of a machine-tool company which is feverishly filling war orders for the U.S. Jealous of Caleb, and regarding him as a dangerous "Red," Gabriel decides to get rid of him.

An opportunity comes (so he thinks) after Bert Hendricks comes to Wallisport for a labor union. Seeing Bert and Caleb together frequently, he suspects that they are part of a Communist conspiracy. Then, when one of his factory buildings is burned, he accuses Hendricks of incendiarism. But before the police can arrest Caleb's friend, Caleb (assisted by Hope) enables him to make his getaway.

Meanwhile, Natalie Gabriel (the widow of John's brother) has become infatuated with Greg Ashburn, a British industrial spy, who has inveigled her into giving him copies of important secret documents entrusted to John in Washington. . . .

Bert Hendricks is murdered. The authorities claim that he has been drowned. But, having learned that Heinemann has come to Massachusetts, Caleb knows that the police are wrong. He feels certain that Heinemann has killed Bert. He feels sure, furthermore, that the police have burned Gabriel's building, and that they are now on the trail of Greg Ashburn.

When, accompanied by Hope (to whom he has told everything) he calls on John Gabriel and informs him of his suspicions, his suspicions, Gabriel refuses to believe him. A quarrel ensues. Hope takes Caleb's side. She and John exchange sharp words. In the end, realizing that she has fallen in love with Caleb, she breaks her engagement to John.

Knowing that Greg Ashburn is in peril, Caleb tells the Englishman of Heinemann's presence, warns him to be careful. Then, alone with Hope, he discusses the situation with her. He knows that he may be murdered if he remains in Wallisport. She urges him to go away with her. But Caleb refuses to run away to safety. And Hope guesses the truth: Caleb Thatcher is going to kill a man!

VIII

THE undertaker's chapel was hideous in its good taste, and exactly twenty people were there. Caleb was with two pallbearers—had he been to Boston?—and except for Hope and Aunt Elinor the others must be from the neighborhood. The service was mercifully brief, three cars followed the hearse to the cemetery, and with Aunt Elinor's hand on her arm Hope stood beside the grave and watched the coffin lowered into it. She reached blindly for Caleb when he came up and his hand steadied her. She said to Aunt Elinor, "Will you drive your car home if I walk her for a while?" Aunt Elinor would be glad to, and they turned away from the grave, strolling slowly down the exquisitely landscaped path where Wallisport would call it the final resting place of Caleb to bury Bert. Hope said, "I'm all right," and in a way she was, for agitation had become the normal thing. Caleb said, "Sure, but you

(Continued on page 32)

In the unalloyed horror of that moment, nothing was clearer than that she really desired that kiss

Caught with Our Guard Down

By Walter Davenport

DOWN Main Street again comes the National Guard. They're pale, perhaps, but it's sunlight they lack, not valor. They're on the scrawny side, but wait a few weeks. Their hats seem too big and their uniforms too small, but that's because they don't know how to wear them. After a month or so in camp they'll mend all that. They are short of the stride and shy of the swing that marks the old soldier, but what do you want? They're clerks and salesmen, bakers and bookkeepers; they're boys out of high school and bellhops and what not.

They're what the brass-and-leather General Staff of the United States Army solemnly calls sixty per cent of our Initial Protective Force. And in that youthfully awkward column stumping down Main Street there are kids who don't know a right flank from a right turn. Give them time, give them time and they'll tell Hitler how to run a blitzkrieg.

Tomorrow, perhaps, they'll be on their way to a Texas town to live by the bugle, to sleep under canvas, to learn discipline by the numbers, how to kill by machinery. Suddenly they're men. That queer something that gets into a man when the uniform's on has straightened their backs and squared their shoulders. Already their eyes are clearer because they're looking toward something they never believed they'd see. You see for yourself—the kid from the farm, the factory, the WPA. A new and resolute glower on his clerkish face, a pack on his back, a couple of beers in his belly, a Testament and four chocolate bars in his pockets. Well, he's ready to march off to war or whatever.

He's less prepared than his old man who marched off like this in 1917. Almost half a million guys like the old man went off then in the National Guard. Two out of every five divisions we sent to France to make the world safe for democracy were militia kids like this. The overwhelming majority of them saw active service in the actual firing line with what the General Staff's writers of militarese call "some expenditure of personnel." Of the nearly forty thousand Yanks killed outright, they furnished a third.

And when they marched off twenty-three years ago they were unprepared—soft as flounders, underarmed, innocently proud of antique weapons and blissfully ignorant of anything better. The kids on Main Street now, the kids who may be jerked tomorrow out of their jobs and classrooms to be hammered into warrior men, are even less prepared. In the past few months even the General Staff has been throwing away their textbooks—almost throwing up their hands. When the old man went to war it was all man power. Napoleon stuff. But war has become wheels and gears, wings and gasoline, bombs and shells that make the First World War little-boy stuff.

And don't forget—out of those armory warehouses of amateur soldiers is coming sixty per cent of our Initial Protective Force. They've got to be good. What we're going to arm these militiamen with nobody knows. There are 251,000 of them, men and officers. Starting this minute, eastern daylight saving time, it will take a year and maybe two to equip these militiamen that they might be something more than a wide-open target for an up-to-date enemy. Maybe they don't know it and you may be sure they don't give a damn. It would take that long to fix up our regulars with weapons that would give the invader pause. And if the day should come when the General Staff's M-Day mobilization of all the country's youth is the law of the land—heaven knows what we'll do. That would mean 4,800,000 more kids to arm. And ten million more to come. And in all our Initial Protective Force today—the militia you see there on Main Street and the regulars scattered far and wide in Army posts—there's but one honestly mechanized fighting unit. It's a mere brigade, a third of a division. Even Holland was better off than that.

Even the Army regulars, looking down their noses at the National Guard amateurs, have to admit they are two thirds of our "Initial Protective Force." In double-quick time they'll be ready and willing to fight, too—but with what nobody knows. They have only a handful of guns and equipment and in the whole Guard there is but one honestly mechanized unit. Even Holland was better fixed for defense

There are eighteen divisions of this National Guard of ours. They're scattered helter-skelter from Walla Walla to Key West. Later on we'll sketch out for you what they're lacking. But for the moment be satisfied with the hollow voice of General Marshall, the Army's Chief of Staff. "National Guard Divisions are now tied immobile to the ground. They cannot maneuver as divisions. They cannot take the field as such. And yet they are a part of the Initial Protective Force which we must be able to move in an emergency."

Tomorrow They'll Be Heroes

Yesterday the regulars looked down their military noses at these Main Street grenadiers. Yesterday, before the fear began to sour your stomach, you laughed as you talked of tin soldiers and postgraduate boy scouts. You'll not laugh now. You'll be loading them with gifts and food and knitting them woollies and writing them mash notes. And the regulars will be telling the editors what remarkable lads these tenderfeet are.

What was it that the valorous Mussolini called them? Oh, yes—"Playboys who specialize in picnics." And not that Little Caesar was altogether wrong. For years they drilled but forty-eight periods a year exclusive of summer encampments. As often as not the periods were less than an hour each. Of late they've been drilling sixty hours a year and their summer picnics lasted three weeks instead of two.

If the dauntless Duce wants a real

The National Guard goes over the top, each man armed to the teeth with an old-style Army rifle and earnest if awkward determination. Below, a little entertainment as the 245th Coast Artillery, N. G., takes the subway to Fort Hancock

laugh he should know that each militiaman costs the federal government the crushing sum of $206 a year—in peacetime. With this they give him two uniforms—one for summer and the other for the winter. It arms him with such weapons as the Army may have to spare, leaving him virtually unarmed. It pays a part of his expenses when he's on maneuvers with the regulars, making the regulars laugh or curse as the mood is on them.

Certain states contribute more generously to the militia's maintenance but others starve him. The National Guard Bureau of the General Staff refuses to specify, but high among the reasons why they've not been able to get the militia off the lower rungs of the efficiency ladder is the persistent refusal of states to co-operate with the military chieftains. Regular Army officers are detailed to the Guard as drill and training instructors. They report increasing order that the amateurs survive their courage poured upon them by state governments. And yet there are hundreds of instances where the military spirit has been so keen that individual members have paid their own expenses of membership. In times like these, however, the lads get smiles. New Jersey, for example, has just appropriated an extra $425,000 to mend the seams of its militia's britches.

Tradition is about the only thing that has held the National Guard together anyway. In the less populous states it is numerically unimpressive. Delaware, for example, has but 900 militiamen. They'd be shuffled into the 44th Division along with some from New Jersey, some Pennsylvanians and New Yorkers.

INTERNATIONAL
Here the 245th Coast Artillery gets down to serious business, with work clothes replacing uniforms as they prepare to load one of the big coast-defense guns at Fort Hancock, N. J.

INTERNATIONAL
Battery C of the 16th U. S. Field Artillery brings up its guns—with horses da's contribution at the moment is 1 and they'll struggle along in the 45th Division. North Dakota has 1,300 men for the 34th Division and New Mexico sends a thousand to the 45th. The big contributors are New York, Illinois, California, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Texas, Michigan and Wisconsin, which is as it could be.

Any time Mr. Roosevelt wants them and if Congress lets him he has only to give the order. The General Staff has their training camps selected. It's going to cost a lot of money to mobilize them and the General Staff wants it understood that any such turnout can't be blamed on them. Merely to provide uniforms the Guard would need to outfit them for active service would cost $5,000,000, and that doesn't include overcoats or blankets. Before the militiamen got to camp that five million dollars would look like the kitty in a high-school poker game. For about a billion dollars the National Guard could be put into fairly adequate fighting shape. And after that the real expense would start. A real war today would cost us about ten times what we had to pay for our part in that 1918 shenanigan.

Here's Where You'll Go

But if you're mobilized, lads, here's where you'll go for hardening. The 26th and the 43d Divisions (Massachusetts and Connecticut) will go to Camp Jackson, South Carolina. The 27th and 44th (New York, New Jersey, Delaware and increments from Pennsylvania and Maryland) to Camp McClellan, Alabama, and Chickamauga, Georgia. The 28th and 29th (Pennsylvania, Virginia and Maryland) to Camp Beauregard, Louisiana, and Fort Eustis, Virginia. The 30th and 31st (Tennessee, the Carolinas, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana) to Fort Benning, Georgia, and Camp Blanding, Florida. The 37th and 38th (Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana and West Virginia) to Camp Shelby, Mississippi, and Fort Knox, Kentucky. The 32d and 33d (Wisconsin, Michigan and Illinois) to San Antonio, Texas, and Fort Clark, Texas. The 34th and 35th (the Dakotas, Missouri, Nebraska and Kansas) to Fort Huachuca, Arizona, and Fort Bliss, Texas.

The 36th and 45th (Texas, Colorado, New Mexico and Arizona) to Camp Hulen and the San Antonio area, Texas. The 40th and 41st (California, Nevada, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Wyoming and Montana) to Camp Merriam and Camp Lewis, California.

And if that happens, you militiamen may as well reconcile yourselves to a lot of changes. You'll probably be triangularized—if there's time. You're going to lose quite a few of your officers, particularly the older line officers who can't take it physically, to make room for sprightly young field marshals from the Reserve Officers' Training Schools and the Citizens' Military Training Schools. There are 60,000 or so of these gentlemen. However, the great majority of this officer material will be saved against the day of conscription—M-Day. But there'll be no Officers' Training Schools as there were in 1917 and 1918. If you go in as a private your chances of emerging a field marshal will be slim and you ought to be glad of it.

You'll get no favors even if Uncle Dan's your congressman. The chances are high that the United States will follow desperate England's example and draft everything in sight from money to monkey wrenches.

What kind of fighting the National Guard will be asked to do will depend on where the fight's held. If the Fighting Ghost of Berchtesgaden gets away with what he's mapped out for himself in Europe and doesn't emerge punch drunk, he may decide to pursue his luck on this side of the Atlantic. As the General Staff and almost everybody else knows, there's no telling what evil tidings Mr. Hitler may have on his mind. He'll probably pay no attention to this bit of advice but we hope he'll be satisfied where he is and be glad it's no worse.

It gets you nowhere in particular to enumerate the equipment shortcomings of the National Guard. If they're mobilized you'll see. If you were to

(Continued on page 52)

"When you report this conversation to him tell him I do not fear him any longer," she said

Occupation: Widow

By William C. White

ILLUSTRATED BY GEORGE HOWE

The Story Thus Far:

ROLF BLAERCHEN and Paul Lesser start a night club, the Krokodil, in Berlin. They employ Carola Dirling, a singer, and Karl Dietrich, a comedian, whose appeal to the public is so strong that the venture is soon a success.

Blaerchen, a Nazi, and Lesser both fall in love with Carola. Lesser wins her, marries her. Then, sent to Warsaw on a mysterious "government" mission, he writes to her and tells her that he does not trust Blaerchen—that he fears he is to be murdered. A short time later, Carola is notified that he has been killed in an automobile accident. She leaves Berlin at once—at about the same time that Karl Dietrich, who has offended the Nazis with his jibes at certain officials, is arrested and sent to a concentration camp.

Three years later, Carola is in Rome when she is approached by a Nazi agent, who informs her that Blaerchen (now a power in the German Foreign Office) has a job for her. He tells her brutally that she must return to Berlin, or else—

Realizing that she will be in peril if she remains in pro-Nazi Italy, she goes to Berlin, reports to Blaerchen, who asks her to lunch with him the following day. Then, at the Krokodil, she encounters Karl Dietrich. Karl, who has just been released from the concentration camp, does not tell her of his misfortunes. They agree to meet for luncheon two days later.

The next day, Blaerchen (now exceedingly prosperous) sends a car for her. She is driven to his beautiful country estate (taken from some wealthy exile) near Berlin. There he greets her, makes clumsy advances. Carola, on guard, asks for information concerning her job. Blaerchen smiles, makes a cryptic reference to "Occupation: Widow." Carola is puzzled. Blaerchen will tell her little other than that she will be expected to accept every invitation she receives, meet all the people she can. And he insists on showing her the estate.

Sizing up her host, as they walk along, Carola thinks that his might be the attitude of an employer; or it might, also, be that of a man who has caught something pleasant and desirable in a clever trap!

II

IN THE late afternoon, after lunch with Blaerchen, Carola sat in her apartment, glad to be alone, freed from the need for pretense. Winter darkness was coming swiftly. As the light dimmed in her deep-set eyes, uneasiness settled on her like a shrinking garment. It tightened as she recalled Blaerchen's vagueness about her work, the touch of his hand, the casually assumed intimacy in his voice. For the hundredth time she told herself that she had had no choice in Rome but to return, that attempting to discover the truth about Paul's death was a real and worthwhile objective. If that were so, then she could endure this cold, lonely and frightening Berlin.

Yet, on every side she was closed in; leaving Blaerchen this afternoon, she had left like a prisoner reaching out and, for the first time, touching the nearness of cold stone walls. The careful thoughtfulness of the man who met her at the train on the first morning might well have been a warden's meticulous attention to a new arrival. Even Blaerchen's order not to see Karl was an instance of restraint. Carola would have liked to see him, to offer sympathy and any help that she could. If he had come out of the concentration camp with hatred, then she might find him a friend when she needed a friend. Yet it would be unwise to disobey Blaerchen. She wrote Karl at once and broke the luncheon engagement.

To shake off her mood she changed from the black crepe dress to her gray flannel suit. In the mirror she looked so young, but with unhappiness firmly on her face that she laughed and applied a powder puff viciously to that would change her expression. Then she put on a little black hat, moving to an impudent angle and revealing a line of golden hair.

A gray tweed coat completed her newish appearance. Hands in her pockets she swaggered a few steps before the mirror. After all, the sense of constraint could be the product of loneliness in a lonely city. Nobody was hindering her from going out where she wished, from going wherever she chose. To prove it to herself, she left the apartment hurriedly. Fear, a few minutes before, seemed ridiculous in the cold, clear air outside.

As she came to the street she saw a man standing near the doorway. Her fears returned with the premonition that he was there to watch her. She walked along for a hundred feet, then looked back. The man was following. She stood still, frightened, but not convinced that an imagined danger would be so quickly real. Then the man turned around. A moment later a large, young woman came from a doorway and joined him. They walked off in an opposite direction, like any respectable middle-aged German couple taking the air.

That, Carola told herself firmly, was enough imagination for the day! She walked on, insisting to herself that she could be less worried if she made the effort.

On Kurfürstendamm the cold east wind of winter moved the crowds quickly. Music from the cafés flooded lightly on the street; that was as it had to be, in this gayest part of Berlin. The absence of traffic noises, the scarcity of automobiles because of gasoline rationing, the way that passers-by pulled on tighter their thin coats around the neck—this was something new, this was part of wartime Berlin.

As Carola passed Café Buda she remembered the time when Paul and Blaerchen and Karl, too, used to gather around the large table in the rear. If Karl was visiting any of his old haunts he would be sure to come here. If he were to happen on him by accident, Blaerchen could not criticize her for that. She entered the café. At first glance nothing had changed; the past three years and the war months might well have been stopped at the door. The same little orchestra was playing the same music, the same sort of people were at the tables, the same sound of conversation splattered on all sides, and the same stout proprietor, Herr Hoyt, was standing near the door, a cross between a brooding hen and a traffic policeman.

Then Carola saw one thing change: the large table at the rear was occupied by strangers.

Hoynig came to her at once: "Fräulein Dirling! It's like old times seeing you here."

"Danke schoen!" She smiled as she followed him to a table. War rationing had not cut into his waistline. She his chatter, then asked casually, "Do any of my old friends come here?"

"Seldom," Hoynig said sadly. "I haven't seen Karl Dietrich, for instance." The question sounded as if they were making conversation. Hoynig frowned and hesitated. "No, I can't come here."

It was just as well not to find him. His manner was suspicious and he probably had reported any such thing. She had to remind herself that in Berlin one could not be too careful. A café employee might be working for the Gestapo. As she sat drinking imitation coffee, she wondered whether the feeling of restraint was just an inevitable reflection of a whole nation under restraint. Eighty million people scarcely two who trusted each other!

A little orchestra turned from a waltz to a tango, one of those old German tangos played by two violins and an accordion, that were popular in 1930. She could bathe in nostalgia in that

Fräulein Dirling?"

Carola turned nervously. She saw a tall, dark, almost tropical face. Around her neck soft fox made her face look stouter. "I'm Senta Mainescu. You'll excuse me, won't you?"

"Don't you sit down?"

"I scarcely believed my eyes! I used to see you so often at the Krokodil and I thought you had left Berlin."

"I have recently returned," Carola said cautiously. "Trust no one! There is something unusual in this woman's behavior."

"It's just by chance that we never met before," Senta said. "I used to know so many of your friends at the Krokodil. I named a half-dozen entertainers. And I knew Rolf Blaerchen, too."

Carola did not comment on that although she felt that she was supposed to. The woman spoke German with an unfamiliar accent that Carola could not place. "You aren't German?"

"I'm Rumanian." Then she continued. "Your departure from Berlin was a loss. We missed your singing."

"Thank you very much."

"I knew of your husband's death. I am so sorry. If you'll pardon me, you have remarried?"

"No." Carola was annoyed at that familiarity.

"I don't suppose you'll return to the Krokodil?"

"No." Carola was more annoyed.

"The whole crowd is broken up," Senta said regretfully. "I don't see any of them any more. Do you?"

"No, none of them." Carola buttoned her coat, ready to leave. She would answer no more questions.

Then, like a lonely woman, Mlle. Mainescu said, "I'd love to talk to you about old times. May I call on you some day?"

"Some day," Carola said vaguely.

The woman insisted on having her address and telephone number.

Carola walked home slowly.

WHEN Blaerchen phoned the next morning, as he always did, Carola said, "I met a friend of yours yesterday, a Rumanian woman named Mainescu."

"Really!" He sounded as if he were pleased.

"She spoke of wanting to call."

"See her, by all means! She's charming!" There was something peculiar in his voice, as if he were trying to stifle sudden laughter. "By all means, see her!"

She began to tidy her apartment, trying to bring some air of intimacy into the old furnished rooms. The echo of Blaerchen's laughter remained—unpleasant, sardonic laughter.

The doorbell rang. A large, round-faced woman asked for her, in the accent of Bavarian speech. "Gut Tag," she said loudly. "My name is Maria Kunkle. I was told you needed a maid and housekeeper."

"Who told you?"

Maria handed a letter to Carola. It read: "I thought you might like someone to do chores for you. You will find Maria most competent. I suggest you employ her." The note was signed by Blaerchen.

Here was living proof of her fear—someone to watch every move, to listen to every telephone call, to report every word overheard. At least, there was no place here for her to sleep. The woman stood confidently, watching Carola reread the note.

"Very well," Carola nodded. "Put your things in the kitchen." . . .

After changing to a uniform, Maria said, "You have a ration card?" Then, briskly, "I'll attend to all the buying. I will get butter, coffee, meat—!"

"Where?" Carola was astounded.

"I have my secrets."

Perhaps that was why Blaerchen had sent her! Such things could not be found in stores by people without connections.

MARIA acted at once like a person taking charge. She asked for instructions, and began to rearrange the kitchen. Carola watched her, all her fears alive again. The woman had a peculiar gait—waddling best described it.

When Carola returned in the afternoon from a walk, Maria was in the living room, smiling. "Look!" In one corner of the room was a small piano.

"Where did that come from?"

An opened envelope and card were on a table. The card was signed "Rolf Blaerchen." The piano did not interest Carola at the moment. She asked coldly, "Do you usually open letters addressed to your employers?"

"No, Fräulein," Maria said, surprised, "but I thought there might be some mistake. You didn't say anything to me about expecting a piano." She pointed to it. "Now you can sing, Fräulein."

Carola turned away, not answering.

"I heard you sing once," Maria said pleasantly. "My husband brought me to hear you. My husband—his name is Fritz Kunkle—said, 'It's our fifth wedding anniversary,' he said, 'and we'll celebrate.' So he said the best place was the Krokodil and he took me there."

Carola was suspicious of the woman's attempt to be friendly.

"My husband's in the army now, but not at the front," Maria smiled. "He's a cook in a barracks at Cologne."

The telephone interrupted her and

(Continued on page 38)

"Look here, Dietrich," Kreitz said, "I don't want any dirty tricks from you, understand?"

ONE bright day, about a year after Mayor Edward J. Kelly received the scrolls of office as Burgo-master of Chicago, a Daily News reporter went to him with the disturbing tidings that the News had found a nest of horse-betting parlors—of all places—in Chicago. Well, you could have knocked Brother Kelly over with a feather. What? Gambling in Chicago? He would not have been more astonished if he had been told that Adolf Hitler's blitz-bombers had just landed behind the lines of Democratic headquarters over in the Morrison Hotel.

"Gambling in Chicago!" exclaimed the mayor to the reporter. "I am surprised there is any gambling in Chicago." Then with a sharper tone he cried: "And I will not countenance it."

It was not long before this that Mayor Kelly, talking to the American Legion, had said with pride: "We have purged the city of gangsters, hoodlums and racketeers. The underworld, realizing that we mean business, has moved to other places."

And now here was the mayor's own City Hall literally encircled by gambling spots; the Hall itself set like a sapphire in a cluster of bookie joints. And no one had even breathed a word of it to the mayor.

And so the question arises—do these official gentlemen in Chicago know what is going on? Or are they just giving us what Mr. Dennis Cooney—the Duke of Madison Street—calls the old razz-ma-tazz.

The visitor to Chicago is not there very long before he becomes aware of a mysterious, shadowy power that everyone speaks about, seems to know about, but actually is unable to describe save in the foggiest terms. It is that invisible, sinister organism known as the Syndicate. Frequently it is referred to as the Capone gang. But that is not satisfactory, for Mr. Capone has not been in Chicago for eight years. It is, however, made up of the men who were what might be called department heads of the old Capone mob—but how changed! It does not ride the highways, throw pineapples, spray machine-gun bullets, bomb homes, murder cops. It doesn't have to.

They Streamlined the Rackets

By the time Kelly became mayor the old gang wars were over. There reigned in Chicago what might be called the Pax Caponeum. That is to say, by a process of elimination nobody was left to contest the supremacy of the Capone mob. The elimination involved some 550 murders in ten years.

Of course the Capones did not do all the killing. There were a number of gangs. They blazed away at one another for ten years, cutting down the competition, eliminating unfair trade practices, delimiting spheres of influence, slowly, but surely, introducing order into that great basic industry of vice in Chicago. By 1933, when the dry era ended, peace had descended on the city—all of the Capone rivals were in heaven or in jail or in other towns or were bums.

Today the Capones are men of different mold. There is gray hair at the temples. Some are bald. An air of sobriety and, in cases, respectability encompasses them. Some of them go to church. They do not appear at first nights or in gaudy night clubs in evening clothes surrounded by bodyguards in Tuxedos. They go to the office during the day; at night they go to their homes, sit in their slippers, read the afternoon papers and wonder what this dreadful world is coming to.

They are in business—all sorts of business. They will sell you firewater or groceries for your home or your bar. They will organize and operate your labor union. They will sell you a drink, a set of dice, a fresh didie for the baby, a bookie bet or a girl.

They have streamlined the racket. It is now a well-organized department store of vice—commercial vice. And they now enjoy the most cordial relationships with powerful figures in the great Kelly-Nash machine. That great party is organized to fight for "Roosevelt and Humanity," as it proclaims, and Humanity has to have its fun. All work and no fun makes Humanity a dull boy.

The machine furnishes the work to fifty or sixty thousand of Humanity and the Syndicate furnishes fun to the balance.

The great problem of Chicago is this invisible alliance between the rulers of the Upper and the Under World.

The Police Do Some Shooting

On December 19, 1932, Detective Sergeant Harry Lang, accompanied by two other officers, walked into the headquarters of the Capone gang at 221 N. LaSalle Street. Capone was in jail, but Frank Nitti, his cousin, known as the Enforcer, was looked upon as the generalissimo of the Syndicate. Nitti had not long before finished serving a sentence in Leavenworth. It was afternoon and Nitti was in the LaSalle Street G.H.Q. when Detective Lang walked in. Lang was the bodyguard of Mayor Anton Cermak. He was sent there by the mayor, he said later, to arrest Nitti, because the mayor believed that Nitti had imported Louis (Little New York) Campagna to kill him. Whatever happened, Lang blazed away at Nitti. His bullet brought the gangster to his knees. Nitti was taken to a hospital, fatally shot, it was supposed. Lang, with a bullet wound in his finger, was also sent to a hospital. Lang said he had fired in self-defense because the gang boss resisted arrest. Nitti recovered and was indicted.

This incident was taken at first as merely one phase of an effort by Mayor Anton Cermak to rid Chicago of the gangsters. There does not seem to be any doubt that Cermak had told various persons he was going to drive the Greaseballs out of Cook County. "Greaseballs" was a term of disparagement applied by the underworld to the Capones. But along that restless whispering gallery—the Loop—certain wise persons began to ask questions. Was Cermak driving the gangs out of Chicago, or just pushing the Capones out to make room for more favored operators?

In good time Nitti was brought to court for trial. The witnesses against him were Lang and his fellow officers. It looked like another ride for the Enforcer. Then swiftly the trial exploded in the most extraordinary manner. The prisoner became the accuser; the accuser became the prisoner. Very quickly it developed that Nitti was unarmed the day he was shot. One of Lang's fellow raiding officers testified that "only one gun was fired and that was Lang's." Then who shot Lang in the finger? "He must have shot himself," said this officer. This knocked the prosecutor back on his heels. When Lang, the accuser, took the stand, he said he had shot Nitti in self-defense and then refused to answer any more questions on the ground that he might incriminate himself. That bowled the prosecutor over so completely that he dropped the case against Nitti. The Grand Jury then indicted

Jake Arvey, No. 3 Kelly-Nash boss. Police Captain Thomas Harrison explained a $10,000 mortgage on his expensive home by saying it had been arranged for him by Arvey

These Our Rules

By John T. Flynn

Sin on a mass-production basis threatens to down even Chicago's traditionally lusty appetite. Here's the whole unsavory picture of its gambling, vice and labor racketeering over which there approvingly the political machine that not makes it possible but thrives healthily on Horse players studying form charts in a bookie parlor. There are over 100 such places surrounding the Chicago City

Owners of the political machine that has engulfed Chicago are County Chairman Pat Nash and Mayor Edward F. Kelly

CHICAGO TIMES

long for assault with intent to kill. He was tried and convicted. But he got a new trial and numerous continuances until the case was allowed to die. He was dismissed from the force. Chicago is used to assassinations. But there was a new one—the police assassinating a gangster. The man biting the hand. And why? Why did the mayor's personal bodyguard want to kill Nitti? Lang was one of the closest men to the mayor and, though a mere detective sergeant, lived in luxury, packed a heavy roll of "frogskins" and, it is said, handled some of the mayor's most intimate money transactions. Strange stories floated around Chicago. One was that Mayor Cermak was loosening the grip of the Capone mob in the gambling racket on the North Side as a starter in order to put the area under the "protection" of Ted Newberry, a former Capone lieutenant. Another was that Newberry had paid Lang to rub out Nitti. Along the whispering gallery the wise guys said that the Capones would have to get Newberry. Certainly somebody did three weeks later. His body was found beside the road. And three weeks after that, the whole city of Chicago was making a martyr's holiday over the body of Anton Cermak, slain in Miami by an assassin's bullet intended for President Roosevelt. The wise guys said Zangara, the assassin, was a Capone stooge. But the evidence is all against that. However, that was the last chapter in the local war against the Capone Syndicate. The new Kelly-Nash machine rose to power. The booze era closed. One by one the Capone gang filtered back into Chicago. And very soon order prevailed in the Loop—the Pax Caponeum was over all.

The precise and intricate relationship of the invisible powers that rule gambling in Chicago are a little confused. The Capone Syndicate is supreme in the Loop and, of course, in Cicero and other outlying places. But there is another syndicate—the Johnson-Skidmore Syndicate. The exact mechanism through which these two machines mesh is not at all clear. But between them both this gambling racket is the richest prize in Chicago.

Mr. Johnson Gets Along

Consider Mr. William R. Johnson. He is perhaps Chicago's premier gambling magnate. Quiet, with that tranquil dignity of the Monte Carlo croupier, with a touch even of the spiritual in his countenance, he is the precise opposite of the brash mobster-businessman of the Guzik type or the meaty, Tammany ward-leader type of his partner, Billy Skidmore, the eminent junkman. Mr. Johnson's home is the lovely Glen Ellyn estate where he lives in the style of a rich English squire. He operates twenty-six gambling rendezvous, some of them palaces like, for instance, the vast Bon-Air Club in an adjoining county.

Mr. Johnson enjoys a high reputation in Chicago. The only thing against his name is his profession, his tax evasion and the fix. But heavens! When was large-scale tax evasion and a bit of bribery a mortal sin in Chicago? And as for gambling, what is wrong with gambling?

And he made, last year, according to our Uncle Sam's auditors, over $900,000. Which is a tidy profit for a purely local enterprise. He has been indicted by the government—and various others with him—for assisting him in evading another $1,877,000 in income taxes.

The government says that Mr. Johnson operated twenty-six places, many of them run by managers who posed as the owners. They made income-tax returns as such, thus getting the benefit of a very much lower rate than if the profits of all the places were lumped and returned as a single income. Millions flow through the hands of these men—checks by the thousands, many of them involving transactions never intended for the light of day. And so, says Uncle Sam, they maintained a currency exchange—a sort of bank—through which these checks could clear more or less anonymously. It's business—big business, business involving millions—and business very strictly against the laws of Illinois and Chicago.

There is in Chicago a section that all the world knows as the Loop. It is that small collection of blocks that lie, generally speaking, within the arms of the old elevated structure that circles around them. It is the very heart of the city—including its big banks, the Board of Trade, the great stores, the big downtown hotels, the great skyscrapers, bars, theaters, night clubs—only a patch on that vast metropolis, but hot with its most highly concentrated energies. There in that Loop is where the Syndicate—the dreaded Capone Camorra—holds sway. And in that little group of city blocks I counted some 110 bookie joints, gambling spots and betting commissioners.

You've Got to See Skidmore

In the Loop these places were operated by such distinguished Capone generals as Jack Guzik, Frank (Chew Tobacco) Ryan, Hymie (Loud Mouth) Levin, Harry (Greasy Thumb) Guzik, Frank Diamond, (Capone's brother-in-law), Charles and Rocco Fishetti, his cousins, Louis (Little New York) Campagna, Eddie (Dutch) Vogel, slot-machine czar, Rocky de Grazio and their colleagues in the Syndicate.

Throughout the city, outside the Loop, there were some eight hundred more bookie joints operated by so-called "independents."

Now, obviously, this is no small business. The take is enormous. And it is utterly and flagrantly against the law. And the big question is—who permits it? To come to the point, in short, who is protecting them?

Of course there is Mr. Billy Skidmore. Like Moe Rosenberg, Skid runs a junk yard out on Kedzie Avenue. If you wish to open a bookie joint in Chicago—or a policy wheel, or a crap, blackjack and roulette parlor—you select your loca-high above the Island up into the blue sky and it's thrilling because there's nothing much between you and the ground and that's the cue for your gal to tighten her grip on your arm and for you to soothe her with brave, manly words. Of course it's as safe as a baby's cradle.

(Continued on page 46)

Nickel Empire

Continued from page 12

Now the Wonder Wheel in many ways is a symbol. It is the first bit of America immigrants see when they come to this country. Even from Ambrose Lightship eighteen miles out to sea you can see the Wonder Wheel, before you see the land line and long before you see the skyscrapers of New York. It dominates Coney Island, and it's a brave sight silhouetted against the dawn.

But let's pass the big wheel and walk down Surf Avenue to Steeplechase, where a visitor can buy a fifty-cent combination ticket for each member of his family, enter the gate and emerge a bit dazed and with aching feet eight hours later without having had to spend another cent. It is a big place, five acres of hardwood floor under a high-vaulted ceiling of glass and steel.

Steeplechase is owned by the first family of Coney Island, the Tilyous. It was built back in 1898 by George C. Tilyou whose father, a French Huguenot, was one of the Island's earliest pioneers.

By 1907 his Steeplechase was nationally known. There was nothing subtle about the fun at Steeplechase. A clown touched you with an electric wand, a floor began billowing under your startled feet, a puff of cold air sent your hat sailing or your skirts flying—that's Steeplechase fun, 1900 and 1940 vintage. There are all sorts of rides just as there were in 1907 when the big fire came to destroy the whole enterprise.

The Fence Stayed Green

Frank Tilyou is one of the three sons of George Tilyou now running the business. Frank likes to tell of how his father refused to accept the doleful verdict that he was ruined by the fire that came just two days before a big holiday. Tilyou kept men working for two days and two nights building a flimsy fence around the still smoldering structure. Then he put up signs that read, "Ten cents to see the greatest fire ruin in history." He did a tremendous business.

Then the sprawling gaudiness of the brand-new Steeplechase emerged. It took a year to build. Workmen were just ready to paint the outside fence, the last part of the job. It was March 17, 1908. Tilyou had told them to paint it blue. Then he went into the apartment in back of his office to be greeted by an unaccustomed wail.

"It's a boy," the doctor said smiling.

Tilyou stuck his head out the window and yelled, "Change that blue to green." Because young Frank arrived unexpectedly on St. Patrick's Day, the fence around Steeplechase is a bright green. Frank, Ed and George Jr. now run Steeplechase and it is their proud boast that there is always at least one Tilyou in the building.

Luna Park, Coney Island's other big amusement center, also fronts on Surf Avenue. Founded by Frederic Thompson and Elmer S. Dundy in 1903, it covers 50 acres. Once this whole area was seething with boisterous crowds bent on having fun, but the past three years found Luna Park only a shadow of its former self. Gone were the gay throngs, the noise and excitement. But this summer a completely streamlined and reconditioned park awaits you behind its glittering façade.

Once more people will be standing in line to ride down Coney Island's only Chute the Chutes, the speedy toboggan that spills you into Luna Park lake. And with all the other "thrillers" in operation and new entertainment novelties the old carnival spirit and past popularity of Luna ought to be restored.

Feltman's is the place where you can get a hamburger and a gardenia for a dime. In Coney Island parlance, it might be added, a gardenia is a large slice of onion. Feltman's, perhaps quite truthfully advertised as the world's largest restaurant, was founded upon three things: shrewd German common sense, an act of God and a frankfurter. The common sense and the frankfurter were brought to Coney Island by a German baker named Charles Feltman in 1860. He opened a restaurant on a plot 200x150. One fine day a storm arose and when it had subsided some days later, as sand at Coney Island. The roller coaster with the biggest "dip" is the Cyclone, owned and operated by George Kister and Chris Fuerst. Fuerst, who builds roller coasters, is a comparative newcomer to the Island. He arrived in 1906. Kister, a real veteran, has been there forty years.

Thrills Without Danger

"Our Cyclone is a thrilling ride," Fuerst says, "but it's a safe ride. We've never had an accident. Come along, I'll show you why."

The cars that whirl up and down the roller coaster weigh more than a thousand pounds. Their center of gravity is very low and they are heavily weighted at the bottom. After inspecting the cars it is easy to believe that they can shoot around curves at sixty miles an hour without being derailed. Safety is an cially true of the freak shows. Such a fine dyed-in-the-wool attraction as the Dog-Faced Boy lost his after four years. The next year he changed his name and dyed his hair. He immediately regained his popularity.

Entertainers at the various shows are all proud of the Coney Island tradition and each of them hopes one day he or she will find the fame so many did. They'll tell you of Jimmy Durante used to play ragtime at the old College Inn and that he was as funny as he is now. Ted Lewis played in a band there once and Irving Berlin was a singing waiter at the Inn. Victor Lopez got his start at Coney Island. Gallagher and Shean were an obnoxious act in Henderson's Music Hall. George Price was a kid star at the Island. Eva Tanguay once sang there for supper, going on just before Mabel Dressler.

Only the real old-timers will remember the Island's most famous hotel, the Coney Island House, a hostelry built years ago on a sandbar. It was destroyed by fire many years ago but its register was saved and now it is in the Brooklyn Museum, mute testimony to the days when the Island was a fashionable watering place, long before it was the Nickel Empire. P. T. Barnum took Jenny Lind to dinner there the night she arrived from Sweden. Daniel Webster and Henry Clay dined there (July 1850) and their names stand out bold on the register. John C. Calhoun spent a week at the hotel and Washington Irving visited the hostelry just before he died. General Sam Houston was a visitor and he wrote of the "ocean break in musical cadences beneath touch of summer breezes." Herman Melville, who wrote Moby Dick, is also on the register.

It's a Big Business

But that was the Coney Island of another age. Today, on hot Sundays, Coney Island outdraws the greatest show on earth by three or four to one. By no all doubts are settled and we know there never was a show like the World Fair. But on a good Sunday the Fair will attract perhaps 300,000 visitors and Coney Island will play host to a million. During the summer twenty-five million of us will stream joyously into the Nickel Empire and we'll leave about thirty-five million dollars behind us.

We'll see the two largest amusement parks in the world, sixty bathhouses where half a million people can dress in seventy "ball" games, thirteen carroussels, eleven roller coasters, five tunnel rides, two wax works including the famous Eden Musee, six penny arcades, twenty shooting galleries, three freak shows, 200 eating establishments—in all more than 500 separate, comparatively small, business enterprises. If we lose a couple of our youngsters, we won't have to worry. Eighty-seven lifeguards and platoons of police are on the job looking for lambs that have strayed from their flock. Last year they returned 3,000 children of the 3,000 who were reported lost.

Yet here's a sobering thought. "No one from Coney Island was ever buried in Potter's Field," some veteran concessionaire will tell you. "For sixty years we've taken care of our own. Only two nights ago one of the freaks died and we took up a collection. We'll all be at the funeral tomorrow over at St. Andrews Church."

That's Coney Island—a nickel away from Times Square.

Feltman discovered that an additional 1,200 feet of land had been piled onto this plot by the obliging sea.

Charles Feltman must have been quite a man. He came to this country in 1856 as a cabin boy on a sailing vessel. Finally he gravitated to Coney Island. At that time the Island was not for the masses. Politicians, theatrical personages, underworld leaders went to the Island to relax at very high prices. Champagne was the standard Coney Island drink, and it was ten dollars a quart. Beer was fifteen cents a glass and even clams and oysters (without pearls) were expensive. Charley Feltman opened a small shack where he specialized in clam bakes and ten-cent beer. When the unmoneyed masses discovered Coney Island, Feltman's profited and soon skyrocketed to a point where it had 1,200 employees and could serve 8,000 at one sitting.

Soul-shattering rides are as common important consideration at Coney Island. One accident will ruin a concession forever. The Cyclone and the other rides, for instance, are inspected each morning by employees of the concession owners and weekly by New York City inspectors.

There's Sam Wagner who has been running the World Circus Side Show for thirty-five years. He's a little unhappy now and he shakes his head dolefully as he tells you that "Coney Island isn't what it used to be. Back in the 1920's his exhibition of freaks would draw 20,000 daily. Today only a mere 10,000 troop in to see the Spider Boy, the Man with the Revolving Head, Fat Girl Laurello and the two famous pinheads (microcephalic idiots) Pip and Zipo. But Sam can still keep the wolf away from the sand with 10,000 people paying ten cents each.

Coney Island visitors insist upon being fooled, oddly enough. This is espe-

chids to the hostess who discovers this really superb mayonnaise!

A superb blend of choice ingredients including
Fresh Lemon Juice

NEXT TIME you want a bowlful of really elegant mayonnaise, delicately rich in flavor, beautifully smooth in texture, let Kraft make it for you! Your food shop carries a kitchen-fresh supply of this unusual mayonnaise of true "home-made" goodness.

Taste a little Kraft Mayonnaise, critically, just on the tip of a spoon. "What fine eggs Kraft must use"—you'll say. "What excellent salad oil and vinegar! And don't I taste, just faintly and delicately, the fresh delightful piquancy of real lemon juice?"

Everywhere women are saying that Kraft Kitchen-Fresh Mayonnaise is a real find. Everywhere dealers report that their most fastidious customers come back for more . . . again and again! Won't you try a jar . . . soon?

Especially good on fish is this rich mayonnaise with the delicate touch of Fresh Lemon Juice! Above, shrimp share the honors with olives, celery and radishes . . . to make a platter of hors d'œuvres your guests will take to greedily. Try Kraft Mayonnaise, too, with cold lobster. It couldn't be better! And keep it in mind for salmon and tuna.

KRAFT Mayonnaise

You'll fall hard (it's a promise) for the new COLA LIFE SAVERS. They bring you the tasty, tangy flavor of cola in candy form.

A girl with sweet breath seldom turns into a sour old maid. Keep yours sweet with PEP-O-MINTS.

Newest and one of the nicest of all LIFE SAVERS flavors is COLA. It's refreshing, zippy, wonderfully delicious.

Everybody's breath offends sometimes after eating, drinking, or smoking. Let LIFE SAVERS save yours. 14 delicious mint and fruit flavors. Sold everywhere. 5¢.

The Gag Man

Continued from page 10

as he came up. He had been watching her, and he was surprised that her eyes, seen unexpectedly, were sad. The little permanent crinkle of laughter at their corners went with the tilt of her chin and then you noticed the queer, deep look in her eyes.

"My daughter, Mr. Berens," Vibart said. "Didn't know you were interested in horses."

"Well, I've b-been thinking of getting a couple this spring," Tom said. That was true, anyway.

"Really?" the girl said. "Too bad Prell's colt isn't up for sale. But the Denmans have a pair: a pretty good heavyweight hunter, six years old, and a ladies' mare."

"I don't need a ladies' horse," Tom said. "I'm alone. And the hunter sounds too big."

"Oh. Sorry. I didn't know," the girl said. "But you'll be able to find what you want. Somewhere."

"Probably. Thanks," Tom said.

Vibart was looking at them, judiciously letting a thread of smoke dribble cut under his mustache. "Don't quarrel about horses," he said. "Pick something else—"

"We aren't quarreling," the girl said. "I'm coping. For the neighbors."

"Horses still surprise me," Tom said. "I come from Tacoma, Washington. I learned to ride in Hollywood." The girl didn't pay any visible attention to his defiance. "What I mean is," he tried lamely to get out of it, "they still have what the chess books call 'the vaulting movement.' You know, you start in one direction and then it's suddenly two squares to one side. Or the other way. However you start, it's always a jerk, one way or the other. Horses. Mmm. It's always a surprise."

"Chess," Vibart said, looking at him with sudden interest. "You play?"

"Not well," Tom said.

"We'll have a game some time," Vibart said. "Marjorie, Mr. Berens is our next-door neighbor, you know."

The girl looked at him with a new expression. "Oh," she said. "You're . . ."

"Yes," Tom said.

"Buying horses," Vibart said absent-mindedly. "Marjorie can help you. She's a good judge." He nodded and moved off, toward a cluster of people around a dancing bay colt.

"Are you showing any of your horses today?" Tom asked the girl.

"We haven't any, just now," she said. "We used to, but we're awfully broke at the moment."

"Oh, well," Tom said, "it's a holy condition, advised by many spiritual teachers."

SHE strolled away, and after a while Tom went home again. On the way, he had an idea for a new play, a really good one—or rather, he thought of a character around which he would construct a play, which is the way that such ideas usually come. He wasn't any too clear about the character, just yet, either, except for an impression given by the way a pheasant's feather was thrust into an old felt hat; but as he pushed into a drawer the gloomy litter of papers he had been tinkering with, he thought of the title for the new play. He would call it The Wildwood Tree. He didn't know why yet, but it seemed the right title.

He had the first act nearly done before he saw the girl again. It was an April morning, and he was still so new at being a country gentleman that the singing of so many birds in his trees sounded like the too-enthusiastic sound effects of an amateur stage manager. And when he came to the fence, he saw her kneeling beside the deep brown earth of the border.

"Good morning," he said, quite casually.

She looked up and nodded absently.

"Hello," she said. "Have you got horses yet?"

"No," he said. "I took your seriously."

She watched him calmly, her hand upraised in one gloved hand.

"I mean," he hurried lamely, "I thought you'd help me—that is, I've been rather waiting around, thinking that perhaps you'd—"

"Oh," she said. "I'm sorry. I understand. I will."

"Will you really?" he said.

"Of course. This afternoon, if you wish."

ON THE way back to the house, she thought: "Gosh, I didn't know I'd raised real ladies any more," and she thought of several lovely professional aristocrats who could profitably do a few ermine wraps for his glimmering a lady with muddy knees and a trembling hand. And he was ready at ten o'clock, when she swung her long skirt over the fence and came striding across his lawn, carrying a really battered crop.

Three hours later, as they emerged from a stable into an evening dusk starred by the dim constellations of dogwood, he owned two horses. But they were curiously unimportant—although they were large and alarmingly enough—in comparison with other horses he had acquired that afternoon. The memory of a shining head rearing competently through the stable door and of a voice speaking crisply through the restless, muffled noises of clopping hoofs, and the deep, nervous breathing of horses. Those, and a picture he never forget: the girl had a great, chestnut hunter sailing in a living across the windy spring sky above while he stood at the fence with his trainer. . . .

The stable had a cupola, with a face dim as the ghost of a moon. He glanced back at it as they started down the long slope of turf toward his house, wondering if he could ask her to stop for a cocktail. She seemed queerly less now, plodding along beside him in silence, as if she were leaving a life behind her life behind, there. He bled abruptly:

"Look: with both the horses, I mean, wouldn't you use the chess? He'll be right next door, and any you could—that is, I think he's a bit too much for me just yet, and he'll exercise, and—and the way you put him this afternoon, it occurred to me that . . ." Conscious that he was making a pretty bad hash of it, he broke off floundering.

"Thank you," she said. "Perhaps Sometime."

Something in the perfectly courteous detachment with which she spoke that the excitement of the horse business was over, made him aware of what she was thinking. ". . . But, after all, the ex-husband of Mona Karrow."

Holding open the car door for her, he said:

"Oh, well. Any time you want to see him. He'll be there. I won't be here much time for riding myself."

But the second act of The Wildwood Tree was finished before anything of his invitation. The evening he wrote the last line of that difficult and

...ue, Vibart had asked him over to chess, and he walked across the lawn to the Georgian house feeling pleased with himself. Because, most people know now, that second one of the best in the American era.

...found that there was no Mrs. Vi-Marjorie and her father were sitting in the library. Once or twice, in the silent pauses of the game, he caught the girl watching his face with expression—a speculative expression which he could not read clearly in her eyes.

...part moved a bishop which Tom had gotten and looked up from the board, seeing his mustache with doubtful expression.

...heck," he murmured, "and I'm not sure but perhaps—" "Yes," Tom said. "It's mate. And a checkmate."

...part looked at the combination of the chess and pushed his tobacco pouch across the table toward Tom's hand. "I've asked your daughter to use the snout hunter," Tom said, filling his glass. "He's getting sinfully fat."

...part turned in his chair to look at Marjorie. "Why don't you, my dear?" he asked. "I think it's what you need."

...he girl put her knitting down and up. "All right," she said. "I will tomorrow."

...after she had gone out of the room, looking with her free stride, Vibart said: "You know. It's damned decent of you. She's been restless lately. Prowling about the house in a way that worries me. She's never shown nerves before, when—" He broke off abruptly and looked at Tom. But Tom watched him calmly, knowing his face was perfectly blank of any knowledge of that affair of hers, whatever it was. "... Nuisance," Vibart muttered obscurely.

...Marjorie came back in, carrying a silver tray with a siphon and glasses and a bowl of ice cubes. Watching her, while Vibart talked about gardening, Tom was struck with the quaint charm of a girl knitting while she sipped a highball; especially when she presently put on a pair of horn-rimmed spectacles to peer at the fine type in her fiction book. That was so far from Hollywood. ...

...O IT came about that at five o'clock the next evening they were riding slowly homeward, knee to knee, along a quiet country lane where last winter's dead leaves lay softly under the tired hoofs of their horses. There hadn't been much chance for talk, with the way she took them over the country, across pastures and rainy hilltops and down stony roads. That little he had said to her had been wanted anxiously, because he was not a good rider and even his horse was giving trouble from being too long inactive in the stable. But now the horses were tired, too, and content to walk; and the girl said suddenly:

"You must have had a different kind of time in Hollywood."

"Yes. In those interior-decorated salt mines," he said.

Another evening after they had been riding she came in for a cocktail before the fireplace. The Wildwood Tree was finished by that time, and he had just come back from New York where he had signed the production contracts in his agent's office. Rehearsals were to start the second week of September. This was late August. Standing on the hearth-rug in her riding boots, she said abruptly:

"You know. Marking time like this. We aren't very good influences on each other."

STARTLED, he looked up at her. "Marking time? I hadn't thought of it as that."

"You. You have your play coming," she said.

"On the other hand, you're a very nice influence," he said. "But I'd hate to hear you call yourself one."

"Well, you're not a good influence," she said. "I should be out getting a job. Doing something."

She lifted her glass, but didn't sip. Instead, she looked at him steadily.

"Our lives have been so different. It's hard for me to understand you," she said. "I can't even imagine what your life has been like."

In the way she said it, this was the closest either of them had ever come to recognizing his life with Mona—and he was suddenly appalled by the utter impossibility of ever telling this girl of the sterility, the bright emptiness of that marriage. To him, now, those months were a slightly confused impression of too-bright lights everywhere, everywhere even in his dreams at night, and of too-expensive flowers wilting too soon with the drying of their artificial dew, and of too-perfect voices saying too-clever things too damned easily.

He said dully: "But all lives are pretty much the same. What do you mean?"

"Well," Marjorie said. "I mean—I hate the word—but I mean glamor. Damn it!"

"Oh," he said, "but ..."

But she didn't understand. Mona—Mona Karrow—was too big a name for mere glamor. Hell, a glamor girl, you made a wisecrack and she giggled, and sidled a bit, and turned out usually to be a darned nice kid.

But Mona Karrow—she was so big that it was art for her to look gaunt and sad sometimes, she was so big that she was mystery and art. Trouble was, she carried over that fragile exterior, absolutely unchipped, even unto the breakfast table; and when, after months, he had suddenly realized that she had nothing, simply nothing, to say worth listening to, he threw a two-weeks glumly silent drunk in the better bars. But—he looked up aghast at Marjorie. How could he ever tell Marjorie that?

"Oh, please," he said. "I—"

Marjorie quit looking at him and fin-

THE TERRIBLE TEMPERED MR. BANG

—by Fontaine Fox

"HE SAYS IT'S HIS CONSTIPATION THAT MAKES HIM SO TERRIBLE TEMPERED! HE HAS A WHOLE DRAWER FULL OF CATHARTICS, TOO, BUT HIS TROUBLE ALWAYS COMES BACK!"

"YOU THINK THAT MIGHT HELP?"

"I MOST CERTAINLY DO! HE'S PROBABLY LIKE SO MANY OF US WHO DON'T GET ENOUGH BULK IN OUR DIETS! AND ALL-BRAN IS PARTICULARLY RICH IN IT! BE SURE HE GETS ALL-BRAN EVERY MORNING AND DRINKS PLENTY OF WATER!"

SOMETIME LATER

WOULDN'T you like to avoid those dull, uncomfortable days due to constipation? And wouldn't you welcome a better way out than just "dosing up" after the damage is done? If your constipation is the ordinary kind (due to lack of "bulk" in the diet) there is a better way! Go straight to the cause of the trouble by eating a crunchy, ready-to-eat breakfast cereal—Kellogg's All-Bran. Eat it every day, drink plenty of water, and watch the world grow brighter!

Copyright, 1939, by Kellogg Company

Join the "Regulars" with KELLOGG'S ALL-BRAN

HIGH BUILDING

HOKETT JOHNSON

"I'LL BITE! How can you?"

Answer: He takes along beer or ale...in those easy-to-open CAP-SEALED CANS!

Listen to a reel expert!

1. "You always stow away a can of beer when we go fishing, Ed, but how come you don't drink it in that same kind of can you're holding? Why don't you, a fisherman know about the difference in beer?"

4. "Down the hatch, Ed! Here's to the pleasure to open, and a pleasure to drink! Don't mind me to stop by the store when we go fishing. I'll pick up one of those handy 12-can cartons of beer."

CONTINUED

Got a smart fisherman?"

No special tackle needed to open this can, these Cap-Sealed cans open with any opener. You can drink right out of the can, too, from a cap-protected surface."

3. "Sun's over the yardarm, Bill, and that reminds me of two things. First, it's time for some beer. Second, no sunlight gets into Cap-Sealed cans to rob the beer of that true brewery flavor!"

Where are you going this week-end?

Off on a picnic? Down to the beach? Spending a couple of days at the lake? Wherever you go, here's a simple, 3-step recipe for having a better time!

1. Take along beer—it's a cool and wholesome summer drink.
2. Take along beer in cans—chills faster, takes less space, no deposits or returns.
3. Take along beer in CAP-SEALED cans—because that's the can that requires no special opener, and lets you drink right from the can, from a clean, cap-protected surface!

Cap-Sealed
TRADE MARK REG.

All the smart fishermen aren't out in boats. Even ashore, they take along beer or ale in Cap-Sealed cans!" (P.S. For large-quantity advantages, the big quart-size Cap-Sealed can, too!)

AN COMPANY New York • Chicago • San Francisco

TWO CONVENIENT SIZES: Regulation 12-oz. can and a big quart can (32-oz.)

EMERSON
FANS

Thrifty Shoppers Everywhere are Going for

EMERSON-ELECTRIC GOLDEN JUBILEE FAN VALUES

When anything creates as much excitement as have the new Emerson-Electric Fans there must be a reason. To celebrate its 50th Anniversary, Emerson-Electric offers the finest fans, the greatest fan values in its entire history. Join the crowd—get your share of the thrilling fan values that thrifty shoppers everywhere are buying.

New! EMERSON-ELECTRIC 10-Inch Oscillator

See its smart design and finish—feel the cooling effect of its strong breeze—hear how quietly it operates. Then you'll know why this Emerson-Electric GOLDEN JUBILEE FEATURE FAN is one of America's most talked-about fan values! 5-year guarantee.

New! Popular-Priced EMERSON Junior Fans

The 12-Inch Oscillator pictured here sells for only $16.95! There is also a 10-inch oscillator at $9.95 and an 8-inch non-oscillator at $3.95. For fans of superb quality, smart appearance, fine performance, see these new EMERSON Juniors! One-year guarantee.

New Way to Cool and Ventilate Several Rooms

This attractive cabinet-type fan fits snugly in any window, and, quiet as a whisper, floods several rooms with cooling, refreshing breezes! For apartments, flats, small homes, stores and offices it provides summer heat-relief at low cost. One and two-speed models. One-year guarantee.

See your nearest Retailer of Electrical Appliances or Write for Catalog No. 464

EMERSON-ELECTRIC MOTORS - FANS - APPLIANCES

New York • ST. LOUIS • Chicago

1890 FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY 1940

ished the drinking of her cocktail. "Late," she said. "I'm off."

He spent most of the time of rehearsals in New York, only coming up to his house in Connecticut for week ends. He saw very little of Marjorie in that time; she seemed to be awfully busy, and for the first time since he had known her she was going out a lot.

On October 9th he had a note from Mona:

"My dear:

"All my congratulations on your play. Sam Moltka told me last night that it is beautiful and strange.

"I shall be in New York on the twenty-seventh, and have already asked a number of your old friends to go to the opening with me.

"I have planned a supper for us all at Dwam's, afterward. We are all so looking forward to seeing you again—especially, your devoted, MONA."

He wired Marjorie at once:

"WILL YOU AND YOUR FATHER PLEASE SAVE THE EVENING OF OCTOBER TWENTY-SEVENTH TO GO AND WITH ME TURN UP OUR NOSES AT THE BOOS AND HISSES WHICH WILL THAT EVENING GREET THE NEW PLAY? AFTERWARD WE CAN GO OUT AND DROWN MY SORROW AT THE ORANGE DRINK STAND AROUND THE CORNER.

"TOM BERENS."

After that, he spent the afternoon hunched in a third-row seat at the theater, trying to dope out an iron-clad but properly phrased note of refusal to Mona, while the company rehearsed.

It was noon the next day before a wire from Marjorie came up to his hotel room on his breakfast tray:

"MY FATHER AND I ARE SO SORRY BUT A PREVIOUS ENGAGEMENT MAKES IT IMPOSSIBLE TO ACCEPT. THANK YOU THOUGH AND GOOD LUCK WITH EVERYTHING.

"MARJORIE VIBART."

He didn't understand. Not until he had opened the morning paper to the gossip column which everyone reads:

"Mona Karrow and her X, Tom Berens, will meet again for the first time since, come the night of the 27th, when his new play, The Wildwood Tree, opens at the Davioli Theater. Her supper in his honor, at Dwam's, after the show, will be guested by a lot of the Hollywood crowd who haven't had a good gag to pass off as their own since Tom quit attending the Sunset Strip teas. This looks like make up in an atmosphere of make-up."

SO THAT was it. He recognized the relentless hand of Joe Solpin, Mona's personal public-relations counsel, in that. Joe was a good egg, one of the best, and he meant everything for the very best, but . . . Tom knew that Mona's last and most inhumanly sophisticated picture had not been too successful at the box office, and he shrewdly suspected that the studio heads in conference had decided Mona needed a human touch in publicity. Anyway, being the procrastinator he was, he never did get around to replying at all to Mona's note.

Dressing in his hotel room for the opening night, his bones felt heavy with weariness and his heart was as empty as an old glove. The tryout in Boston had gone well, but that didn't mean much except to show that the company was working smoothly in the parts. It was tonight that the coin would be flipped for keeps.

On his way to the street he remembered he hadn't had any dinner so he turned into the bar and had a quick highball instead. At the theater, no one had any time for him. He went into Ben Arondel's deserted office and sat there on a pale blue silk lounge, trying to smoke cigarettes with a casual air, listening to the movement and babble of the crowd beginning to pass through the lobby.

When the curtain went up he walked out and found his seat.

When the curtain came down on the first act he tried to buttonhole Ben to ask him how the play was going, but Ben was in a great hurry and brushed him off and was gone, fat legs running toward the dressing rooms. It was not until the end of the second act that anyone spoke to him and then it was Joe Solpin, Mona's personal public-relations counsel; but by that time he didn't mind. Because the second act played to one of those rare and utter silences that authors and players dream of over their brandy after a good lunch. Hearing the voices speak into that tense and living hush out front, his lines seemed to him so beautiful that he felt like weeping; so when Joe Solpin came hustling around backstage while the crowd was still roaring in the aisles, he didn't give a damn.

"GREAT stuff—great!" Joe said. "Boy, it's a killeroo! And not a gag in it," he said, looking at Tom with wonder.

"Thanks, Joe," Tom said, blinking at the crowd of laughing, excited players that jostled him aside.

"Mona, she's all in a heap—a heap!" Joe said in a hushed voice. "Gee, boy. It's a fact."

"Ah. Mmm," Tom said vaguely.

"Well, see you after the show!" Joe said. "In the lobby, see?"

Tom didn't even know he was gone until he turned to ask him how he thought the play was going. He spent the third act in Ben's office, and it didn't seem any time at all until a sudden dull thunder broke out in the theater and swelled, pierced by voices, and ebbed for a minute and then swelled again, time after time. He was counting the calls: ". . . seven . . . eight . . . nine . . ." when the door burst open and Ben came bounding toward him, blowing like a spent horse.

"Say!" Ben bawled, "what's the idea, hiding like this? Here I am looking all over the house for you, and I am finding you hiding! Ain't you got no interest in—"

"What's the matter, Ben?" Tom quavered.

"What's the matter? That's what he says! They want you. They are yelling for you ten minutes now. Come on, pull yourself together and—"

With a jerk his thick hand straightened Tom's tie and he hustled him along a side aisle and into a backstage door. He tripped over things and people's legs in the dusty backstage gloom, hands clawed at his, voices screamed in his ear—and a hearty shove between his shoulder blades sent him stumbling out into a sudden intolerable radiance of light and a huge, steady noise that had been going on and on anyway roared up to meet him and . . . stopped.

The abrupt silence left his ears and buzzing, but he could hear perings in the wings to his left and they stopped, too, and silence b faces lost and blurred beyond the of lights—all looking up at him.

Afterward, he remembered quite distinctly that his vocal cords had re with a slight but audible click, and he had said: "Thank you," in a reedy voice. Thereafter, he had b and turned to the wings with a dist savoir-faire gesture to motion ba the stage the company, to whor credit was due. But at the momen and he were storming up the side again and Ben was giving him he not having made a speech. "Man!" was saying, "here's half the auth the world thinking up speeches to r and here are you with the world at feet and a chance to make—" B that time they were in the lobby there were thousands of faces swim around in light and a shrill swell and hands clawing at his again and ping away and being lost as Ben pu ed him along—

Toward Mona.

He saw her suddenly, standing there. She was tall, in an ermine wrap never seen before, and her eyelids still mysterious as she watched him, the famous shadows of a smile brushing the corners of her lips.

"Oh, hello," Tom said. And his v in his own ears sounded remarkably a quack.

"My dear," Mona's deep, slow to were as self-possessed as her hands his. And they stood there looking each other in the blinking stutter of flashlight bulbs which made Mona's go alternately shallow and deep. Exc that Tom wasn't looking at her face y more. He was staring past her shoulder, past Joe Solpin's jerkily supervising figure in the background—at M jorie.

She was standing on the stairw caught and held by the press of people coming down out of the balconies at the galleries who had all stopped to lo at Mona Karrow and her ex-husband meeting again. And her face, among the curious, stupid faces, was sudden distinct to him as it would have been a camera whose lens was sudden brought into focus.

MONA'S hands clawed too, and slipped away and were lost, and he was walking away, and out the door. It was raining outside and pools of spattered light on the sidewalk among the hurrying feet. He began to hurry too, and—abruptly he stopped and turned into the doorway of a closed shop. The shop window was full of empty gloves, like hundreds of limp hands, and the rain dripped from the eaves above the doorway, and through it he watched the people coming out the wide, bright door of the theater.

When Marjorie came out he didn't have to run after her because she turned his way and, walking with dead steps, came down the sidewalk as he had come. Only, when she passed his doorway and he took a hesitant step toward her, she whirled with her eyes suddenly alive with startled fear.

"Oh, hello," he said. It was a forlorn sound, in the dripping of the rain.

She just looked at him for a minute. A long, quiet minute, and all the noise dropped away, and all the excitement and all the people that passed them, staring curiously. Then, with a long breath, her lips opened, and she said: "Where's your hat?"

He blinked and automatically felt the place where his hatbrim should be, and her hands had reached out and straightened his tie with an expert twist. And then they were walking along, side by side, not saying anything.

Good old-fashioned Bulking mellows the smoke

... GIVES YOU A NOTICEABLY SMOOTHER CIGARETTE

● THE MOST IMPORTANT cigarette advance of recent years is the result of looking backward.

For Pall Mall has revived an old-fashioned, painstaking, all but forgotten method of making fine tobaccos better and kindlier... BULKING.

In BULKING, the choice Pall Mall tobaccos are rested together in aromatic heaps, where they generate their own heat, and bask in it. Given sufficient time (the careful, old-fashioned, conscientious ways of working take time), this heat causes harsh qualities to grow mild. It releases subtle flavors and aromas, which permeate every shred of tobacco. Thus all the tobaccos are enriched, improved, mellowed; to give you a really smoother smoke.

A significant fact: with Pall Mall, there is noticeably less finger stain, or no finger stain at all.

Pall Mall is a cooler cigarette, too—because the additional length travels the smoke further.

Yourselves, try Pall Mall critically. Noticeably cooler and smoother, its price remains but 15¢ for twenty.

"WHEREVER PARTICULAR PEOPLE CONGREGATE"

Rain Before Seven

Continued from page 17

look as if you didn't get any sleep last night."

They passed through the ornate gates and down the curving road toward Wallisport.

She said, "It may work out that I'll try to get in your way," and he instantly answered, "Not if you've got any respect for me—and want to keep any." So there at last, in simple words, was an admission of all she dreaded. So she was going to get in his way. She could be as hard as he, and she could think just as straight. She was certainly going to have to think straight.

A half mile farther on, she said, "There are a lot of things you've been trying to keep me from thinking about. One of them is—it hasn't been just Bert. You want me to think that nobody would make an attempt on you. Or anyway, that any attempt on you would be sometime in the future. You see, I've got quite a good mind and I've been thinking. He has already tried to get you. Somehow he made it look to John as if you were a desperate character. Somehow he was able to work on John."

They had been together most of the time since Bert went out from her room to die and that was the subject that Caleb had completely avoided. But now he was willing to talk about it. "We badly messed things with John, yesterday. We got mad and we got him mad. It would be agreeable to know what induced John to prod the cops into searching my house."

"Do you mean who induced him to?"

The tenth part of a smile. "Heinemann hasn't been dining at Castle Gabriel distinguished as a senator—he didn't tell John over a cocktail that it would be a good idea to search my place. But there must have been some special little bit of evidence that was arranged. Something he fixed up that would grow and grow on John."

"That would be pretty clever."

"Something of the sort must have happened. But it wasn't necessarily clever. Heinemann hasn't proved himself very clever. He came to bat twice and struck out both times. He didn't land Bert in jail and the cops didn't find what was planted in my house."

But Heinemann or someone he directed—Hope remembered—had gone into Caleb's house and put that paper there. And if Heinemann had not landed Bert in jail—well, in Caleb's much too carefully careless phrase, he had come to bat a third time and that time he had not struck out. That deadly shudder set up in her again—but be wary, don't let Caleb know. Especially don't let him know that she went right on to think of the next time Heinemann should come to bat.

"What else would it be agreeable to know?" she asked. That was useless, for the thousand things they had to know and didn't had been summed up so many times that she knew them backward. Where had Bert seen Heinemann? Where had they met? What had happened to them? How had Bert been killed? What had Heinemann been doing in Wallisport that night? And before that night? Whom had he come to see? Whom had he left on guard? Whom had he left on guard?

Caleb said, "Who told the cops . . ." and then stopped. She said impatiently, "Told them what? Tell me!" There was reluctance in his face when he answered: "Why did they start looking for your car, the day you drove Bert to Boston? Someone must have told them I was driving him away from Wallisport. They were on his trail long before you got back to town. . . . We won't find out. All Nate Jenkins knows is that the state cops put the town cops to work on it. The state cops haven't got any record of why they did."

"Maybe John knows that too. I can ask him—I can go back and drag it out of him."

"Not after yesterday. All either of us could get from him is a sermon."

They had got to North Wallisport. Caleb hailed a taxi. Inside it, he went on explaining—with, she was sure, some purpose of keeping her from learning something: "Everything is in the dark. We don't know what's important—we wouldn't know it was important if we found out. Somebody may have the key to everything, without knowing it's the key. Maybe you and I have it right now. But we can't tell it from the idlest rumor or the most meaningless hunch—in the dark."

What was he trying to keep her thoughts away from? He shifted ground again and was speaking with intense solemnity: "Don't go to John again. Don't do anything else. Hope, I must make you understand that you mustn't do anything at all."

Did he think she wouldn't? "What could I do? . . . Nothing."

"You must not try. Stay home—get some sleep—grieve about Bert—but. . . . We've made an incredible series of mistakes. Up to now we could afford them. Now we can't. But don't do anything. The most promising or the most innocent thing might be another mistake. And we've passed the place where we can afford even one mistake more. One more might be . . . one too many."

He hadn't needed to say "might be fatal." So that kept her quiet till the taxi drew up at her house. They got out and he told the driver to wait.

"Where are you going?" she asked.

"Home."

He wasn't. But he wasn't going to tell her that. "Caleb, I can't let you out of my sight!" She clutched his arm but knew that that wouldn't accomplish anything. "Promise me you'll come back—here—today."

"If I get time." He loosed her fingers from his arm and got back in the taxi. It drove away.

The storm was holding off. She sat in a lawn chair, probing what Caleb had said—and had not said. Suddenly one thing was crystal clear. He had intended not to say it—and how cannily he had worded it when she drew it out of him! One of the crucial things was: Who had phoned the police that he was driving Bert out of town? That was the way he had put it—trying to head her off. But of course! The police had had the number of her car. Someone had tipped them off who had actually seen her. What of it? Just this: Caleb must think that she was still being watched. Whoever was watching Wallisport for Heinemann was watching her. "Stay home," he had said.

No matter how persuasively Caleb might lie, he thought that every moment in Wallisport was charged with danger. "We've passed the place where we can afford even one mistake more." Sinister enough when he had said it, that was ghastly now. Who? Who had seen her with Bert and told the police? If they could find that out, they would know—everything.

Aunt Elinor had left the yellow coupé at the curb. Hope drove off in the far from clear determination to find Nate Jenkins. But when she found him, there was nothing to learn. "Somebody called the state cops," Nate said. "They don't know who. They was too interested in gettin' Hendricks. Maybe they didn't even ask."

Her mind spun in a sudden vertigo. Here, with her hand on the gear shift to drive away, here was her chance! She could say, "Nate, you've got to watch Caleb for the next few days." and maybe she could make him see why. She could say, "None of the things anybody has suspected about him are half so incredible as the truth—he intends to kill a man if he gets the chance." Even Nate would have to act on that.

But . . . "One more mistake might be one too many." Time had run out. If she tried to save Caleb, she might make that one mistake, she might . . . kill him.

She said, "So long, Nate," and drove away, shivering.

More of the bay was walled off with haze. The clouds were blacker and lower. She stopped in front of the house and was thinking, "Where can I look for him?" when another car drew up and Greg Ashburn got out of it. Instantly her distaste and distrust awoke.

"I'm looking for Caleb," he said. "Do you know where he is?"

"No," she said.

"What has he done since yesterday?"

"He went to Boston very early this morning to see Bert's friend, George Tanner. Just that, I guess, and the funeral."

"Tanner had nothing new?" She shook her head. Abruptly he said, "What did you two see the night of the fire?"

"Nothing. What do you mean?" She supposed she had to answer him.

"How can I work with you people if you don't put all your cards on the table? I can do nothing for you unless I know all you know." Never before had she seen Greg Ashburn excited. She didn't like the sight. "If there is anything at all in Caleb's fantastic suspicions," Ashburn continued, "then your man must have been here the night of the fire."

"We know that."

"Did you see anything whatever that might be connected with him? Did you see anything suspicious? Anything out of the way? Even the slightest thing?"

"No."

The excitement in those penetrating eyes got hostile, and when he said, "You shall not lie to me!" his voice was violent. He repressed the outbreak and said, "Oh, sorry!" in his most British manner. Then: "Understand, Hope, all I'm interested in is facts—clues, if you will. Your morals don't interest me. It is nothing to me that you two chose that night for a midnight assignation. That is your business, and no doubt you had a delightful time. But I must know—before that honeymoon, or on the way to it, did you see anything that will help me find your villain?"

She must not slap that repulsive face, she must not even say, "When I tell Caleb you've said that!" Be wary! She stared at him, weak with disgust. Her silence made him burst out, "You were seen, you little fool! The two of you, in his house, half-dressed. Must I threaten to publish your intrigues, to get the truth from you?"

She moved swiftly from behind the wheel and ran up the walk.

Caleb had seen someone at the window. He had decided that that was just excited nerves, but he had been wrong. . . . She watched Greg's car disappear round the corner. "You were seen." By whom? By Greg, of course—he was talking about himself. But Greg wasn't in town that night—if he had been, he and not John would have taken Nate to the dance.

She called Caleb's number. He answered. Just as she hung up, with rain broke free in a tremendous and thunder crashed. It was three-quarters of an hour before the squall out to sea and she could try Caleb

The onset of the storm brought her a reprieve. She would have minutes and might find some means of invention or defense. But her resource had been bombed away. The citadel she had supposed impregnable had been carried. She had a few minutes; having proved unable to save herself, could she save John Gabriel from humiliation and revulsion? . . .

Yesterday he had poured out the story of his engagement, the strain on it, the events that had broken it. They were bound up with the trouble, sabotage and mysterious attacks on the mills, and Natalie was able to see how logical some of his misunderstandings were. Only she, why he had misunderstood some things. She had the key to some of them; clear that others, Caleb among them, perhaps Hope, might have the key to his other mistakes. And even if shocked into humility, could understand at last that he himself might have erred. It had taken the breaking engagement to teach him that.

"I've had too much pride. I could tolerate the idea that I might be wrong. And perhaps I've been increasingly wrong, from week to week. . . . That has called me a fool. He's right."

She knew well enough how that could torture naked flesh.

"Worst of all, how stupidly I tried to dominate Hope! Who did I suppose was—her overlord? No woman could be blamed for revolting."

She was not much concerned about any wounds he had suffered at Hope's hands. She knew he would not mope the broken engagement very long. His male pride was affronted, there would not be much repining over love. "You ask too much of yourself—your standards are too high," she said. "More than anyone should ask of any man. You ask much too much of women."

Caleb was a greater threat to John than John was unable to believe either facts or his conclusions, but as he fully repeated them Natalie began to understand how close they came. For ever bewildered John was, what essential things Caleb did not know, dangerous discoveries were dangerous close at hand. Caleb had decided that secret agents were at work in Wallisport, and he was wrong only in identifying them as Nazi. If he had come close, he might at any moment go the way. He might learn about Greg. She saw now why Greg had watched him so closely and tried to find out all his activities.

Happily, the danger was about over. Greg would be done by tomorrow or the next day. Greg was safe. With Caleb safe, Natalie was safe.

Caleb was wrong in connecting the fire at the mills with the activity of secret agents he suspected. The overwhelming necessity of Greg's job was that nothing whatever be allowed to disclose it. The most compelling reasons could not have persuaded him to take such a risk. Greg could have nothing to do with the fire. . . . But the fire had happened, and if you believe anything whatever of Caleb's argument, the man Hendricks could have nothing to do with it. Impulses of passion

Before you know it, a baby is no longer a baby. The days seem to fly... Don't let them get away without the surest memory savers—the snapshots through which you can live the days over again.

When a snapshot
"fairly talks," chances are it was made on Kodak Film

GETTING SWELL SNAPSHOTS is too much of a thrill—keeping a snapshot record is too important—to take chances on film. That's why most people use Kodak Film. They know it's great—know it's the sure way to avoid disappointment.

If you're using an average camera, Kodak VERICHROME Film will give best results. Even with reasonable exposure errors or in unfavorable weather—it gets the picture. You can count on Verichrome.

NEW—An Important Safety Margin: An exclusive "skiving" process provides, in all popular Kodak Film sizes, a safeguard against light leak along the edges of the film—an extra assurance of better pictures with Kodak Film... Eastman Kodak Company, Rochester, N. Y.

KODAK'S NEW COLOR SHOW—AGAIN THE HIT OF THE NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR

Last year and this, millions of people have marveled at the beauty and drama of Kodachrome full-color pictures projected on a 187-foot screen, longest in the world. And every day now, in increasing numbers, they're seeing the newer, better show. Also at the Kodak Building—expert advice on picture taking at the Fair. Don't forget your Kodak.

Accept nothing but
the film in the familiar yellow box—Kodak Film—
which only Eastman makes.

The great snapshots are made on KODAK FILM

You may worry about the neighbor's kids

but here is one worry you can avoid

If those little rascals next door get your goat, there's not much you can do about it except change your address.

But you don't have to move to get Peace Of Mind about your chassis lubrication.

Let us Marfak your car every 1,000 miles. Then you can be sure it is in perfect running condition.

For Marfak is Texaco's standardized 40-Point Lubrication Service. Every detail is checked. Nothing missed.

And at every vital friction point, a special lubricant goes on duty—a lubricant so tough it lasts twice as long as ordinary grease.

This lubricant is Marfak, from which the full service takes its name.

To keep your car in smooth-as-velvet condition, drive in and we'll do the rest.

TEXACO DEALERS INVITE YOU TO tune in the TEXACO STAR THEATRE—Starring Kenny Baker and Frances Langford—Every Wednesday Night—Columbia Network—9:00 E.D.T., 8:00 E.S.T., 8:00 C.D.T., 7:00 C.S.T., 6:00 M.S.T., 5:00 P.S.T.

AT ALL TEXACO AND OTHER GOOD DEALERS

Copyright 1940, The Texas Company

visited Natalie's nerves. There might be more than she knew. There might be some darker meaning to that fire.

But that, too, would lapse. The crest of danger had been passed. Greg was going away. John's interests were no longer threatened, and his jealousy of Caleb would subside.

That was where they had ended last night. For the rest, she could sustain her role, uphold John's self-respect, seem to be the woman he believed her to be. The structure of deceit would stand. And it was at least kinder to John than the discovery that it was fraud would have been. It had seemed reasonably safe and secure—last night.

But this afternoon John had come home wearier still but with some perspective restored and had opened up a new danger. He must face the idea, he said, that Thatcher was right. Something much more mysterious than he had thought was going on. He had proved that he was incompetent to deal with it. The latent threat still existed and the time had come to act. He was going to call in the FBI.

If he did, he would find out about Greg. He would find out about Natalie. And that would be the end of John Gabriel. . . . And, the slow thought formed, Natalie Gabriel would go to jail. Which was fair enough.

Could she get that paper back from Greg? Not with the United States government closing in.

So she entered on the climactic fear. Or so it seemed until a greater fear was unmasked. There were no endings, it appeared, any terror or anguish was just a prelude to one still worse. Long ago she had squandered her honesty, virtue, honor and self-respect—surely she should have been able to count on them to buy peace, or at least safety. No.

Nevertheless, there might be a precarious way out. John had taken so deep a wound in his own judgment that he easily accepted hers. He had made so many errors that he was grateful for her assurance that she was saving him from another one. A talent for duplicity might now be turned to her own interest. . . . She had only to argue that Caleb was as badly confused as John. "Only, a friend of his has died and that has made him frantic." Absurd, but when she said it, John didn't see the absurdity. "The simplest explanation is some quarrel inside the labor union. With Hendricks dead, that must be over now." Grotesque to her, knowing what she knew, but not grotesque to John Gabriel, on her assurance. "Wait and see—nothing important can happen now." Silly, in the light of the facts he didn't know, but he trusted her. "The most mysterious things can turn out to be simple—let's not exaggerate them." No, let one of us hoodwink the other most affectionately.

Always the thought was running, could she get that paper back? No. The price of honor could no more be recovered than honor itself. All she could do was to push dishonor as far as it would go.

SHE said abruptly, "I'm wrong and you must not consult me. Don't ask me to decide anything or help you decide. Do what will be best for you."

He said, with a sudden burst of self-contempt, "If I hadn't been blinded by my own asininity, I would never have paid any attention to anyone but you!"

That seemed to mean a momentary release from the pressing danger, but it was the first hint of a greater one. John began to move around the room, talking, pressure steadily rising in his voice and in the movements of his hands. "One thing has been flung in my face all these weeks but I was too blind to see it. No matter what happened or how I felt, when I came back to this house, you made everything right for me. The business might be threatened, a hundred dangers might exist, but I might be flouting me. . . . Natalie came in the door—and there you were. You'd smile—and trouble would appear. You'd touch my face—and everything was all right. Why did you command wrathfully, "why was I so stupid to understand?"

The greater fear was completely masked. Discovery and ruin were for very little, after all—for had revealed that the man she had loved and betrayed was in love with her. And the same instant had revealed that she was in love with the man who had betrayed her. How could you love that rested on dishonor? You could not tolerate it—it was tragedy, it was disaster.

She had said, "John!" and he had answered with a desperately pleading hand. "You're kind. You're warm—there's warmth in you. You're a man can warm his soul with you. You're being chilled by a contemptuous look. After being frozen by his own

HER hand groped for the table, standing beside. She sat down, covered her face. That was a mistake, but fatally wrong, for he crossed the wide room and touched her shoulder, her cheek. "What's wrong with that?" he demanded. "If I could only bring me to my senses, should you cry when I get there?" She got out of the chair and ran from him. "John, we can survive anything but this. There's one thing I must do. You're—oh, wrong. I've made the worst mistake of all. Don't—God's sake, don't be victimized by another woman."

"Be quiet!" She couldn't look at him, and what she saw of his gaze from him, and what she saw of something John Gabriel had never seen before. Not even in that terrible darkness at midnight had she seen him, not even when she woke up faint in his arms. She was seeing now. An exultant thought soared in shock and fear: he never looked like Shaler like this! She was not a fool, lost if she could keep him from touching her, but if he so much as laid a finger on her again—"You tell me what would be best for me," he most shouted. He had picked up the book, unregarded, and was bending the book back. A wrinkle ran along the book and she said, "Oh, don't!" He took the book away and glared at her. His face softened. "What would be best for me? I'd like to take you somewhere where there was quiet music and food and no violence and no noise. I'd like to sit somewhere with you and hear your voice. I'd like to watch the light on your cheeks and your eyes and see how lovely you are. To realize that only a fool would have realized from the beginning of our marriage that it was not only fear that was in her heart. She moaned, "John, no!" But her knees were strong in them. She had thought enough about destruction. It was upon her in another moment, a moment which she could not put off, she did not want to put off.

He said, with intense derision now I'm a fool. . . . There you are. I say what would be best for me is to take you to dinner! That's even what I want. This is what I want. There was no strength in her and strength was altogether gone from her purpose. So John Gabriel, brother of the husband she had betrayed, John Gabriel whom she had betrayed, who did not know that you desired could betray you, was fool enough to desire her—John had her in his arms. He kissed her the unalloyed horror of that night

ing was clearer than that, faithless coupt, she desired that kiss and it as she had never answered
s kiss before. She was pliant, d desirous in his arms and his no greater hunger than her own.
destruction.

They drew apart. John found enough to say, "That's what I want. The ing of it." Her hands went to cheks and the dammed-up realiza-began to break free. . . . And that moment when thunder crashed, gent window swung in a risen floods of rain shut off the out-world.

storm broke through enchant-
They rushed to the window,
t by main force, stood looking haos of thrashing branches and al rain. Rapid flashes of light-at the gloom and thunder was irous. . . . It had broken the en-tent, and that would be forever.
e knew, it had brought her only entary reprieve. John would not rted by the storm much longer.
uld turn away from the window,
her. When he did, she must what to do.

It almost as bad as the hurricane," aid.

he was no hope that it would be
There was no hope that she find any solution as easy as dying.

RG ASHBURN sat out the storm a garage. He started home as the gale blew out, and got there the rain stopped. A number of and many branches were down the highway, and one had fallen at angle in his drive, partly blocking it.
would not do, and he shouted for hwaite to remove it. Smurthwaite ored in the dripping doorway of the bl. Greg yelled at him to take an own the drive, and went into the u.

Eric turned from a rear window.
swine was gone from here for two hours, getting the damned dog and burying it," he said.

"So?" Greg said contemptuously.
"Then what?"

"Then did we not order him to watch this house? If someone had come, where would I have been?"

"In the attic. Under a bed. Behind the coal. In a closet. You would certainly have saved your skin."

The gross face broke up in what passed as merriment. "My little Siegfried! You would still double-cross me if you could find a way." He came close to Greg who, though a tall man, nevertheless felt dwarfed by his unwieldy bulk. He tapped Greg's shoulder, and his face was repulsive with satisfaction.
"There is no way. You can save yourself only by saving me. God has made us comrades, and we must serve God together." The heavy head went back, and the vast mouth opened for hoarse
laughter.

"And I must do your thinking for you." Greg looked with supreme contempt at the blunderer who had endangered everything, feeling for the thousandth time that the cause was hopeless if it had to rely on bruisers.
Scorn whipped into his voice: "You have the intelligence of a gunman! You are a thug—and thuggery has done for us.
You are stupid, an inept, blundering fool. Everything you have done has recoiled on you. I would not mind that —nothing would please me more than to see you in an American jail. But you are cowardly as well as stupid and that has ended in your putting an end to work that was valuable till you came along. When you appealed to me for help, you made me risk exposure. Now you have made exposure certain. I am finished here. I do not forget that. It will not be forgotten—up above."

"My friend," Sir Eric said—Bramwell, Hedger, Heinemann, what other names? "It is a great mistake to have a temper. It is bad to be so soft as you.
It is much worse to get angry. I will

MAKE YOUR PLEASURE

"Double-Rich"

THIS SUMMER!

SCHENLEY'S

Cream of Kentucky

THE "Double-Rich" BOURBON

Up to the mountains or down to the shore —wherever you take your fun it will be richer with Kentucky's fine "Double-Rich" whiskey! Cream of Kentucky is the world's largest-selling straight Bourbon whiskey because it gives more pleasure to more people. Enjoy yourself!

HERE'S HOW TO MAKE A "Double-Rich" JULEP

In bowl, crush fresh mint covered with powdered sugar and just enough water to melt it. Half-fill glass with shaved ice. Add mint; then fill with ice. Pour Cream of Kentucky, to top. Stir till frosted. Garnish with mint, sprinkle with sugar. Serve!

July 6, 1940

Dear mother and Dad:
Mr. Briggs says

I cant go swimming again till I've written home.

your aff'T son

Robert.

Norman Marsh, famous cartoonist and creator of the . . .

. . . cartoon detective, Dan Dunn, flies his own plane many thousands of miles every year. And for safe lubrication he uses Sinclair Pennsylvania Motor Oil, as does . . .

. . . American Airlines, Inc., the country's largest air transport company. In fact, more than 1/4 of all the oil used by airliners in the U. S. is Sinclair Pennsylvania. This is . . .

. . . the same quality Sinclair Pennsylvania Motor Oil sold by your nearby Sinclair Dealer. Try Sinclair Pennsylvania or Sinclair Opaline Motor Oil in your car. You'll find they last so long they save you money.

break your neck if you lose your temper in a tight place. But I cannot watch you all the time. I dare say you have let fly in front of someone. Your neighbor, maybe, or the exciting blonde—"

"At least I was not reckless enough to strike a servant in her presence."

Hedger grinned. "But you have seduced her. One might count on her to forgive all."

He longed to sink a fist in that leering face, but Hedger was right in saying that he must keep his temper. "You came to me with a plea for help—"

"And orders, do not forget."

Greg shrugged. "Orders to keep you informed what the mills were making—not to defend you from your own terrors. No man was ever scared worse or faster than you. I should think that the fastidious corps of saboteurs would insist on a minimum of guts. But one glimpse of a labor agitator and yellow came sweating from your pores." His resentment gathered. "I should have thrown you out—turned you over to the police—flung you into Hendricks' hands. You have destroyed the work of years—at the most vital time. It is over—it can never be repaired."

Hedger also was shouting: "And if you had let me do it as I meant, your precious job would be safe. There would have been no trouble if I had waylaid Hendricks with a club an hour after I first saw him. But no, we must be secret at any cost! It is your precious secrecy that has done for us, my friend. That and your childish fear of Americans. All must be done through someone else or the police would collar us! We must not show our hand! We must use the Gabriel ass—we must use so many people and so many things that would enable us to keep happy and hidden!"

"At least I have kept us out of jail—so far. You know nothing, you learn nothing. Do you not know that the greatest fool is the one who believes his opponents are fools? The Americans are not fools—and there is an excellent chance that we will both be laid by our heels by tomorrow. Unless I prevent it."

"What have the fools found out?" Hedger growled. "Nothing! And you have not been so brilliant. Your pretty plan of getting Hendricks sent to jail for us—was he sent to jail? Your clever device for getting the other one sent to jail—he is not in jail, and only the fact that he is a sublime fool has kept him from realizing I am in this house. Those were your ideas. Fortunately, the Americans proved to be fools."

"I AM not responsible for accidents—" "So you say. But it came to killing Hendricks after all—"

"It would not have come to killing him if you had the intelligence of a field mouse—if you could have kept yourself from being seen. That is what has ruined us! Up to then we were safe, we could have tried again, you could have gone elsewhere and bungled other jobs, and your betters would be free to go on working for your fatherland. You could not even conceal yourself from the man who terrified you! No! You even led him right to this house—the one place where there was refuge for you, the place where far more important work than yours was securely concealed. You let him see you—and since he was no fool he followed you here. I should have shot you both that night."

"It is good odds," Hedger said, "that I will have to shoot you before I am done."

"We are quarreling," Greg said slowly, "on the edge of an abyss it is good odds we will not get across. We had better suspend our private pleasures."

Smurthwaite's voice floated in: "Miss Shaler's car is going down the lane." Greg cautiously looked out. The rain had stopped, the west was clearing, and Hope's yellow coupé was seen through mud toward Thatcher. "Is Thatcher home?" he called. waite said, "He has not come after."

Greg turned back to his repulse. "It will be much more comfortable if they do not meet again. I will try." He fixed his eyes on the swinish eyes. "Have you brains enough to realize we are in deadly peril? May be already lost? If we are taken tonight, then we must get out tonight—we two at least. And now nothing left for us but"—he tightened with contempt—"you odds. If fate had sent me anything but a fool to work with, there would have been no danger and no need to take a chance at all. Now everything hangs on us but one thing. We have just one chance."

"Yes," Hedger said with satisfaction. "we can finish it now."

"AND Greg said coldly, 'leave Wallisport with another crime to be traced to us. You think you can do anything in America with impunity? Where are you going from here? Where are you for you to go? Do you believe you will not be traced?'"

"Bah! Already your brilliant plan have called it a drowning and for it. Who is there to think otherwise?"

"For one, it took Thatcher twenty-four hours to find out. It is an excellent thing for us both that he decided to consult me. But it is because he has spotted you that he has been taken care of. There is just one thing," Greg said calmly, "that has kept me from letting him find you and taking you off my hands. He would find you very soon, though he does not think so—our great good fortune is that the county families are more competent at sport than at deduction. But he will find you and relieve me of all responsibility for you. But he would also prove that he saw me, or my brother."

"So!" Hedger said. "The girl is yours?"

"Not in words. But she made it even last night when she hurried away. And it was quite clear from the first, I have not seen how she could have helped it. I all but ran down when they were swimming. It was too was your fault!" He let his head leap up. "An accident born of your terror of being choked by a man who have choked you long before. So a less agreeable young man, easily a battalion of you, must pay for it."

"If you had knocked him on the head when you had him here last night could be already gone."

"Would we take the girl with us? do you suppose that a mass drowning would be treated by the police at the opening of the resort season?"

Smurthwaite came to the door and stood at attention. "I have discovered that the telephone wire is down where. At least, the instrument is out."

"That may be no disadvantage," Greg went to the window again. The clouds were blowing out to sea, the sky was smooth green, the trees were dripping. "The bay will be quiet again by now," he said. Hope's car was coming and he stood away from the window. "She does not know where he is and would not have come looking for him." He hardened to the last expedient few hours more—and at any time the morass that Wallisport had been would be behind him. He had no notion whatever about the job that remained to be done—except an end anger at Hedger, whose stupidity made it necessary. And his anger at Hedger was too costly to be indulged. The rest was as impersonal as a problem in mathematics. It was necessary way out, and there was an obstacle had to be red. It was too bad about Thatcher, man whom Greg even liked.

a stubborn and implacable young
He would follow Heinemann to of the earth, for Heinemann
d his friend. He would stop at kind no barrier. He would kill who was associated with Heine-and by now he knew that Greg ned to Hedger: "Get back into and stay there till dark." To waite: "Even so, nobody is to be in the house, or even past the et there be no lights anywhere house is to look dark and deserted.

ur eye on Thatcher's place. If nd catch up with him, he will probback sometime before dinner.
him. You will get the boat over back." He let his lips make a
e. "This time, you had better not Gorham for the car."

oked at his watch. "Four-thirty.
be very pleasant for us all if I him before his lady friend does.
in he is on the verge of a deduchis sure to make before long. If find him, I also will be back by f she finds him—well, it may be pice who will arrive. . . . And if elms before I do, well," he said
"I sincerely hope you both un-ted that he must not be allowed out again any farther than this

AS deep twilight when Caleb got one. Small branches littered his and he stumbled over some bricks drive that had probably been from a chimney. A disorderly ould once have demanded his attention before anything else, but that ing ago.

ing into the house, he suddenly lid that he was ravenous. He had nothing since breakfast. And with unger, a sharp rebellion roused
h. He might be taking Hope to ! That, he thought, would be in a world than his world would ever ain. But need it be? Was there reason why he should not forcibly everything away from him for one evening and give himself the delight of a last few hours untouched by anything? Why not take her to dinner?

Find some quiet place beside the water, or drive to Boston where there would be music. One such evening, even, as they and Bert had had in any dingy diner. He would watch the subtleties in her eyes change and deepen. He could . . .

He went to the telephone. But he wasn't going to take Hope to dinner, for the storm seemed to have fetched a wire.

Just as well. And that kind of impulse must not be allowed to master him again. It was the kind of impulse that he must root out at all costs.

He set water heating for coffee, got out eggs and bacon, bread, butter, stood looking with intense repugnance at the cans on his shelves. If he had been dining with Hope!

Something creaked somewhere, and Caleb's nerves clanged. The impact of that instantaneous fear was, once it had abated, probably more alarming than the fear itself. He had had no idea that he had got so jumpy. He had supposed that he was in excellent shape, ready for anything, completely in control.
This suggested that he was far otherwise.

There was something to be learned from that. He went to the cabinet in his bedroom and got out his automatic. He would feel better with that in his pocket, probably. It would have been good sense to arm himself long ago. He tried the action, glanced down the barrel, got out a package of cartridges and began to fill the clip.

He was interrupted by steps on the front porch and a knock at the door. He went out and there was Smurthwaite.
"Mr. Ashburn told me to bring you a note, sir," Smurthwaite said.

Caleb carried it in to a desk lamp.
The two lines said, "I think I've located the girl in the bathing suit. Come and talk it over."

The coffee was beginning to give off an aroma that made him wet his lips.
But he wasn't going to eat for a while.
"Okay, Smurthwaite," Caleb said, "I'll go back with you."

(To be continued next week)

"This campaign has made a nervous wreck out of the senator"

LEONARD DOVE

This Vermont Farmer's Wife Knew A Thing Or Two About Soup!

This "Receipt" Is Typical Of Those Used In American Homes Years Ago

Mrs. Raeburn's Chicken Soup. The day before you want the soup, dress a well-fatted hen and put it in a kettle with cold water, a bunch of sweet herbs and some peppercorns if you have them. Set the pot on the back of the stove so it may cook slowly as possible—upwards of 3 hrs. Skim several times. When meat is tender and slips from the bones, take it out and cut it up. Cool soup in an earthen bowl and put back chicken. Next day place on stove again. Add a small onion (size of walnut), some sticks of celery, a tea-cupful of rice washed in three waters. Season and salt to suit your taste. Just before serving, thicken the soup with the yellows of 2 or 3 new-laid eggs. Throw in a little chopped parsley.

*Now Heinz Recreates This Famous Country-Style Soup With Tender Chicken And Fluffy
Rice In A Rich Savory Broth*

1. When Heinz chefs make soup, they follow, step-by-step, old-time home methods and prized recipes—passed along from neighbor to neighbor—from one generation of good cooks to the next.
That's why these soups taste homemade.

2. Today Heinz Country-style Chicken Soup, newest addition to Heinz 23 home-style favorites, is fast becoming one of America's most popular ready-to-serve soups. Rich, savory, fragrant—a soup that makes a man eat like a boy again!

FOR SUCH a soup as Heinz Country-style Chicken Soup—housewives once began their preparations the day before! But now it's ready—waiting—in "57" tins at grocers everywhere. Finished, perfect soup needing no additions—complete in every savory detail—even to the seasoning of sweet herbs, the egg yolk, fluffy rice, tender chicken. . . . Heinz Soups cost less than like soups made at home.

Heinz Country Style Chicken Soup

AGAIN IN 1940, H. J. Heinz Co. cordially invites you to visit the gigantic Heinz Dome with its beautiful, interesting display walls and sampling booths while you attend the New York World's Fair.

"You Look Lovelier Every Day"

Use Pepsodent with Irium to Remove Ugly Surface-Stains that Discolor Teeth!

Official dental opinion, backed by 47,000 dentists, declares Pepsodent to be Safe, Effective and Truthfully Advertised . . . It removes Surface-Stains that make teeth look dull, dingy.

If you want to see the true beauty of your teeth, remove ugly surface-stains that glue themselves to naturally sparkling surfaces. But if you want to be sure that you remove Surface-Stains quickly, effectively, safely, switch to Pepsodent.

Here's why! Only Pepsodent, of all tooth pastes and tooth powders, contains Irium, known to dentists as Purified Alkyl Sulfate. Irium is the Plus that enables Pepsodent to do a better job. And you can be sure of it! Because when you see the Seal of Acceptance of the American Dental Association on Pepsodent's advertisements, it means that 47,000 dentists stand back of the opinion Pepsodent is Safe, Effective, Truthfully Advertised. That's why you can trust Pepsodent with Irium completely.

Switch to Pepsodent with Irium today. See how much brighter your teeth will look when Surface-Stains are gone.

This Seal is Proof
PEPSODENT is

Safe Effective
Truthfully Advertised

Occupation: Widow

Continued from page 21

Maria hurried to it, even as Carola said, "I'll answer." Maria stopped and frowned and Carola took the telephone.

A woman's voice said, "This is Senta Mainescu. May I call on you?"

Carola hesitated, then remembered that Blaerchen had told her to see the woman. She looked up and saw Maria standing near by, listening to every word. "When would you like to come?"

"Tomorrow afternoon?"

"Very well."

Carola sat down uneasily, reminded again of Blaerchen's laughter when she had spoken with him in the morning. It was the laughter of someone pleased at a dreadful practical joke.

Pfennersstrasse is near Alexanderplatz, in the poorest part of Berlin. On it was a large seven-story apartment house, with eight entries off a dirty courtyard. The windows looking down on it were grayish. The vestibules and landings were crowded with boxes, trunks and possessions that the small apartments could not contain. On the dark stairways people frequently stumbled over baby carriages. The air smelled of cabbage cooked some time ago or, at times, the damp vegetable odor of a root cellar.

A sign at the entrance, Room for Rent, giving an apartment number on the sixth floor, attracted Karl. It was a detached single room. He took it.

BECAUSE he was out of a concentration camp he had to register with the police; that was done. Now, perhaps, they would shadow him to see what he did in his first days of freedom and who his friends were. Anyone who shadowed Karl followed a man who, to all appearances, was just wasting time, a man who walked the streets aimlessly, never stopping to look in shop windows, a man who shivered in the bitter winter wind as he returned to his room, his thin coat wrapped tightly around him.

A shadower would have noticed only one break in this routine: on the first morning Karl mailed a letter.

Until an answer came Karl could do nothing. He knew he should find a job and earn a living but until his letter was answered he could not concentrate on job hunting. He still had forty marks left and that would last a week. The answer to that letter would satisfy an appetite deeper than hunger.

One letter did come to the hotel where he had stayed for two days before finding his room. It was from Carola, breaking the luncheon engagement and saying, "I do hope we meet soon." Probably Blaerchen had told her about his prison record. Karl had thought so often about her in Buchenwald. On dark and damp nights in prison when a man could keep from going mad by flight in imagination to a happy past, he had remembered her jonquil-colored hair, her deeply blue eyes, the cadence of her voice. Now they had met and she was a friend of Blaerchen. That was natural; Blaerchen and her husband had been friends. Karl knew that he and she were on opposite sides, without bridge or approach between them. To think in bitterness of such things only made a man restless. They could be forever forgotten when an answer to his letter came.

In these days of waiting he talked to only one person, a large fat-faced man who knocked at his door one evening. "Herr Dietrich? I'm Hans Kreitz." He said it as if the name should be familiar. "I'm the house warden." Without waiting for an invitation Kreitz came into the room. House wardens were petty Nazi officials, assigned to check on the dwellers in one house or one block of houses. Kreitz now looked down at him as if he were seeing some particularly unattractive subhuman specimen. "You're just out of prison, nicht wahr?" Kreitz scowled. "Look here, Dietrich, I don't want any dirty tricks from you. Understand? I'm responsible for you. You get yourself a job at once and have yourself." Then he asked, "Have you a cigarette?"

"I gave them up," Karl said. "Too expensive!"

Kreitz hesitated, as if that deserved a reprimand for being an anti-social mark, then went downstairs.

Karl shrugged his shoulders. He had seen that type of Aryan ox among the guards at Buchenwald. There were no important things to think of. The row might bring the answer to his question.

It came two days later, an envelope with a picture postcard saying, "Meet me at noon today." It was signed "R." The card gave no hint of who the meeting would take place nor where it would be there. Karl understood well the reason for secrecy in the message; he wished it were a little more understandable. He turned the card over and saw an ordinary view of the statue of Frederick the Great near the Lustgarten. Then, looking at the picture again, Karl was sure he understood.

Just before noon, in icy sunlight, Karl waited near the statue.

On the curb across the way from the statue, he watched the statue casually, and then a man who looked as if he had escaped a few minutes from his desk at the end of a routine of years. Karl waited at the base of the statue, studying it as if to memorize every small detail on it. The elderly man left his place and came toward the statue. He was about the age of Karl when he asked quietly, "Herr Dietrich? Follow me to a bus!"

A few minutes later Karl sat in the rear of an uncrowded bus.

"I am Hans Klauss." The man's voice was low. "How is our friend in Buchenwald—Doctor Rorer?"

"As well as the guards permit him to be."

Klauss nodded thoughtfully. "How did you get to know him?"

"I stumbled out of line a year ago while the guards were running us out of an enclosure," Karl explained, his voice steady. "One of the guards beat me for falling." He saw Klauss smile. "Oh, I was fortunate! I have seen men beaten to death for some such mistake. After that I could do no more work and I was assigned to the kitchen. Doctor Rorer was there. He has been beaten around the head."

KLAUSS said quietly, "He was a doctor. He saved thousands of lives during his career. He has a right to be cynical today."

Karl shook his head. "He is the most hopeful man I met in prison and the kindest. When my back hurt, he tried to save the grease that they gave us for our bread and he rubbed it on my back. His voice was suddenly tender: 'I will never forget him.'"

Klauss watched two people enter the bus, then said, "I understand."

"He gave me your address and told me how to write you."

"I'm glad he did." Then Klauss asked, "Is there something I can do for you?"

Karl understood the hesitation. Klauss might think that Karl was a provocateur, sent to act on some forced out of Doctor Rorer. The doctor had foreseen that. Now Karl looked carefully around the bus. No one lowered his voice: "I would help in your work." That did not change Klaus's look of hesitation. He told me that if you doubted my sincerity I should say to you, 'Aunt permits it.' He smiled. "I do not understand that but Doctor Rorer would understand."

Klaus nodded and looked relieved. He said back. "It is hard to know what to trust!" He looked out to see if they were. "Let us go somewhere else."

A few minutes later they came down the street along the Spree. It was clear that the weathered barges on the river looked, as ever, as if they had always been there, as permanent as the apartments behind them. Then they passed up a little street and into a small bar in the basement of a house. It smelled of cooking cabbage and sour beer. A dozen tables were set out and no one paid attention to the men who took a table in the Klaus signaled to a waiter, Karl looked at his face. He was older than Karl. His face had few wrinkles but they were deep ones. It showed his age but it was not so much worn as old; everything about it implied age. His deep-set eyes were kindly and understanding.

Klaus ordered beer, Karl looked at the low-ceilinged room. At every table men were talking, but there was no sound of conversation; more than that, there was no laughter. Klaus saw the way one man sat alone at a table. He toyed with a glass of beer. From time to time he glanced at Klaus with a questioning look. It was a look of recognition yet the man made no move to speak and Karl was uncertain whether or not to call Klaus's attention to it. Then as the waiter drew Klaus looked at the man and perceptibly nodded. Karl saw that Klaus wondered whether he had blundered into a trap.

The stranger left his table and joined them. "This is Franz Ranke, my son-in-law," Klaus said pleasantly. "He is a good list."

Karl relaxed, Ranke extended his hand. He had waited until Klaus had told him that Karl was not suspect. "Very glad to meet you," he said. "He was young. His was a friendly pointed face, weighted with glasses, the kind of face seen at a public library, bent over the reading table until the last second before closing time."

"Doctor Rorer sent him to us," Klaus said significantly.

They were two men who fought on opposite sides! Karl felt that he was friends for the first time in years. "Why did they let you out of Buchenwald?" Ranke asked.

"I was injured slightly a little while ago and couldn't do heavy work," Karl explained. "And they've been filling up Buchenwald with prisoners so they let us go."

"You were lucky."

Karl nodded. "One of the guards said, 'You should we feed you? Get out and feed yourself—if you can!'"

"You must let me lend you some money until you find work," Klaus said, reminded of something.

"Thank you. But more than enough!"

Klaus understood. As a matter of fact he looked around the room cautiously. Then, in a low voice, "You said if there was something you could do for us. We must be honest. At this stage of the war any underground movement must go slowly. The German people have not yet had enough of the privations of war."

Ranke interrupted impatiently, "The army—"

"With Hitler leading to one victory after another, the army will start no revolt," Klaus said. "If Germany is defeated, there will be a popular revolt and the army may take that over. If Germany wins—"

"Won't that end underground work?" Karl asked.

"On the contrary," Klaus said confidently. "The Nazis will never agree on a division of spoils. Never! If they should win, what do they get? Bankruptcy in all Europe and a chase for spoils. More than ever, that will be our opportunity."

"We should do something definite, now," Ranke said sharply.

"My son-in-law and I do not always agree," Klaus smiled. He seemed restless. "Let's go outdoors." On the street Klaus said apologetically, "I can carry on a conversation indoors just so long."

Karl understood. It was safest to assume that no place was really safe. As the three men swung into step, he wondered how many thousand people in Germany at this moment were walking through cold streets with friends, to be able to say things without fear of listening walls, lamps, telephone, radiators and picture frames.

Klaus took up the conversation again: "Underground groups must avoid detection, they must keep their contacts with friends abroad, they must gather information here, they must keep contact with other underground groups of a dozen different persuasions and beliefs. But most important, they must hold on! Time is on our side. The Nazis are the best allies we have—the corruption, the cruelty, and the selfishness of those men!"

They walked on in silence then, while Karl tried to fit himself into the situation, "What can I do?"

Klaus smiled at him as if he were an impatient schoolboy. "There is much to do, but I should say the important thing is to get a job for yourself."

"That does not seem important if I can help you."

As if following his own thoughts, Ranke interrupted: "It's this doing everything slowly that wrecks men's nerves."

"Yes, Franz," Klaus said as if to quiet him. Then, to Karl: "Do you know any person here with connections who could help you find work?"

"I KNOW Blaerchen in the Foreign Office," Karl said. "But I should prefer not to ask him for anything."

"Blaerchen!" Ranke snorted. "Men like him should be destroyed."

Klaus smiled gently. "One man does not make a system. The system is what we must aim at, the system on which Blaerchen and his friends fatten. That has been one weakness of our underground work. We have aimed too much at one man, at Hitler."

"Hitler, Himmler, Goebbels, Blaerchen," Ranke broke in. "What difference? If we could only do something at once!" Ranke had the amazing quality of a man who is always talking to himself. It was in the aimless gesturing of his hands, in his glance which was never fixed anywhere, in his colorless tone of voice.

"Blaerchen is one of the group that Ribbentrop brought into the Foreign Office," Klaus said. "Naturally, the old Foreign Office men hate them. Blaerchen helped to set up the so-called Ribbentrop Bureau, a very active espionage group."

"Why, with the Gestapo—?" Karl asked.

"This is espionage chiefly for Ribbentrop's benefit," Ranke explained. "The most important fight in Germany today is the fight of Ribbentrop against Goer-

Get in the Swim

Replace
with a

DELCO
battery

Millions of car owners the world over are daily proving the dependability, long life and quick starting qualities of Delco batteries. So, isn't it logical to join these millions by making your next battery a Delco? There are types and sizes of Delco batteries to fit all passenger cars and commercial vehicles. There is a Delco battery dealer near you.

Delco batteries are original equipment in all General Motors cars. Be sure to register your new battery with your car dealer or Delco battery dealer. Delco batteries are distributed nationally under the direction of United Motors Service.

Delco-Remy

World's Largest Manufacturer of Automotive Electrical Equipment

YOU ARE never very far from a can of Sani-Flush. You'll find it in most bathrooms for cleaning toilets. So don't wait for a car radiator to hiss and boil. Keep it cleaned out. Use Sani-Flush twice a year. See directions on can.

It cannot injure motor or fittings. It removes rust, scale, sediment and sludge. Your car runs cooler. Power is saved. You may save on expensive repair bills due to overheating. Clean out the radiator yourself for 10c (25c for the largest truck or tractor). Or ask your service station to do the job for you. Insist on Sani-Flush. Sold by grocery, drug, hardware, and 5-and-10c stores. 10c and 25c sizes. The Hygienic Products Co., Canton, Ohio.

Sani-Flush Safe NOT CAUSTIC
CLEANS OUT RADIATORS

FILMS DEVELOPED & PRINTED 20¢
Automatic Process—Develops Your Movies!
Satisfaction Guaranteed or Money Refunded WRAP 20¢ IN COIN WITH YOUR FILM AND SEND TO AUTOFOTO - 945 Broadway, New York, N.Y.

For RELIEF of
Sunburn Cooling, soothing MENTHOLATUM relieves sunburn quickly.
MENTHOLATUM

Now you can really SEE what you're getting!

No squinting at a tiny image, no guesswork, no doubt: You SEE your scene large and clear—and snap exactly what you want. You'll get a new thrill from this easy way of making grand pictures!

BRILLIANT VIEW-FINDER SHOWS THE SCENE LARGE AND PERFECTLY CLEAR.

2 1/4 x 2 1/4 Pictures.

Uses Eastman or Agfa 12-picture roll
Sold everywhere with 12 months guarantee.

$3.98 Complete

Falcon Magni-Vue
REFLEX STYLE CAMERA
FREE Write for free catalog of all latest Falcon models.

UTILITY MFG. CO., INC., 40 W. 25 ST., NEW YORK

ing and Himmler. Remember, Herr Ribbentrop was left out of Hitler's plans for his successors. Hitler named Goering, then Hess, and Hitler won't last forever. Ribbentrop does not approve of that order."

"That explains a story I heard in Buchenwald," Karl said. "Someone there said that Ribbentrop had caught one of Goering's men opening his files and had him arrested. Goering demanded his freedom. Ribbentrop told him, 'First, send back the two of mine you caught last week!'"

No one smiled.

"Blaerchen and several others have been the leaders of the Ribbentrop Bureau," Klauss added. "We've had information about many of his agents."

"Many of them are women," Ranke said. "I met one once, a Rumanian named Mainescu."

For just a second Karl thought of Carola. She, too, was a friend of Blaerchen but, after all, that was her choice. There were more important things to think about.

The three men reached Potsdamerplatz, and Ranke said, "I must leave you here."

"My son-in-law is on one of the newspapers," Klauss explained.

"My work used to be called journalism," Ranke said. "Today there is another and uglier name for it."

Then Ranke said goodbye and turned up the street.

"If you'd like to walk a little more—!" Klauss said.

"I'll be glad to."

They continued down Potsdamerstrasse.

"By the way," Klauss said, "in the future any contacts between us will have to be through my son-in-law. You must never come to my house. You can telephone but always say Cousin Karl is arriving. I'll understand and arrange a meeting for you and Ranke."

Karl nodded. He was disappointed that Klauss had not offered him definite work. He had waited long for a chance to do something. Hesitantly, he asked, "Isn't there anything I can do for you?"

KLAUSS smiled warmly. "You are very eager, Herr Dietrich. Why?"

"The police took me from the stage of the Krokodil one night," Karl explained, "and charged me with making anti-Nazi remarks. I was only echoing what men in the street were saying and without their malice. That's why I'm eager to help you, to do anything."

"I understand," Klauss said paternally. He looked at Karl, then said slowly, "I can offer you a specific job at once but it is dangerous. I can only tell you what it is and leave the decision about doing it up to you." He smiled warmly. "If you refuse, I shall understand."

"What is it?" Karl asked quietly.

Klauss did not answer directly. "I should tell you first, frankly, that my son-in-law offered himself yesterday but I would not permit it. It needs a cooler, less excitable man."

"What do you want me to do?"

"One of our friends told me of a person in the Foreign Office who is willing to work with us," Klauss said. "I have no guarantee that he is sincere. For all I know, it might be a Gestapo trap."

"And if he is sincere?"

"It would be a valuable contact. We have friends in government ministries but it has been difficult for us to get information from the Foreign Office. It may mean walking directly into the hands of the police."

Karl nodded. "You want me to meet the man?"

"If you wish."

Karl thought of the years in Buchenwald, the odor of the cells, the cries in the night, the shuffle of lamed feet. But someone had to take risks, or Blaerchen and his kind would be forever safe. He answered, "Tell me the details."

Ten minutes later Karl left Klauss and walked briskly, no longer aimless. The first thing was to find a public telephone booth and he saw none near by. It was a crisp January afternoon, clear and fresh, fresh as the air at Buchenwald never was. He passed a cellar saloon. There would be a public telephone here. He hesitated before entering, as if this were the decisive step.

In the saloon a middle-aged woman stood behind the bar. All the tables were empty. "Have you a telephone?" Karl asked pleasantly.

The woman gestured to one in the corner.

Karl had memorized a number and knew what he had to say. He asked the operator for a number, hoping that this call was not going to a man in uniform, seated at a desk in the Gestapo office.

A man answered, "Hello!"

As he had been instructed, Karl asked, "Are there any plays worth seeing in town?"

The voice at the other end said quietly, "There is Manon Lescaut at the Volks Oper."

"Very well. When would you like to go?"

"How about tomorrow night?"

"Tomorrow night will be convenient."

That was all the conversation necessary. Karl left the barroom hurriedly before anyone could possibly trace the number.

While Carola waited for Senta Mainescu to come, the echo of Blaerchen's laughter over the telephone stayed with her. This, she was sure, would be more than a polite social call. She spent a long time at her mirror, combing her long hair smooth and smoother, as if every detail of the impression she would make was important.

THE presence of Maria was a problem for the first time. Whatever was said in the living room could be heard clearly in the kitchen.

Shortly before four, Carola said to her, "Will you please do some shopping for me?"

"Certainly, Fräulein. Now?"

"Yes." She had a blouse in her hand. "Would you try to find some of this same material?"

Maria shook her head vigorously. "There's no material like that anywhere in Berlin. If there was they would not sell it without a ration card."

"Please do as I say!" Carola exploded.

With the air of one going on a fool's errand and going suspiciously left the house.

Mlle. Mainescu came on time. "You are so good to let me come," she said. "Berlin is no place for a lonely woman. You have a nice apartment. That was a little too casual for me. I was sure that the woman was to talk about apartments."

"They're so hard to find," she added. "Nothing is very easy in Berlin. Berlin changed while you were away."

CAROLA was sure that this indirect approach to some carefully planned as the first act of a play. In the next two minutes the woman touched on night singing, the opera, and a performance of the Brahms Requiem, which she had just heard.

She even turned to the subject of ration cards, as a housewife in Berlin would do. "It makes life difficult to suppose we should not complain. But I have heard that you know important people you can get around many restrictions. Your friend, Rolf Blaerchen, could help."

Carola would not let herself be surprised at that name. "I know," she said colorlessly.

"I should think he'd be on your mind, step eager to help, after all you know him and you did for him." Against the same aimless sort of remark.

"He hasn't been," Carola said. "I've seen him once quite casually."

Senta rambled on. "Of course, politics now," she went on. "That takes him far from the entertainment world."

"I suppose so."

The woman came forward in her own way as if to tell an important secret: "You'll find things in Berlin have changed! You'll find out. Politics and the war are all the matter." She pouted, "They don't notice an attempt at a new hat, though God knows, anything like that is a to get."

The woman had no reason to complain. She was well dressed.

"Of course, I can't blame them for being absorbed in politics," Senta continued, "considering the prizes."

"I know little about politics here anywhere," Carola said.

"You don't need to know about politics," Senta laughed. "Men prefer to talk to us about other things! But they're by themselves they talk not but politics. That's all that inter-

Each one is ambitious, of course. Germany, government promotion, custom-bound. A man knew he could expect every year until today an ambitious man has fifty minutes this conversation almost a monologue and Carol still suspicious. Yet there was that this was all harmless, simple matter of a talkative woman. makes a woman's part difficult, times. An ambitious man is eager possible help and he may end the friends."

at was an indirect reference to the thing specific. It might refer to a man looked up, as if to see that had made any impression. hushed.

that man's enemies will appear and be glad"—she smiled with emphasis—"be very glad to aid them!"

was not a suspicious word in the remark but the way she said it Carol sure that she was fitting it one certain case.

woman has a career in politics" the emphasis—"if she wishes many questions that Carol might ask would be cheerfully answered she was sure!

ly turned in the front door lock Carol was startled. That would be home before she was expected. prying quick the Rumanian was on her feet. Maria!"

"Fräulein Mainescu! I—thank you—I'm well." Maria stammered. Carol looked confused.

Then she heard Mainescu say coldly. "So you have only seen Herr Blaerchen casually! What a careful choice of words!"

"I beg your pardon?"

"I presume you found Maria at an employment bureau, nicht wahr?" She turned at the door and her coolness was gone. Now she was hot angry. "In the days when I knew Rolf Blaerchen and was engaged to him, Maria was my maid, too. And when you report this conversation to him tell him for me I do not fear him any longer. Tell him I am going to marry a man from an old family whom he will not dare to harm!"

The closing door jarred the apartment.

"Maria!" Carol was able to control herself. "I want you to say nothing about this to anyone." The point of Mainescu's conversation was clear. She could find employment working for Blaerchen's enemies! Certainly, Mainescu worked for them. "I myself will speak to Herr Blaerchen."

Maria was staring at the living-room wall. She looked helpless, ready to cry. Her red, chapped hands were fumbling with her shoddy coat.

"Now that we understand each other, bring me some coffee!" Then Carol's nerves snapped: "Hurry! Hurry up!"

Maria waddled toward the kitchen. Carol watched her go, suddenly realizing what that walk recalled. It was the waddle of a person with a ring of keys hitting at her belt, the waddle of a jailer.

(To be continued next week)

The Wounded Don't Cry

Continued from page 9

from the burning part of the But that was half a mile away. darkness partially hid hundreds of forms lying on the ground in front of a long shed where the wounded were brought.

I picked my way among them and into the shed. Three nurses and a doctor were there. There were four men there and three civilian men. The three nurses were examining the wounded and putting disinfectants on the wounds and then bandaging them. They were very wonderful. They gave patience and kindness and skill in the abundance to a dull-witted Englishman and a handsome young captain. One of the nurses looked for a breath and she told me that she and the other two were from this city; had been born in it and learned nursing in it and would die for it. I was getting a warm, friendly feeling for this city. This, after all, is the story of the city and I mention the wounded and the hospital merely as incidents connected with the death of the symptoms perhaps of why it was dead.

The night was alive with little noises the sound of the ambulances coming the whispers of the stretcher bearers, "Easy boy, you'll be all right," of the American ambulance drivers. Now then they would have to wait for a while and I would have a smoke with my Morgan, whom his pals called Man Mountain Dean because of his black head, and with the ridiculously youth-looking Jon Thorenson, with Carl Gley and Dave Stetson and the others. Peter Muir, in charge of the drivers, everywhere giving directions. "The ambulance is about full," Montgomery said. "This'll be our last load. These devils will have to stay here."

I went down to the station with their last load. The long train stood there patiently and perhaps two hundred wounded lay on the platform waiting their turn. But there was only room now for the badly hurt. It was very quiet at the station. We unloaded three of our four wounded into a car.

"No more room," the man in the car said tersely.

"We'll find room," James said.

I walked through the cars with him. Each one was filled. The wounded lay on stretchers three high and then they lay on the floor. There wasn't an inch of room left on the train. We had to bring one lone casualty back to the hospital. We sat there in front and James said, "I haven't nerve enough to tell him."

The Bombers Strike

He and Montgomery looked at me but I looked away. Montgomery lit a cigarette, took a deep breath and got out of the car. He helped the stretcher bearers take the boy out. He put his cigarette between the boy's lips and he said, "There's another train in a few hours, kid. Don't worry."

We drove back to the camp the boys had made under a large shed that had recently sheltered horses. The night was just beginning to get tired of it all and there was a glimmer of gray in the east. We sat under the shed on straw and smoked and had a drink of whisky and muddy water, and it was good. Some of the boys flopped down on the straw and went right to sleep. I wished we could have taken the stretchers out of the ambulances and slept on them but the stretchers were full of rather horrible reminders of the many wounded who had lain in them today and even at the front it is silly not to consider infection. Who wants to get killed by a bug?

I had been at or near the front with He'll offer pointers to a riding master....

BUT HAS TROUBLE
STICKING ON "OLD NELL"

Anyone Can Make Big Claims...
But Performance is What Counts

Prove this Performance at our Risk!

We absolutely guarantee that Alemite Motor Oil will Go Farther—and Last Longer—than any other oil
you've ever used or it doesn't cost you a penny!

Prove It At Our Risk!

Have your crankcase filled with genuine
ALEMITE Motor Oil... and keep the sales slip.
Then if you don't drive farther than ever before without needing to add oil, send us the sales slip and we'll refund every cent you paid!

Stewart-Warner Corporation, Chicago
Stewart-Warner-Alemite Corp. of Canada, Ltd., Belleville, Ont.

ALEMITE
REG. U.S. PAT. OFFICE
100% Pure Super-Pennsylvania
MOTOR OIL
ANOTHER STEWART-WARNER PRODUCT

A Flavor THAT SAYS
 "KENTUCKY'S FINEST BOURBON"

NOW 4 YEARS OLD

With a mellowness, a smoothness unmatched through the years, GLENMORE (Silver Label) now comes to you as an older whiskey, a greater value. Advanced to bonding age, it is still being bottled at 90 proof for mildness.

From the distillery with more than a million barrels experience.

Copr. 1940
 Glenmore Distilleries Co., Incorporated

Pour
Glenmore
 ..you get more

NO INCREASE IN PRICE

• OTHER GLENMORE PRODUCTS •

KENTUCKY STRAIGHT BOURBON WHISKEY

A BLEND OF STRAIGHT WHISKIES

KENTUCKY STRAIGHT BOURBON WHISKEY

the French army for some time and it was exciting to be with these Americans. We talked of colleges we had been to and of football and of a man named Roosevelt. One of the Boston men said, "Tonight I'd slug anyone who made a crack about Roosevelt." I liked that and I took out a pack of American cigarettes I'd been hoarding and gave it to him. I regretted it later and maybe sometime I can get it back from the President.

We were on a hill and from it we could see the city dying. The light from the flames was dull now because the dawn was thinning it out, so we slept after a fashion, but in an hour a man blew three notes on a bugle and that woke us. In this city that was the "Alerte." That meant German planes are coming.

We walked sleepily out from under the shed and into the open field. It was bright daylight although it was only five-thirty. We heard the drone of the planes and knew without looking up that these were the two-motored Dornier bombers. But we looked up. There were only six of them flying in their familiar triangle with the odd two following the base of the triangle. We yawned. This hadn't been worth waking up for. But then we saw another formation of six following and another and another...

They weren't high. They started dropping bombs. They were big bombs. We lay down in the fields, for there were no ditches, no holes to get into. We lay there looking at them. A few anti-aircraft guns began to bark foolishly. The planes came over us. The bombs dropped close to us. They made a heavy noise and you shook your head to clear it of the concussion.

"There's a hundred of them," someone called from behind a bush.

"I count 120," someone else said.

The bombs fell and whistled loudly and then exploded and you wished you were somewhere else. They were falling on our city. Thank God that one train had pulled out! The bombs kept falling forever. Five minutes can be forever. Then the planes disappeared into the sun. They hadn't been interrupted once.

Someone made coffee. We all felt tired now. A French artilleryman who had been manning an anti-aircraft gun in the next field came over for coffee. He had strong glasses with him. He had counted 126. That's a lot of planes.

Jack James said, "Anyone who says he isn't scared up here is either a liar or a damn fool."

Courage Through Fear

We all nodded agreement. It was nice to know that James had been scared a little. He was the best of us, we all felt, tough, hardworking and with the gentleness of big, tough men. Once he said that he had been scared, we all felt better and we could lift our filled coffee cups without spilling more than a few drops. The planes came back three times within the next two hours. The tension drained us of vitality. In disgust James and Larry Morgan and Fuller pulled straw over them and went back to sleep.

Now a lazy column of black smoke came up from our city. Our city had been given its death blow and we knew it. It could never be proud of its lovely cathedral again. Its few small factories were smoldering sullenly.

Two hours after the planes had left for the last time there were three dull explosions. The planes had dropped delayed-action bombs. That isn't good, because the ambulance men go into wreckage as soon as the planes leave, trying to save some people, and the thought that these time bombs may be lurking underneath a destroyed wall makes you work very quickly a times you can't work as e Mind you, it doesn't prevent t going into the buildings which hotly writhing in their death a it forces them to work too quic

Edwin Watts was hurt by one He was in a building when a bomb exploded near by. The w house began to totter and Watts braced himself against and held it upright until the were gotten out. He wasn't ba but he won't drive an ambula month or so.

Orders came from somewhere to leave the dying city. We w ask questions: What of the couldn't get on the train las What of that smiling nurse who she was born in the city and w in it? What of the big Senegale had orders to get out.

Farewell to a Dying City

That meant that there was the boys could do. They ar twenty ambulances had to move few miles. They hated to leave because they had come to love that seems silly maybe we all ge silly hearing guns all the tin watching bombers drop death in steel containers. Silly or no true. I hated to leave it and did the excuse the ambulance drive They thought they could still do thing. I was a parasite, watching giving nothing, helping none. hated to leave this dying city.

You act quickly when you get at the front. Ken Downs, the Ar newspaperman, was with me. I virtually been stowaways in the alance driven by James and Mo ery. We had no right to stay but make an effort. We saw the col charge of this section of the army. We said that we couldn't we had no means of transportat would have to stay for a while. can walk," he said abruptly.

I pointed to what is perha healthiest ankle in France and "Mais Mon Colonel, the ankle y see..."

I often wondered what it to make a French officer lose his I was a nuisance to them a h times but their exquisite, smiling tesy never deserted them. Somew this world or the next there may more magnificent body of men th officers of the French army. I do very much. The colonel expressed pathy and he smiled with his gra eyes and he said: "I will arrange portation."

He gave us a car and a drive after we'd gone a while we aske driver to stop. We wanted to tal other look at this little city. I w dying, all right. Those four ugl umns of black smoke were thick Mind you, in the military sense, th of this little city meant nothing. were no munition factories her wasn't any kind of military base. just a small, insignificant French that fate had tossed into the pa the ruthless god of war. Its did not help the German cause i slightest.

We watched it burn for a little and then told the driver to get on. a pretty silent ride. It may be that American ambulance drivers ha flavored the city with their presen for us it had become a part of our try. All I can say is that it was m tough to watch it die and some da like to meet those who killed it. I to have Downs and James and M and Thorenson and Montgomery the rest of them with me. Yes, would be nice.

Girl from Home

Continued from page 15

ographers in New York." She put down on the small table near "I met him a month ago when men to buy photographic supplies work. He'll probably be here now. He's developing some of a summer street scene he took this morning."

er was something revealing about portrait—something about Dora's young neck and her breast that to explain Sturgess' interest in composition," Doris said. "I Clinton wouldn't understand it." guess not!"

soon discovered several things at Dora Appleby that Clinton understand. They sat there in a room which was filled with a twilight and the sad rumble of traffic. It was funny, she seemed and strange with the unfamiliar sounding expressions she had and the new way of dressing and her hair. And yet he caught thinking: She's got a scar on her forehead from falling from a tree behind when she was eleven years old. had almost forgotten about Sturgess when the door pushed open and he saw a tall, wiry man with a pale, handsome face. He stood in the doorway for a moment, hat still on, and stared at Sturgess walked toward him, almost as if he were a statue; and the way she walked and the tall, silent figure gave Hugh a feeling. It was as if she walked with a purpose—had to walk toward Wade Sturgess.

"Sturgess," Sturgess said, "the films are excellent!" His voice was smooth, emotional.

"So glad," Doris said, her own face lower, almost reverent. Then, one of her quick, birdlike moves, turned to include Hugh: "Oh, Wade is Hugh Barlow—you know—I thought he was coming today."

Sturgess remained in the doorway and found himself walking toward there was only a second's hesitation before the tall man brought up his hat but it was long enough to make him conscious of it.

"Hello," Hugh said. "We were just talking about you."

Wade Sturgess bowed his head slightly. Then he turned to Doris: "I can't stay, little pigeon. Some of the others are coming to the studio to work with me tonight. You're not going out, are you?"

Doris said, "Why, Hugh thought we'd go out for a while."

Sturgess looked annoyed. He turned his slow, dark eyes on Hugh and there passed between the two men that understanding challenge of one male to the other.

It was only a moment, but it was significant—happening there in the soft light of the feminine room.

Wade Sturgess moved around as if he owned the place and he talked a lot about himself and their friends and his talk made no effort to include Hugh. After a time, he turned to Hugh: "Where you going tonight?"

Hugh said in his slow, even speech, "I don't know, yet. It doesn't make much difference, does it, Sturgess?"

For an instant Hugh saw the other man's eyes shift quickly and his whole character appeared there on his pale, handsome, selfish face and he felt a growing antagonism. Then Sturgess said to Doris, "I have to go back to the studio." Something like suspicion was in his eyes, as he walked to the door and went out.

A silence followed the closing door. Then Doris said, "That's Wade Sturgess. You didn't like him."

"How'd you guess it?"

She walked to the sofa and sat down. She tapped a cigarette on the lid of the aluminum box and Hugh held a match for her.

"You don't understand Wade," she said quietly.

"I suppose not," Hugh said. "But I know you, Dora."

She looked up at him then, a funny, little, wise smile on her lips. "Think so? Well, I've changed a lot, Hugh. Sometimes I wake up and laugh at the way I used to be."

Hugh said, "You've lived! Is that it, Doris?"

"All right, Hugh Barlow, but it's true. I've changed. I want to tell you some-

"Back home, whenever I got one of these not-eating spells, Ma always fixed me some special little dishes"

LAURENCE REYNOLDS

FOR SAFETY'S Sake USE

Genuine LOCKHEED HYDRAULIC BRAKE FLUID

21

MADE IN UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
Wagner Electric Corporation
ST. LOUIS, MO. U.S.A.

To Save Your Life
- - - you can't find a better way to assure yourself of SAFE BRAKES than by having them checked periodically

FOR SAFETY'S SAKE don't guess about the condition of the hydraulic brake system of your automobile. Drive to an authorized station that displays the Wagner red, white and blue sign, and let a trained mechanic check your car.

If additional brake fluid is needed, Wagner Lockheed Fluid is the answer. If new parts are required, Wagner Lockheed Parts assure the kind of brake performance the automobile manufacturer had in mind when designing the car.

21 IS AN ALL-WEATHER YEAR-ROUND FLUID

The small cost of having a master cylinder filled to the correct level with No. 21 is negligible compared with the added safety gained. And one filling lasts a long time.

No. 21 is an all-season all-weather fluid, and is recommended for all hydraulic brakes. It retains its highly efficient qualities under all driving conditions. It completely and properly mixes with all other approved fluids, furnishes necessary lubrication for working parts of hydraulic brake system, and, in general, preserves the essential characteristics of the entire system.

FOR ALL CARS and TRUCKS

Behind this quality product are fifteen years of Wagner development and research. No. 21 is used by car manufacturers, and is recommended for the service needs of all cars and trucks having hydraulic brakes.

For safety's sake—why not have your car checked TODAY! There is a station near you.

BE WISE...HAVE YOUR CAR CHECKED PERIODICALLY at a STATION DISPLAYING THIS SIGN

Throughout the United States and Canada Wagner has selected thousands of well-equipped, experienced, reputable brake service stations and has identified them with the above Authorized Hydraulic Brake Service sign. Wherever you may drive, on pleasure or business, should your car need hydraulic brake service you will always feel at ease when driving into a station displaying this sign. It is your assurance that here genuine Wagner Lockheed parts and fluid are available, and the mechanic will be found to be well informed on hydraulic brake service. Remember, whenever your car needs hydraulic brake service, no matter where you may be, look for the Wagner Authorized Hydraulic Brake Service sign.

AUTOMOTIVE PARTS DIVISION H 40-7

Wagner Electric Corporation
6400 Plymouth Avenue, St. Louis, Mo., U. S. A.
(In Canada: Wagner Brake Service Company, Ltd., Toronto)

Wagner

LOCKHEED HYDRAULIC BRAKE PARTS and FLUID
...CoMaX BRAKE LINING... NoRoL...AIR BRAKES

"THERE'S NO CATCH TO THIS" SAID THE FISHERMAN

"What, no whales?" said Jerry, laughing at my empty creel. "Well, just quit jiggling your rod for a minute and sweeten your temper with a taste of Beeman's. That's real flavor, my lady. Refreshing enough to change any fisherman's luck!"

"Beeman's!" I cried. "Jerry, you angel—you know I can't resist it. Beeman's flavor is so luscious! So smooth and tangy. Refreshing as a breeze at sundown. And look—!" But Jerry was already reeling in my line—with a whale of a catch! I'll say Beeman's brings me luck!

BEEMAN'S AID'S DIGESTION

thing. This may shock you. It will shock Clinton too—if you want to tell the town about it. I don't care any more what they think. It's this. Wade and I are going away this week end together."

Hugh turned his glass slowly, watching the small ice cubes bobbing in the beady liquid.

"Getting married?"

"No."

Hugh put his glass down.

"Scared?" he asked.

"No." Then she said, "I just want you to know, Hugh. We're not going to be secretive about it."

"I see," Hugh said, "you want to be aboveboard."

HUGH looked at her hands. They were moving nervously.

"Little Dora Appleby," he said, thoughtfully. "Well, well..."

A policeman's whistle cut through the roar of traffic and somewhere in the building a telephone rang and rang. Hugh got up. He walked to the kitchenette with his empty glass. He put it down in the sink. When he came back he saw Doris leaning against the pillow, looking at him. For a second he saw a curious, astray expression on her face. Then she smiled at him quickly.

Hugh said, "Come on, let's get out of here. Let's go eat."

They had dinner at a quiet restaurant. She was wearing a sort of flowery thing, low cut, with lace or something on it, but she looked good in it. He liked that kind of dress, it was so feminine. He said, holding up the glass of wine, "Well, good luck to you on your big adventure."

She seemed uneasy for a second. She laughed a little. Then she said: "You don't really approve, do you?"

He wanted to say, "Why the hell should I? I think you're a damn' little fool. That guy Sturgess is a fourflusher if I ever saw one." Instead, he heard himself say flatly, "I think it's a swell idea."

Doris said, now talking excitedly, explaining things, a challenging light in her eyes, "I can't go on being just a dull little virtuous girl. I think they're impossible. Wade says no woman is interesting until she's had a lover."

"He would say that." It was funny, he thought, how the city, which might have brought them together—two of a kind—had really come between them.

There was a long silence. Then Hugh said, "You've been to the Fair?"

Doris shook her head. "No," she said, "we natives aren't as excited about it as you out-of-towners."

Hugh smiled. "Well, it's a pretty fine thing, I guess from what I hear. I want to see it. How'd you like to take it in with me tomorrow?"

AS IF it were a great lark, a sort of slumming trip, Doris said, "Why, I think it would be very amusing."

"Good," Hugh said. "Look, it's sort of business with me. I'm due there at eleven at the L. J. Connett exhibit in the Home Furnishing Building. I've got a couple of passes. I'll pick you up at the apartment at ten."

Doris liked the idea of seeing the Fair that way—as someone who belonged inside—with passes.

It was only nine when they finished their dinner. Hugh let Doris pick out a musical comedy which they enjoyed very much. But the night club afterward was his idea. "To celebrate," Hugh said.

It was a pretty swank place and he wasn't dressed, but Doris was, and hell, a guy could go anywhere with money in his pockets.

The headwaiter greeted them with a little bow that stopped them a foot or so from the entrance to the floor.

"What is the name, please?" The headwaiter held a large card in front of him on which he was tap-tapping a gold-headed pencil.

"Barlow. Why?"

"I have no reservation down for you, Mr. Barlow. There are no tables left."

"Full house, heh?" Hugh said. "Well, maybe someone will leave soon. We'll wait here, okay?"

For some reason that annoyed the headwaiter. His eyes dropped lower and examined Hugh's single-breasted coat, the crease in his trousers, the tan rubber-soled shoes. Hugh felt those eyes as if twin streams of cold air went down his front, leaving in their wake wrinkles, broken buttons, stringy laces.

Hugh waited a minute and then he said to the headwaiter, "Oh, I get you." He reached into his wallet and without hiding it, held out a bill. He said, "Here you are."

The headwaiter looked past Hugh at some people who were just coming in. He said to Hugh icily, "There are no tables left." He was already bowing to the others.

Hugh felt sudden, hot anger surge through him. He wanted to take the waiter by the collar and throw him to the floor. He saw a smartly dressed woman in the group glance at Doris. There was amusement in her eyes. She murmured something to her companion and Hugh caught the word "quaint."

He turned to Doris. "Let's get out of here," he said.

With dignity, without hurry, he escorted her down the long lobby, as if she were a Hollywood star—as if she were the most important woman in the world.

They took an open-top cab. For two red lights neither spoke. Then Hugh said very quietly, "Meet Hugh Barlow, hick, from Clinton, Iowa."

He reached his hand over to shake hers. Her hand touched his for a moment and then held his.

"Man!" Hugh said, "I sure came near pasting that guy."

"I almost wish you had," Doris said. "It would have been some satisfaction—instead of a perfect blank. I suppose I have lost out completely."

"How?"

"With you."

Doris said nothing. She turned crosswise on the seat and pulled her legs up under her. Then she said, "Do you care?"

"Yes, I do. I was just getting ready to like you."

"And then you heard that I was quaint?"

Hugh didn't say anything for a moment. Then: "Forget it. She was and puss. You were the best-looking there."

"You're swell, Hugh."

"You're not so bad yourself. The trouble with us is that we're just a pile of hicks. I feel like gawking."

"Hugh, stop it."

"'Fraid the driver will hear."

"No, but it's not true."

HE TURNED to her: "The funny about it, Doris, is that it is true with me—I know. Sometime today proves it—but that's time am anyway. And now you're prying."

"How?"

"By thinking it's necessary to get the week end with a guy like Sturgess your diploma as an A No Yorker."

"Why are you bringing that up? you going to preach?"

Hugh laughed. "If you loved me and couldn't live without him, I'd be up. But to me, a girl like you know—maybe I'm all wrong—should have something special in her. Do you love him?"

Doris was silent. Then, without a word, she said, "No. But that's not exactly your business."

"A couple of hours ago it was your business. Things have changed since then."

Doris looked at Hugh from her corner of the cab. She said, "Have they changed? Have things changed?"

The taxi had stopped in front of her place. Hugh said, "Yes." He turned toward her. He stared at her for a minute. He leaned nearer her. "This is your house."

They were standing on the sidewalk. The brownstone fronts looked empty and lonely in the night. Sudden Doris said, "There's a light in my room."

Hugh said, "I'd better go up with you. They hurried up the three flights. Doris took her key from her little evening bag and opened the door. She looked in. Hugh heard her catch her breath.

"Wade!"

Hugh heard someone in the doorway. Then Sturgess' voice said, "Come, my pigeon. I've been waiting a long time for you."

Doris opened the door wide and Hugh saw Sturgess walking across the room toward them. He was in his sleeves—the collar was open. Hugh

"... an' my kid musta took mine by mistake" from Doris to Hugh. He said, "The boy from home keeps late doesn't he?"

"What is it, Wade? What's going on here?"

"You can't get away from me." He spoke precisely. "You are trying subtly to convey your rustic there that I never except by invitation."

"Wade—please. Stop talking this way? What's wrong?"

"Nothing much. I've just been thinking. So this is your football hero from home? You wrote poems about him: 'The boy from home keeps late'—iron strength—"

"Wade. Stop it!"

But his own hands behind his back. The right caught the wrist of the girl. He said, gently, "Your horses there, Sturgess."

"Good in front of Wade. Anger her. She was trembling. 'Go on, Wade. Please go out—go out.'"

"A smile went across Sturgess' face. He walked to the table where he had his coat very deliberately, like a picture. He stood at the desk, smiling. Then he swung the door open, went out and very gently closed the door behind him.

He turned to Doris. She was standing in the middle of the room, looking at him. "Oh," she cried. "This is awful."

"What a little stinker a girl can be."

"Barlow! I hate you. You can't do these things. I never wrote a poem about my life. It's all a lie."

"What have I done?"

"What have you done! You've done it all. She threw out her hands. 'All right. Then, as an afterthought, I'm sure you to stand there criticizing me. What do you know about the life here in New York?'"

"Through the open window came the sound of the Third Avenue El. Then he said slowly, 'If that's the way you want to live, I guess I'd better go.'"

He didn't answer.

"He looked at her, turned away and went out. It took the taxi only fifteen minutes to get across town to his hotel. The night clerk gave him his key and the envelope from Manton containing the passes for the Fair. Hugh shoved the envelope into his pocket and went up to his room. He stood by the window looking over the sleeping city. He lit a cigarette and took a deep drag. After a while he removed the passes from the envelope and examined them. He looked across his room once, twice and then stopped at the writing desk. He looked at the pages of his notebook. And with sudden decision, he put one of the passes into a hotel envelope and added it to Doris Appleby. He phoned a messenger and told him to deliver it immediately. "Take a cab—hire a cab—anything. But get it there at once."

He tucked the other pass in the inside pocket of his coat.

A little after eleven the next morning he was standing near the information desk of the L. J. Connett exhibit in the Home Furnishing Building at the corner of the Fair. He could see down the full length of the cool, air-conditioned corridor and could watch the entrance of the Fireside Row. Every time the door opened his eyes nailed the entering individual for that fraction of a second of identification.

Nothing had stirred him. Something had made New York's streets, restaurants a series of records on which he etched the quick tap-tap of a girl's heels, the sudden birdlike turn of her head, the powder-sweet smell of an evening wrap. He saw her everywhere—in shop windows, in subways, crossing streets, in passing cars. Something had happened to him—and Hugh Barlow knew just about what it was.

Four people came in at the same time: a large man and two old ladies in black, and a little behind them, a girl in a white dress with a red hat and a red belt around her small waist. She came into the cool corridor, looked up and down, and walked with heels tap-tapping toward the desk.

Hugh leaned against the wall and watched her. He folded his arms on his chest and crossed one leg over the other. He was standing that way when she saw him. She stopped, and a man almost bumped into her. She looked at Hugh without smiling—looked at him with relief, with tenderness, which made Hugh unfold his arms and start for her. She came halfway, and they met in front of the desk. Both her hands lifted toward him, and both his hands reached for hers. Their hands didn't meet. Their hands went slowly back to their sides.

They said things that meant nothing, which were useless. How-are-you? You-got-the-pass-all-right? So-hot-on-the-subway!

Hugh took her arm, turned her and they walked out of the building into the drifting crowds on Bowling Green. Her arm was cool and smooth. He looked down at her.

He said, "Got time to look around and see the sights?"

She said, "Yes—I have all the time in the world." Then she faced him, and said, "I talked to Wade this morning on the phone—for the last time, I guess."

"You did?" he said casually, suddenly becoming aware of the colors around him, the noise, the laughter, the smell of fruit gum and flowers, the feel of the sun on his back. "Let's go!" he said, and she almost had to run to keep up with him.

They climbed on board one of those trains of cars with rubber tires, which brought sight-seers around the grounds. They sat in the front seat. It was good and hot—baking—and the flat walls, pink and blue and red, reflected the heat in waves, and made Hugh take off his coat, which he slung over his shoulder, and made Doris' upper lip dewy, and brought color under her eyes.

SHE sighed and stuck out her legs. "I like this," she said. "It's nice to be yourself. I feel as though I had just come from Iowa."

"I do too," Hugh said. Then: "It's funny—do you realize that we haven't said anything about it?"

"About what?"

"About what's happened. About the way we feel—I feel. I mean the way we met here just now—about my seeing you all over New York in taxis, in shop windows, crossing the streets..."

"Do you feel that way, too?"

"Do I? I've been nuts!"

She leaned nearer him. "Careful, Hugh—the couple behind us are listening—"

"Do you mind?"

"No."

Hugh turned around. The young man behind him was looking far off toward the city. Suddenly he turned to Hugh: "Pardon me, Mister. What's that bridge over there?"

"That's the Triborough."

Hugh heard the girl behind him say, "Oliver! You oughtn't to ask so many questions. They'll think we're hicks."

Doris caught Hugh's arm. She whispered, "Bet they'll ask us to tell them where there's a nice little place to eat—with atmosphere." Her eyes crinkled up when she looked at Hugh.

Presently they both turned back to the sights of the Fair with the cool, casual acceptance proper to people who know their way around.

SEE WHY Union Pacific—North Western STREAMLINERS

(AND YOUR CAR, TOO!)

go like greased ... with

PENN ZOIL

I hear the Diesels in these 'liners develop 5400 horsepower. Must take a special oil to keep 'em free from sludge. Wish I could get an oil like it for my car.

Why not get the same oil? U. P. engineers tell me these 100-mile-an-hour bullets use regular PennZoil. That's why I use it in my car, and she runs clean as a whistle!

HERE'S THE REASON PennZoil keeps your motor clean and snappy!

Only PennZoil uses these 3 extra steps. They zoom PennZoil quality so engineers use and recommend it—and 4 times as many dealers now respond when you sound your "Z"!

Be oil-wise specify PennZoil

Member Penn Grade Grade Oil Ass'n. Permit No. 2

Sound your "Z" ... Get SLUDGE-RESISTING
PENNZOIL

A WHALE OF A BUY AT TODAY'S PRICE!

A sharp flavour that smacks merrily on the tongue

Old English Process Cheddar Cheese

FOR THE FIRST TIME
—THE SHARPNESS OF RARE, AGED CHEDDARS IN A CHEESE WITH UNIFORM FLAVOR AND PERFECT COOKABILITY.
KRAFT MASTER BLENDERS ACHIEVED IT!

SIZES: 2-POUND LOAF;
½-POUND PACKAGE

PAINLESS BANDAGE

New kind of bandage. Gauztex, sticks only to itself, not to flesh or hair. No pain when it comes off. Easy to bandage between toes, over joints. Prevents blisters in sports, breaking in shoes. Medicated and sanitary. All widths. Handy package for sports, travel. Try 10c size now for comfort. Any drug or sport counter. GENERAL BANDAGES, INC., Chicago, U. S. A.

Handy Household Package

25c

3 GAUZX 5c

NEW 5c

BAND-ME-QUICK

8 ready to use Gauztex bandages in small envelope

GAUZX

THE SELF ADHERING GAUZE

FOR THE 1 MAN IN 7 WHO SHAVES EVERY DAY

A Special Shave Cream—It's Not a Soap, Needs No Brush!

Daily shaving leaves many men's faces raw, sensitive. This is especially true of the man who, because of his business and social status, must shave every day.

To meet this condition Williams, for 100 years makers of fine shaving preparations, has now developed GLIDER—a special cream for daily shavers. With no soap base, it's a complete departure from ordinary shave creams. No brush. No lather. Not sticky or greasy.

A superabundance of moisture in this rich cream softens each whisker, yet forms a protective layer over your face to keep blade from scraping. Swiftly, gently your razor glides over your skin. Like a cold cream, Glider helps smooth, soften your skin and prevent chapping and roughness.

FREE—tube of Glider. Send name, address today. The J. B. Williams Co., Dept. EG-11, Glastonbury, Conn.

Offer good in U. S. A. and Canada only

tion and make a trip out to the junk yard on Kedzie Avenue. If you do not know the great junkman personally, you get properly introduced. With his okay and after some other details are settled, you are ready for business.

Mr. Skidmore will tell you how much you must pay each month. And thereafter every month, before the tenth—you go out to the junk yard and pay your tax. As long as you do that you seem to be able to operate without molestation from anyone. If you default in that payment by the tenth—you are out of business.

The Internal Revenue boys played a rather dirty trick on Mr. Skidmore. Quietly they stationed a couple of operators with a movie camera, effectively camouflaged, opposite Mr. Skidmore's junk yard. Day after day gamblers, public officials, police entered the door of the junk yard. And as they did, the heartless film recorded the scene. It makes a wonderful movie.

The Tie That Binds

Skidmore apparently makes plenty of money out of this. For instance, Uncle Sam's bookkeepers worked out that Mr. Skidmore in 1938 had an income of half a million dollars ($511,150.87). He made only $2,996.40 on his junk business. He is a partner of Billy Johnson and he made $31,300 on gambling. But there was a little matter of $167,733.58 in currency and some more income amounting to $303,000 which was unaccounted for—mysterious income from some unknown source, but actually connected with the beautiful movie that the officers made.

Now why do these gamblers pay Skidmore all this money? He must give them something. And the something that he gives them is protection.

But protection from whom? Who can hurt a poor gambler minding his own business? Nobody but the police, the courts, the politicians and the gangsters. It is against the law to run these shops. It is not to be supposed that Mr. Skidmore protects them all by himself. Whom does Skid do business with and how much does he pay? Whom, in short, does he represent?

Well, to begin with, there has always been a curious cordiality between the gentlemen who run the joints and the gentlemen who run the city of Chicago—and perhaps in your town too. One of the Kelly-Nash judiciary luminaries once said: "Whenever crime and politics are united, the illegal gambling enterprise is the link that binds them."

It's an old cordiality. Political bigwigs acted as pallbearers at gangster funerals. Al Capone could keep his dog tracks open for two years under protection of an injunction by a machine judge—an act branded by the higher court as utterly "repugnant to the theory upon which courts of justice are organized." Such instances can be multiplied abundantly.

These things mean nothing, perhaps, save that they exhibit the kindly friendliness of the rulers of the town and the rulers of vice. Take, for instance, the case of Mr. Mike Flynn, City Clerk, mighty ruler of the old Lucky Thirteenth Ward. As becomes a great chief, Mr. Flynn has his outing each year. One year it was held at the Lincolnshire Club. Of course there was a program. And the pages were sold to persons who would pay forty dollars a page. And there you see page after page of "good wishes" to good old Mike from Denny Cooney, the vice lord of the South Side, from breweries, taverns, gamblers and even from a Republican police court judge, who sent $40 of good wishes to Mike—all mixed in among wishes from "Mamie," Mae's Tavern, Mae's Cozy Grill, Nellie Carey, Finnegan and McGovern, gambling joint owners, who shot the good wishes for $80. They're just friendly—that's all there is to it.

These Our Rulers

Continued from page 23

But who protects them from the cops? I talked with Police Commissioner Allman about that. He is a rugged, blunt, straightforward Irishman with a heavy brogue, who has all the marks of an honest man. "What can the police do against bookies," he asks, "save to arrest them? Look at the records of this department. You will find not hundreds of arrests every year but thousands. We can bring them to court, produce the evidence—that is all we can do."

And that is true. The police do make arrests. But the courts have discharged them as fast as they come in or have assessed fines so small as to be negligible. Yet this is not the whole story. For instance, when the government went over Mr. Skidmore's books they found one investment in a mortgage—a $10,000 note on the home of Police Captain Thomas H. Harrison. Captain Harrison gets $4,000 a year. A home with a $10,000 mortgage is quite a shelter for a $4,000-a-year man. It's a handsome brick structure worth plenty more than $10,000—nearer twenty or thirty thousand. Captain Harrison said the mortgage was arranged for him by Mr. Jake Arvey, the Number Three Kelly-Nash boss. And he explained the fine home by saying that before he was a cop he was a bricklayer, hadn't forgotten his art, and had built it with his own hands.

Captain Joseph Goldberg is a supervising captain. He lives in a magnificent home on his $5,000 salary and has two airplanes—airplanes being his hobby.

Captain Laird, chief of the county police, also a Kelly-Nash subsidiary, was haled before the Grand Jury. He wouldn't talk. So the gentlemen of the jury put on a little movie show. And there Captain Laird had a cure of seeing himself as a movie walking as friendly as you please. Billy Skidmore's junk yard times. Then the Captain, charged with enforcing the laws in the county, admitted visited Mr. Skidmore twice a year. No special reason, just dropped in twice a week, hello, how are you and ain't it a terrible winter we're having?

The Captain Can't Remember

And the Captain also made calls at Billy Johnson's beautiful Ellyn estate—no special reason interested even in Mr. Johnson didn't even know him, just wanted to ride Mr. Johnson's horses a while. And he liked it so he bought himself a riding costume. His bank account was a deposit he was only a lieutenant, for cash all in one lump. And Laird couldn't remember when it for the life of him.

Colonel Frank Knox, publisher of Daily News, Republican leader in Chicago, told me this story. After he became mayor he talked with Frank a friendly chat he told Knox that months time he, Knox, would be him 100 per cent because he would give Chicago that kind of administration. Later Colonel Knox had to go on a police captain. He didn't tell the paper. He put it up to the mayor. The mayor was indignant. The would be out before nightfall, but the captain was not ousted. He was promoted.

It's all a bit baffling. There's the cops, the courts—all Kelly-Nash servants. When occasion requires heat can be turned on for a week or month—and presto! even closes. For instance, at intervals the past year a federal grand jury been hauling the bookies before in, Skidmore and many others indicted on income tax cases. Although these proceedings the he run full blast, even though the loss of the Annenberg service. Around March of this year the jur's hunt was getting hotter. Primary election was coming on. The Nash machine was out in a "Roosevelt and Humanity." News was hot on the pur-Dight Green, Republican run-governor, was throwing hot the machine. I was able to lo-three places in the Loop along Madison, West Adams, West West Lake, West Washing-Noh Clark, North State, North Wabash, North Dearborn—the's throw from the Hall, all controlled by the Capone Syn-Levin had a luxurious place West Randolph—the Four Hun-Club, with about $25,000 worth of in and leather furniture. He other places.

"All right, Kennesaw, it's done now"

REAMER KE

Vanishing Act

One night Mr. Billy Skidmore, William Johnson, and a high of the County Committee were in in the Morrison Hotel, atic headquarters. I came upon ere. And the situation must ben grave. Mr. Skidmore's bland unenance under his bald head wn in grave perturbation. The committee official was no less he heads were all together— for an hour—and in the lobby of ol for all to see. I felt something was in the wind. Next day the "Holes," as Dr. Elmer Williams em, were closed. Word had gone n somewhere. It is possible to em. No axes were needed, such es's Attorney Courtney used; no arrests. Just a word from some-us several days before the pres-ased. Then some of the joints re very quietly. Passing the Four ed Club—run by Hymie Levin ew Tobacco Ryan—I found its closed. Some detectives were either guarding the portals or for a trolley. Against the wall the door sat a very small per-oding a paper. I leaned over him ked: "Where're they runnin' to- other?"

10 North Wells Street," he said. over to 10 North Wells where, t the slightest difficulty, I walked watched about a hundred peo-adying the boards, the tip-sheets acing bets on the ponies. urneyed out to Cicero, unaccom- l, unguided. There in the after- I walked into the Rock Garden another Syndicate joint, where st five hundred ladies and gentle- vere shooting craps, playing black- roulette and betting on the horses g casino that filled almost an acre. ht there were five crap games— ables with twenty-five or more ed around—four blackjack games, oulette wheels, a klondike game oker game running—all requiring ervices of about forty attendants. ar away the Paddock Club was in last and, I was told, there were al others. I could find them with- e slightest difficulty and watch aw being fractured into little . But the police can't. Heigh-ho! olind are our rulers!

s bookie racket has produced bad blood in the never too happy cratic household in Chicago. Tom ney, once a machine senator, now ous State's Attorney, back in 1928 an ax brigade and smashed up bookie joints at the rate of several a day. Cases were prepared with the most exacting care. As fast as Courtney yanked them into the municipal courts, the lawyers yanked them out again. The judges denounced the prosecutors for entering bookie joints without a warrant—one of the weirdest jests of the decade.

So Courtney turned his guns on Kelly. He ran for mayor against Kelly in the Democratic primaries. "The mayor," he thundered, "is part and parcel of the Syndicate which controls gambling." He said: "No syndicate could operate here under the eyes of the mayor if he wanted it stopped." He told the voters that "the fact that Kelly permits a hoodlum syndicate to control gambling in itself establishes that he is part and parcel of it. The fix is in at the top," he cried.

But the mechanized legions of the dreaded Kelly-Nash machine rolled over him. Now either he has become good, or something has happened. For he is running for State's Attorney again and the man he denounced as the partner of killers and gangsters is supporting him for re-election. Queer fellows, those politicians.

Of course there are the ward committeemen. They might well make it difficult for a mayor who took the law too seriously. A ward is a little principality. It is a kind of five- or six-ringed circus containing numerous concessions, designed to minister to the frailties of man. The great river wards are called the rich wards—rich in the opportunities of those who serve humanity on its lighter side—taverns, bookie joints, houses of prostitution, dope merchants.

Richest of all perhaps is the old First—over which broods the gentle authority of the aging Hinky Dink Kenna, now eighty-one. It includes the Loop and much besides—gambling palaces in hotels, Syndicate bookie joints, twenty-five-cent bookies in cigar stores, honky-tonks, night clubs like Blondie's on Michigan Avenue or the Coo-Coo Club and Frolics on Wabash or the taxi dance halls, dope peddlers and flop houses where votes are stored—everything from the peep show to the ten grand bet on a horse. The old Hink is shy, frail, vanishing—one hears rumors that Frank Nitti is beginning to exercise unseen the sovereign powers of the principality.

There is the Forty-Second Ward of Botchy Connors—well-stocked with taverns, bawdy houses, slot machines, dance halls, bookie joints. And the great Twenty-Seventh, called by some the "riveriest" of all the river wards.

More Laws—More Money

All these enterprises—all lawless—can operate only under a charter of protection from someone. And the racket fastens itself on everything.

The tavern is an endless source of graft. Chicago has plenty of laws regulating them. The more laws they make, the more there are to break. There are laws regulating entrances, the windows, the light in the bar, the hours of opening and closing, and prohibiting ladies from acting as hostesses therein. Bars must close at 2 A. M. But those hours from 2 to 5 or 7 A. M. are very profitable to thousands of taverns. Hence they remain open—with someone's permission.

The racket does not end with the tavern, the brothel and the bookie shop. A new and interesting type of murder has appeared in Chicago. It is called the Goon murder. It signalizes the presence of the gangster in the business of leading labor unions. The special weapon of the Goon murderer is the baseball bat. It prevents identification of bullets. It is noiseless and cheap.

Indeed the strange mixture of business, labor, gangsterism and politics is

Exhilarating action... refreshment that cools!

That's Squibb Dental Cream for you.

First it's a minty flavor racing through your mouth . . . Then it all comes in a rush—that feeling of freshness . . . that cool April taste.

Squibb Dental Cream cleans and polishes gently. And there's Concentrated Squibb Milk of Magnesia in it, to help neutralize bacterial acids, when it comes in contact with them . . . acids that might harm teeth. And for your extra protection, on every tube or carton, the Squibb control number, your token that this dentifrice has passed 239 exacting Squibb tests. Another good reason to specify Squibb, next time you buy!

SQUIBB ANGLE TOOTHBRUSH (illustrated)... dentist designed, head bent at correct angle for easier brushing and gum massage. Ask your druggist.

Contains Concentrated Squibb Milk of Magnesia

SQUIBB Dental Cream

★ Taste and feel the refreshing difference!

Got the horse laugh till I tried the FINGERNAIL TEST!

YOU'D THINK A JOCKEY'S SWEETHEART would thaw out just a little when he wins the Derby. But not my girl! I scratch my head to figure why she's chilly, and get the answer. My nails show a scalpful of loose ugly dandruff!

THE TRAINER TELLS ME. "Get Wildroot-with-Oil! The same Wildroot formula that's been chasing loose dandruff since Man-o'-War was a pup, plus pure vegetable oil that grooms without greasing." I try it... it works!

YOU'RE MISSING SOMETHING if you haven't tried Wildroot-with-Oil yourself. Its safe, powerful "3-Action" cleans as it grooms, keeps your hair dressed like a million, scalp spick and span. It may not win horse races... but it sure gets the girls.

IMPORTANT — Wildroot Regular Formula, used by millions who prefer a non-oily tonic, also on sale everywhere! Wildroot Co., Buffalo, N. Y. and Fort Erie, Ont., Canada.

nowhere so beautifully developed as in Chicago. The surface of the labor racket in Chicago has scarcely been scratched.

Take the teamsters. Since around 1908 there was a Chicago Teamsters' Union—which had broken away from the A. F. of L. It was a fairly good union. But slowly some very bad boys penetrated it. It had numerous groups—coal teamsters, ice cream drivers, laundry drivers and so on. The president of the Coal Teamsters' Union around 1932 was Daniel Dean. He had a brother-in-law named George Red Barker. Barker and Three-Finger Jack White were gangsters and, like others in their profession, were looking for a new racket as the dry era dribbled to its end. They turned to labor, selected the Coal Teamsters' Union, walked in one day and announced they were taking over.

During their brief regime they collaborated with the Coal Merchants' Association to organize what was called the Truckers and Teamsters Exchange but was better known as the TNT. It turned out to be veritably that. The coal merchants were represented by a high official of the Kelly administration. And the object was to create a monopoly for those merchants that would be policed by the teamsters under Messrs. Red Barker and Three-Finger Jack White. Of course managers like Barker and White very soon ran the show and collected $2 a month from every coal merchant for every truck he operated.

Who Gets the Teamsters?

In good time the firm of Barker and White was dissolved with a sub-machine gun. The union reverted to Jack Sheridan, its business agent. But not for long. One day in April, 1933, the Touhy mob walked in with drawn guns, and announced: "This is the Touhy bunch. We're taking charge." They seized the officers and locked them in a basement where they were kept several days.

The next chapter happened swiftly. Mr. George Roy Baker, another gangster, saw the possibilities of this racket. Also State's Attorney Tom Courtney decided to break up the weak and corrupt rule of the union's officials. And so while those officials were imprisoned in the basement by the Touhy gang, Mr. George Roy Baker walked in, supported by the State's Attorney's men. "On your way, Jack," said Mr. Baker to Mr. Sheridan. "You're out." So the teamsters had a new leader—George Roy Baker.

But apparently Baker needed money faster than the teamsters promised. So he went out one night to get it on the highway, got caught, and was sent to the penitentiary for burglary. It was now necessary to get a new leader. So, under Mr. Courtney's sponsorship, an election was held and Mr. James (Lefty) Lynch was made head of the teamsters. Mr. Lynch had once been sent up for twenty years for murder and indicted on other occasions for lesser offenses. He is out now and a new leader—a former teamster—is at the head. But this is the Chicago way of dealing with gangsters and labor rackets. The teamsters are now an appendage of the machine.

There are the barroom workers. The white bar flies are ruled by Louis Romano; the colored by J. Livert Kelley, known as St. Louis Kelley. Romano has been indicted three times for murder—all connected with gang operations. But each time the charge has been nolle prossed. Kelley has faced forty-four charges in twenty-eight courts in many fields of endeavor—from assault with intent to kill to malicious mischief and pandering. And now we have the amazing spectacle of the former head of the bartenders' union getting an injunction against Romano, Murray Humphreys, Paul Ricca, Little New York Campagna, Capone gangsters, and Frank Nitti, the gang head, to prevent them from operating the union. And there are accusations in the legal papers that the gang is interested in breweries, distilleries, liquor distributors—all legal, mind you—and uses its control of the union to exploit their products.

The building service employees are ruled—or were until recently—by that George Scalise who was convicted as a pander many years ago. The hotel service men are ruled by an ex-bootlegger, the flat janitors by Frank Diamond, Capone's brother-in-law, the moving-picture operators in Chicago by Nick Circella or Nick Dean, known as Nickelodeon, another ex-pander, the retail clerks by Max Caldwell, an ex-Capone man. The laundry drivers are dominated by Murray Humphreys, another Capone hoodlum. These gentlemen ply their activities as the guardians of labor in Chicago with no more molestation than the bookies and maintain the closest and friendliest relations with the great machine which rules Chicago.

I have on other occasions in Collier's referred to that priceless leader of labor, Mr. Mike Carrozzo—merely calling attention to his palatial estate at Hobart, Indiana, which he bought with $170,000 in thousand-dollar bills and which he subsequently improved with at least another hundred thousand dollars in currency. Mike Carrozzo, who started life as a street cleaner, became head of the street cleaners' union and now rules a score of unions covering everything connected with streets and roads, from the building to the maintenance and sweeping thereof.

Carrozzo tells Chicago that it cannot use ready-mixed cement on its streets. While I was in Chicago the city took bids on 100,000 yards of asphalt. The Illinois Asphalt Company was lowest bidder, but too small to handle it all. The city took other informal bids, and got prices from 26 to 45 cents a yard lower than Illinois'. It gave the contract to the lowest bidders. Mr. Carrozzo called a strike of the asphalt Sam Kart, official head of the once president and an incorporator of the Illinois Asphalt Company.

Carrozzo, like Bioff and so many other Chicago laborers began life with a charge of against him, which was never was tried along with Big Tim for the murder of Mossy Enriester. A huge defense fund was and both were acquitted.

Later Big Tim was convicted Dearborn Station $320,000 Carrozzo was charged also, but on bail and never tried. When put thousands of hungry men in 1934, Carrozzo compelled the $1 a month to the union for the of working. He, too, is now a dictment for income-tax evasion.

Chicago Wonders

Fine as it may be for Chicago to command the talents of such there are still some Chicagoans who so far as to say it is a pretty fish. The idea seems to have around that Chicago, like your among other things a large hucity which has a life of its own which life it is living under the advertised processes of democracy. They wonder, perhaps because of timid people, and lack faith, whether democratic society can hold this kind of management. If they like it they seem pretty helpless. Countless thousands of taverers, their help, bookie joints, help, contractors, businessmen, their managers find themselves on same side of the street as some sixty thousand job holders. All with their friends and the unhappy whom they befriend with public they make a mighty host. They be able to rule.

"Of course I enjoy a slight advantage over you fellows—I'm married to her"

MICHAEL B.

Dusk to Daybreak

Continued from page 11

res enjoyable in exact proporto the attention one is able to pay

General's private sentry passed the corridor outside the cell. He was according to orders. The purpose of the sentry was, of course, to prevent escape. But also it was his duty to forestall any such unseemly incident. The sentry was a plumpboned man, perhaps twenty-one or twenty-two. His eyes were large and he was fascinated as he looked in at General Moreno, smoking composedly his cigarette. Later, he would undoubtedly be in awe of the General's presence and would wait for his execution as he had waited for breakfast.
The sentry would be useful to those who continued the struggle from which General Moreno had been removed. But it was of little importance to him.

Two smoke rings, enjoying the sentry could devote to so trivial a task. Presently the sentry passed and his eyes again were round and stared. The general was possessed of the will to explain to him that one need not worry when one's worries are officially at an end. But to speak the sentry would frighten him.

When him. There, that was an end. The sentry could be frightened, General Moreno was not. He had been afraid, of course. There had been times when his tongue moved stiffly in his mouth; when stark panic seized him; when terror yamped his will, demanding that it allow him to flee. Those times he had resisted, appearing outwardly serene when within him was turbulence. Naturally he had always assumed that men were frightened when they knew they were to be killed. True, he'd seen other men facing squads with complete composure. Most men did, when you thought of it. Some ground their teeth and were white-faced and resolutely brave. But an amazing number literally did not seem to mind. At least they did not flinch more than they would if expected—say—to have a tooth

General Moreno found the problem very interesting. He refused to discuss professional matters. His officers, Viznaga and Cervera and Gomez Alderson and all the rest—were present. One of them would take him and the fight for liberty would begin. But he was to be shot in the back. He had hours of freedom, absolutely nothing to distract his mind. It was fascinating to debate the question of whether he would be killed.

Far away, and filtered through the thicknesses of wall and much of the corridor, he heard a bugle's call. The sound was infinitely familiar. He had heard it so many times, at many places! At a little camp by bad land when his whole force was no more than a hundred men. And then more than half of them were wearing filthy clothes and many were barely able to walk or ride, and all were weary and sick and sad at heart. And then he heard the bugles blow from the government's palace of a broad and fertile land—the greatest of the republic—it seemed that victory for his cause was secure; when his troops were fed and paid and almost adequately armed. Now he heard it from his cell.

He was not frightened. Looking forward to battle, heretofore, he had very often been too busy for fear. However, in that little affair at Ensenada—with no more than fifty men under him, so low had his prospects sunk—then he had been sick with terror while waiting for the time to strike. His throat was dry, then. His heart pounded. His legs felt like jelly. Yet nobody had guessed, and the affair was quite successful and led to many recruits' joining him and definitely was the turning point toward what had promised to be decisive victory.

That particular fit of terror, he reflected, was because of uncertainty. The affair at Ensenada had been a gamble.
And he was not inherently a gambler.
When defeat was likely, he prepared to minimize it. Victories could similarly be foreseen and prepared for with much tedious effort. Only the uncertain was alarming.

Yet he was not frightened now, and what was more uncertain than death?

HIS cigarette had burned short. He crushed it out, and, rising, glanced out the tiny barred window. The window itself was too small for his body to pass through, and it was barred besides.
He noted the fact abstractedly. Escape was not actually in his mind. He had seen too many prisoners kept safe, and had known of too few escapes. He did not clutch at straws.

He found, however, that there was no profound meditation in which he wished to engage. Considering the merciless fashion in which he had driven himself these past few years, it was not to be wondered at. But it was wryly amusing that since it was plainly futile to worry about the cause he had fought for, he had nothing left to think about at all.
He was apt to become bored by his own freedom to think of whatever he chose,
pending the moment of his execution.

He seated himself on the cot again and lighted another cigarette. He looked at his hands. He moved his fingers. He made the motions of writing. He reflected upon the pleasure—which he had not enjoyed for years—of doing something with one's hands when that thing is done well. There is a satisfaction in doing a thing precisely and efficiently.
He could see, suddenly, that a carpenter shaping a timber might find the same almost esthetic pleasure that he had felt in seeing an action develop under his hand to victory. And then, too—his thoughts pursued the subject—a carpenter would admire another man's honest woodwork as he had admired the strategy and tactics of generals of the past.

He smiled a twisted smile. It was humiliating to reflect that out of all his victories he had secured no greater satisfaction than a peon carpenter might find in the fashioning of honestly made bullock yokes! But was it not appropriate for him to think at this time of the vanity of all earthly things?

General Moreno now honestly grinned at his own thoughts. For the first time since childhood he had leisure to think freely of anything he chose. And he tended to return to childhood solemnities! There was no reason to avoid such thinking if it pleased him, but—

He became abruptly aware of the sentry, staring at him. The sentry had halted in his passage, seeing an expression of genuine amusement upon the face of the condemned prisoner. He stared at General Moreno with suspicion and alarm. He looked hurriedly about the small cell. Then he hastened away.

General Moreno shrugged. He crushed out his cigarette carefully. The sentry

ATHLETE'S FOOT ATTACKS Hot, Steaming Feet

CRACKS

between your toes

WARN of DANGER!

The fungi that cause painful Athlete's Foot thrive in hot summer weather. Laboratory tests show they grow twice as fast when your feet perspire excessively. Actually, they feed on this extra perspiration and dead skin. Then, when cracks appear between the toes, they strike—through those cracks—spreading beneath the tissues. Your toes redden and itch. Skin flakes off in whitish patches—it's Athlete's Foot you've got!

DRENCH those cracks at Once!

Drench entire foot with Absorbine Jr. at the first sign of a crack! Unchecked, Athlete's Foot can cause great pain and agony.

1. Absorbine Jr. is a powerful fungicide. It kills the Athlete's Foot fungi on contact.
2. It dissolves the perspiration products on which Athlete's Foot fungi thrive.
3. It dries the skin between the toes.
4. It soothes and helps heal the broken tissues.
5. It relieves the itching and pain of Athlete's Foot.

Guard against reinfection. Boil socks 15 minutes. Disinfect shoes. In advanced cases consult your doctor in addition to using Absorbine Jr. $1.25 a bottle at all druggists.

ABSORBINE Jr.

Kills Athlete's Foot fungi on contact!

ALSO QUICK RELIEF FOR: Sore, aching muscles, tired, burning feet, sunburn, bites of mosquitoes and other small insects

Sample
Bottle
Free

W. F. Young, Inc., 201P Lyman St., Springfield, Mass. Please send me sample bottle of Absorbine Jr. FREE.

Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____

MEMO:
Get these for the Car!

ACROSS THE NATION

Everywhere You Drive, You Can Buy these Famous MOBIL SPECIALTIES

Makes Cars Look New

MOBILGLOSS
Brings back the beauty and lustre of your car. Goes on quickly. Removes grime, grease, and ugly traffic film. Rubs up with little effort to a brilliant, lasting polish.

Vital for Radiators

MOBIL UPPERLUBE
Add to the gasoline. Reaches upper cylinders as a vapor. Impregnates surfaces—protects cylinder walls and valve stems from rust and wear. Improves engine performance.

Put in a Supply

MOBIL HYDROTONE
Add Mobil Hydrotone to the radiator. It neutralizes corrosive action—checks rust and scale. Risk of clogging and leaks is avoided. A vital need for every car.

Get Extra Can

MOBIL WINDOW SPRAY
Makes it easy to keep windshields and windows clean and sparkling. Just spray it on; wipe with a clean dry cloth. Equally good for windows and other home uses.

For 100 Uses

MOBIL HANDY OIL
An all-purpose, non-gumming lubricant. Fine for generators, household appliances, sewing machines, vacuum cleaners. A "must" for home and garage. Wall bracket free.

OTHER MOBIL SPECIALTIES

- MOBIL RADIATOR FLUSH
- MOBIL LUSTRE CLOTH
- MOBIL SPOT REMOVER
- MOBIL PENETRATING OIL
- MOBIL SPONGE CLEANER
- MOBILWAX
- MOBIL STOP-LEAK
- MOBIL FREEZONE

BUY WHERE YOU SEE THE MOBILOIL OR MOBILGAS SIGN

Mobiloil Mobilgas

Mobil Specialties

BY THE MAKERS OF MOBILOIL

would now undoubtedly report him mad.

But it was not so simple. In minutes only—and General Moreno had barely lighted another cigarette—there was the sound of hurrying feet. Soldiers. An officer. He gave curt orders, unlocked the cell door and came suspiciously inside.

"General Moreno," he said politely, "I regret to disturb you, but there has arisen a doubt. I feel it necessary to make sure that no communication has reached you."

General Moreno found this, also, humorous. Because he was not frightened, he was suspected of a hope of escape. He stood up, his lips twitching, while the officer searched the little cell. It was not possible to hide anything in it. It became evident that if anything was hidden it was upon General Moreno's person.

The officer regarded him uncertainly. "I do not wish to be discourteous," he said uncomfortably, "but it is important—"

"If you wish to search me," said General Moreno dryly, "I have no objection. But if there were a communication I would be foolish not to burn or swallow it."

The officer made a decision. If there had been a communication, General Moreno had certainly read it. And as certainly, if it contained anything important, he would have destroyed it.

"Pardon me," said the officer, "I regret the intrusion. Is there anything—"

"Nothing," said General Moreno as politely, "I have only been amused."

The officer said shrewdly:

"But would you not wish paper and a pen?"

General Moreno shook his head. "If I grow bored," he said tranquilly, "I shall go to sleep."

He knew, serenely, that it would be quite possible. Indeed, it would be easy. But he was enjoying himself in a fashion that had long been denied him. He refused the responsibility of pen and paper. He would continue to smoke and breathe and meditate in blessed idleness and freedom. If he felt sleepy, he would go to sleep. Assuredly he felt no obligation to leave behind a solemn, patriotic document his enemies would find themselves moved to destroy.

HE SEATED himself upon the cot again and smoked contentedly. Even the intrusion had its value. It had come about because he was not frightened. And why was he not frightened?

He settled down to debate the matter with himself. He had, quite seriously, no faintest hope of escape. Mercy from the dictator was, of course, out of the question. A rescue was equally absurd. It would cost too many men and its chances of success would be practically nonexistent.

General Moreno had trained his subordinates adequately. If they carried on as he had taught them—and he had proved the truth of his teachings—they would end with victory and freedom for their country. He would be dead, to be sure, but there were enough other men dead of the fight for freedom.

No. They would not attempt to rescue him. It would violate every principle he had taught them. And therefore he could smoke comfortably and enjoy the six hours which now remained in the freedom he had been denied because he fought for freedom.

But he heard bugles blowing outside. He heard the hurrying, rustling noise of men assembling with their accouterments. Presently he heard the muffled, measured sound of marching troops. Listening, he knew even about how many men had been mustered. There had been no shots. No alarm. There was no artillery in motion to accompany a column setting out upon a march. It was an alert, a posting of troops, a posture of defense.

And General Moreno knew it had come about because he was frightened. A grin at an unthought. A sentry who saw it and could not understand it. A less search of his cell. It all added to suspicion of an attempt at preparations to prevent it.

It was humorous. But it did again and insistently the question why he was not frightened. Of many other men faced firing with complete composure. General Moreno remembered two men so cowardice who had died bravely an adobe wall. Why? How did men that men smoked zestfully way to execution? Why did men appetite to eat when presently—

General Moreno was enormously curious. He puffed at his cigarette went over and over the problem. Age was not the answer. He was afraid, but he was not afraid now two men shot for cowardice had serenity with an adobe wall at their backs. Perhaps, of course, the ministrations of the padre had helped his recollection of other and scout persons did not bear that out. Men, pious or pagan, died bravely if they had time to foresee it precisely.

WHY? General Moreno began to annoy with his brain for the secret of its own tranquillity. He could visualize the entire process of his own execution, from the binding of his arms in this small prison cell, to the moment when he would stand facing executioners. He would most probably be conceded the privilege of having eyes left unbound. Sitting on a cot and smoking comfortably, General Moreno could literally see the level of that would face him, with the heads of the peon faces behind them. He could hear the hoarse, barked commands that would end with billowing wisps of smoke and flame from the rifle muzzles. He could feel the impact of the bullets. . . .

He knocked the ash from his cigarette again, absurdly puzzled. He had been wounded more than once. The execution volley would not be painful. He would merely feel numbed, by the impacts and then see the world go crazy as his body crumpled. But what?

He blew a smoke ring, frowning interestedly. He went through with execution. He saw himself—his position—on the ground. And still he was not frightened.

Presently he found himself yawning. He settled himself luxuriously on the cot. His breathing became deep and hurried, like that of a child.

Footsteps roused him. He sat up and yawned again, reflecting that he had had so untroubled a sleep for years. He turned his head, expecting a file of soldiers. But it was merely a guard and the padre.

He made a slight grimace. One could be polite, but he had not been a polite man. Among other things, he had been literally too busy ever to think of anything but the task he had set himself. He looked at his watch. An hour.

The padre entered the cell. The padre retired out of earshot. Half an hour later the padre left, promising to return. General Moreno had asked the padre to leave him alone. He felt a trifle rueful. He had been in his mind to stand with dignity, explaining that since he had ignored religious matters for so many years, it seemed not quite honorable attempt to evade the consequences that neglect by a last-minute attention. But there was the universal curiosity, and now he could assure as he pleased! So he told the

that he could not summon tears for anything he had done. He regretted. Some he would make no hypocritical attempt to curry divine favor by pretensions of repentance. A man might weep or howl to prove sincerity," said the padre dryly, "but a gentleman would say but a word. I do not pass upon such things. Nuestro Padre is a gentleman. We understand you."

General Moreno felt that he had never been ridiculous, but whether he attempted at dignity or not, he was not frightened. But still it bothered him that he was not frightened. He heard the steady sound of marching. The rattling of equipment. Marching men. Companies halted and were dismissed. More men and more. It had at last been reached that General Moreno's failure to fight—however inexplicable—was not an indication of any suicidal attempt on the part of his subordinates to rescue him. The whole camp was in confusion as the men who had been under arms were ordered and dismissed.

The sound of their return and dismissal was a continuous, monotonous hum. But then there were men marching down the corridor outside of General Moreno's cell. And that was not monotonous. It was his summons to action. He lighted a last cigarette. The padre was with the soldiers. General Moreno smiled at him as the soldiers bound his arms behind him. The door opened. He marched out, his head up.

Out into the open air. The sky was gray and as yet was colorless. There was the wall before him, pock-marked with something near breast height. There was the firing squad, peons all, with the inevitable hang-dog look of men on such occasions. Their officers moved jerkily back and forth, their hands fluttering nervously as they wiped sweat from their faces.

For the fortieth time General Moreno imagined the thing: the gun muzzles pointing suddenly, the little mist of smoke, the numbed, violent thrustings of bullets striking and then his body falling on the ground while his death was certain. He could foresee it in minute detail, even to the exist of the father through the narrow door with his body upon it.

Then, abruptly, he said: "For Dios! That is it!" The padre looked at him. "I can foresee everything," said General Moreno in the tone of one who has solved an extraordinarily vexing problem. "Everything up to the moment rifles speak. And then I see my body on the ground, and I see it picked up and carried away—but I am standing up and looking down at it!"

The padre looked triumphantly at the padre. "Do you see? It is not possible for me to imagine myself as dead. Only my body. Nobody can imagine himself dead! So that, no matter how defiant a man may be of your ministrations, at the end he is forced to picture his body lying crumpled on the ground—while he stands apart and reads it!"

The padre said simply: "But of course. He probably does."

Suddenly, over the wall, a voice shouted hoarsely above the confusion of marching and countermarching men in the grayish half-light. Abruptly there was an incredible, a savage, an intolerable tumult. Rifle fire broke out, furiously. Not at the edge of the dictator's position, where an attack should have developed. Here in the very center of the enemy's forces. A machine gun blasted savagely. Rifle butts pounded resonantly upon a door that opened in the wall. A hand grenade exploded.

General Moreno stood rigid. He turned slowly and rather terribly pale. The officer in charge of his escort stared blankly, and then his hand went irresolutely to the revolver at his hip. The padre said quietly:

"If you shoot him, my son, we will all be killed."

Figures spilled to the earth from the wall crest. They came racing toward General Moreno, yelling joyously, rifles ready to kill any man who menaced him. Outside, the noise of battle rose to a prodigious roar. Then came a distant screaming sound that drew nearer and ended in a terrific explosion. The uproar redoubled.

Cheering men burst in the shattered door. Yelling men. Officers and troopers alike, roaring with triumph and the lust of battle. A young officer, laughing hysterically, slashed the bonds that bound General Moreno's arms behind him.

"General!" he cried. "General! We did it. Cervera said it could not be done! He said we risked the revolution for you! He said that you would have forbidden it! But he led one regiment when we overruled him! We marched into camp from the rear in column, while they were marching and countermarching without sense. They did not even look at us, thinking we were more of themselves! Now Viznega is pounding them with artillery from the hills; we have three regiments right in their midst; there'll be a frontal attack all along the line—"

General Moreno silenced him with a gesture.

"Get your men under cover," he ordered crisply. "If there's any discipline left, they'll try to crush us and then face about to drive off the outer attack. Send a runner—"

A distant roar of battle. It spread and spread and spread. Men poured in the gate, dancing, to yell hilariously and then force their way out again. There was surprise, inevitable disorganization and overwhelming victory.

Three hours later, General Moreno sat at a desk before which officer after officer appeared to report—usually with documents. He was very busy consolidating the victory, which was final. There was now no authority in existence to combat the forces which under General Moreno had fought for liberty. Liberty, freedom—everything he had fought for was at his disposal to give to his fellow countrymen. But, of course, he was not free, because he had to make very many decisions of far-reaching importance.

WHEN they brought before him the dictator, his late antagonist, General Moreno rose to his feet.

"Señor," he said politely, "I regret that the fortune of war—"

His late antagonist regarded him stonily.

"It is my fault," he said harshly. "I should have had you shot last night. Now you will have me shot instead."

General Moreno said regretfully:

"If you were imprisoned, señor, you might escape. If you were free, you would revolt. As I did. I fear, señor, that it is necessary. Shall we say tomorrow?"

His late antagonist shrugged, his eyes hard. General Moreno sat down at his desk again. Work had piled up for his attention and there was mountainous labor ahead. But he had had sound and untroubled sleep the night before. He looked up, already thinking of something else.

"Tomorrow, then," said General Moreno abstractedly. He added: "I assure you, señor, that it will be a most interesting experience. I found it so."

WOMEN!

"AT LAST I CAN AFFORD THE MODERN INSIDE WAY. MEDS COST ONLY 20¢ FOR TEN."

Here is new and improved internal sanitary protection —at far less cost!

"MADE BY THE MAKERS OF MODESS —A NAME MILLIONS TRUST!"

"ONLY IN MEDS THIS NEW 'SAFETY CENTER' THAT MAKES PROTECTION SO SURE!"

ONLY 20¢ FOR 10 WHY PAY MORE?

"I'VE NEVER KNOWN SUCH GLORIOUS COMFORT! NO PINS! NO ODORS!"

For years, women have wished for it! Out of the Modess laboratories comes the answer at last! Monthly sanitary protection the modern, inside way—at a price everyone can afford!

New freedom for you! For Meds are the first internal method to bring you the "safety center"—a brand-new feature which pro-TECTS three ways: 1. Makes absorption quicker and surer. 2. Draws moisture into the center and down. 3. Increases the absorptive area.

New comfort, too! With Meds, you feel as free as on any other day! Easier to wear, because they're scientifically shaped to fit! Easier to use, thanks to the special applicator. Get Meds today.

Mows and Trims Lawns in One Simple, Easy Operation

Save Time and Labor with a MONTAMOWER

Tired backs and aching arms just don't happen to users of Montamower. All the drudgery and noise of lawn mowing is done away with. No dead weight to push and pull. Instead, just 7 pounds of live mechanism that first gathers then cuts the grass closely, smoothly, and to the correct height; no matting; no streaking; no clatter; no rattles. Cuts a 16" swath through long grass, dandelions, spike grass and weeds. Cuts right up to walls, fences, trees or posts; leaves no fringes to be trimmed by hand. Cutters are self-sharpening. Built to last many years. Many thousands in use. Sold direct from factory. Costs little. Write at once for guarantee information and literature.

MONTAMOWER DISTRIBUTING CO. 323 HOUSEMAN BLDG. GRAND RAPIDS, MICHIGAN

Come On!

Join Us!

SEND for our booklet, "An Adventure in Dollars and Cents." It started thousands of women and girls making money in their spare moments—it will help you too! Think how nice it would be to earn several extra dollars in a day—at home if necessary! Don't delay—join us right now! Send a card or letter today to Margaret Clarke, Secretary, Pin Money Club Department 115, Collier's Weekly 250 Park Ave., New York, N. Y.

SAFE BRAKES SAVE LIVES

Free. Dangerously worn lining gives no warning on modern brakes, because they are so powerful. Pulling a wheel, every 2,500 miles, is the only way to determine the actual condition of the lining, and also save expense of scored drums. Takes only a few minutes. Your nearby Raybestos Brake Service man will do it free. Drive in today where you see the Raybestos sign.

Raybestos

AMERICA'S BIGGEST SELLING BRAKE LINING

"YOUR 2 BEST FRIENDS for HIGHWAY SAFETY"

BRAKE LINING, CLUTCH FACINGS, FAN BELTS, HOSE • FOR CARS, TRUCKS, BUSES

Caught with Our Guard Down

Continued from page 19

KEEP COOL
—without punishing your digestion!

● If you want a safe cooler — as well as a delicious one—switch to grapefruit juice. You'll love the refreshing taste of Florida canned grapefruit juice with its distinctive tangy flavor. And it's awfully good for you—in a dozen different ways! Why not try some today?

FLORIDA CANNED GRAPEFRUIT JUICE

FLORIDA CITRUS COMMISSION, LAKE LAND, FLORIDA

IF YOU want extra funds for clothes, travel or 1,001 other things, try this practical plan. Hundreds of men and women in almost every walk of life are earning extra dollars by taking advantage of our attractive offer.

In the same way, you may increase your income by looking after new and renewal subscriptions for COLLIER'S and the other popular Crowell-Collier Publications. For free supplies, address a penny postal to—

Independent Agency Division, Desk C-25
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company
250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

FREE: Week's supply, double or single edge blades. Write MARLIN, 69 Willow St., New Haven, Conn.

assume that in modern equipment the militia is about twenty per cent efficient you wouldn't be hopelessly wrong. And much of what they've got would fail to make an enemy pause and reflect. For example, they have a fairly complete allotment of 75-millimeter field guns. But only a few of them have been modernized. To back up these World War 75s there should be 105-millimeter guns and howitzers. But they're still on paper. And there should be an array of the more potent 155s—nice heavy belchers to keep the invader at home. In our whole Initial Protective Force we have exactly four of these dependable brutes, although the National Guard has at least seen pictures of them.

Theoretically, the National Guard has 90,000 automatic rifles—the Garand or M1. Actually they have about 7,500. As war goes today, the .30-caliber machine guns the militiamen have are demoted to the tickler class. They have almost no .50s and won't have more before November, 1941. Of course there are a million fine Springfield rifles in the Army's lockers and perhaps 700,000 Enfields, that is, if they haven't been turned over to the Allies as part of our "surplus." And very good rifles they are too—provided we're to fight as we fought twenty years ago. However, if we can stall the enemy off until June, 1942, these sixty per cent of our Initial Protective Forces may be able to lick somebody. Even Mussolini, although we hate to boast.

That gives you the idea. That the National Guard, upon whom our permanent military establishment counts so heavily when there's work to be done, should be a sort of Army stepchild is not hard to understand. Until the President calls the National Guard into federal service it is a state and not a national instrument. And although the militia is as old as the nation it was not until 1903 that even the President had the power to muster it into the United States Army.

It Pays to Be Nice

But even since the National Defense Act of 1903 the United States Army has no direct control over the Guard. The Army Staff has found it convenient to be good to the Guard for political as well as military reasons, the Guard having vote influence with its congressmen who, in turn, are besought by the regulars for fat appropriations. Not that it got the Guard much. Yet laws subsequent to 1903 established a National Guard Bureau within the General Staff and it is the duty of this bureau to write the Guard's budget and see to it that the militiamen get their fair share of what Army appropriations buy.

There are eighteen divisions of militia—all of them of the old, heavy, square type. No attempt has been made to reform these ponderous divisions, far too unwieldy for prompt and effective action in modern warfare, into the new triangular speedster divisions. The full war strength of one of the square Guard divisions is about 27,000. The more mobile triangles will take in only twelve or thirteen thousand. Just how these two formations could be welded into a cohesive army is not at all clear even to the General Staff.

To modernize the National Guard—reorganize it—might not be too difficult in the populous state of New York where the present personnel of the Guard is about 20,000. With a little recruiting and the addition of New York's four independent or nondivisionalized military bodies, the 27th (New York)

Division might readily be enlarged to two triangular divisions. Incidentally we'll have more to say about those non-divisional units.

If the state of New York agreed to it, her own National Guard could be mobilized within her own borders without a word from Congress or a presidential call and the transformation might be effected. It would mean, of course, the breaking up of old regiments, some of which are held together by sentiment and little more. It would be asking units to sacrifice traditions. It would mean the building of new armories and violent alterations of old ones.

Units That Won't Mix

But the problem of making a 1940 model out of, say, the 41st Division, National Guard, would be much more difficult. The 41st represents Wyoming, Montana, Washington and Oregon. All the barriers to streamlining existing in each of these states. Then you'd have to add the reluctance of the military authorities (largely political) of the four states to agree to any one plan of mobilization. Moreover, the commander of the Oregon unit might not become madly enthusiastic were the commander of the Wyoming Guard given precedence or higher rank. In the meantime both Montana and Washington would be convinced that their lads were far superior to the militiamen from the other two states.

Then there'd always be the question of each state's quota to the new setup. For example, Wyoming has only 797 enlisted guardsmen and sixty-one officers. But Oregon produces 3,333 men and 251 officers. Washington has but a few less than Oregon, but Montana has only 1,200 militia. Of course, before any sort of a division could be built out of these slim pickings, considerable recruiting would have to be done—and done at home. Illinois, for example, might have enough guardsmen to build a division and a half but you couldn't very well move Illinois' extras to Montana, Wyoming, Oregon and Washington.

All of which may have a silly ring, which is precisely the kind of ring it's supposed to have. It would be even sillier to try it. The fundamental reason for the new triangular division, aside from mobility and speed, is mechanization. Why, therefore, reduce the Guard divisions to a triangle when you can't put them on wheels? As we've already hinted broadly, many of the Guard units haven't anything as mechanized as a good old ten-ton truck—or any truck.

Of course, had we the equipment, the National Guard could be modernized to formidable proportions. It would be necessary to mobilize them as on the Mexican border in 1916. If the President and the General Staff got tough about it, the results might be extremely military and the militia would cease with considerable speed to be a laughing matter. But the General Staff, with its right eye searching the horizon for a potential enemy and its left on Capitol Hill from whence cometh its strength, has been at some pains to avoid responsibility for a mobilization order. If Congress can be convinced that it is necessary and the President issues the General Marshall and his G's (General Staff sections) will, of course, be to death. In about five months the Guard would be physically fit for duty, foreign or domestic. All that is needed is something to fight with.

Although the National Guard is less than sixty per cent of our somewhat than dependable Initial Protective Force, the General Staff's ability to make it as useful as it is is quite limited. For example, there is nothing we need more at the moment than a dependable coast-defense anti-aircraft force. To be sure, we haven't got much equipment to equip such units with, however dependable the lads might be. And it would take a couple of years to fit them out with highly spectacular patriotic securities. Furthermore, it is a rather special job, calling for men of some natural elasticity and capable of learning quickly and forgetting slowly.

They Like Their Independence

But there are throughout our National Guard some thirteen or fourteen Guard units from brigades and regiments to lone companies which are parts of the eighteen divisions. For example, there are the 10th, 14th, 369th and 369th regiments in New York, but the 10th located in the city of New York. Then there are such outfits as the 56th Cavalry Brigade of Texas, Minnesota's 92d Brigade, the 8th Illinois, the 1st Arkansas, the 3d Battalion of the 372d Illinois Infantry. And so on. Six of these units, including the 10th New York, are Negro troops. They are not included in the National Guard's divisional make-up. Some are the developments of once swank outfits who considered themselves socially more desirable than the common regiments. Some are sentimental perpetuations of famous Civil War regiments and have been able to keep their independent status. And, of course, the Negro troops are set aside for the same noble reason that the big-league ball clubs don't use Negro players.

The nonmilitary mind has no trouble with all this. He settles it forthrightly by saying, "Convert them into anti-aircraft troops." The answer is proper: "Who's going to convert who?"

It has to be done on a voluntary basis—unless, of course, the President calls them into federal service. Well, alas, they'll do what they're told. They'll try hard to like it. Up to the moment scarcely any of these troops have shown any disposition to volunteer for anti-aircraft service—not because it means job nor an extraordinarily hazardous one. It's merely that these independent organizations are jealous of their independence.

At any rate, the General Staff is tiring on its best manners and oiling most persuasive tongues to convert these nondivisional troops that anti-aircraft stations need them, thus they can most pleasantly serve their country and demonstrate their skilled patriotism. And there's another and more guile-laden argument and. Antiaircraft troops will serve time and not be packed off to outposts where the beer isn't good and the gals wear lisle stockings. Moreover it's nice, clean work in the presence of a large, enthusiastic home audience. And instead of carrying a .30-caliber rifle and sixty pounds of ammunition, the anti-aircraft gunner will be lugging away with three-inch, 37-millimeter and .50-caliber guns, to say nothing of heaven-stabbing searchlights. We've said nothing about the National Guard's air force. There are twenty-one air squadrons on paper. We should be fourteen planes in one squadron—all observation. So what? We may as well let it go at that. They'll be equipped in time. After all, the National Guard's contribution to our national defense is not aerial. The regulars didn't call the militiamen fiddleheads for nothing.

Perhaps we should notify you, too, that the National Guard is innocent of parachutes, flame throwers, tanks, collapsible rubber boats and that Lorelei gas that lulled the Liege forts to sleep. And, of course, no dive bombers. Perhaps it's just as well. If they're anything like they were on the Mexican border in 1916 they'd be using them on one another. All except the flame throwers, that is.

We forgot to tell you that there are no barracks for the militiamen at the various training camps. The boys will be in tents. They'll use those flame throwers, if they get them, to keep warm with during those lovely Southern winter nights.

Comeback

Continued from page 16

that put a crimp into everything concerning DeLancey around the camp and he would feel the eyes on him all the time. It was only when his finger began to peel and he started to bang the ball around with his old vigor that they finally decided they might be wrong about him. Curt Davis was the first to break the ice. He came up to Bill in the lobby of the St. Petersburg hotel one night. "You're going to make it, kid," he said, and that changed the attitude. Soon after that Branch Rickey came on and signed DeLancey to a contract. By this time he was throwing hard and hitting well, although he has always been a slow starter in the spring. When he had a conference with Rickey and Ray Blades, who was manager of the club, DeLancey was to work out every day, warm up pitchers, labor in the bull pen during the game and act as occasional pinch hitter.

Above all else, Bill was not to try too hard the first year. If he happened to come in when he was sent up in a pinch, he was to trot it out. That advice proved all right until the day in Cincinnati when Bill was inserted in the line-up in the eighth inning. Both Owen and Padgett had seen action and there was nobody else to use, but nobody expected that DeLancey would have more than an inning to work. However, Benny Mize tied it up with a homer at the game went fourteen innings to a decision. The Cards might have won the game if Bill hadn't missed a third strike on Bucky Walters but it was recognized as something that could happen to anybody. What was important was that DeLancey worked six innings without distress and came through with two outs, one of them an infield hopper that he beat out with a great sprint.

Catching is Harder, Now

"You forget about trotting when you come in like that," says Bill, ruefully. "All you think about is putting down the ball and making tracks."

In short, Bill still retains his speed and his wonderful throwing arm. When he was in New York during the summer, he was plastering the ball into the right-field stands during the batting practice of his old-time style.

As a Rip Van Winkle who comes back from his sleep and thus has a view of big-league pitching from two eras, DeLancey has thoughts on the subject. "Down at Columbus we had one of the best minor-league teams ever known," says Bill proudly. "Bill Lee and Paul Dean headed that staff and we won the pennant by something like sixteen games. At St. Louis we had Diz and Paul and Wild Bill and they had stuff to burn. Coming back now, I find that most of the new pitchers have developed trick deliveries. They throw the screwball, the slider, the downer. That makes it tougher on a catcher."

DeLancey is not a believer in the cult that a big-league catcher has to be a combination of Houdini and the Encyclopedia Britannica. The theory that a receiver can only learn his craft after long years leaves him scornful.

"If a guy couldn't learn most of the weaknesses of batters after two turns around the circuit, he'd be an awful dope," says Bill.

Because he didn't want any psychological hang-overs bothering him, he sold the ranch when he left Phoenix to join the Cardinals.

He says, "I don't want to have any doubts about it. I'm going to make it."

There have been reports that the pleurisy hangs on and that he must submit to regular tapplings but he denies it and most certainly has the look of a healthy man. His cheeks are rosy and he moves with the agility and swift reactions of a first-rate athlete. As an indication of what the fans in St. Louis think of him, he was given a special Bill DeLancey day in early June and presented with an automobile. The way that club was going, they could have used anybody in the line-up and particularly a DeLancey.

So every afternoon he takes his cuts at the plate, fools around with the ball and then wends his way to the bull pen. Anybody who thinks that the bull-pen job with the Cardinals is a cinch is out of his mind. During the regime of Blades, the relief pitchers began warming up as soon as the game started. Any day that saw less than four St. Louis hurlers in the box score was counted lost. When Billy Southworth took over the management, he may have had intentions about preserving his staff but he soon found that you couldn't make finishing pitchers out of so-so pitchers. As a consequence, Mr. DeLancey has seen most of the games while standing on his feet. This was wearisome. It showed that he could stand on his feet.

Next year, if the plans work out, he will be doing the bulk of the St. Louis catching. Any doubts about DeLancey's condition will be solved by Bill himself.

"They won't have to tell me this time if anything is wrong," he says. "I'll know it myself and I'll be back there with the chickens so fast I'll be three traffic blocks ahead of the Super Chief all the way out."

Coming back at all was a miracle; staying back will be a historic event. Old roly-poly says he can do it.

IRON ORE from MINNESOTA

LIQUID GOLD from PENNSYLVANIA

Copyright 1940 by Tide Water Associated Oil Company

Nature gave them both that EXTRA SOMETHING

THE red earth of the Mesabi Range, Minnesota, is the country's source of richest iron ore. The Bradford hills of Pennsylvania are the country's source of richest crude oil. . . Mesabi iron ore produces the most iron per ton. Bradford crude oil produces the most lubricating oil of natural high quality. . . And Veedol Motor Oil is refined 100% from this richest of all crude oils. Veedol's natural heritage as a superior lubricant means much in the safe, economical operation of your modern high-speed motor. Its famous "Film of Protection" assures extra resistance to heat and friction . . . sludge and carbon . . . engine wear and fuel dilution. . . The harder you drive, the longer you drive, the more you will appreciate Veedol.

A PRODUCT OF TIDE WATER ASSOCIATED OIL COMPANY. . . MAKERS OF "FLYING A" GASOLINES

Let's Trade for Defense

ADOLF HITLER, of course, is unpredictable to everybody except his astrologers. However, the majority belief (and it seems logical) is that if Hitler wins this war he will not attack the United States for a long time afterward, if ever.

What he is generally expected to do is to try to muscle into various rich South American countries, either with arms or with fifth columns. If Hitler has such a program, the likeliest headlines on it would seem to be Brazil, Argentina and Uruguay.

An early armed invasion anywhere in the Western Hemisphere looks improbable. German war wounds and war weariness would take some time to repair, even if Hitler should win soon in Europe. Which means we ought to have time to build up our defense forces to a point where we can give a good account of ourselves—IF we keep hammering away on the job of building those forces.

The possible fifth-column problem in South America, though, isn't so easy. After all, if a lawful Nazi party builds up enough strength in Argentina, for example, to elect its own government, we can hardly order that government not to take office. We'd probably refuse to recognize some South American government established by a regular shooting revolution; but on the other hand we'd probably not send marines to overturn the overturners and set up a government we liked.

It looks to us as if the most promising key to the fifth-column problem in South America is to be found in figures such as these:

The European territories Hitler controls at this writing have normally bought from Argentina 60% of all that country's corn exports, 56% of all its hides and skins exports, 55% of its linseed exports, 50% of its forest and timber products exports, 40% wool, 25% wheat, 10% meat.

For such customers, the Argentines are bound to have felt no little affection. And because we have heavy tariffs on those articles to keep down foreign competition with our own producers of similar articles, the Argentines are bound to have correspondingly less affection for us. Similar statistics are obtainable for several other South American countries.

So our best anti-fifth-column medicine as regards South America would seem by all odds to consist in plans for building up our imports from South American countries as rapidly as we can and for keeping that business after the war.

That would mean knocking down tariffs on various key products, which would make some of our domestic producers of those things pretty mad. The thing to do about that, though, would be to slip these people some kind of subsidies or other compensation and tell them to button up their lips. What we've got to do, if we can, is to bolster up our Western Hemisphere right wing, meaning Latin America; and it's just too bad if some of the home boys are hurt in the effort to insure the independence of the entire nation.

Collier's

WILLIAM L. CHENERY, Editor

CHARLES COLEBAUGH, Managing Editor

THOMAS H. BECK, Editorial Director

Treat the Guard Right

PLEASE, will some employers kindly take to making life easier for National Guardsmen on their pay rolls?

Most employers, we believe, treat these men fairly; but don't. Some make it as tough for them as they can, within the law, when it comes to granting time off to attend camp, overlooking slips on a day after a strenuous evening of drill, and so on.

Such treatment is dirty business in the quietest of peacetime. It is unpatriotic, to put it mildly, in times like these.

After all, the members of the National Guard (251,000 men and officers) are trying to learn how to put up a fight for the country in which their employers live and do business, in case need for such a fight ever arises. The least any employer can do, it seems to us, is to stretch various and sundry points here and there in their men's favor, as a means of making them feel that their country is worth fighting for.

One for All—or Else

SOME blunt remarks seem called for on the initial reaction of various leaders of capital, labor, politics and the farmers to the national resolve to arm to the teeth. We hereby nominate Collier's, as the National Weekly, to make those remarks.

The moment the President requested the four-billion-dollar defense this year, numerous employer spokesmen demanded that labor forget about the 40-hour week, the Wage-Hour Law, overtime scales, etc., and return in mass to sweatshop days. Assorted labor leaders said labor wouldn't give an inch, and a sudden though-lived strike was instantly pulled at a Kearny, N. J., shipyard work on six fighting ships. New Deal high-brows were inclined to smile at Henry Ford's sensational and encouraging statement that, given six months and a minimum of political meddling, his plants could produce an airplane production rate of 1,000 a day. And numerous farm spokesmen yowled for more and bigger benefits in the face of the President's request that nonmilitary spending be cut 10%.

Leaders of our four most important social groups, in a word, are on record as favoring sacrifices by everybody but their followers.

That isn't democracy. It is mobocracy; government by organized mobs, each fighting for itself and against the common welfare.

We cannot tolerate it in this country if our defense program is to succeed in insuring us against the dangers that threaten to blow us from this war. Those dangers can come home to every one of us if we hit us right where we live, if we don't arm against them, and do so fast.

We have all got to be prepared to make sacrifices for the common welfare. If we go on standing for mobocracy—well, Hitler observes in Mein Kampf that the United States, though potentially mistress of the world, has been for generations a push-over for a divide-and-conquer artist like this same Mr. Hitler.

July 20, 1940

5¢ A COPY

Collier's

WOMAN ARTIST L W

Say It with Music A Short Story by Richard English

THE CROWELL-COLLIER PUBLISHING COMPANY—PUBLISHERS OF COLLIER'S—THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE—WOMAN'S HOME COMPANION

Do you see Johnny, aged 7?

No! I see a Man who is starting at Dartmouth!

Will he get on in his Life at College?

Yes! He has a Smile that takes Him Everywhere.

Why is his Smile so Attractive?

For one thing he has always used Ipana and Massage.

Why take chances with "Pink Tooth Brush"? Help your gums to become firmer, healthier, your smile brighter... with Ipana and Massage.

LET DAD rule the family finances... let Mom be the "law" in running the house... but it's often wise to listen to the youngsters when it comes to dental care!

For today, thousands of children are taught in school a lesson that many an adult still has to learn... the importance of gum massage to healthy gums, sparkling teeth.

They know that many of today's foods are too soft to require vigorous chewing. And our gums—deprived of needed exercise—often tend to become weak and flabby. Then all too frequently comes that warning tinge of "pink."

Never ignore "Pink Tooth Brush"

Yes—the minute you see "pink" on your brush... see your dentist! "Pink tooth brush" may not mean serious trouble... but it's a warning you should never ignore.

Your dentist, very likely, will simply tell you that your gums have grown lazy, need exercise and invigoration. And he, like so many dentists these days, may suggest "the healthful stimulation of Ipana and massage"!

For Ipana not only cleans teeth thoroughly but, with massage, it is specially designed to aid your gums... help them to become healthier and stronger! Each time you brush your teeth, massage a little extra Ipana onto your gums. That invigorating "tang"—exclusive with Ipana and massage—is evidence that you are stimulating your gums—aiding them to become firmer and healthier!

So get a tube of economical Ipana today. And start now to let Ipana and massage help you to firmer gums, brighter teeth, a more radiant smile!

Ipana Tooth Paste

WILLIAM L. CHENERY Editor
CHARLES COLEBAUGH Managing Editor
THOMAS H. BECK Editorial Director

WALTER DAVENPORT
AIMEE LARKIN
QUENTIN REYNOLDS
KYLE CRICHTON
KENNETH LITTAUER
JAMES N. YOUNG
MAX WILKINSON

Politics
Ditaff
Sports
Screen and Theater
Fiction
Fiction
Fiction

WM. O. CHESSMAN
HENRY L. JACKSON
GURNEY WILLIAMS
DENVER LINDLEY
FRANK D. MORRIS
IFOR THOMAS
CLARENCE H. ROY

Art
Fine Feathers
Humor
Articles
Articles
Photographs
Syntax

W. B. COURTNEY
FRANK GERVAZI
MARTHA GELLHORN
JIM MARSHALL
WM. HILLMAN
ROBERT McCORMICK
JOHN T. FLYNN

Mediter Scan
The European Wash
Associate

THIS WEEK

JULY 20, 1940

SHORT STORIES

RICHARD ENGLISH

Say It with Music. A Harvard accent can be a handicap. Page 9

DONALD HOUGH

Mistaken in Love. Comedy of errors. Page 14

KYLE CRICHTON

Southpaw Blood. Father may know best, but Son has the say. Page 20

THE SHORT SHORT STORY

To be Continued, by Pat Frank. Page 16

SERIAL STORIES

WILLIAM C. WHITE

Occupation: Widow. The third of nine parts. The underground fights the terror. Page 21

JOHN AUGUST

Rain Before Seven. The ninth of ten parts. Repentance and restitution. Page 24

ARTICLES

QUENTIN REYNOLDS

The Army of Despair. Retreat from mechanized terror. Page 11

FRANK GRAHAM

Katie's Hero. Lew Jenkins knows who's boss. Page 12

JIM MARSHALL

Saint on the Spot. He has an empire worried. Page 13

RUTH CARSON

Living at Ease. In the house of today and tomorrow. Page 17

JOHN T. FLYNN

These Our Rulers. Conclusion. Citizens' apathy puts them on the throne. Page 18

F. BEVERLY KELLEY

Here Kitty, Kitty. The cats you don't want in your home. Page 23

FRELING FOSTER

Keep Up with the World. Page 6

EDITORIALS

The Big Job for Americans.
Lie Awake and Like It. Page 62

COVER

E. M. JACKSON

ANY WEEK

THAT this department is more than slightly overwhelmed by the state of the world is not your fault. The mail is crammed with advice, counsel and plan. For example, here is Mr. Edwin B. McIsaac of Washington, D. C., who bids America to "hold up its head and reply sharply to those who jeer at us for not fighting shoulder to shoulder with somebody. Lord knows," goes on Mr. McIsaac, "that our government has done everything possible to get us into the war. One day we're nonparticipating belligerents. Next day we're fighting neutrals. When I look again we're international isolationists and before I get used to that we're fighting for Democracy with our backs to the treasury doors. I don't wish to be regarded as a fifth-column Communist but I'd certainly like some candidate for President to tell us where we stand—in, out, off or on and what to do next."

ALL of which is equally disconcerting to the Republican party says Mrs. W. R. Brutters of Lawrence, Massachusetts. Mrs. Brutters admits that she has never "yearned over editors," believing them to be "mossy thinkers in ivy-clad citadels," a description that leaves us hanging by our suspenders somewhere between indignation and applause. "I'm thinking of the editors of Republican publications who are compelled to go along with Mr. Roosevelt's pro-Ally policy and approve of his armament program but at the same time convince us that, after all, he's only playing politics and that the Republican party could be far more pro-Ally and build larger armaments and at the same time keep us out of war. After all, editors are only trying to be human, which, considering their limitations, is a laudable endeavor."

WE'RE asked, too, to remember that this four billion dollars (or is it five?) that we're trying to spend for arms is "in danger of being disbursed much like the Osage Indian's sudden oil fortune." This comes from Mr. Joe Cavanaugh of Tulsa, Oklahoma, who says the Indian's name was Charlie No Toes. One afternoon Mr. No Toes received a check for $23,000. He cashed it next day. Seating himself comfortably in a speakeasy, Mr. No Toes handed the money to the proprietor, called for a bottle of popskull and said: "When money gone I go get more."

"KEEP Congress in session for all I care," writes Mr. Clifford H. Zebulon of Racine, Wisconsin, "but for God's sake do something to stop those birds from broadcasting. Listening to broadcasts from war analysts is bad enough, leaving us awfully low in the mind. But after hearing a few of those boys in Washington you sort of lose faith in yourself to say nothing of the future of the country. I heard somewhere that they get dough for broadcasting. Is that so? And if so, who pays them? Hitler?"

ALL letters can't have the appeal of this one we've just got from Miss Aino I. Niskanen of Norway, Maine. She describes herself as "a Finnish-American who is thankful to be living in a great, wonderful country as the United States of America." Says she, "I want to tell you that your magazine brings a great deal of pleasure into our home and we, as the first generation removed from Europe, are trying hard to become Americanized—and your magazine is a very great help. We've had word from my aunt in Finland of the loss of two uncles in the Russo-Finnish War. That along with the present crisis abroad upsets us both mentally and physically."

AND THIS is more or less in the nature of an invitation to Mr. Jack Stein of Brooklyn, New York. We suggest that he read a file of correspondence sent to us by Dr. D. H. Dubrowsky who, as you'll remember, wrote a series of articles for us showing among other things how the Honorable Josef Stalin diverts money grants from American veterans of the A.E.F. to his Moscow treasury. Mr. Stein's money and his brother's too, were cases in point, cited by Dr. Dubrowsky. Mr. Stein says it isn't so and that he, for example, thinks well of Russian bonds. We think that Mr. Stein would serve himself well by reading his own letters to Dr. Dubrowsky and others before going to all the trouble of suing us. Not that we want to interfere.

WE'VE been waiting for someone to come through with a demand for the suppression of foreign-language newspapers. And here it is. One of the pleasant features of this chore is the knowledge that sooner or later our readers think of everything. Anyway, Miss Beulah Wells of Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, is looking for a congressman with no foreign-born constituents to worry about. She proposes to ask him to introduce such legislation. "If anybody has anything to say or write these days," says Miss Wells, "let it be said or written in English."

AND YET we doubt that such legislation would eliminate our journalistic or forensic confusion. We've been reading quite a number of English language dodgers, tear sheets, pamphlets, appeals and propaganda throw lately and find ourselves some more bewildered than usual. sample we offer a few outst thoughts from a printed bro from Mr. John Dickens Deems, of Los Angeles, California, places. Our derangement start that Gr. D. But maybe you know it is. Anyway Mr. or Doctor I would have "the nations of the meet on neutral grounds and from among them one nation would own all the world's arm armaments. These arms and ments," says he, "would bepa and maintained by all the n When any nation threatened to another, this one constable would step in and stop it." On ing this over we're inclined to be charitable than we were at first. I it's not a bad idea after all. Al require is a neutral meeting and someone strong enough to fo the others to vote for him. Yes, we were a bit hasty. Anywa Hitler wouldn't object.

IN THE meantime the bing-ba hullabaloo are so great that voices are lost and commonplace lems forgotten. While vast arm made and destroyed, what beco so obscure an incident as the needs of Mrs. A. McCall of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. She's eight She's all alone. She has no r Ten of her forbears and four of scendants have fought in Am wars. Five of them died in ur It's hard to read her writing. will become of the Townsend asks Grandmother McCall. "Wh become of me? When you get perhaps it would be best to die. tell me what will become of th age pensions. I do not see ver any more."

IF WE knew so much, we'd pr know the answer to this on "What," demands Mrs. T. P. nemary of Denver, Colorado, " think those politicians are th who are responsible for the paredness of England and Fran though knowing for seven year Germany was doing nothing b ting ready to slaughter those w trusted them with government

PLEASANT week end. . . .

Vol. 106, No. 3. Entered as second-class matter at Post Office, Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A., under Act of March 3, 1879, and at Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Springfield, Ohio, Publishers of Woman's Home Companion, The American Magazine, Collier's. Copyright, 1940, The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, in the United States, Canada and Great Britain. Executive and Editorial Offices: 250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y. 6 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London. Published weekly at Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A. Joseph P. Knapp, Chairman of the Board; Thomas H. Beck, President; Albert E. Winger, Executive Vice President and Treasurer; Gertrude B. Lane, Vice President; John S. Brehm, Vice President; William P. Larkin, Vice President; J. A. Welch, Vice President; Denis O'Sullivan, Secretary. Manuscripts or art submitted to Collier's, The National Weekly, should be accompanied by addressed envelopes and sufficient postage for their return. The Publisher assumes no responsibility for return of unsolicited manuscripts or art. Price, 5 cents a copy in the United States and Canada $2.00 a year, $3.50 for two years, in the United States and Canada, also in Argentina, Balearic Islands, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Labrador, Mexico, Newfoundland, Nicaragua, Paraguay, Peru, Spain and Colonies, Uruguay and Venezuela. Foreign subscriptions including postage: $5.50 a year to all other countries. Remit by postal or express money order or check in United States. The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Springfield, Ohio. To avoid in delivery, subscribers should notify us of change of address five weeks in advance. Give both old and new addresses.

THE HUMAN THAT'S ALMOST RUBBER...
... and vice versa!

YOU'VE GASPED, too—probably—at the contortions of some "Rubber Woman." Yet it might seem even stranger if rubber were to be given some of the characteristics of a living body . . . if, for instance, an automobile inner tube could "heal itself" almost as your body heals a wound—only faster! A MIRACLE, you say? Well, Goodrich has accomplished it . . . with rubber so plastic that it works in to fill holes or rips as you ride, yet so tough that it forms a permanent seal. It took years to perfect this "Self-Healing" lining. But the result is 2-Way Safety: protection against blow-outs and flat tires both. THESE NEW INNER TUBES, called Seal-o-matics, can save you money, too. Records of taxi and light-truck fleets show they make tires wear up to 34.6% longer . . . save substantially on total rubber expense. Let this saving help buy a set of Seal-o-matics for you. Your Goodrich Silvertown Store and many Goodrich Dealers offer a confidential credit plan on Seal-o-matic purchases. Also ask about the special deal they can make for new car owners. And remember which . . . the name's Goodrich.

2-WAY SAFETY—Maximum Protection Against Blow-outs and Flat Tires Both!

"Self-Healing" lining (A) heals punctures from glass, nails, etc., while you ride—seals even bigger gashes that ordinarily cause fearful blow-outs. For added blow-out protection, this tube is 60% stronger all around than ordinary tubes . . . made of special black heat-resisting "Tuff-Rubber", . . . and not weakened by stretching to size, because it is built up (not just blown up) to fill your tire.

At the 1940 New York World's Fair—Jimmie Lynch drives over dozens of 3" spikes every day, without a blow-out or flat. See him do it at the great Goodrich Thrill Arena.

Goodrich Seal-o-matic

DON'T BE SATISFIED WITH LESS THAN 2-WAY SAFETY

OL' JUDGE ROBBINS

IN RECENT LABORATORY "SMOKING BOWL" TESTS, PRINCE ALBERT BURNED

86 DEGREES COOLER

THAN THE AVERAGE OF THE 30 OTHER OF THE LARGEST-SELLING BRANDS TESTED— COOLEST OF ALL!

GET IN THE SWIM WITH COOLER, Milder SMOKING

YOU BET PRINCE ALBERT IS MILDER— IT BURNS COOLER— AND IT DRAWS EASY, EVEN!

MEET THE RICH BODY AND AROMA OF P.A.'S CHOICE TOBACCO! IT'S NO-BITE TREATED!

ROLL-YOUR-OWNERS! P.A. IS CRIMP CUT FOR FAST ROLLING, TOO— MILD, TASTY FOR 'MAKIN'S' SMOKES

50 pipefuls of fragrant tobacco in every handy tin of Prince Albert

Copyright, 1940. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, Winston-Salem, N. C.

PRINCE ALBERT THE NATIONAL JOY SMOKE

KEEP UP WITH THE WORLD

By Freling Foster

Short-wave diathermy not only produces the deepest heat penetration of any agency used for such purpose, but its effect may be felt for some time. As an example, a scientist who had his right leg treated seven years ago states that it is still warmer than his left or untreated leg.

When no longer needed, the private correspondence of the King and Queen of England is put through three distinct processes of destruction. First the letters go through a machine that blacks out every word. Next they are torn into very small pieces. Then they are secretly burned by a trusted fireman.

Among the many unusual objects that emit a light or produce a luminescence that may be seen in the dark are rubber bands when snapped, quartz pebbles when struck, lumps of sugar when rubbed together and adhesive tape when stripped from a roll.

The Supreme Court of the United States has been known to render "no decision" verdicts. One such case was that of the New York Unemployment Insurance Act which, in November, 1936, could not be decided because an even number of justices voted and the vote was evenly divided. Therefore, the judgment of the lower court prevailed and was enforced.

The number of possible moves in a game of chess is almost beyond calculation. For example, there are more than 4,000,000,000 such possibilities in the first six moves of each player.

The loudest respiratory movements known are those of whales. When harpooned, they sometimes stay under the water for as long as two hours and, coming to the surface, expel their long-held breath with such force that the sound can be heard for more than a mile.

Dry sand is heavier than sand and oxygen in air is heavier than oxygen in water. A sponge will hold more cold water than hot water.

Although only twenty-four states impose a tax on retail sales, $450,000,000 a year is collected this way. Incidentally, on the states, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, have made the tokens interchangeable for the convenience of interstate shoppers.

Courts have awarded damages to persons injured while trespassing on premises marked with a reading "No Admittance" and "Keep Out." In one recent year such judgments totaled $1,000,000, only $37,000,000 of which was paid by insurance companies.

According to a recent decision, an employee is entitled to workmen's compensation for injuries received in a fight during working hours.

In major-league baseball one in about 1,400 games was won by a no-hit, no-run pitching performance. — By Dale Shipman, Wichita Falls, Texas.

The United States Fleet moved through the Panama Canal with remarkable speed. Not long ago, a hundred and ten of its ships moved through in forty-eight hours, moving one vessel in and another out every twenty-six minutes.

A large Eastern railroad has ordered from 200 to 500 tons of rust metal to various steel companies, to use it in the manufacture of iron. — By Edwin C. Barringer, New York, New York.

Five dollars will be paid for each item or unusual fact accepted for this column. Contributions must be accompanied by a factory proof. Address Keep Up with the World, Collier's, 250 Park Avenue, New York City. This column is copyrighted by Collier's National Weekly. None of the items may be reproduced without express permission of the publisher.

I'll say "33 to 1"
wins at the 19th Hole!

BLENDED 33 TIMES TO MAKE ONE GREAT BEER!

A BRAND NEW BONNET
WITH A BLUE RIBBON
ON IT!

The goodness never varies—because every single glass of BLUE RIBBON is a blend of 33 separate brews!

Treat yourself to a glass of Pabst Blue Ribbon today. First you'll enjoy the look of it — the clarity, the sparkle, the creamy head.

Then you'll discover what beer flavor and beer smoothness can really be!

For in that glass — and in every glass of Blue Ribbon is a blend of not two, or five, or twelve ...but 33 separate brews, from 33 separate kettles.

And each brew is as fine as 96 years of skill, the 28 Pabst scientists, and Pabst ingredients can make it.

An expensive way to brew? Of course! But that's what makes Blue Ribbon America's Premium Beer, with a smoothness that is unique . . . and a goodness that never varies.

Sometime today, have the pleasure of meeting a glass of Blue Ribbon.

It's the BLEND that Better's the Beer

Try Pabst Blue Ribbon and Prove it

First in the Homes of America — and the Largest Selling American Beer in the Rest of the World!

Copyright 1940. Pabst Brewing Company, Milwaukee

PHILCO brings you Europe... 5 times stronger, clearer and easier to tune!

Yes, Philco makes radio history while world history is made! The world's greatest staff of radio engineers presents, for 1941, not one but a series of spectacular inventions, so momentous, so new and different that they begin a new era in radio enjoyment!

A New Kind of Overseas Wave-Band makes foreign reception 500% stronger and clearer, 5 times easier to tune! Nothing like it has ever been known in radio! Now, in these stirring times, a new 1941 Philco makes programs direct from the Capitals of Europe as much a part of your daily radio life as your favorite local stations!

A brand-new radio circuit... reduces noise by 5 to 1, "cross talk" by 20 to 1, more than doubles selectivity... made possible by the amazing new XXL Noise-Reducing Converter Tube created by Philco. New Built-In American and Overseas Aerial System gives you far greater sensitivity. No aerial or ground wires... just plug in anywhere and play!

Philco 255T, only $5.90 down.

From $9.95 to $395

See and hear the new 1941 Philco Radios and Radio-Phonographs now on display at your nearest Philco dealer. Consoles, table models, compacts, portables... a variety of styles for every purse! Yours on easiest monthly terms:

NEW KIND OF OVERSEAS WAVE-BAND

A MUSICAL INSTRUMENT OF QUALITY

NEW AMERICAN AND OVERSEAS
AERIAL SYSTEM

BUILT FOR TELEVISION SOUND AND FM
the Wireless Way

JUST PLUG IN ANYWHERE AND PLAY

GLORIOUS TONE

Philco 280X
only $6.90 down.

Again... Only PHILCO has it!

NEW PHOTO-ELECTRIC RADIO
PHONOGRAPH

NO NEEDLES TO CHANGE

RECORDS
LAST 10 TIMES LONGER

NEW PURITY OF
TONE

Philco 608P, only $12.95 down.

Records reproduced on a Beam of Light!

The first basic improvement in record reproduction since the invention of the phonograph... brought to you by Philco engineers! The amazing Philco Photo-Electric Phonograph reproduces records through the reflections of a floating jewel on a photo-electric cell. No needles to change! The floating jewel lasts 8 to 10 years! Records last 10 times longer. Play valuable records as much as 700 times. Glorious tone... full record beauty. Needle talk and surface noise no longer mar tone purity!

New Tilt-Front Cabinet

Brings you new beauty and convenience. No lid, no need to remove ornaments to reach the phonograph, no dark, awkward compartment. New principle tilts phonograph forward, in full view and easy to use.

MAKE YOUR OWN RECORDS with Philco "Professional" Home Recording Unit. Optional equipment at reasonable extra cost.

Say It with Music

By Richard English

ILLUSTRATED BY ROBERT O. REID

Whatever else posterity may say about the music of Oliver Bradley, let it remember he emitted the first recorded war whoop in the Harvard manner

LESS than two minutes before the arrival of the morning Mainliner—a huge red bus made the turn into the Burbank airport on two wheels and, its blaring horn warning off traffic, went roaring toward the terminal. There was one breathless moment as it negotiated the parking circle and then, its brakes screeching, it pulled up at the entrance. Mr. George Bates, Mammoth Pictures' pudgy publicity chief, leaped out. He was immediately followed by sundry parties, half of whom were disguised as Daniel Boone.

The others, a number of braves complete with scalp locks and war paint and armed with tomahawks, were just emerging when an indignant official collared Mr. Bates. "Listen you," he roared, "if you think you're going to take that mob scene out on the field, you're crazy! Last week it was a whole chorus to meet some strip-tease artists. The week before—"

Mr. Bates' large eyes were reproachful. "Can I help it who the studio signs?" he demanded. He shook his head, answering the question to his own satisfaction, and then added reassuringly: "But this is different, pal. I'm meeting a very distinguished man today. All I want is a carriage-trade spread."

The booming voice of the amplifier cut off any further debate:

"Flight nine, the Mainliner, arriving from New York."

"This way, boys," cried Mr. Bates, speeding for the gates. "And remember to put some oomph in it!"

The plane was still circling over the field as Oliver Bradley gathered up his magazines. It was his first plane flight as well as his initial trip to the coast, and he was having a hard time concealing it. He was a sober young party with horn-rimmed glasses and the natural shyness of a man who has devoted three years to writing the great American opera and then watched it lay an All-America egg.

Arise America had opened to critical acclaim and closed by popular demand, leaving Oliver a man minus career. He had been weaned on Bach, studied abroad, graduated from Harvard and, while he was at work on the recently deceased, had been an associate professor of music at the state university. He was gloomily preparing to return to the campus and the harassed existence of a serious young man entirely surrounded by extravert young ladies when Fate—Mammoth Pictures—had intervened. For some reason never quite clear to him, he had been hurriedly signed to a composer's contract, thrust aboard a plane and dispatched to the coast, marked "urgent."

The plane was down now and rolling toward the terminal. Peering from his window, Oliver observed that there was some commotion at the gates and a number of cameramen were present.

"Why, Oliver!" she gasped. "Have you been drinking?" "I have not," he said darkly, "although I admit toying with the idea"

It was too much for Oliver. There was nothing he could do but kiss her Apparently there were some picture celebrities aboard and Oliver looked around, wishing that he might have met them. He would have appreciated some advice from a colleague in this new field.

The door opened and the passengers crowded into the aisle. Oliver was the last to emerge, a shy, dark young man in tweeds, blinking slightly at his first exposure to the famous California sun. As he started down the steps George Bates cried: "There he is, boys. Let him have it!"

Seven cameras flashed and a bulb exploded with a loud, sharp report. Oliver flinched and, momentarily blinded, staggered against the handrail. Before he could recover there was an ear-splitting war whoop and Indians in breechcloths and tomahawks appeared on all sides. Oliver took one look and emitting a strangled cry, bounded up the steps. It was too late. A brave laid violent hands on his coat and Oliver swung around, determined to sell his life dearly.

He laid about him with his brief case and one warrior went down. He was struggling with another when men with long rifles, buckskin suits and raccoon caps came surging in, fighting their way through the braves. Oliver stopped a swing in mid-air to get a better look at this unexpected aid and George Bates cried happily: "That's fine, Mr. Bradley! Hold that pose!"

Once more the cameras went off and Oliver found himself being helped down the steps.

"Welcome to Hollywood!" Mr. Bates cried enthusiastically. "I've met a lot of actors and I never saw one give a better landing performance."

Oliver was just getting his wind back. He stared at Mr. Bates.

"Actors?" he said frigidly. "Actors? There must be some misapprehension. I happen to be a composer."

Mr. Bates looked hurt. "Don't I know it?" he demanded. "The whole studio is waiting with open arms to greet you!"

The reporters were crowding around and Mr. Bates did the honors, en masse. "Boys," he said, "meet Oliver Bradley, the greatest living American composer.

Brought to Hollywood by Ancil Steinberg, whose genius guides the destinies of—"

"We know that routine," said a fat reporter. "We've already filed it in the wastebasket. What's this guy here for?"

"What's he here for?" Mr. Bates said indignantly. "To write the score of that epic of the west, that superlative answer to Northwest Passage—Mammoth Pictures' Across the Plains. What else could he be here for?"

OLIVER had not yet recovered his composure when he was herded into the outer office of Mr. Ancil Steinberg, that eminent producer. He had been whisked to the studio by limousine, taken in hand by a messenger boy, relayed to a secretary and now, rejoined by Mr. George Bates, was sitting in an office that could, and had, doubled for the interior of Buckingham Palace.

"Wait until you see the Throne Room," George said reverently. "He's got everything but the king for a prop."

At exactly one o'clock they were ushered into the presence. Mr. Steinberg was a small round party with the nervous oyster eyes of a man who had always been careful never to lay the same egg twice. He was seated at his desk, gulping his midday bread and milk. He peered at them over his spoon.

"This is Oliver Bradley," said George. "You know, the one you signed to do the score on Across the Plains."

There was a moody silence as Mr. Steinberg surveyed his new hireling.

George coughed. "Remember his clippings, chief? He wrote that opera all the critics were nuts about."

"I remember," Mr. Steinberg said fretfully, "and he still don't look to me like nobody who would know about Indians."

Oliver stared at him. There had been nothing in his contract about Indians. But this, he realized, was no time for half measures. If, to be a Hollywood composer, one was supposed to be an authority on Indians and things, he must cope with that situation. Only the screen could provide the mass medium through which a young and hopeful composer could reach the most humble home. Better Hollywood and Indians than being a professor of music, growing old and musty among other men's works.

"You needn't worry, Mr. Steinberg," he said recklessly. "There shall be tom-toms and more tom-toms!"

After a hasty sandwich in the commissary Mr. Bates led his latest protégé down a long line of minor Moorish bungalows. "This is composer's row," he said. "Two artists to every bungalow. You rate the one with Sigmund Roseblum. We got him on a loan-out from Vienna."

He threw open the door of the end bungalow. "You married?" he asked.

Oliver regarded him for a wary moment. "No," he said, "as a matter of—"

"Fine," said George, taking up the phone. When his office answered: "Send over Penny Ames," he said. "I want her to meet her new love-life."

Oliver could feel the color surging into his face. "Look here," he said wildly, "I have no intention—"

"Relax," said Mr. Bates. "It's just part of the old build-up."

Before Oliver could say anything, there was a sudden series of heavy, lugubrious chords, so utterly mournful and out-of-this-world that they made the flesh creep. Oliver's hair rose as he realized the sound was emanating from the adjoining room.

The chords continued, growing more and more dolorous and suddenly he could stand it no longer. He threw open the door and found himself surveying a huge man at a piano. There was a big, round face and tears were streaming from his sheep-dog eyes.

"No muzzer," he groaned. "No muzzer."

He struck another lugubrious chord and Oliver felt more and more distressed. "I beg pardon?" he said anxiously.

The pianist looked up. "No muzzer, no fazzer," he gulped, about to break down completely. "No nuzzin'."

George closed the door gently. "You mustn't mind Sig," he said. "He always takes his work seriously. Right now he's on the remake of Orphans of the Storm."

"Oh," Oliver said weakly.

The morose chords continued, gradually achieving a banshee effect, and Oliver shivered. Before he could quite make up his mind what to do he became conscious that a very blond young lady was standing in the doorway, regarding him with wide-eyed interest.

"This is Penny Ames," said George. "As long as she's the lead in Across the Plains and you're both free-lancing, I'm going to give it that old heartthrob. See you in the gossip column, kiddie."

He went out, leaving Oliver staring at the young lady. Her beauty was entirely natural—hardly what one would have expected in the cinema colony and she was dressed in simple good taste. There was a rosebud mouth, tip-tilted nose, and exactly all the right lines in all the right places. There were also wide blue eyes that he suspected harbored neither guile nor thought.

"Free-lancing?" Oliver said helplessly. "What did he mean by that?"

She had a nice smile. "He just meant that as long as we're both not married or engaged or something," she looked at him. "Or are you?"

He reminded himself that this was Hollywood and perhaps such questions, if not excusable, were to be expected. "On the contrary," he said stiffly, "I have never been married, engaged—or anything."

"That makes it much nicer," she said. "Neither have I." She perched herself on the divan and Oliver was desperately trying to invent some avenue of escape when, in the next room, Mr. Sigmund Roseblum finally outdid himself.

There was a series of chords and figures, each one more weird and terrifying than the last and even they were eventually topped by something that must have been lifted right out of a funeral march. The door flung open and Mr. Roseblum peered in, wiping his eyes.

"I go golf now," he said drearily. "No more of this can I stand!"

THE door closed on him and Oliver looked at the girl. "It's all right," she said reassuringly. "You get used to Hollywood. Everyone does."

It developed that Miss Ames had once felt quite like Oliver. Only two seasons ago she had been chosen Miss Brooklyn, the contest having saved her from life in a bargain basement, and when she first came to Hollywood it had been more like a nightmare than a dream. But now she was a veteran of seven pictures and was used to things. Across the Plains was her first big lead, and if she went over they meant to star her.

Oliver felt some remark was called for. "I'm sure you'll be a great success," he said gallantly. "You—you have all the attributes."

Apparently he had said the right thing. The wide blue eyes regarded him for a moment and even he could see the childlike honesty in them. "I like you," she said. "When you say something you sound as if you mean it."

Oliver colored. "Thank you," he said, blurring the words. He looked around the room before lowering his voice. "Miss Ames," he said, "would you mind telling me just—just what is expected of us?"

(Continued on page 57)

The Army of Despair

Martin Reynolds

men, women, children from their homes
join the unending of bewildered and less refugees fleeing the terrors of a war can't comprehend

each family crouches in a roadside ditch to escape machine-gunner planes. Below: refugees in trucks to flee the war zone

THERE was no dawn.

This was puzzling at first because it had been a clear night. Now the air was heavy with a smoky fog so thick that you could reach out and grab a piece of it in your hand. When you let it go your hand was full of soot. Then you realized that this was a man-made fog, a smoke screen thrown over Paris to hide the railroad stations from the bombers. But for the first time in its history Paris had no dawn.

The restaurants and the hotels were all closed. For nearly a week there had been no way of hearing from or communicating with the outside world. A reporter without means of communication is a jockey without a horse. No matter what story you wrote now, you would be its only reader. And now the Germans were pounding on the gates of Paris. Already their mechanized forces had encircled the city on three sides. Within a day the thing that couldn't happen was inevitably going to happen. They would be in Paris.

It was time to say farewell to Paris. Virtually everyone else had left. The government had left the cable office, and the wireless had moved south. With the exception of a few newspapermen who had been assigned to the death watch the entire press had left. They had to leave. They had to follow their communications. Hotels were closed. There were no telephones and not a taxicab on the streets. Today Paris was a lonely old lady completely exhausted. The last of the refugees were leaving, some on bicycles, some on foot, pushing overladen handcarts.

I had stayed behind to write the story of the siege of Paris, confident that the army would hold out in the north. Now it developed that there would be no siege of Paris. A lonely old lady was not a military necessity. She was to be reluctantly abandoned. The problem of how to leave Paris was solved by one of those incredible bits of luck that come only to fools who have waited too long. The Grande Boulevard was almost deserted this morning. One middle-aged woman was sitting at a table at a sidewalk café, one of the very few where one could still get coffee and bread. She was telling a few bystanders of her plight. She had driven into the city that morning in her small one-seated car. She had the car and two hundred francs, that was all. She would stay in Paris but she needed money. With money one could buy food even from Germans. She wanted to sell her car. Sell her car? For weeks people had been combing Paris, looking for cars. Offering fantastic prices, offering anything for means of leaving when the time came. I bought the car on the spot. She gave me the key, I gave her five hundred dollars, which left me with five. No signing of papers, no transferring of ownership. I don't know her name yet but I have her car.

Now I was mobile. Now I, too, could follow the government, follow the wireless and the cable offices. My car was a Baby Austin, no bigger than a minute. Its tank was full of gasoline, enough to carry me a few hundred miles. There was room in it for a knapsack, a mattress, a typewriter and a steel helmet. And so the tiny car and I said farewell to Paris and headed south.

Caravan of the Homeless

We didn't catch up with the great army of refugees until we passed the city limits. From then on we were a member of this army. It is one thing to see thousands of weary refugees in the newsreels; it is something quite different to be one of them. We moved slowly, sometimes we would be held up for as long as three hours without moving. The road stretched from Paris to Bordeaux four hundred miles away and it was packed solid that entire distance. Thousands of these people had come from the north, many had been on the road for two weeks. They had only one thought: move south. Move away from terror that swooped down from the skies. Move away from the serfdom that would be theirs under German rule. Few had any money. Few knew where they were going.

Some rode in open trucks and large, open wagons drawn by horses. Inevitably the sides of these would be buttressed by mattresses. These were not for sleeping. These were protection against machine-gun bullets. Refugees coming from Belgium and from Holland and refugees who had come from the north had been machine-gunned by Messerschmidts not once or twice but repeatedly. This is not rumor; it is fact.

Thousands in our army of refugees rode bicycles and they made the best time. Often a military convoy came down the road against our tide of traffic. Then we would stop and wait interminably until it passed. Those on bicycles managed to keep going, winding in and out of the massed traffic.

Into Comforting Darkness

Thousands were walking, many carrying huge packs on their shoulders. This was a quiet, patient army. There was little talk. The hours passed slowly. My uniform and military pass gave me priority. And yet in eight hours I had only covered fifty miles.

It started to rain as night fell. Now we began to be held up by trucks and automobiles that had run out of gasoline. There was no gasoline to be had. Women stood on the roadside crying to us for gasoline as we passed. We could only look ahead and drive on. The rain continued to fall softly and the night grew very dark, which made us breathe easier. Even German bombers can't see through a pall of blackness.

Individuals would emerge from the mass when we stopped. Here on the roadside was a woman lying asleep. Her head pillowed on her bicycle. Here was a farm wagon that had broken down. A man and woman with their three children, the youngest in the mother's arms, looked at the wreck. The rear axle had broken and when the wagon collapsed its weight had completely smashed one wheel. They stood there looking at it, their faces empty of everything but despair. The road was completely jammed now. A man went from car to car asking: "Is my wife there? She has lost her mind. She has lost her mind."

He asked me and I said: "No, she isn't here." And he looked his amazement at hearing his mother tongue. He was English, had owned a bookstore in Paris. We heard a strange laugh and he ran toward it quickly. I followed. He had found his wife. She had left their car and now she had returned to it. She kept laughing.

Their car had run out of gasoline. They had no food. The woman laughed and then cried a little and said, "Help us."

I took the man back to my tiny car. I showed him my gasoline meter. I had less than three gallons left. There was no room in my car for anything. I had no food. I couldn't help. People around us looked on, saying nothing. There was nothing to be said. Thousands were in the same predicament. But this woman had cried. That was breaking the rule a little bit. No one else was crying.

Our army went on through the night. Hours later a whisper ran back: "Alerte... alerte." It had started perhaps miles ahead and had come back to us. The very few cars that had been showing lights snapped them off. Boche bombers were somewhere overhead in that black, unknown world above us. We were very quiet, thousands of us. I stepped out of my car. I flashed my light once to see where we were. I was

(Continued on page 56)

Katie's Hero

By Frank Graham

It's a long haul from Sweetwater, Texas, to Madison Square Garden but Lew Jenkins, lightweight champion, made it with Katie's able assistance.

PHOTOGRAPH FOR COLLIER'S BY PAUL PETERS

The imperturbable Lew Jenkins, with his manager, Hymie Caplin, and Marvin Kennedy, his small-boy manager.

THE lightweight champion of the world is, as they say in the prize-fight business, a guy out of Sweetwater, Texas, by the name of Lew Jenkins. Outside the ring he conducts himself in an orderly manner and will give you plenty of "Yes, sir" and "No, sir" in the course of a conversation but he would be a bad guy to tangle with on a street corner or in an alley. Just as bad as he would be in the ring when the lights go down over the crowd and he shuffles his feet in the corner and the bell rings and he moves out punching. Worse, maybe, because there are no bells and no referees on street corners or in alleys.

He is twenty-three years old but looks older because his face is weather-beaten and scarred by the gloves that have crashed against it. He has high cheekbones, a beak of a nose, tousled brown hair, a crumpled ear and the narrow, cold blue eyes of a fighter. He came up from a background of cotton fields, packing houses, cow towns, rodeos, Army barracks (Eighth U. S. Cavalry, Fort Bliss), the road, flophouses, carnivals and the fight clubs of Dallas, Houston, Fort Worth, the border towns, Mexico City and the Middle West.

He came up the hard way and he looks it and he fights the way he looks. He is cold, hard, merciless. A vest-pocket Dempsey of the days when Dempsey was fresh from the hobo jungles and was lean and hungry and a killer in the ring. With this difference:

Dempsey operated under a fearful nervous tension. Jenkins has no nerves. Two hours before he won the lightweight championship from Lou Ambers in Madison Square Garden he was in Toots Shor's restaurant with one of his managers, Hymie Caplin, meeting some of Hymie's friends. He wore a khaki sports shirt and an old suit and he was going from table to table shaking hands. He had punched his way up from obscurity in a few months and in two hours he was going to fight for the lightweight championship of the world and he was no more concerned than he would have been if he was on his way to fight the town clown in Peoria.

He was a 16 to 5 shot against Ambers that night because Ambers, wily and rugged and dead game, had taken the punches of Jimmy McLarnin and Tony Canzoneri and Henry Armstrong and Pedro Montanez and Al Davis and the gamblers couldn't see how Lew Jenkins could hope to knock him out—and if he couldn't knock Ambers out he couldn't win. But thirty seconds after the opening bell, he had Ambers on the floor. He had him on the floor again in the second round and in the third round the referee stopped it because Ambers had been knocked down twice in that round and was reeling, helpless, into the ropes in his own corner.

Katie Packs a Punch

Lew Jenkins had arrived. So had Katie, who is Lew's wife and has helped to shape his career, sometimes forcibly. Katie, curiously enough, was a Jenkins before Lew married her after a three-day courtship when he was campaigning through the Southwest and she was a midget auto racer. They were a strange-looking pair when they met, for Lew's face bore wounds suffered in a recent engagement and Katie had just been working on her car and her hands and face were smeared with oil and grease. Truly, it must have been love.

Katie is only about this high and weighs no more than one hundred pounds. She has a page-boy bob, a forehead, high cheekbones, laughing eyes—and a punch in either hand.

She has come all the way with Lew. When they were married, he was a body and they were both broke. He went hungry and lived in rooming houses and tourist cabins and cheap hotels and moved from town to town in a battered old car. Across the border back again, almost starving one day in Mexico City, and Jenkins sometimes despair. Fighting wherever he could. Fighting from round to round. Fighting for enough money to get something to eat and a place to sleep. And Katie telling him that some day he would get a break and become the lightweight champion of the world.

At one stretch, when Lew couldn't get any regular fights, they tied up with a carnival. One of the attractions was a boxing booth, where the town school boys would try to stay four rounds with the carnival fighters and win ten dollars. As one of the fighters, Jenkins had to take on all who challenged him and knock them out in less than four rounds or blow his job. They don't pay much attention to weights in the boxing booths. He fought them from one hundred pounds to 150 and over.

Nobody ever had taught him to punch. (Continued on page 44)

Saint on the Spot

By Jim Marshall

Mahatma Gandhi and members of the All-India Congress party. At left is Villabhai Patel, who may be the first president of the Indian Republic if Gandhi succeeds

India, the irresistible of Mahatma Gandhi
des with the shaking British Empire—and it's going on in Europe
er, after all, turn out to relatively unimportant

IE greatest dictator in the world lay on his back on a palm-leaf mat spread on the floor of a mud-and-oo hut in a tiny, straggling village out in the middle of the baking In-plains. All he had on was a wisp of e white cotton cloth and a pair metal-rimmed specs. He had a sort master of brown mud spread over hidriff—mud almost the color of his brown skin. He said it was good for ing stomach trouble and what-ailed-Not that he had any stomach troue you could hardly acquire any on a of goats' milk and dates, with a nib-of garlic for dessert. But the earth the great curative and preventive.
He took some more mud and spread it his domed forehead. It would cure a ache. Not that he had a headache, just in case.
Then a tall, pleasant-looking Indian in a cotton sari came into the dim and said in rapid Gujarati that that was here again. Very well, said the dictator, let him come in, and what it now? It turned out to be a queer, ing little fellow named Bhansali, a of Number One Disciple of the dic-
r. Once, you heard, he was a recluse, ed for weeks and then lived on raw and leaves, spoke no word to any-for five years and once, lest he break vow of silence, sewed his lips to-er with copper wire. Now he works lay and half the night for the cause.

He owns nothing save the couple of yards of cloth around his waist. He talks to the brown man on the floor. The girl secretary translates.

Bhansali, it seems, has a plan to help the good crusade along: he wishes to hang headfirst down a near-by well.

The dictator smiles a one-tooth smile and says no. The mud poultice on his forehead slips and he pushes it back into place. The potential well-hanger is silent a moment; then he accepts the decision and steps from the hut into the hot, searing sunshine of India.

There is nothing much in the hut except a few mats on the bare floor. The walls are pierced for window spaces about a foot square, high up, iron-barred.
The only decorations are some low reliefs of palm trees, done in mud on the brown walls. Over in a corner stands a spinning wheel. The spinning wheel is what the dictator calls his best weapon.

People who come into the dim hut speak to the man on the mat as Mr.
Gandhi, and Mahatma. But the familiars of the place call him Gandhi-ji, the "ji" being a term of respect something like the Japanese "san." It is not long before you are calling him Gandhi-ji, too, for he has some indefinable power to invoke friendship.

You sit there and you say to yourself:
"This little guy here, who doesn't own ten bucks' worth of anything, is a bigger man than Hitler, Mussolini and Joe Stalin all rolled into one. For Gandhi-ji, more than 350,000,000 Indians, high and low, rich and poor, will march and sacrifice themselves and perhaps die. For him they will do anything—except fight.
He has forbidden them to fight. . . .

You wonder what sort of philosophy this little brown man has that in twenty years shot him from obscurity up to the leadership of nearly a fifth of the world's population. Then suddenly you realize that while most of the rest of the world has been giving lip service to the principles of Christianity—and getting

(Continued on page 49)

PHOTOS © COUNSIC

The young of India are a strong force in the drive for independence. Above are girl volunteers of the Indian Youth Movement. Below is Jawaharlal Nehru with his sisters. He is expected to wear Gandhi's mantle when the saint dies

I TOLD Captain Atkins I wanted him to meet my friends and see the ranch, and I would introduce him to Cristobelle. I didn't say she was beautiful, I said she was nice. I said she was a charming girl. She is; she is nice, she is a swell person, and she is charming. The funny part of it is, she also is beautiful.

Anyway, I called up the CCC camp that day and asked for Captain Atkins.

I said, "Look, if you're off duty this afternoon, or can get off, maybe we could go up to Lodgepole Ranch, like I mentioned."

"I'm not off," he said, "but I can get off. Shall I pick you up?"

"Get here about four," I said. "We can be up there by five."

"Good," he said. "Four it is."

He hung up and I hung up.

I ought to explain about Lodgepole Ranch. It will take only a minute, and there's no sense to this story without it. It is a private Wyoming dude ranch, is the only way I can describe it. It is owned by three families, who live in the East and visit the ranch summers. Each family has its own cabin, but there is a common central establishment consisting of a kitchen, dining room and lounge, with the necessary help. Each family has its own string of horses, which are kept in a common corral.

The families are the Alfredos, the Nethercotts and the Berrands. The Alfredos consist of Gerald Alfredo, a widower, and a son and daughter. The Nethercotts are James Nethercott and his wife, who enter into this story only perfunctorily—as do the Alfredos—and an uncle, a Mr. Hackenschmidt, who does not enter into it at all. The Berrands are Madison Berrand and his wife Ethel, and Ethel's mother, Mrs. Shute. And Cristobelle. Don't forget Cristobelle.

At the time of my story, the Berrands were my line of communication with the ranch. I had known them for seven years. As a matter of fact, I went to school with Cristobelle.

The situation as of the moment which found me waiting for Captain Atkins to call for me with his car was this: The Berrands had invited me to spend my vacation at Lodgepole Ranch as their guest. Everything had been arranged when I found I had to take my vacation a month earlier than I had planned. The Berrands had guests at this time, and there was no place for me. But at their suggestion I came out anyway, to the little town thirty miles from the ranch, and got myself out of these automobile tourist cabins. Of course I spent a lot of time at the ranch.

Almost on my arrival I had met Captain Atkins! I met him in a bar. I liked him immensely and we got along well together. He was well set up, an expert on the military establishment, very much on his toes in his profession. He was the despair of every lass in the valley.

I decided I wanted him to meet Cristobelle, and I wanted her to meet him. I guess I just thought they'd make a charming couple. I don't know.

PROMPTLY at four o'clock Atkins showed up in his car. He honked his horn for me to come out, but I went to the door and told him to come in. I had a Tom Collins. He did, and we had a Tom Collins and a dividend, and started. Going through town Atkins covered he needed gas. We pulled into a gas station. Atkins felt in his pocket and found he had no money. I said I'd cash his check anyway, so while the tank was being filled we went to a bar next door and had a drink, a Tom Collins, and Captain Atkins cashed his check.

"Well," Atkins said as we left the bar and headed for the filling station, "we're off at last." Poor Atkins.

Ahead of us, at the filling station, I saw the big green car that I knew

Mistaken in Love

By Donald Hough

ILLUSTRATED BY EARL BLOSSOM

A romance of ranch life in the modern West—which manages to develop into two romances ged to Mrs. Shute. (I hope you remember Mrs. Shute. She is Mrs. Ber-rand's mother.) I said to Atkins, "That's Mrs. Shute's car. She must be from the ranch. Maybe some of the others are with her."

Atkins went into the station to pay his bill, and as he went in, Mrs. Berrand—Mrs. Shute—came out. I chatted with her for a minute, standing beside her. Cristobelle, she said, was up at the ranch, but most of the others were on one errand or another. I told Atkins and I were on our way to the ranch. She invited us to supper. She said supper would be at seven as usual.
We'd all be back by that time.
Atkins came out. I introduced them.
Now do you do, Mrs. Shute?" Atkins was bowing gently from the hips.
"Mrs. Berrand," I repeated. I had said Mrs. Berrand, but Atkins evidently had only linked Mrs. Shute with the car and couldn't shift on short notice.
"Of course," Atkins said, glancing at Mrs. Berrand with a touch of resentment, I said, "and bowing again."
Mrs. Berrand said, "We'll expect to see you at the ranch about seven."
Atkins nodded, and Mrs. Berrand got into her car. Atkins and I got into his car, he lifted my hat and he saluted Mrs.
Berrand, and we drove away. "I could have sworn you said Shute," Atkins said, "I told him. 'I said it was Mrs.
Berrand's car.'"

I ran with all my might, and shouted as loud as I could. The car picked up speed. "Hey!" I yelled

"But you said this one's name—" he began.

"Have you never heard of a person using another person's car?" I demanded, glaring at him.

"Oh," he said.

WE STARTED out of town. "Wait a minute," I said. Atkins stopped the car. "There's no use getting up there ahead of the others," I pointed out, "now that we're invited for supper." Atkins agreed, and we went back and parked the car and went in and had a Tom Collins.

As we left the bar we ran into James Nethercott. His arms were full of bundles. I introduced Atkins. Nethercott said, "When are you coming up to the ranch?"

"Tonight," I said.

Atkins nudged me, and he leaned forward and looked into my face, evidently feeling I had overdone the Tom Collinses. "We promised Mrs. Shute for tonight," he said.

"We haven't even seen Mrs. Shute," I said irritably.

Nethercott excused himself, said he had to put his bundles in his car, which was across the square.

Atkins said, "Well, we promised somebody. That lady."

"Mrs. Berrand," I said.

"I knew it was somebody," Atkins said. "How many places are we going to make tonight, anyway?"

"One," I said. "It's the same thing. Listen, Atkins, Mrs. Berrand and Mr. Nethercott are in a way of speaking, the same thing. The same ranch."

"I see, excuse me," Atkins said. He looked around, a little helplessly, I thought, and said, "How about another Tom Collins?"

"Fine," I said.

But as we were passing the drugstore, Alfredo came out with some magazines and a couple of cartons of cigarettes. "Hello," he said cheerily. I introduced Atkins. Alfredo said, "Why don't you two run up to the ranch one day soon? For that matter, why not tonight?"

"We're practically on the way," I told him.

"See you," he said, and went on.

I said, "Atkins, that was Alfredo. He's up at the ranch. Now do you begin to get it?"

"Sure," Atkins said sourly. "We're just going to every damned ranch in the valley tonight." He stopped walking. "We better not have another drink," he said. I stopped and stood beside him, and he started walking again, and it was toward the bar. "One more," he said.

We went into the bar and standing near the far end drinking a glass of beer was Frank Loomis. He owned the Lazy Y, a dude ranch, and I had met him the year before, through the Berrands. I mean the Nethercotts. No, the Berrands. I had seen him this year, too, around town, and he had asked me to come out for supper sometime. I never had got around to it.

I SAID hello to Loomis and he waved, and Atkins and I ordered our drinks. Atkins said, "Now, listen, I'm an Army officer, dignity of the service and all that, and we've had a couple drinks and I think the thing to do is not to go to any of these places tonight."

"They're all one," I said.

Atkins frowned. "Well, anyway," he said, "we better not go to the—one. Fellow doesn't like to go to a strange place, meet people and all, with a couple of drinks under his belt. Some other time."

"Hell, you're all right," I said.

At this point Loomis moved down beside us. He said to me, "Thought you were coming up to supper."

I introduced Atkins. They shook hands and Atkins said, "We're starting for the ranch in just a few minutes. Be there before you are."

"No, no," I said quickly. "Not tonight. Some other time."

"Well, have a drink," Loomis said.

(Continued on page 41)

"I cannot imagine," he snapped, "a man with a heritage like yours hesitating to give himself to the Reich"

To be Continued

By Pat Frank

FREDA came into the laboratory long before her accustomed time, with Mark, who was five, trailing after, his eyes wide and hungry as they always were when he was allowed to view—but not to touch—the twisted glass tubes, and shining machines, and bubbling liquids with which his father worked. Usually it was noon when Freda brought in her husband's lunch. But here he had scarcely begun his morning's work, and she stood before him, a slim figure dwarfed between the ungainly X-ray projector and the ugly, bulbous centrifuge.

"The mail came, Robert," she explained, allowing just a bit of her anxiety to slip into her voice, "and there's a man outside. He insisted that he see you. He's in uniform, and I think you'd better go into the house and see him."

"All right," Dr. Klein said. He stripped the rubber gloves from his lean, corded hands, laughingly steering his son away from a tray of fresh slides, and took the letter. He recognized the brown envelope in which the hospital at Stuttgart sent its reports. "Let's hope for luck," he murmured, opening it.

Twice he grunted, as he read, and once he exclaimed, "Wonderful, wonderful!" Then he smiled and folded the letter and said: "Remember the old lady from Berlin—the inoperable? She's been discharged from the hospital. The report says, 'Completely arrested.' That's our fifth."

"Completely arrested? That's almost the same as cured, isn't it?" Freda asked. Mark made a dive for the microscope, exclaiming, "Can I see the bugs now? Now, Father?"

"Yes, but don't touch the slides," Robert said, and lifted him to the porcelain-topped stool and let him peer into the eyepiece. "You can't say 'cured,'" he told Freda. "Not for five years can you say 'cured.' Maybe not then. Remember what happened to my father."

"I do remember!" she cried, and her face went white and she drew close to him.

She is frightened, Robert considered, because she recalls how the first Dr. Klein worked at this thing all his life, and how he thought he had the answer, but how after his death some of the cases he had called cured had relapsed.

Then Robert discovered this wasn't why she trembled against him, and that her mind was on the second, not the first Dr. Klein, because she raised her head and whispered: "This man outside—I don't know whether he's from the police, or the Winter Relief, or the Gestapo. I never can tell all these uniforms apart. Robert, didn't you arrange it—about your military service?"

"I talked to Dr. Schneider," he said, unfastening his smock. "He's high in the party, you know. He said he'd do what he could."

"Robert," she demanded, the fear full in her voice now. "Didn't they send a card for you to report? Wasn't that after you saw Schneider?"

He frowned, and hesitated. "I don't remember," he admitted. "Come, we'll see what this fellow wants."

He was waiting in the parlor, a stocky man with a face that might have been punched in clay by a careless sculptor. He stood with his boots wide apart, and his hands behind his back. He did not offer to shake hands, nor did he give the salute. "Lieutenant Brucker, Military Police," he introduced himself. "You are Doctor Klein?"

"Yes. What is it?"

"You received the notice to report to the medical section at your headquarters, for active service."

"Yes, but I talked to Dr. Schneider, and he told me . . ."

"You failed to report," the lieutenant interrupted impatiently, "so I had to get you. You know, Doctor, that it is a serious thing not to report, but if you come with me now, immediately, they will only ask you some questions and you can say you forgot the date, or make some other excuse. They will forget about it, because they have not enough surgeons in the field."

"But I'm not a surgeon," Robert protested. "I haven't handled a surgical instrument since I left the university. My work is different. I'm a biochemist."

The lieutenant shrugged. "You're a doctor," he said simply. "You will oblige and come immediately. You take a bag."

MARK rushed through the door and ran to his father's side. "Are you going away?" he asked. "Are you going away to the war? Will Mother let me into the laboratory when you're gone? I can look at the bugs?"

"Yes, Mark," Robert said, "I'm going away," and he turned and started up the stairs, and he could hear the steady tread of Freda behind him, and he could hear the choking sound in her throat.

He took the suitcase down from the upper shelf in the closet, and he wiped the dust from the well-worn leather, and for the first time in a long while he noticed how her hair was fine and soft and how it circled her head in two even braids. He opened the suitcase and saw it was half filled with forgotten papers. He shuffled through these, and saw that one was the medical society's reports on his father's experiments, and that indeed there were the original notes of the first Dr. Klein, the notes upon which he had fashioned his own work. "I guess you can throw these away," he told Freda, and tossed them on the bed. Then he began to pack.

After a time he finished, and went downstairs again, and saw that Lieutenant Brucker, his legs still spread and his hands still locked behind his back, was inspecting the framed clipping, flanked by the iron cross, on the wall. Scrawled on the clipping was the date, November 20, 1915. The clipping was only one paragraph, and it read:

"Captain Mark Klein, Medical Corps, was one of those killed in the action of yesterday on the Verdun front. He was known internationally for his cancer research."

Brucker contemplated the clipping and then wheeled on Dr. Klein, and his tempt had tightened his mouth. "I cannot imagine," he snapped, "a man with a heritage like yours hesitating to give himself to the Reich!"

Robert started to retort, but from the laboratory there came the crash of breaking glass, and Mark ran out, frightened, and clung to his father's knees. "It was only empty tubes," he said. "I was just climbing up to look at the bugs."

His father was not angry, as Mark expected. His father only smiled, ruffled his hair, and said, "When you grow up, maybe they'll give you time to do the work," and this Mark did not understand. Then Dr. Klein kissed his wife, once and tenderly, and told her, "Those papers on the bed, Freda—your better save them for him."

"But they're awfully old."

"He will need background—a background to understand my work he must understand what went before."

"Come on," growled Lieutenant Brucker. "Stop this silly chatter. Consider that this delay may cost the life of a soldier."

CHECKMAN

Living at Ease

Ruth Carson

Collier's House of Ideas
In its time and laboring equipment takes the rudgerly out of work and makes room for fun

COLLIER'S House of Ideas is not a model home. You couldn't buy it and move in, even if you wanted to. It's built on a skyscraper terrace at Rockefeller Center, New York City, and the building regulations and your desire for privacy would be against it from the start.

The house is a demonstration house, to show many of the newest ideas in house design, construction and furnishing. It's packed with enough ideas to fill a dozen houses, even though they sit happily together in this one. The room that divides to become a guest and dining rooms, or expands into a playroom, is the idea that will tick with you. Maybe a dressing-light, or a window that opens and looks like a Venetian blind, will be an inspiration. Collier's architect, Mr. Edward Stone, working with lighting and painting and equipment experts, has put together a horde of good ideas. They are yours to pick and choose.

In the June 15th issue of Collier's you read about the plan of the house and the details of which it is built. That is what you see first in a house. But the things that make it tick, the pipes and the mechanical equipment, are the vital part of the building, for they are the things that make today's house easy to live in and easy to care for. Here we give you the equipment of Collier's House of Ideas.

The man of the house this means heating equipment. The heating system of Collier's House is warm-air convection. Air is filtered, heated, humidified and then circulated to the rooms by means of a fan, accomplishing what many things for your comfort. In the first place, humidified air does not rob the last drop of moisture out of your books and furniture, as some heating systems did. Since your skin is not being dried out till you start, you don't go jogging up the thermostat to a higher temperature, thus launching yourself in a vicious circle. The circulation of air, scientifically regulated into the room through one register and drawn out through another, adds further to your comfort by eliminating layers of cool air at the floor and hot air at the ceiling and by changing the air about you constantly, so that your own body heat doesn't have a chance to weigh upon you. This movement of air is so gentle that you get no sensation from it.

The heating plant is oil-fired, with a burner run by electricity and especially fitted to eliminate radio interference. It is automatically and completely regulated by a clock thermostat that, besides giving you the time of day, will lower the temperature at any hour you have set for the night, and raise it again without your opening an eye in the morning. So you can economize on fuel bills and live in luxurious comfort at one and the same time.

In the summer, with the burner turned off, the same fan sends air through the house, refreshing you as only circulating air can. At night when the outdoor air has cooled, it quickly carries this coolness through your rooms.

Built for Convenience

The lady of the house is already ahead of us, peering into the kitchen. One end of it opens into the dining area, not only through a door, but over a counter with rolling panel above. With the panel open, you can keep an eye on the children playing in the room beyond. Here at the counter the family lines up for breakfast, or bring their guests for drinks, or service to the dinner table passes over the counter. The range is right at hand so that you can dish up and pass food over the counter, in regular drugstore fashion, making for easy informal service when you want it.

The range itself will do everything but serve the meals for you. It flashes different-colored lights to notify you which burner you've set for what it calls a rolling boil, which is ready to simmer, start things fast, cook gently, boil hard, or just keep warm without burning. The oven expands to accommodate a turkey or contracts by means of a separating sheet to bake your biscuits economically.

The guest bath adjoining the many-purpose room can be converted into a photographer's darkroom by sliding the mirror up to cover the windows

The oven will turn on and off without your so much as being in the kitchen.

A sink over there under the window performs tricks, too. A sink used to be just a place to run water out of a tap. This one is wired for action. Dishwasher in one compartment, to make that once unpopular job something the kids cry to do. Voracious device under the sink proper that chews up and flushes away every bit of waste you drop down the drain, doing away with smelly garbage pails and treks outdoors for the final dumping.

The electric refrigerator, sleek and sure of itself, is busy at its job of preserving foods—adjusting humidity to suit vegetables and meats, storing frozen food, freezing the dessert for dinner.

In the cupboards beside the dining table is equipment for flourishes in table cookery—electric toaster, waffle iron, percolator, casserole. Convenient outlets are at hand for plugging in.

At the other end of the kitchen is the laundry. Here you are going to have to step fast to keep up with the machine age. To the ranks of electric washing machine and ironer and water heater is now added the electric drier for home use. So pick any day, and never mind the weather, so long as it's cotton and linens you have to deal with. The washing machine will wash, rinse and spin moisture out of the clothes. Then, with no clotheslines or pins or weather to worry about, you start the drying process by transferring the proper load to your drier, a compact little cabinet that opens to reveal a perforated cylinder within. Drop the clothes into the cylinder, which revolves slowly while the clothes miraculously lift and billow and shift in a current of warm air. Fifteen minutes or so of this concentrated wind-blown treatment, and the clothes are damp-dry, ready for ironing. Thirty minutes, and they are completely dry.

Meanwhile, if you can stand the pace,
(Continued on page 48)

Between the kitchen and the dining area, which is part of the many-purpose room, is a counter to make serving easy

ROLF KLEP

These Our Rulers

By John T. Flynn

Having swallowed Chicago, the Kelly-Nash machine hungrily attack the county and state government. Now, with plenty of votes and power under their belts, the bosses welcome the Democratic convention to their kingdom and look forward to greater powers in the national government

Haberdasher Sam L. Nudelman entered politics in 1932 as a clerk. Now many consider him virtual governor of Illinois

SARRA

In six years, Chicago paid $3,476,000 to dump garbage in this hole. Paul V. Colianni, Democratic politician, heads the refuse-disposal company

IV

AT THIS moment the Hosts of Democracy are convoked in Chicago and, standing there at the front door to greet them, is smiling, red-haired Ed Kelly, mayor, as host to the hosts. What the hosts are interested in is a third term—not for Mr. Roosevelt but for the hosts. For—believe it or not—it is just a hundred years since the Democrats have enjoyed three in a row or what might be called three square terms together. The last time was when Andy Jackson served twice and Martin Van Buren once—ending in 1841—and immortalized the slogan that makes all these invading hosts so happy, and Kelly and Nash in particular—that “to the victor belongs the spoils.”

It is a very different host Messrs. Kelly and Nash are receiving from that slim and hungry horde that was welcomed by Anton Cermak to Chicago in 1932. Fresh in from twelve years in the wilderness, a dollar looked like something to those boys and they roared in with maledictions on the unhappy head of poor Hoover for his spendthrift ways. They were yelling for a balanced budget. Now they are back, all with balanced budgets. The old jalopies are cast aside and the boys ride proudly in streamlined limousines.

They have been enjoying for eight years one of the most glorious and successful depressions in history. Through the hands of these gentlemen have flowed twenty-three billion dollars of public funds—which is an average of about $23,000,000 per delegate. It has all been possible because of the generosity of that man whom the Cermak-Nash machine tried to howl down in 1932, but whom the Kelly-Nash machine is specially commissioned to howl up this time.

This army of delegates and fellow travelers is all cluttered up with mayors and county commissioners and governors who are bubbling over with gratitude for the fine showing they have been able to make on their own home grounds because of these federal billions. And none has more reason for gratitude than Boss Ed Kelly and Boss Pat Nash.

Kelly says he found Chicago sunk under the great red deluge. Out of the Red and Into the Black is the title of his administration. When he came into power the city pay-rollers had not been paid for five and a half months; the teachers had not been paid for two years. They had $22,000,000 in back pay coming to them. Kelly paid off the teachers and other city employees and has kept the pay rolls up to date. He painted all the 450 schools and built nearly thirty more; resurfaced 200 miles of streets, repaired all the others, cut the bonded debt $80,000,000 and paid off $110,000,000 of city IOU's in the form of tax warrants.

An interesting feature of this is that it is mostly true. A far more interesting feature is the singular way in which was done. And just as interesting that it has probably happened the same way in your town.

Chicago is a living example of beating a city can take and still stand up. It had been stepped on for years when Big Bill Thompson the Builder landed on it with his hob-nailed boots. He was not only Big Bill the Builder he was Big Bill the bill builder. But wasn't all his fault. The businessmen contributed their share to the disaster. The big property holders in the Loop were always ready to play ball with other officials who were looting Chicago at the time. What they got, among other things, were shockingly low assessments on their property.

Came a time when the small taxpayers began to grumble about the dodgers in the Loop. Some got so just let the taxes slide; delinquent tax-

Governor Henry Horner (left) fought and defeated the Kelly-Nash machine. When he became ill, Lieutenant Governor Stelle (center) seized the governorship but lost control when Kelly and Nash backed Horner and re-elected him governor became a problem. There was agitation; a commission named to study the problem; a report for a reassessment and, in due time a reassessment. When the smoke cleared away, the reassessment that was ordered to make the big Loopists pay their share had raised everybody's assessments except those in the Loop. The low grumble rose to a howl. Then the taxpayers struck. And for two years the city treasurer was a man with scarcely a visitor.

How does a city of 3,000,000 people with an army of pay-rollers and other creditors exist for two years without any taxpayers? Well, Big Bill the Builder just borrowed the money at the banks and gave the banks the city's IOU's in the form of tax warrants—claims against the taxes—when and if they should be paid.

But all this time Chicago's political rulers—Democrats and Republicans, Big Bill in the City Hall and Kelly on the South Park Board and Cermak in the County Building—were proposing bond issues—five million for this bridge, five million for that boulevard, millions for this and that, all approved by popular vote of citizens who wouldn't pay any taxes. And all this to build around the town that glamorous golden frame known as the Chicago Plan. And down on all this came crashing the depression, with its bank failures, its Insulls, defaulted real-estate bonds that hit Chicago quicker and harder than most big towns. By 1933, when Kelly came into power, the town was perfectly and beautifully busted. The town owed $465,000,000 in bonds and $228,000,000 on tax warrants—a total of $693,000,000.

If you have gotten these simple facts, you do not have to be a bookkeeper to see what a simple trick it was to do what Kelly did—and why he and so many other mayors did the same.

Suppose you earn fifty dollars a week and you spend it all on living. Then the boss gets in financial difficulties and can't pay your salary. Instead, every week for a year he hands you an IOU for fifty dollars. You have to live, so you cut down your expenses to thirty dollars and buy on tick at the stores. This goes on for two years. You are then $3,120 in debt to the stores. But the boss owes you $5,200.

Now at the end of two years the boss gets prosperous again and he starts paying you your regular weekly salary and also begins to redeem those IOU's. You are now getting your pay plus the pay of the last two years. You can take up the bills at the stores and have something left over. It was tough going those years when the pay checks stopped. But it's skittles and beer now.

This is what happened to Chicago. For years tax delinquencies piled up. Then for two years hardly any taxes were collected. That was a disaster for the fellow who was mayor then. But when Kelly came in he could spend not only the taxes that he would levy on the people, but all the taxes Thompson had levied but couldn't collect. He would be knee-deep in clover—if things picked up so that the taxpayers could pay their current taxes and their back taxes.

Judge Edmund Jarecki offended the machine mortally by taking a vigorous stand for honest election and registration laws. The Kelly-Nash leaders dropped him from the county ticket

And that's what happened. Things did pick up. But with that neither Kelly nor any of the numerous mayors had anything to do. They picked up because the federal government began to spend billions of dollars—billions that it did not collect in taxes, but borrowed from the banks. This money was paid to people on relief and to farmers. They promptly spent it at the stores. It was in the reliefer's pocket Saturday and in the merchant's cash drawer Monday. It made business and jobs. It produced something that resembled recovery. The people of Chicago were able to resume paying their taxes and to pay their back taxes.

When Kelly took office the city owed $465,000,000 in bonds. A good many were in default. But as the back taxes flowed in the defaulted payments could be met out of the back taxes. And the current maturities on the bonds could be met. Not only that, they had to be met. They were contract obligations.

Kelly was enabled to collect twelve per cent of the taxes of 1928; eighteen per cent of the taxes of 1929; twenty per cent of the taxes of 1930; thirty-seven per cent of the taxes of 1931 and thirty-seven per cent of the taxes of 1932. All this was in addition to the taxes in his own administration.

But in spite of all this the city has not been able to pay its running bills. Every year there is a batch of unpaid bills and another batch of judgments against the city that it cannot pay. The city owes $19,000,000 in current bills and $18,036,000 in judgments. It is in the red every year.

Chicago years ago decided to be thrifty. It created a fund on which it could borrow while waiting for taxes to be paid. That fund grew to be $70,000,000. The city has been tapping that fund—borrowing it, and putting IOU's in the tin box, until the fund is practically gone and in its place is a handful of IOU's.

While this has been going on the tax rate has been going up. In 1928 the rate was $5.15 per hundred of assessed value. This year it was $9.42 per hundred. When Kelly took office it was $6.49, today it is $9.42. That is, taxes have increased forty-five per cent since Kelly took office and eighty-three per cent over 1928. As a matter of fact, Chicago assesses all property at about one third its value; its actual rate now being $3.39 per hundred.

And all this in spite of the huge sums of money that the government was spending on services that the city would have had to shoulder.

But oh! what a blessing those federal funds were. Over half a billion dollars has been poured into Illinois during this administration on the WPA, the CCC, the RFC, Surplus Commodity Corporation, National Youth Administration, farm relief, to say nothing of housing and home and farm mortgages—which would be in addition to the half-billion.

The depressed city—like most cities—was aided by these federal funds two ways, directly and indirectly. For instance, Kelly says he painted and repaired 450 schools. What he means is that the WPA painted and repaired these schools. Millions have been spent on streets, highways, public buildings, parks—money the city would have had to spend. Another instance is the HOLC (Home Owners Loan Corporation) which took up thousands of defaulted mortgages and paid the delinquent taxes on them—amounting to nearly $20,000,000 cash in the city treasury.

The teachers' back pay of $22,000,000 was paid with money loaned to the city

(Continued on page 52)

Old Doc Yarnell came up in the clutch and poked one into right field

Southpaw Blood

By Kyle Crichton

THE first time Spud ever knew his old man didn't like the profession he was in was the day Doc came home around noon and made Spud quit throwing the ball up against the house. There were patches of snow still left on the ground but the sun was shining and this was Spud's first chance to get out and throw a few. Spud was twelve and pretty big for his age, and Doc had never spoken to him like that before.

They had called his father Doc—Doc Yarnell—ever since he left college to join the Sox. He had been taking a premed course but that was all washed up when Pinky Williams, the Sox scout, saw him ruin Fordham one afternoon with four hits and three stolen bases. Back in his mind maybe Doc always knew he was going to be a ballplayer instead of a doctor, but he put up a battle with Pinky before signing. That got him a bonus of fifteen hundred dollars for signing, which was dough thirteen years ago and is not bad now, no matter what you read about big money.

Anyhow, Doc had quit at the end of his junior year and married Bessie and joined the Sox. They farmed him out to San Antonio for the rest of that year but recalled him at the end of the season. He went out to Paso Robles with the Sox for spring training and had the left-field job cinched by the time the season opened. Spud was born that sec-

Doc Yarnell tells his boy all about the paths of glory. But youth prefers to learn for itself

ILLUSTRATED BY HARRY MORSE MEYERS

ond summer at the Applegates' place—that's Bessie's folks—at Cooperstown, Ohio, and Doc didn't see him until he was about three weeks old, when he stopped off for a day at Cooperstown on the Sox's second Eastern trip.

Doc hit .318 that first year and there was never any doubt that he belonged in the Sox outfield. He was a snap hitter rather than a long hitter, and he had a little trouble at first going back for hard-hit balls over his head, but he cured that before long and was a fixture with the club. He was fast and had a good arm.

Bessie stayed with her folks that season, but when Spud was just short of being a year old she came up to Chicago and had the apartment ready for Doc when he came back again from spring training. That had been the life of the family ever since—except that Doc wasn't with the White Sox any more.

Twelve years of that, and now Spud was slamming the ball up against the house between the two back windows and Doc comes along and says cut it out.

Spud had seen Doc coming and had put a little extra stuff in his heaves, thinking Doc would like that, but Doc stopped by the fence and said sharply: "Cut that out and come on in for your lunch!"

THEY'D always been pretty close, Spud and Doc, because of the way they lived—all summer with some ball club and now in late years staying every winter here in Cooperstown—and this was the first time Doc had ever talked to him that way.

"Ah, Doc . . ." began Spud.

"I'm telling you," said his father coldly. "Cut that out and come on in and eat." . . .

Bessie began taking Spud to the games when he was about two, and became so well known to the regular fans that they used to come by the tion and talk to him. By the time he was four he was pretty well spoiled and something of a trial to Bessie, who had to pin him to his seat to keep him from running all over the grandstand. He ate hot dogs and peanuts and ought to have been a wreck but he seemed to like it. During the game Doc never showed any sign that he knew they were there, but Spud knew all about his father and all about baseball before the kids had learned to talk.

Spud was five when he got his fame at the Sox park. The Sox were in a slump and Doc was as bad as the rest of them. His fielding had fallen off and he couldn't buy himself a hit. The Sox had gone sour and the crowd had begun to ride the team. In a game at Philadelphia they had a three-run game up to the sixth and then the A's hit a home run. Doc had hit into a double play the second and had fanned in the third. In the seventh Perry got on second and the A's with two out and then Doc smacked one on a line to left. Doc tried to cut off the run by making a shoe catch and the thing got past him and rolled to the fence. Perry scored and Haller pulled up at third.

The uproar in the stands was tremendous. (Continued on page 46)

Occupation: Widow

By William C. White

ILLUSTRATED BY GEORGE HOWE

Story Thus Far:

BLAERCHEN and Paul Lesser both in love with Carola Dirling, a singer led by them in their night club in Berlin, the Krokodil. Lesser marries her. A short time later, Lesser—sent to Warsaw on a mysterious "government" mission—is killed in an automobile accident, and Carola feels sure, without proof, that Blaerchen, a Nazi, is somehow involved in his murder! Heartbroken, but determined to have the tragedy investigated, the widow leaves Berlin.

Years pass. Carola is in Rome when a German agent finds her, informs her that Blaerchen now has a power in the German Foreign Office, has a job for her, and tells her brutally that she must return to Berlin. Thinking that she will have a chance to learn the truth concerning her young husband's death, she obeys.

In Berlin, she encounters an old friend—Friedrich, a comedian who had worked at the Krokodil. They have a long conversation and agree to lunch together. But Karl—not the name of Carola—does not tell her that, at the time of Paul Lesser's death, he had been released from a concentration camp.

Blaerchen makes at least two things clear to Carola: he is to work for the Foreign Office (reportedly as a spy); and she is to have a difficult time repelling the clumsy advances of Rolf Blaerchen. . . . Ensconced in an apartment suite (selected by Blaerchen), with a maid—Maria Kunkle, who, sent to her by Blaerchen, is obviously spying on her—she begins her first assignment.

As she is attending to the preliminaries, Friedrich is actively engaged in getting in touch with certain persons who are plotting the overthrow of Hitler. Working cautiously, he meets Hans Klauss and Klauss' son-in-law, Rolf Ranke, two of the cleverest ringleaders of the anti-Nazi movement. And Klauss, given an unusually perilous job, tells him what is expected of him. . . .

Carola Mainescu—a woman who, once enemy of Blaerchen and working for him, now has changed—calls on Carola. Carola sends her out on an errand. Senta then intimates to Carola that she can easily find employment working for Blaerchen's enemies. Before she leaves, she sends a defiant message to Blaerchen. Unfortunately Maria returns while she is talking (as Carola is well aware) does some housework. Watching the maid move about in the kitchen, Carola notes her curious waddle—the waddle of a person with a ring of buttons sitting at her belt; the waddle of a jailer!

III

WHEN Blaerchen telephoned early the next morning, he asked, "Did you enjoy Mademoiselle Mainescu's visit?"

"Yes," Carola said uneasily, glad that he could not see her face.

"I'm sure it must have been pleasant," he continued, as if that were all important. Before Carola could answer he said, "I'd like to take you to a very important party this afternoon. I'll call for you at five."

Throughout the day Carola was conscious that Maria was staring at her as if trying to guess in a glance what she was going to do. She had already decided; only one decision was possible. Blaerchen came promptly at five, smiling and far more than usually jovial. She knew some extraordinary comic act. "It's good to see you, Carola," he said warmly. Then, to Maria: "How do you do? You have a good cook, Carola?"

Maria half grinned, half grimaced. "She and her husband worked for Blaerchen," he explained. "I sent her here because she's the best cook in Berlin."

"Ah, Fräulein Dirling gives me little pleasure to show it," Maria said modestly. Blaerchen asked her carelessly, "What do you hear from Fritz?"

"I haven't heard anything for some time," Maria explained to Carola, "Herr Blaerchen was kind enough to arrange that Fritz will not have to go to the front."

"You won't get within fifty kilometers of the front," Blaerchen said loftily.

"You are so kind, Herr Blaerchen!"

The officer was polite. "Are you having any trouble finding your way?" "No, thank you," Karl said

Maria smiled as she went to the kitchen.

Carola was impatient. Blaerchen's genial pretense annoyed her. Always acting like an immaculate god in a well-ordered world!

"Ready to go, Carola?" Then he stopped and stared at her. "Every time I see you I am surprised. I think I have a vivid memory of your beauty and then when I see you—!"

"Thank you."

"You're like one of those sky-blue-and-gold rock-garden flowers."

"Not so delicate, I hope," Carola laughed. "Where are we going?" She resented the way he assumed no need for explanation.

"To the home of one Herr von Buene, the assistant chief of the Propaganda Bureau. You'll meet many important people there and many theater people, too. Herr von Buene collects them."

"That sounds delightful." She wished she could ask, "Why are we going?" It was better to be patient about motives; sooner or later something would reveal what he wanted her to do. More immediate was the Mainescu matter.

It was dark on the street. Blaerchen helped her into his car and the chauffeur started off. "These damned black-outs!" Blaerchen said. "We'll have to drive slowly as usual but we'll have all of England's lights as well as our own when this war is over."

Carola agreed. It was curious that he had not yet mentioned Mlle. Mainescu but silence might be planned to see if she would speak first. She began directly: "Mademoiselle Mainescu said things that troubled me yesterday."

"Really!" Blaerchen laughed. "She's a nice girl," he continued, still laughing, "but don't be concerned with what she said. We were to have been married once. I suppose she feels bitter toward me." He waved one hand. "I could probably tell you all she said!" He laughed at that. "Forget her!" Then he lounged back in the seat with an air of self-satisfied relaxation, like a man beyond any possibility of hurt. Carola felt him jostle closer to her. His arm fell across her shoulders. "I'd much rather talk about you. What have you been doing?"

SHE was relieved at not having to repeat her conversation with the Rumanian woman. She answered, "Leading a dull life since I don't know what work I'm supposed to be doing."

"You aren't unhappy? That's all that matters. You're comfortable, you have a nice apartment—!"

"I have you to thank for it."

"Nonsense!" He did seem pleased. "And is Maria satisfactory?"

That might be an apparently innocent question to find out if she suspected Maria. "Quite satisfactory," Carola said pleasantly. "And she seems to have no difficulty with the hardships of war."

"Why should she?" Blaerchen sounded surprised.

"Life must be difficult for those people without such connections."

"The so-called common people?" Blaerchen snorted. "Why be concerned with them?"

"That sounds like the things you and Paul used to talk about."

"We talked a lot in those days," Blaerchen answered. "We're still in power today and that's the best proof that our theories were right."

In every conversation between him and Paul, Blaerchen had always talked about the need for power and position as a hungry man would talk about food.

"We used to talk about the need for Lebensraum, for living space, for Germany," Blaerchen continued. "What we meant, of course, was Lebensraum for ourselves, the men of my generation." He raised his head proudly. "We have it now."

When he talked like this in the old days, Carola remembered, his voice rose and he looked straight out and over, as if to a listening crowd. He had the same manner now.

"We are strong today," he continued. "What have we done that every other ambitious people has not done? Why shouldn't an ambitious man do everything he can to advance?"

Very sharply Carola was reminded of some of the things Mainescu had said. "What happens here in Germany when two equally ambitious men clash?"

"The more skillful man wins, of course. It sometimes happens." Then, brusquely: "Why should you ask that?"

"It seems an obvious question."

"Or the question of someone well educated in politics."

She could not resist answering: "I remember you used to tell Paul that women have no place in politics."

"Of course not," Blaerchen sharply. "Their place is to enable to forget politics." He was pleased that remark. "Yet women can sometimes help."

"How?" Carola leaned forward. might bring an important answer to give some clue to what he wanted to do.

"By being gracious and using charm and the social gifts God gave them!"

The car swung into a narrow street and stopped at a large house set behind hedges. Other cars were parked on all sides.

The entrance to the home through a heavy feudal doorway led into a lavishly overdecorated hall. At the entrance was Herr von Buene, the host, and his wife, a young blonde. Their greeting was stiff and formal.

The sound of many voices came from a huge living room. If Blaerchen had any hidden purpose in bringing Carola here, she would soon know. Then anxiety was forgotten for a moment as she saw a room untouched from the eighties, decorated with heavy brocade with sets of stag antlers bristling from the walls. Conversation and laughter seemed unrestrained. It was long since she had been at any sort of party; her face flushed ever so slightly. It was pleasant and warming to feel free, for a moment.

"There's quite a crowd," Blaerchen said proudly. He pointed out a general on leave from the western front, a tone at the State Opera and one of her secretaries.

Carola looked for familiar faces but saw none. In spite of her misgiving she felt gay. But, shadowing her general from time to time, was the question about Blaerchen's reasons in bringing her here.

A man passing by happened to notice her, a short, middle-aged man, dark-skinned, with a lower lip that protruded like the navel on an orange. He stood and looked at her from a distance off and his look was like a caress. He smiled to himself as they were pleased at what he had seen and came forward quickly.

"HERR BLAERCHEN, won't you introduce me?"

Blaerchen was not pleased. "Tell Wilhelm Praut," he said, "one of our co-workers in the Foreign Office."

"I thought I knew everyone well knowing in Berlin," Praut said contently. He smiled at Carola as if his smile were for her alone. "I see I been mistaken."

Blaerchen looked so annoyed that Carola wished the man would leave. Then several others came up, greeted Blaerchen and were introduced to Carola. In ten minutes a dozen men were around her, but closest was Praut, said inaudible things in a whisper as he was trying to carry on an intimate conversation. Then Carola heard a name called. A stout man pushed through the group around her, a middle fifty with a perfectly round face and cheeks that threatened to bury his blue eyes.

"Carola Dirling! This is luck." He paid no attention to the other men and took her by the arm. "Come over. I want to talk to you."

Blaerchen did not look particularly pleased, but he smiled and walked away. "I am glad to see you, Franz," Carola said. She meant it. This was Franz Wagner, once the proprietor of the

(Continued on page 27)

"Blaerchen will use her, too," he said, "and she'll probably go the same way as the other women did."

SHAFT of cold, white light from a giant spot lamp in the lofty reaches of the big top shoots to floor of the arena and traps the figure of a little man with a scar on his nose who looks as though he ought to be sitting at a concert piano or preparing to lecture a class in French literature. He bows briefly and surveys his pupils. It is commencement time in jungle school, and Alfred Court's leopards, pumas and jaguars in the center cage add their guttural undertone to the music of the circus band. With the finesse of a circus Duse, the little "schoolmaster" puts his jungle charges through their exercises and, at the finale, wears a garter, curling, hissing, spotted Sumatran cat around his neck as a live fur collar.

Meanwhile, twenty-odd animals are standing on their hind legs, pawing the air atop high, illuminated pedestals. Look right—and left. In two flanking rows, directed by other trainers, are groups of undergraduates—polar bears, lions, Himalayan bears and even quinn Dane dogs. Court has trained them all, giving the acts over to skilled assistants, but the lightning-quick, murgent leopards, pumas and jaguars are kept for himself. These seniors of the college of the big cage have been in England, on the Continent and elsewhere, but this is their first season before an American audience.

The little man carefully lifts the Sumatran leopard from his shoulders while a whistle and cheering echo in the big tent. The Ringling-tented empire moves across the country and Alfred Court knows he has made good in America. His animals are so well-trained that it looks pretty easy, but you should have been present at the big show's rehearsal in Madison Square Garden on April 4th.

Tragedy stalked that rehearsal. A priceless snow leopard, Douthka, black-and-white coated, blue-eyed prima donna of the big cage, was destroyed by a jealous understudy for Douthka named Indo. The snow leopard was given the best medical attention and expert surgical attention, but it was too late. The master was stricken. He had become so fond of Douthka that he had refused an offer of 10,000 francs for her. She was the trained Siberian snow leopard in the world.

Half an hour later, with rehearsal redoubled, Indo escaped over the top of the inadequately netted arena and led a news reporter through an exit door down a flight of steps into a blind alley. The reporter grabbed a piece of wood from a prop near by and covered himself as best he could. Two of Court's animal handlers, coming up behind Indo, yelled, "Catch him! Catch him!" But the reporter replied, "You catch him, not my leopard!"

They threw a net over the spotted leopard and some strong stimulant into the reporter and rehearsal began again. Minutes later, Indo lashed out at Court and drew blood within an inch of his eye. The little Frenchman finished the act and had his wound attended to and then went back into the big cage two hours before the opening performance. The little man had had a busy day.

Court was glad to get his animals out of Europe a few months ago, for wild animals in European zoos and circuses are confiscated and destroyed in time. When war broke out, his three leopards were in France, Germany and Scandinavia. He rounded them up, shipped them from Oslo and the rest from Liver-

Here Kitty, Kitty

By F. Beverly Kelley

PHOTOGRAPH FOR COLLIER'S BY GEORGE DE MAYAS

Europe is no place for wild, dumb animals, so Alfred Court brought his leopards, pumas, lions and tigers over here where they can be appreciated

Alfred Court puts his leopards through their paces as a puma looks on curiously from the pedestal sumably reduced Court's price for such an excursion, heretofore a major obstacle in the way of negotiation.

Youngest in a family of eleven children, Alfred Court chose the circus in preference to going to work in his uncle's soap factory. He had been interested in gymnastics since early childhood and at high-school age held the gymnastic championship in his home town, Marseilles. An acrobat he remained until he was thirty-five and then he became a wild-animal trainer by necessity rather than by design.

Necessity Makes a Trainer

It all happened when, following his American acrobatic debut with the Ringling Circus, he had returned to France and had started his own circus which he took on a tour that wound up in Mexico. The feature on a rather modest circus menu was to be a lion act imported from the States. Court says he was excited about that act and he awaited its arrival impatiently. At last the great day came! Four male lions, tempers a bit ruffled after a rough sea voyage, arrived and so did their trainer who was the worse for having tried to fight the stormy passage with a bottle. "He was the drunkenest trainer I ever saw in my life," says Court. Now, wild animals sense immediately the vulnerability of a trainer who hasn't control of himself. The drunken trainer would have lasted less than a minute with those lions, but Court definitely was on the spot.

"I had advertised the new act and people had been at the dock to see the lions unloaded. It was up to me. So I got the trainer sober enough to tell me what the routine of the act was and I rehearsed the lions one by one. Then I put them all in the cage and went in."

Those lions performed beautifully, and the portals of an uncrowded profession opened to admit a new candidate.

Court bought those animals, cage and props for $700 and shipped the trainer back to the States. "From then on I was a wild-animal trainer; nothing else fascinated me like matching wits with the kings and queens of the jungle. Some of them are pretty bright."

Court's early acrobatic training had equipped him wonderfully for the style of presentation that he and his assistants use. Superb handling of the body rather than traditional chair and pistol is what protects Court. He and his trainers move their bodies like matadors and their footwork resembles that of prize fighters as they elude the swift, savage charges of the beasts. Incidentally, the Court methods of schooling are the most humane known to the business of wild-animal education.

Court knows the first lesson in any wild-animal trainer's primer: You can train 'em, but they never really are tamed. The trainer, Court explains, (Continued on page 60)

Rain Before Seven

By John August

ILLUSTRATED BY C. C. BEALL

Instantaneously she knew about him. Then one arm pinioned hers and a hand went over her mouth. He shouted for Smurthwaite

The Story Thus Far:

WHILE fighting on the Loyalist side in Spain, Caleb Thatcher, of Wallisport, Massachusetts, and his friend, Bert Hendricks, most lose their lives when one Heinemann, a Nazi fifth columnist, betrays their unit to the enemy.

Returning to Wallisport, after the outbreak of the war in Europe, Caleb falls in love with Hope Shaler. But Hope presently announces her engagement to John Gabriel, head of a machine-tool company which is feverishly taking orders for overseas. . . . Representing a labor union, Hendricks comes to Wallisport. Caleb gives him a warm welcome; and when one of Gabriel's buildings is burned, and Hendricks accuses Hendricks of incendiarism, Caleb enables him to make his getaway.

Meanwhile, Natalie Gabriel, the widow of John's brother, has become infatuated with Greg Ashburn who, telling her that he is a British spy, has inveigled her into giving copies of important secret documents trusted to John by Washington. Finding that he is in danger of being apprehended, Ashburn adroitly directs suspicion to Caleb Hendricks. Whereupon, Gabriel (jealous of Caleb and regarding both Hendricks and Ashburn as subversive plotters) decides to put them on their trail. . . .

Caleb learns that Heinemann is in Wallisport. A few days later, Hendricks is drowned—that is, the police accept that verdict. Caleb is sure that Heinemann has murdered Bert. He does not suspect the truth: Greg Ashburn and Sir Eric Bramwell, with whom he is working, are Nazi agents; and "Sir Eric" is Heinemann!

Caleb, trying frantically to find Heinemann, asks Ashburn to help him. Ashburn promises to do what he can. Caleb goes to his home. At this time he knows that Hope Shaler loves him—following a series of quarrels with Gabriel, she has told him that she can be happy only with him. No sooner has he entered his home than Smurthwaite, Ashburn's servant, brings him a note. He reads the note, in which Ashburn informs him that he has made an important discovery and asks him "to come and tell it over." He drops the note. "Okay, Smurthwaite," he says quietly. "I'll go back with you."

IX

THE violence of the storm annihilated time but its crest must have lasted a full half-hour. Rain came out of the northwest in flat sheets and the sound of the wind was a squeal rising higher till it was almost inaudible. An occasional slate from the garage roof shot past the window. A young elm that had survived the hurricane shook itself and began to walk ponderously across the lawn; it had gone fifty feet, upright before it toppled. A magnificent Norway spruce leaned at an angle, quivered throughout its length, and slowly went down. Probably some of its roots still held; probably, Natalie thought, it could be propped up again. But there was nothing of her life, she felt—or of John's—that could be propped up.

The respite, however, had enabled her to see what the essentials were. She wasn't dizzy any longer or stunned, but there was something hypnotic in the way her mind was working. Tell John what she had to, and for his own sake hide from him what she could. Revealed enough to destroy his love for her—but see if she could keep the worst of a secret hidden—for his sake as much as hers.

John turned from the window—and that was what had to happen, what she had been waiting for. They were back at the beginning. But instantly she understood that it wasn't the beginning that he had gone on from there. Before he had been tense and strained—had still doubted himself. That doubt was

(Continued on page 34)

“That Horse gets away Fast”

Instant response, smooth
pick-up, full power!
Mobilgas answers these demands—and more!
You get complete “Balanced Performance”! Drive in for Mobilgas and Mobiloil.

WHEN TRAFFIC LIGHTS GO GREEN... you don't want to be left at the post. Pick the gasoline that gets away fast—Mobilgas. It's sold at the Red Horse Sign, the Sign of Friendly Service.

We know you'll like Mobilgas...when you try its flashing action—its smooth power...in your car. Here's why—

Mobilgas is made for quick-firing modern motors. It atomizes instantly; burns cleanly; delivers full, even power to every cylinder every time.

Whether you're starting, picking-up, climbing, cruising—you get the “Balanced Performance” that has made Mobilgas America's favorite gasoline!

1. Quick starts despite cool engine.
2. Fast warm-up—rapid acceleration.
3. Freedom from vapor-lock—no stalls.
4. Minimum crankcase oil dilution.
5. High anti-knock value.
6. Cleanliness—freedom from gum.
7. Full, smooth power under all conditions.
8. Long mileage—economical operation.

SOCONY-VACUUM OIL COMPANY, INC.
AND AFFILIATES
Magnolia Petroleum Co.—General Petroleum Corp. of Calif.

● Actual color photograph—G. E. Smith shows a visitor through a tobacco warehouse in Durham, N. C.

Luckies' finer tobaccos mean less nicotine

Authoritative tests reveal that Luckies' finer tobaccos contain less nicotine than any other leading brand!

Here's the natural result of buying finer, selected cigarette tobacco for Lucky Strike. The average nicotine content of Luckies, for over two years, has been 12% less than the average of the four other leading brands★—less than any one of them.

This fact is proven by authoritative tests which have been confirmed from time to time by independent laboratories.

You see, each year we exhaustively analyze tobaccos before purchase. Thus our buyers can select the leaf that is ripe and mellow, yet mild and low in nicotine content—then buy it up.

The result—a cigarette of finer tobaccos—mild and mellow, with a naturally lower nicotine content.

Have you tried a Lucky lately?

Copyright 1940, The American Tobacco Company

★NICOTINE CONTENT OF LEADING BRANDS

From January 1938 through March 1940, Lucky Strike has had an average nicotine content of 2.0 parts per hundred—averaging 9.82% less nicotine content than Brand A; 21.09% less than Brand B; 15.48% less than Brand C; 3.81% less than Brand D.

With men who know tobacco best—it's LUCKIES 2 TO 1

Occupation: Widow

Continued from page 26

for night clubs and mixed up in a dozen different theatrical enterprises. Everybody knew him; he knew everybody. He went through life as he had come through the group of men. My goodness, where have you been?" He smiled happily as he led her to a corner. "Are you looking for work?" "I'm in book you for three months right now in Berlin. We're dreadfully short of jobs—!"

Carola smiled. "Don't you ever talk about anything but business?" She was glad to see Franz. He was one pleasant acquaintance from the past. "You might tell me how I am."

"I can see how you are." He looked at her admiringly. "You have a great talent. You look magnificent. I am opening a new place shortly. Well?"

"No, thank you." Carola shook her head. Then she remembered that Wagner knew everything that went on in the entertainment world. On impulse she considered her voice. "Have you seen anything of Karl Dietrich?"

"No. Is he back in Berlin?"

"A tall, light-haired man came by, saw Carola, and stopped. Then, as he was about to walk on, he turned toward Wagner."

"Why won't you listen to me? I can guarantee you four months—"

"I don't want to sing," Carola said firmly.

The young man interrupted: "Herr Wagner, it is not fair for all the intelligence and all the charm in the room to be gathered in this one little corner."

"You should be a playwright," Wagner said. "That is a perfect entrance for me. This is Signor Froschetti, from the Italian embassy."

FROSCETTI bowed from the waist. "I heard you spoken of in the next room, Fraulein. I came to see for myself."

Carola smiled. "And?"

"I am content to stay here all evening."

Wagner looked disgusted. "Business, not romance, is what I'm after. Call me, Carola, at my office, if you change your mind."

Froschetti watched him go. "I shall never be able to thank him enough for letting us alone." He smiled boyishly. "I understand you've just returned from Rome, Fraulein. If I had only known you were there—I've just come back."

He asked questions about life in Rome. Carola listened, saying very little.

"There is so much I'd like to talk to you about," Froschetti said. "Can't we lunch together?"

Carola smiled. "What would you like to talk about?"

"Well, for instance, Rome."

"We've practically exhausted that."

"Modern Rome, possibly. But there is ancient Rome, medieval Rome—"

"THAT sounds like conversation enough for a series of lunches."

"I should like that. Tomorrow? The day after? The day after that?"

"Or any following day?" Carola laughed lightly. In spite of the shadow of Blaerchen, she was enjoying this. It had been a long time since she had been able to talk to anyone without having to hunt for some meaning behind every word.

"Any day! May I call you?"

"Please do." Blaerchen had returned to the room. She looked over at him. He left his place and came toward them.

Froschetti sighed. "I knew it couldn't last forever!"

A few minutes later Blaerchen said, "Perhaps we'd better go now, Carola."

"Very well." She was not sure how he felt about Froschetti. For all she knew Blaerchen had brought her here to meet him. When they were driving home she said innocently, "That was an amusing young man."

"Froschetti?" To her surprise he continued: "A very charming person. You'll find him fun, Carola. After all, when I'm busy, you'll have to have someone to go about with. He's pleasant company."

She bit her lip. "Thank you."

"What's the matter? I meant it sincerely." The car was going very slowly now. "I was proud tonight to see the way men were attracted to you. There wasn't a woman in the place as lovely as you."

"There were very few women there."

Blaerchen laughed. "And you certainly attracted my colleague, Praut."

Remembering the man, she shuddered.

"I know him very well," Blaerchen said. "I can even prophesy that he will telephone you before noon tomorrow and ask for an engagement."

"And would he be someone to go about with?"

"Would you like him?"

"He terrified me."

"He's not very attractive in any sense of the word." Blaerchen was silent for a moment. Then: "How about dinner? The menu at the Adlon still manages to run the British blockade."

"No, thanks. I'm really not hungry."

"I'm disappointed. I have so few free evenings. And every time I'm with you—!"

Carola was sure that the conversation, having reached a personal plane, would not stop there.

The car arrived at her house. Blaerchen asked softly, "May I come in for a little while?"

"It's late—!"

"It's scarcely eight o'clock."

"I really am tired tonight," she said pleasantly. He could not know how uncomfortable she felt.

"Then may I drop by some evening when you aren't tired?"

"Please do! Any evening!" She hoped that she sounded sincere but she doubted it.

"Listen, Carola!" He had his arm around her and she had to hold herself from shuddering. "Why are you always so reserved?"

She had only one defense. "Because there was Paul."

"You can't live in the past forever," Blaerchen said impatiently. "After all, you can't always remain a widow."

"Possibly not." She started to leave the car, then looked at him mischievously, "but at the moment it's my occupation, nicht wahr?"

KARL went to his appointment at the Volks Oper shortly before eight, excited but not nervous. The instructions from Klauss were simple: as soon as the last note of the overture was played he was to leave his place and go to the lobby. At the same time the man he was to encounter would leave his place and the two would meet. That was the plan for a simple meeting that would not attract any attention and for which no identification was necessary.

The orchestra leisurely took their places in the pit and Karl was annoyed by their lack of any desire to hurry. It seemed like an hour before the leader appeared in a spatter of welcoming applause. It seemed like another hour before he tapped on his stand and was ready to start the overture. Each note marked a passing moment, fast, then slow, then fast. Karl sat in a rear row, wishing that the music would finish.

The last note came with a rush and then sudden silence. The curtain was about to rise. Karl got up hurriedly. People in the same row paid no attention. He started to walk toward the lobby, unwilling to look around to see if anyone else in the house had moved. A few late-comers were still entering. Then, by force of will, he made himself turn and look. A man was coming down the center aisle. If this was a trap, confederates would be waiting in the lobby.

The lobby was almost empty.

The man, a stranger, came into it and looked around. Karl stepped forward and as Klauss had instructed him, said, "I didn't want to wait for the opera, either."

"We'll go together," the man said quietly. On the street he added: "We'll find a bar somewhere."

He said nothing else as he walked along quickly. For all Karl knew he was being taken to a meeting with the police.

The man stopped just once, as if out of breath, and said, "My name is Schebeler."

"Mine is Dietrich."

Schebeler seemed to choose a bar at random but Karl could not be sure. They sat at a table in the rear and for the first

FEELIN' RUNS HIGH

About this truly different AROMATIC pipe tobacco

It's the plain truth . . . Bond Street is too out-of-the-ordinary for some smokers—that's just the argument. But thousands of men won't ever again smoke anything else!

Bond Street gives you rare aromatic tobacco never before used in a popular price mixture. Gives you "custom-blend" aroma, flavor and bite-free coolness . . . at popular price. Even the women approve your pipe . . . with Bond Street.

Get a 15¢ tin of Bond Street—find out for yourself.

Today—try a tin of

BOND STREET

Pipe Tobacco

A Product of PHILIP MORRIS

"The first thing he asked for was a newspaper. After reading the front page, he decided to remain there"

ADOLPH SCHUS

RECIPE

for making coffee in your icebox!

1. Make Sanka Coffee by your usual method,\* but make it double strength. Use two heaping tablespoons of Sanka Coffee to each cup ( $\frac{1}{2}$  pint) of water.

2. Pour your freshly made Sanka Coffee into an ice-cube tray. Cool. Set in refrigerator to freeze. A tray of these coffee cubes can be kept on hand, ready for instant use.

3. Now... when iced coffee is wanted, simply heat milk... not cream. Do not bring milk to a boil.

4. Fill a glass with the frozen coffee cubes. Then fill with warm milk. Instantly, you have delicious, refreshing iced coffee... of a consistency similar to iced coffee served with expensive cream.

WHY IT IS IMPORTANT TO USE SANKA COFFEE

5. Many people, who don't drink hot coffee because the caffeine keeps them awake, should shy away from iced coffee too. For there is more caffeine in iced coffee than in hot coffee! Iced coffee is made stronger... and a tall glass holds more coffee than a cup!

So make your iced coffee with Sanka Coffee. It's 97% caffeine-free, and can't keep you awake. It's real coffee... all coffee... and is delicious iced. Best of all... you drink it and sleep!

The Council on Foods of the American Medical Association says: "Sanka Coffee is free from caffeine effect and can be used when other coffee has been forbidden."

*Sanka Coffee comes in "regular," as well as the new "drip" grind.

Copyright, 1940. General Foods Corp.

time Karl had a good look at the man's face. He was a man of forty. The roundness of his face was emphasized by thick, round glasses. He was slightly round-shouldered. His face and his manner, too, were those of a man bent by routine.

"I can explain at once," he began, "why I asked for this meeting. My brother and my father, too, were once good Nazis. They were killed during the Blood Purge of 1934. I waited a long time before deciding to do anything. I thought that it was not Hitler's fault, that he was a good man. Now, with the war, I know he is not and as a good German I felt it my duty, as soon as I heard of your friends—!"

That was reassuring but Karl still wondered whether at an unseen signal men would walk up and take him by the arm. A man did approach, a waiter with beer. Schebeler seemed as honest as he was simple and direct and thoughtfully, not impulsively, in earnest.

"If I can help you in any way—!" Schebeler said.

"WHAT is your position in the Foreign Office?"

"I am a translator." He explained, "A specialist in language. I have studied twenty-two in all and speak eleven fluently." He said that proudly. "As a translator, I have access to much more information than an ordinary clerk."

As Klauss had instructed Karl said, "We should be glad to get any information you can furnish. Of course, we can't pay."

"I would not think of taking money," he said timidly. "It is enough to know that one is helping."

Karl could understand that. His last worry about the man disappeared.

"You know," Schebeler said, smiling wistfully, "I was afraid to meet you tonight. I thought, well, you know—! But I felt I had to take any risk, any risk at all. With things as they are in Germany today—!"

Karl nodded as he looked around the barroom. There were couples at a dozen tables and men at the bar, yet there was no loud conversation in the room. People were talking to one another in muted voices. Germany today was the land of whisper.

"Any information I can bring will be valuable to you, I suppose," Schebeler was saying.

"Anything about government activity, about the activity of important Nazis? It will be carefully circulated. Once people learn what is really going on—!" He repeated a sentence he had heard from Klauss. "The characters of Nazis are the best weapons against them. Once the German people know—!"

Schebeler agreed. "I brought nothing tonight. We shall meet here in the afternoon three days from now." Then he finished the glass of beer and pursed his mouth. "I've heard men talk this 'Tidal Wave' beer, because it's sort that is going to wash away Hitler and his friends. That the German people should have to drink such stuff—!"

Karl smiled. "Do you hear my complaints?"

"About food and living conditions? On all sides! Yet the sharpest complaints are about the sort of men now in power. We have a lot of them in the Foreign Office, protégés of Ribbentrop."

That interested Karl. "Do you know Rolf Blaerchen?"

"Is he a friend of yours?" Schebeler was alarmed.

"I once worked for him. I have no more for him."

"He's one of Ribbentrop's favorites. You know, people now call the Foreign Office 'Ribbentrop's Robber Roost.' The career men there—I was one of them—see sickening things but they're helpless." Schebeler was silent for a moment. "I feel sorry for anyone who is a friend of Blaerchen's."

For a moment Karl thought of Carl. Then he said, "I think Blaerchen's definition of a friend is simple: a person who can use."

Schebeler nodded and almost whispered. "There are many in the Foreign Office like him today. Even worse than another of Ribbentrop's favorites, Wilhelm Praut."

"Never heard of him."

"They use the Foreign Office as a base."

"—It's made this way in case you should ever want to wear skirts—"

DOUGLAS BORGSTEDT

Take Life a Little Easier

GIVE YOURSELF A BREAK

IF YOU'RE somewhere between 35 and 40, the chances are you've passed your physical peak. Then it pays to watch what you eat, conserve your energy, exercise regularly. And if you drink—never take "one too many".

Enjoy a whiskey you know is extra-smooth—extra-light—extra-fine—Seagram's 5 Crown. It's whiskey in its "smoothest" form.

Say Seagram's and be Sure

*Extra Smooth
Extra Light
Extra Fine
AT NO EXTRA COST*

Seagram's 5 Crown

Blended Whiskey

WHISKEY IN ITS "SMOOTHEST" FORM

Seagram's 5 Crown Blended Whiskey. 72½% grain neutral spirits. 90 Proof. Seagram-Distillers Corporation, Executive Offices: New York, N. Y.

Stepped up to give you...

QUICKER STARTS!

It's a great gasoline made even greater. Stepped-up Fire-Chief "grabs hold" when you touch the starter... its "lightning action" gets you off to a singing start.

Copyright 1940,
The Texaco Company

QUICKER GO!

Stepped-up Fire-Chief's precision power balance protects your car against coughing and bucking that first half-mile. See how smoothly it powers your car from the instant of starting. Try it today!

NOTE: At its price you can't get a better gasoline than

STEPPED UP FIRE-CHIEF

now at

TEXACO DEALERS

Texaco Dealers invite you to tune in The Texaco Star Theatre—starring Kenny Baker and Frances Langford
Every Wednesday Night—C. B. S.—9:00 E.D.T., 8:00 E.S.T., 8:00 C.D.T., 7:00 C.S.T., 6:00 M.S.T., 5:00 P.S.T.

for intrigue against Goering and Himmler. Continual intrigue!"

"Blaerchen is well suited for it," Karl said idly.

"There is always gossip about him, the sort of gossip that should be whispered in darkness. I heard someone say that one of Blaerchen's friends, a Mademoiselle Mainescu, was arrested just the other day, at his order. She probably knew too much about him! And I heard someone say that Blaerchen appeared at a party with a particularly beautiful girl, a Fräulein Dirling—!"

Karl's sudden gesture upset the ash tray on the table. "I knew her once."

"Blaerchen will use her, too, and she'll probably go the same way as the other women when he wants to get rid of her."

It took effort to continue to sit quiet at the table. Perhaps Carola did not know in what she was involved, perhaps she trusted Blaerchen. Karl felt faint and the air in the place was suddenly rank.

"We shall meet here three days from now, about five o'clock," Schebeler said. "That is convenient, nicht wahr?"

Karl nodded absently.

He was glad when they separated.

IT WAS black on the street but Karl did not notice. He knew he could not return to his little room, even though it was light there. The first worry about Carola had passed now, but in its place was weakness in arm and foot and leg and knee. Even if that weakness increased, he knew he must keep on walking. He could not return to his room with the thoughts now rushing into his mind. He had never met Mainescu but that did not matter. She had been a friend of Blaerchen. Carola was a friend! He thought of Carola, who had come to the Krokodil for the first time, so fresh in her beauty. And now, for all he could know, she was working for Blaerchen and helping him, as the Rumanian girl had done.

He reached a subway and came out as near to Carola's address as he could. It was difficult to find the house in which she lived but after a time he entered its vestibule and stood at her apartment door. He rang the bell and waited.

He rang again. The door opened and Carola was there.

She stood framed in the doorway, slim and childlike in a simple dress. The light from behind fell on her, gilding the circle of her hair. Her face was shadowed.

She said only, "Karl!"

It might have been that he had not heard his first name called for a long time, it might have been the friendliness and the honest warmth in her face. His worry and concern dissolved, his suspicion vanished. He stepped forward toward her as if the three years between them had never existed.

"I'm so glad—!" Then he saw a look deeper than shadow on her face, a flicker of hesitancy, then a smile again but only a copy, as if she were trying to gloss over an impulsive reaction. "Carola!"

She was not smiling now. Confused embarrassment settled quickly on her face.

Without another word Karl turned toward the stairs. Clearly, his prison record made a difference to her. He was furious that the first impression of her loveliness had tricked him.

"Please, Karl, please—!" She followed him as he started down the steps.

He did not want to stay and he moved more quickly.

"Wait for me outside! I'll only be a minute."

He waited, in spite of his impulse to continue running. He had planned nothing to say and he would have to say ugly things.

Carola came quickly. "I was not sure who might drop in, Karl. That I hesitated. I am so glad you have so glad!"

He could not see her face but his voice sounded sincere.

"I have wanted to see you so much."

He could not stand here awestruck, silent, confused by the warmth of her voice, the softness of her hand, the brutal coldness of what he had felt her tell her.

She was holding tightly to his arm. "Where can we go, Karl?"

"Let's just walk in the darkness."

"I should like that," she said.

"I am so glad to be with you."

He decided to be blunt. "I don't want to talk about Blaerchen." He felt his hand tremble for a moment.

"I would rather talk about anything else in the world."

"He has numerous attractive friends for friends, Carola. He had one arrested—a Rumanian named Mainescu." He felt Carola sag and stumble. "What's the matter?"

"I knew her, Karl. She was in my house just three days ago. That is terrible. Wait a moment." She held him to him. "Why did you come to this?"

"You are a friend of Blaerchen," Karl began to stammer and hesitate. "I am a friend of Paul."

"And you came to warn me?"

"I think so. I was all upset—I don't know of you—!" He could not continue. His sentences had to suffice.

They walked on slowly. The darkness was not a friendly curtain but a wall. They were two in the darkness. The street was quiet, without sound of auto horn or footstep.

"I've needed a friend, Karl," his voice was steady. "It's so funny, in the dark. I can't see your face, yet I see mine. Yet I don't feel as if I am in the darkness at all. I never thought I should like a black-out." Then he spoke more softly, "When we first met I know you had been in prison."

"Who told you?"

"Blaerchen."

He had to ask a question: "I don't see him frequently?"

"Quite." She went on hurriedly. "We were in prison for three years. When you came out, did you have any news for the people who put you in?"

Karl hesitated before answering.

"Don't be afraid of me," Carola said.

"I hated them." His voice was low. "I still hate them!"

"Then you should understand I have no fondness for the people who put me here." She said nothing more for a half-dozen slow steps. Karl tried to guess what she meant. Then, suddenly, "I'm glad you came tonight, Karl. To count on you at the Krokodil had all your stage experience, I know. It's the same way now. I'm nervous, so frightened. What you told me about Senta Mainescu—!" She was walking so suddenly that Karl's arm jerked. She whispered, "Are you following?"

KARL listened. There were footprints on the pavement, coming close to him. A moment later there was a blue light from a policeman's light.

The officer was polite: "Are you having any trouble finding your way?"

"No, thank you," Karl said quietly, relieved.

"Then excuse me for interrupting. The officer laughed. "That's the good thing about black-outs—good for lovers!" He laughed again as he walked off.

Carola echoed his laugh. "Don't know, Karl, with you I feel safe for the first time in months." She lowered her voice. "I want to tell you something. Her whole story followed: the story from Paul, the man in Rome, the an the return to Berlin. "I had no chance but to come but it didn't seem so bad if I could find out about Paul's death."

Karl did not answer. He felt sick at himself for his suspicions, revolted at the meaning of all that she had told him.

"What are you thinking?"

"I hated this system," he said slowly, "but I hate Blaerchen more than the system that produced him." He wanted to tell her all of his suspicions about her, to tell himself forever of any sense of shame and self-reproach. Then he thought of what she had said of Paul's death and for a moment he wanted to go to Blaerchen and confront him, as man to man. That would be as ridiculous as it was impossible. "I can believe anything of Blaerchen," he said slowly. "He has always been ruthless. I felt jealous of Paul when he married her, but then, so were all of us. What did he ask you to do for him, so far?" "Nothing. That's one reason I'm afraid."

"It will be something uniquely filthy. Does he suspect you?"

"No," Carola said hesitantly, "but he was always eager to know how I feel toward him. And he assumes that sooner or later, as he puts it, we shall reach a pleasant, intimate basis."

KARL took her hand and held it tightly. It was as soft as white iris. "That may be his chief motive in having you brought back to Berlin. In the meantime, he'll make use of you in any way that he can." He hesitated, then asked, "Have you mentioned Paul's death?"

"Only to remind him that I still love Paul. I was afraid he might become suspicious."

"You had better say nothing. If he knows that you suspect him—!"

"I know that." Then she asked hurriedly, "What shall I do? When I arrived here, I was determined to be cool and to let nothing upset me but each day I've grown more and more anxious." Streaks of gray came through the blackness. There was the slightest touch of wind. Posts, steps and mailboxes were dimly visible.

"I could say, leave Berlin," Karl answered slowly, "but you have no passport now. If you make a move to go, Blaerchen will want to know why and he may become suspicious." Ominously, he added: "I presume he became suspicious of the Mainescu woman." He could feel Carola's hand tremble and suddenly grow colder.

"I'm sure her conversation with me partly explains what happened to her," Carola said slowly, "but she said she was not afraid of him any longer. I do not know how he learned any of the details. My maid heard none of it."

"You'll probably never know." He wished he could say something, anything, that would help her, but it was difficult to be sure what to advise. It was getting late. "We'd better turn back," he said. Then slowly: "The best thing for you is to wait until you have a legitimate excuse for breaking with Blaerchen. Now you have no excuse except fear."

"I don't think I'm so much afraid, now that I've talked to you. And knowing that I can see you often—!"

"After Blaerchen's orders, seeing me may make trouble for you."

"We must find some way," Carola said simply.

They walked slower now, as if unwilling to have this evening end.

Then Carola laughed. "We've talked about nothing but myself. What are you doing in Berlin?"

"Looking for work," Karl said frankly. For a second he thought of telling Carola about Klauss, but if she got into trouble anything she knew might be forced out of her. It'd be better to say nothing.

"I met Franz Wagner the other night," Carola answered. "Perhaps he could find something for you."

"I'll see him." Wagner might give him work.

The wind was colder now, the light grayer. It was still a world in which they were alone, with no one to see, listen or suspect. In a few minutes Karl knew he would have to leave Carola. He wished that they could walk on and on, away from the one wise conclusion, that they must not meet again. The sensible thing was to part here, for good; between them, in the everyday world, was the implacable shadow of Blaerchen. With wires tapped, it would not even be safe to telephone.

"You're so silent!" Carola said. When Karl did not answer she guessed the reason. "I must see you again! I will be happier if I know I can see you."

It would be wisest to separate for good but Karl hesitated. Then he said, "If you need me, send a telegram and meet me an hour later at the Potsdamerplatz subway station."

In the blackness overhead there was a streak of light as the moon came through. For a moment, the street was spread with silver splinters.

"Look, Karl, an omen."

Karl looked at her. In the light her face was as fragile as soft shadow.

A second later clouds hid the light and the street was blacker than before.

"Yes," Karl said slowly.

(To be continued next week)

How's your "Pep Appeal"?

—by Dorne

Lil: Arthur—that's a horse, not a hearse! Put some pep in it!

Art: Aw, Lil! I didn't wanta be an actor.

Aunt Patty: Lil, it's a plain case of no pep appeal! I'll bet he doesn't get all his vitamins. Come over to my house and I'll show you lesson number one—a lesson entitled "KELLOGG'S PEP."

Aunt Patty: And don't let him forget it, Lil! Right in that crisp wheat-flake cereal, KELLOGG'S PEP, are extra-rich sources of two of the most important vitamins, the ones our diets are most likely to be deficient in, vitamins B<sub>1</sub> and D.

Art: Holy smoke, Auntie! It's delicious! Why haven't you told us about it before?

Art: You know, KELLOGG'S PEP and those other vitamin foods she told us about might make a lot of difference in me!

Lil: From now on, my handsome hero, you're going to be the most vitaminized man in Suffolk county!

Vitamins for pep! Kellogg's Pep for vitamins!

Pep contains per serving: 4/5 to 1/5 the minimum daily need of vitamin B<sub>1</sub>, according to age; 1/2 the daily need of vitamin D. For sources of other vitamins, see the Pep package.

MADE BY KELLOGG'S IN BATTLE CREEK

COPYRIGHT, 1940, BY KELLOGG COMPANY

LEO GAREL

What Not to do

Valuable advice in words and pictures by:

NED HILTON ★ DOUGLAS BORGSTEDT
REAMER KELLER ★ GARRETT PRICE
FRANK BEAVEN ★ CHARLES ADDAMS
RICHARD TAYLOR ★ GARDNER REA

and the

IT IS my conviction that a basket which lacks a properly of Schlitz Beer is not a basket in the real sense of the word. It's just a basket.

The famous flavor of Schlitz is the final touch to a good picnic. Its ant sparkle matches the gurgle of the brook. The br goes with the freshness of And the distinguished app of the Schlitz bottles lends look to your spread.

If you prefer your beer you'll cheer for the fact Schlitz can opens like a bot any bottle opener.

THE BEER

a Picnic

thing to do—

TAKE ALONG PLENTY OF SCHLITZ!

live the first savory taste of
and appreciate it more as succeeding sip caresses your throat.
quickly discover how important that the glorious, original flavor of Schlitz is protected from contact with air, so that it keeps freshness right up to the moment you drink it.
Now, I'm hinting that Schlitz should have along on a picnic.
Right now, may I suggest a bottle of your next picnic? Open a one and that even finer Schlitz and see for yourself how really good this beer can be.

IN THE FAMOUS BROWN BOTTLE AND THE CAN THAT OPENS LIKE A BOTTLE

FOR ALMOST A CENTURY
THE SUPREME QUALITY OF SCHLITZ DRAUGHT BEER HAS MADE IT
THE CHOICE OF THOSE WHO LOVE
REAL DRAUGHT BEER

Copyright 1940, JOS. SCHLITZ BREWING CO., Milwaukee, Wis.

FOR GREAT OCCASIONS

AN EVEN FINER

Schlitz

MADE MILWAUKEE FAMOUS

Full speed ahead with COOL SHAVES for Hot and Harried Chins!

Men! Here's a shave as cool and refreshing as ocean spray—as zippy as a spin in a speedster
—as soothing as a soft sea breeze!

Ahoy, Mates! Set your course for Ingram's!—
the luxury cream that's really different! It's cool, deliberately planned
COOL, to help condition your face for shaving. And how it takes the fight out of those tough and troublesome bristles!

Your razor slips through those Ingram's-wilted whiskers in jig-time—
giving you a quicker,
cleaner, closer shave!
And all the time that rich Ingram's lather is cooling and soothing your face with its own special kind of Coolness!

AVAST, MEN! Overboard with those hot, stinging shaves that leave your face "scraped" and irritated!

Tie-up to Ingram's now! You'll get smoother, easier shaves—you'll look more attractive—and your face will feel a sea-breeze freshness that lasts for hours. No lotions needed.

So, set sail for your favorite drug store right away. And ask for Ingram's —in tube or jar. Choose whichever your fancy favors! Both give you the same cooling, soothing, economical cream. Both give you the same long-lasting shave—the shave that's friendly to your face.

INGRAM'S SHAVING CREAM

IN TUBE OR JAR

Rain Before Seven

Continued from page 24

gone now. John had read quite as accurately as she had the eagerness of her body in his arms. When he turned to her from the diminishing storm he had the assurance of an accepted lover. That was the highest pinnacle he had ever reached, and from the pinnacle she must immediately cast him down.

Most astonishing of all was the calm that had come to her. Once you understood necessities there was no more desperation. She said, "No, stay there, John." Then, when he smiled, "Yes, you're exactly right, if you insist on coming three feet nearer, I can't stop you. I couldn't stop you from doing anything you wanted to. I'd want it too.
You were supposed not to find that out.
You weren't supposed to find out what I'm going to tell you, either."

HIS new assurance was so complete that a kind of indulgence came into his smile, as though he were humoring a child. "I know all I need to," he said.
She said calmly, "You'll think otherwise in a minute or two. . . . I thought there would be a number of ways out of it. There never is any way out. I thought—oh, I'm not going to say the futile things. Sit down, John."

Maybe the force of her will compelled him to sit down, or maybe he was still confidently indulging her. Natalie sat down, too, ten feet away from him, composing herself in a big chair. It was solid behind her shoulders. Toes and knees together, hands unclasped in her lap. John thought that this was a whim of hers. So for one moment more a single thread held the sword from falling.

"I don't know what good it does to feel sorry about anything," she said.

She wanted to say, "I'm the thief who stole your secrets." But that was what she must not say, what perhaps she need never say.

Abruptly she broke the thread that held the sword suspended. "I've been Greg Ashburn's mistress." Up to that moment she had thought she could meet his eyes, but she couldn't. She heard her voice small and tranquil in the big room as if it were someone else's voice.

It was said. She had destroyed him with five words and could find no more words. She had to find them. . . . "A little while ago you were kissing me.
That makes you think: if she's telling the truth, it was just because she was lonely after Mark died. What you've got to understand, John, is that any decent idea about me is wrong. I was Greg's mistress before Mark died. Anyone who trusts me is wrong. There is nothing decent about me. Nothing honest."

She saw that her hands were shaking and so she clasped them, but she saw nothing else. She could not have raised her head or even her eyes. She didn't hear anything, either, except the rain.
They were both still alive, after a fashion.

"You see how it is," she said. "It isn't even dignified enough to be a tragedy. You make mistakes about women, and now you know the mistake
you made about me."

With a queer surprise, she realized that there would be an end of this. She would go away somewhere. That was —pretty funny. Where was there to go to?

John said, "Are you in love with him?"
She said, "Of course not—you know that," and it was amazement that made her look up. There was a greater amazement. For though his face was pale and dreadfully shocked, it was also resolute.
Immediately her panic came back. She stood up. "John, two weeks ago I was —in his arms."

John said, "What of it?" He started toward her. She cried out—something that might have been words she didn't know. John stopped. There was still a chair between them. "You see," he said, "you're afraid I'll have me touch you. But I have you. That's what makes the difference.
I'm going to again."

"I've lied to you. You don't know the worst—in a hundred ways I've trayed you."

"What of it?" If the unpardonable had happened to her, something that be understood was happening to Gabriel. Urgency had gone out of his voice; he was speaking evenly and reasonably. "You can come out of from behind that chair. If you don't not to touch you, I won't—for I know
. . . . You've betrayed me? I don't know what you think that means. You've to me? But, a little while ago, you didn't lie. . . . Whatever you've done, think you've done—it doesn't matter.
I don't care what it is. I'm in love with you."

"Don't! If you say it, you'll never stop feeling sorry."

"I'm in love with you." He didn't move but just stood looking at her.
"Now you can say what you want to."

The logic of fate might hurt but it just: she was not going to be left for a penny of the price. "All right, I'll I'm going to show you what I mean when I said I'd betrayed you. You being Greg's mistress isn't the worst done to you."

"It will do you no good to say that.
Or to deny that you're in love with me. . . . All right, you've done something else. Do you want to tell me it is? It will make no difference."

She said, "Then . . . just be kind to me. Let me get out of this room. . . . You wrong. You're not in love with me.
not in love with you. A kind of amazement has happened to us—that's all.
Yes, I'm going to tell you. I thought could get out of it with just making hate me. But you've got to deserve
But before I tell you I'm going to do something. To repair something I raise my head again. Then I'll tell you . . . . Will you let me get out of here?"

"When will you come back?"
"In half an hour. Or tonight. Some time or other. I'll know you're still in an ignorance I must cure, and I'll afraid not to cure it."

YES, it was simple. She went up her room and bathed her face with cold water, then with cologne. She wasn't, really, paralyzed. She had idea how she was going to get the
She knew she was not coming back
she had got it.

She went downstairs. John was hear the door closing behind her. The rain had stopped, the northwest wind turned a clear green, the black clouds were rushing eastward. She went to garage and had her car brought out.

It was four-thirty.
The sun was coming out but it dripped heavily and the road was flooded. Here and there a tree was many more had lost branches, one telephone pole snapped hanging by the wires. It took twenty minutes to make a drive ordinarily took no more than ten. She came into Greg's drive and saw her car was gone. No matter—she would wait. Or . . . maybe her salvation that he had gone. She remembered that he had forbidden her to come. Smurthwaite, who had been lawn, was hurrying toward her. She remembered his anxiety. "Has Radnor come back?" she asked.

There was something odd in Smurthwaite's manner, something tense and almost menacing. But at her question his face saddened. "No, ma'am. But I find him. Down by the mouth of Witchcraft. Somebody had shot him. I just looked till I found him."

"Shot him? How horrible!" That beautiful dog! She felt a genuine distress and touched his hand. "What a ghastly thing! You must be heart-broken."

"Yes, ma'am. I found him today. I brought him home. Would you care to see his grave?"

"Of course." She got out of the car and followed Smurthwaite around the house, beyond the stable, to an apple tree in full bloom where the grass was broken by a new, small grave. There was a clean plank—Smurthwaite was going to put up a marker. Pity wrung from a sudden pity for meaningless pain. "Do you know who did it?"

"Well, no, ma'am. That is, I know, ma'am, and I can't do anything about it." His stolid face furrowed with helpless anger. "He was a brute," she said, and Smurthwaite said, "Yes, ma'am. He's a brute. I'd like to shoot him. He ought to be shot," and then turned away. "Mr. Ashburn isn't here?" she said.

"No, ma'am. He left about fifteen minutes ago."

"I'll wait for him."

Oddly, Smurthwaite got in front of her, as if to prevent her going to the house. She stared at him. "Mr. Ashburn gave orders nobody was to go into the house, ma'am."

"Is there anybody in the house?"

Sullenly, "No, ma'am. But he gave orders. You can't go in."

Haste and excitement grew in her, and how did you handle the stubborn servant? By being a great lady? "You will not be impudent, Smurthwaite!" Imperiously, "No such orders would apply to me. Think, Smurthwaite—do you want to take that risk? I'm going in."

Shock touched her nerves, for that dull face hardened with a sudden and terrible brutality. Smurthwaite glared at her poised on tiptoe. Then, just as suddenly, his face changed. He was grateful for her sympathy about Radnor. "Do you want to go in, ma'am?"

"Yes."

"Then go ahead. He said not to let anyone, but—you liked the dog. Could you—please—hurry?"

He went back to the front lawn. Natalie enforced deliberation on herself till she was in the house. But she must be gone before Greg got back!

THERE were packing cases stenciled with the address of his firm in Boston. There was confusion, disorder, an obvious preparation for departure. What would happen to his furniture? Who would buy his house? It didn't matter.

But surely he would be reporting in person, now, to whatever people or departments he reported to. Surely it would be safest to take his last haul with him. Surely he had not, this close to departure, entrusted that paper to the precarious, roundabout channels of an underground organization. Surely he still had it.

Natalie's breathing had become clogged. There was a chance! Her whole being was a frantic prayer. It might be here. But where?

She raced through meaningless odds and ends on his desk, papers, memoranda, accounts. Did she suppose he would leave it on a desk? But where? Increasingly frantic, she lifted things and peered into things with an aimless

1 "Watch me and learn how to roll a log!" brags Tom. So to teach him a lesson, I make a bet—first man to get rolled off has to buy a bottle of the whiskey with No Rough Edges. "Haven't tried that brand," Tom replies, "but okay!"

2 Tom slips—kerplunk. I follow a second later, but I've won. And that mellow highball sure Doubled My Enjoyment. And when Tom tasted TEN HIGH, he said, "It actually paid me to lose today!"

GET THAT TEN HIGH SMILE

IT'LL PAY YOU, TOO,
TO TRY TEN HIGH.
THIS RICH WHISKEY WITH "NO ROUGH EDGES" IS MIGHTY GENTLE ON YOUR POCKETBOOK!

90 proof
Hiram Walker & Sons Inc.
Piquette, Ill.

STRAIGHT BOURBON WHISKEY • STRAIGHT RYE WHISKEY

Double your enjoyment with
TEN HIGH

E. GOODENOW

sale

LISTERINE
TOOTH PASTE

ALL 3 FOR 49¢
75¢ value

NEVER GIVE A FLEA A BREAK!

One thing I'm not soft-hearted about is fleas — and that goes for the Mistress too! One scratch and she's all attention. Two scratches and I get a bath with Sergeant's SKIP-FLEA Soap. Down the drain they go — SKIP-FLEA really kills 'em!

A third scratch is rare, because we follow up the bath with borated SKIP-FLEA Powder — it soothes the old bites and kills the new fleas! Get wise — get both SKIP-FLEA Soap and Powder! At all drug and pet stores. And ask for the free new Sergeant's DOG BOOK — or mail this coupon.

Sergeant's
DOG MEDICINES

Polk Miller Products Corp.
Dept. 2-G, Richmond, Va.

Please send a free Sergeant's DOG BOOK to:

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

compulsion. Steady! Later on she could be hysterical. Later on there would be no reason for hysterics.

Kitchen. But did she suppose he would hide it in one of Smurthwaite's coffee cans? Hall. It would not be in his boots... Hurry! Hurry! She had a wild impulse to laugh. If she did, that would be hysterics.

She went upstairs. Never before had she been alone on this floor. An intolerable disgust settled down on her. There were clothes of hers in this room. She started to gather them up, then stopped. There was no time for that. And it didn't matter—now. Where?

There were two packed bags on the floor. She knelt and went through the pockets of the suits, then rifled the bureau drawers and such clothes as were left in the closet. Hurry! She must get out before he came.

But if she didn't, if he saw traces of what she had done! Her hands fumbling, she made everything neat in the bags—would he remember how he had left them? She hung her negligee in the closet again and fled downstairs to try to restore the desk as she had found it. Would Smurthwaite tell him she had been here? Yes. But he would think she had come for—love.

She stood in the center of the living room, and a sense of complete and irreparable failure crushed her and brought blackness spreading across her eyes. She shook it away. She had failed altogether, and she was alone here, and helpless. But she must not fail, she could not stay alive if she failed. It must be here.

No! Of course! He would carry it with him. It would be in the pocket of his coat. Or in a money belt. One of the conventional places. So she was not to go before he got back. She was to stay till he came. And... when he did come, what? She was sobbing again. How did you threaten to kill a man? How did you kill a man?

She rushed back upstairs. Greg had a pocket automatic. She had never fired a gun—but he did not know that. Get the gun! He kept it in a shaving cabinet, one of those ultra-British things with a number of razors and a variety of accessories. The cabinet stood on a chest of drawers and they had made jokes about it. She opened it. The razors and accessories were there. But no gun.

That lost the last chance. And she had induced John not to get the only help there was—the FBI. Was there time, still, to call on John? There must be!... There was a little leather wallet, she saw now. Her fingers trembled, her heart pounded. She opened it. A photograph of Bert Hendricks was looking up at her. It was a passport and the name wasn't Hendricks' but the photograph was.

How? Hendricks had been drowned. Yes, the inks had run, there were water stains on the leather. It had come from Hendricks' body.

She dropped it. In the mirror her eyes, shining with horror, stared back at her. She thought: Caleb was right, Hendricks was murdered. She thought: Greg took this from a murdered man's pocket. She thought: that man was Caleb's friend.

HE HAD kept urging her to spy on Caleb. He had repeatedly prodded John to take action against Caleb. Caleb thought that whoever had murdered Hendricks had set that fire. And had been—a Nazi.

Her spinning, terrorized mind produced a clear picture—Greg glancing at the paper that Caleb said had been planted in his house for the police to find. Greg had had it in his hand only a second or two before John snatched it away. But he had known that all those figures on it were the wrong figures. How? He had made them wrong, himself, he had put that paper in Caleb's house, himself. That meant...

He was not back yet! She snatched up the passport, turned, started from the room—and was confronting Sir Eric Bramwell.

"If you had not found that," Sir Eric said, "it would have been most convenient to let you go. As it is..."

The gross face was as brutal as it had been when he struck Smurthwaite. Instantaneously she knew about him. Then one arm pinioned hers and a big hand went over her mouth. He shouted for Smurthwaite.

HOPE forced herself to sit quietly in a chair, stretch out her legs, relax them, and listen to her own instructions. Look here, if you get into a panic you'll be done for. Actually, nothing is happening. You're scared, but nothing is happening. There's plenty of reason to be scared, but nothing is happening.

Caleb had as good as told her that she could ruin everything forever. She would ruin it if she lost her head. She had to do two things—she had to find Caleb and she had to think straight. Caleb had said that one mistake would be fatal.

Following the storm she had not been able to get him on the phone, so she had driven to his house. He wasn't there—and he had not told her where he was going. He had very carefully avoided telling her.

Well, what was there to tell Caleb? That Greg Ashburn had seen them, as he put it, half-dressed. Wait a minute—think straight! Greg knew that they had been half-dressed, but that didn't prove it was his face Caleb had seen at the window. Greg wasn't in town that night. How do you know he wasn't? Well, the best possible reason—Natalie had gone to that dance with John. She would have gone with Greg if Greg had been in town. They were lovers. Any time this year a face at Greg's window would have seen plenty.

What had Greg wanted? Why was it important to ask her if they had seen anything that night? It must be important, for he had asked the same thing before. Or had he? She forced her whirling mind to reproduce a picture. She had driven to Caleb's the day after the fire—the day she went in and found Bert hiding from the police. Greg had been in his front yard, with a golf club. He had come out and asked her if she had seen the fire. What of it? Everybody in Wallisport had asked the same question, that day.

He was the most loathsome man she had ever known, she had always him without knowing why—but didn't prove a thing. She was certainly going to have Caleb find out what he was so interested in what they doing that night. Don't worry! The moment Caleb found out what Greg said to her—

Hope stood up. She was not afraid of Greg, she was not even interested in him; the truth was that she was not going to hide from her real fear. She had not seen Caleb since three o'clock. He had carefully told her—nothing at all. Into her stunned mind came the picture she had been shutting out. It was with a man who was heavy-set, Teutonic, who had a brutal, scarred face. They were in some room. Or on a street. Or in some patch of woods in Wallisport. In Gorham. Somewhere else. There had been a shot. It was now...

She rushed downstairs, picked up the telephone, called John's number. What formed on her lips: When will the G-men come? But when she heard her voice say, "Yes?" she put the phone down again without saying a word. That shot had been fired, it might be Caleb who had fired it. He had said "Don't do anything at all. Anything you might do could be the one mistake we can't afford."

There was no hiding from it any longer: she was now believing that Caleb had committed a murder. It wasn't a murder but it would be treated as murder.

SHE went out to her car. Coming to the square at Wallisport, she stopped in front of the town hall. Police headquarters was lighted and someone was sitting with his feet on a desk, reading a newspaper under a green lamp. A merciless conflict cleft her. She could go into that room and start the telephone and the radio clamoring for Caleb. Wanted, Caleb Thatcher, last seen in taxicab driving from North Wallisport. She could start all the resources of the police looking for... for a man who might have fired a shot. "Anything you might do could be the one mistake we can't afford," Caleb had said.

She drove on. Greg's house was dark, nobody was there... The sweetest relief she had ever felt restored her, a light was burning in Caleb's kitchen. She rushed through the back door, calling "Caleb!" Her voice came back to her; she got no other answer. She switched on the living-room lights. He wasn't there.

But he had been. He had turned on that kitchen light. He had been there since dark, since twilight any way. Within two hours. She went back to

"I don't care if Washington did stop here—this steak is tough"

BARNEY TOBE

*I am that versatile King Can—Marvelous things I do for man
Like bringing food from far and near,
And then I quickly disappear!*

I GO TO THE CIRCUS

...to the calliope play...watch the elephants sway...
...nuts, peanuts...get your tickets here. And when the ...ful clowns and circus folk gather around the table...
I am...or, at any rate, I brought the food there....No
...er where you eat...in circus cook
...in grand hotels...famous restau-
...lodes in the wilderness...or sim-
...t home...I, King Can, will be at your
...ce!...Take the vegetables I bring you ...nd we all should...there is an endless variety! Corn on the cob; shoestring carrots or beets; tender tips of green or fancy white asparagus; hearts of artichokes; tasty tomatoes, whole, paste or sauce...even tiny new Irish potatoes....These vegetables in a can are the 'choice of the crop'...but reasonable too.

Carefully and scientifically preserved by the canners to retain all of their rich goodness
...they are then packed in a superior tin plate...DUCTILLITE. The perfect plate for the tin container! It's Wheeling Steel."

"The Musical Steelmakers"—It's Wheeling Steel—return to the air
October 6, 1940—Mutual Broadcasting System—From Coast to Coast.

Ductillite

WORLD'S FOREMOST TIN PLATE

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

I SMILE
LIKE THIS

When I spread Parkay thick on bread because it tastes so good!

DAD GRINS TOO...

When he tastes the delicious cakes,
pies and cookies
Mom makes with Parkay as a flavor-shortening.

...AND MOM LOOKS HAPPY...

When she uses Parkay for pan frying. It doesn't spatter or stick to the pan and adds flavor to fried foods.

to "MAKE THINGS STICK"

Get Your Favorite at Your Stationer

SANFORD'S
LIBRARY PASTE

Dries and sticks instantly. Will not stain or discolor. Keeps perfectly. In tubes or the "Utopian" water-well jar.

SANFORD'S
LIQUI-STICK MUCILAGE

Transparent liquid adhesive. Rubber cap brush permits adjustment to desired depth. Keeps handy and fingers clean.

SANFORD'S
WHITE RUBBER CEMENT

Clean, convenient, economical.
Never wrinkles or discolors. Waterproof and non-inflammable.

Other Sanford's Products for Office and Home include:

Sanford's Fountain Pen Ink... Sanford's Premium
Writing Fluid... Sanford's Ink Eraser (Liquid)...
Sanford's Solvex (Typewriter Type Cleaner), etc.

GO TO YOUR STATIONER for

SANFORD'S
MODERN OFFICE AIDS

kitchen. He had started to make coffee, and then had taken it off the stove. He hadn't put the bread and butter back, though. He had got an idea. Or he had been called away.

She saw that she had left the lights of her car on, and went out to it. A sudden thought stopped her short. She knew her own license number—57038. But the taillight was so dim that, hardly a hundred feet away from it, with the car stopped, she could not read that number. It had been dark when she started for Boston with Bert. Whoever reported to the police had not read her number, he had recognized her car.

Caleb knew that! It was what he had tried to keep her from guessing. Who? Someone who knew her. No, only someone who had got familiar with Wallisport.

When she went on to switch out the lights, there was a further relief. For they were shining on Caleb's garage and when she got here she had been too anxious to notice that Caleb's car was there. He had not driven away. And that meant that—the worst had not happened. If it had he would never have come back here, or if he had come back, he would have got away fast, in his car, driving furiously. He was alive and he had not done the worst thing. Of course, he would never have stopped to get supper!

But why had he stopped? . . . She sat on the running board, easier in mind than she had been all day. He had come home and started to get supper. Then he had stopped and had gone away—on foot. Why? Where? Where would you walk from this isolated place, a mile and a half from the highway, a quarter of a mile from the nearest house? The only house. Well, probably you would walk to the nearest house.

She had never expected to feel grateful to Greg Ashburn but she did now. He was with Caleb. That meant that Heinemann could not possibly have got at Caleb and Caleb could not possibly have got at Heinemann. . . . A few minutes ago Greg's house had been dark. Was it still dark? She got in her car and drove there, stopping in the drive. Not a light anywhere. Her headlights fell square on the side door and the blank windows that framed it. She sat there, trying to think.

After a while she got out and knocked at the door.

Nobody answered. She tried the door but it was locked. She went on to the garage. The door was closed but she opened it and saw that Greg's car was not there. She went back to her own car and stood for a moment chilled by one more new and sudden but unidentifiable doubt. Was there something wrong, something she hadn't thought of? A realization formed: this is a long way from anywhere; it would be just too bad if you needed help suddenly. She put a hand over her mouth. Was she going to go to pieces now that she had the first encouraging knowledge she had had all day? She was not! So she drove back to Caleb's.

IT WAS pretty clear now. Caleb had come back from—well, she didn't know where he had come from but at least he had come back. He had started to get some dinner—the poor lamb, scraping up a dreadful meal! Greg had seen his car come down the lane and had telephoned him. So Caleb had walked over to Greg's and they had gone somewhere in Greg's car. That could mean only one thing—Greg had located that girl in the snapshot. They had gone somewhere to find her. Caleb was talking to that girl right now.

She turned out all the lights but the shaded one on his desk, which gave a mellow dimness to the room and brought out comfortable shadows on the walls. Lord, she was tired! Every atom of her was sodden with fatigue. And yes, in this very room he had first noticed that she had grown up. What was it he had said about her knees, that day? So now there was a lull, while she waited for him to come home. He would be surprised to see her. He would be glad, too. And in this room he had kissed her, and was going to kiss her again. In this room she had seen that scar on his shoulders. The dreadfulness of that pulsed in her mind for a moment but the light seemed dimmer and her mind moved drowsily to Greg Ashburn loathsome peering in this window. But even that didn't matter much, though Caleb would certainly beat him up for it, and the light was dimmer still, and she stirred, remembering that Caleb had kissed her and would kiss her again. The light got even dimmer.

She woke with terror cutting off her breath, fighting her way up through levels of unconsciousness with the desperate thought: I've got to call the police. How had she supposed this place was safe and reassuring? It reeked with dread. How had she dared to fall asleep? It was a quarter to eleven. Caleb had not come back.

She flooded the living room with light, switched on the porch light, went out to the kitchen and turned on the lights there. She had to blot out the fear that lurked in darkness. So she went into Caleb's bedroom, turned on those lights—and saw his pistol and cartridges on the table. There were four cartridges in the clip. He had started to load it. Then he had stopped—or had been stopped. He had started to get dinner, then something had interrupted that and he had started to load his pistol, and then something had interrupted that. And he had gone away. Or he had been taken away.

She heard her voice making a moaning sound. She got to the telephone. She rattled the hook. Nothing. The phone was dead.

Tremors shook her arms and legs, she sprawled over the table, fighting back her panic. There was nothing to do but fight back. She had to get the police.

She started for the door, then rushed back and got the gun; she put the clip in.

She got out to the porch—and didn't go any farther. She had stopped short by the incredible. A hundred yards away, straight in her, Witchcraft Creek was silvery in the light of the last quarter of the moon. That had risen above the marsh. The boat was moving across that light. There were no boats anywhere along the creek. Caleb kept his little sloop in the club. Greg didn't have a boat. But a boat was coming up Witchcraft. No lights. But she heard the muffled roar of a powerful engine.

We saw a boat the night of the fire in Farrow Shoals. Caleb made about it. There was a plane that was just an accident. It wasn't an accident. It was coming toward Witchcraft. This boat.

SHE had started to run down the water, at an angle, and had stopped, instinctively hiding in the shadow of a tree. That was why she was so anxious about. He would know if we saw this boat.

Greg didn't have a boat—oh, he! He was so damned interested in the night of the fire. Heinemann was in town that night. And Greg had come up Witchcraft in a boat. Farrow Shoals.

Caleb had heard Greg's dog somewhere down Witchcraft, near where it ran into the sea, the night the dog was drowned. The dog followed the boat down from Greg's. With it. After Bert had been trapped at Greg's house. He had been doing it. Nobody could ever know. Except a dog had barked in the night.

Greg had killed Bert. Greg and Heinemann. Greg and Heinemann were together.

Caleb! He was on that boat. He was at Greg's house. Greg had phoned for him to come over—the telephone was dead. Greg had come to get him, telling him he had something about that girl. Caleb had gone to Greg's house with him. And Heinemann, Greg's partner, was waiting.

Or was he on the boat? Greg's car had been found in

"He thinks the world of Mr. Dimwittie. Won't let him out of his sight."

HOWARD

"Are you telling me
HOW LUCKY I AM?"

"Don't I know it? I used to own an ordinary refrigerator, too! Then I saw a SHELVDOR at a friend's home just as you are seeing mine.

"I compared the amount of usable space. I saw how all the small things fitted into these extra shelves in the door. In most refrigerators, an orange takes as much space as a milk bottle. But not in my SHELVDOR! Now I save in food buying, too, because with more space there's always room for larger quantities of 'specials'.

"And that separate FREEZORCOLD compartment is a separate cold-storage plant for frozen foods and fish and meat—everything needing almost-zero cold.

"You can be as lucky as I am if you make sure that your next refrigerator is a Crosley SHELVDOR, too!"

At many price levels, you will find Crosley SHELVDORS at your Crosley dealer's—but all with the extra space and added features that make them great bargains.

Crosley SHELVDOR prices start at $99.95 for a 6 cu. ft. model—slightly higher in the far West

visit the Crosley Building at the New York World's Fair
THE CROSLEY CORPORATION, CINCINNATI, OHIO

Powel Crosley, Jr., President

THE HOME OF WLW, THE NATION'S STATION—70 ON YOUR DIAL

CROSLEY Shelvador

A flavor you will find in no
other beverage

Your first Ballantine's is more than a drink . . . it's a discovery. Now you know how wonderfully good a brewed beverage can be!

Ballantine's Ale is brighter, brisker, livelier . . . an ale brewed to the American taste. But . . . and mark this well . . . Ballantine's is a true ale, rich with the extra flavor imparted by ale yeasts.

Try a glass today. Before it's half gone, you'll understand why millions get more enjoyment from Ballantine's Ale than from any other brew. Now on sale from coast to coast. In bottles and cans (12 oz. and full quart).

Copr., 1940, P. Ballantine & Sons, Newark, N. J.

BALLANTINE'S America's largest selling ALE

ham. The boat could be coming from Gorham.

It could be . . . all over.

Fifty yards inshore, she started to follow that boat up the narrowing creek. Under the trees it was all right but there were open spaces to run across. There were boggy places, too. She sprawled full length in one of them, and fell headlong again a hundred yards farther on, when something tripped her. Underbrush clawed at her dress. Something scratched her cheek viciously. She fell again and got up and kept going. She held on to that gun. She didn't know how to use it but she had it.

The creek curved away from Greg's house and she actually got ahead of the boat before the long curve turned back again. But she had to stop short a hundred yards or so from the house, not daring to go nearer, for everything beyond was open and moonlit—the stable, the little garage, the lawn, the house itself. There was a light downstairs, just visible, seeping around thick blinds. She crouched under a bush a few yards from the water. And she knew now how Bert and Caleb had felt, for she wanted to kill a man.

The boat slid past, its power cut off, and she could have tossed a pebble and hit it. It slid in to the bank, not more than fifty yards away. That pumping house of Greg's, above his well, was a boat house!

SOMEBODY got off the boat, an unrecognizable dark bulk, bent over for a moment, probably making fast, and then moved off toward the house. Hope was beating her thigh with a doubled fist, for that would be Greg or Heine-mann. No, it could be Smurthwaite. Smurthwaite must be a part of this too.

She did not dare go any farther, for this bush was the last cover. She could go up the creek, though. She waded out into Witchcraft, holding the gun high above her head. The bank wasn't high enough to hide her—if anyone looked out from the house she would be seen. But the water wasn't deep, hardly up to her waist except in holes she stumbled into.

She got to the boat and sprawled over into the cockpit. There was just enough light to see that nobody was there. A little cabin, forward. She tumbled down the two stairs that led to it, cruelly banging her shins and hips. The cabin was completely dark and she had to feel frantically everywhere, the deck, the lockers, everything. Just cushions and fittings and a couple of small cases. She went back into the cockpit and, yes, there was an engine room. She fumbled through that. It was too small. He couldn't be in this boat.

They had done it. She began to sob. But at once terrible rage blotted out everything else, shaking and blinding her. She was going to that house. She had Caleb's pistol . . . Wait! The pump house—boat house!

She couldn't get into it. The door was locked. But there was a window, and she got it up, and sprawled through it. She rolled over a bench, fell, got to her feet. Nothing could be seen except the dim blur of the window.

She heard a muffled thumping, and stopped short, holding her breath. There it was, and a kind of rustle too. She said "Caleb!" The thumping was louder. She fumbled along the walls and over the floor. She fell across something—something that moved, squirming violently. Caleb was alive!

The bound form stopped twisting. There were ropes around his feet. His arms were tied behind him. She couldn't find his face—oh, something had been tied over it. A thick knot behind—it must be some kind of sack. She got it off. There was a bandage over his mouth. She got that off.

"Greg!" Caleb said. "Where is he? It's Greg!"

"I know."

In endless, frantic time she was working at the rope on his wrists. She had to get it untied. "Don't strike a match!" Caleb said, his voice horribly thick with match!—why she was drenched. "But I've got your gun." Her fingers were good and any minute now they would come for him.

"They dragged Bert back of the house and drowned him that way," Caleb said. "For God's sake, untie that knot."

It came free and a sob burst from Caleb's throat. He sat up, working at his feet. It took him only a few seconds. He stood up and fell down again, sprawling on the floor. He got up. "My damned gun!" he said in that ghastly voice. She saw him swaying on his feet, and felt more than saw him take a couple of steps away from her. He came back, whispering, "Where's the gun?"

She fumbled for it on the floor. She could not find it. Caleb got down beside her, their hands sweeping in the darkness. He grunted, "Got it," and stood up, clicking the gun. He got to the door and she heard the lock rattle. The door opened—and she threw herself on it.

Caleb said, "Hope! How did you get here?" as if for the first time he had realized that it was she. Up to now she had just been somebody that had gotten lost and untied him. . . . But she had stopped him. She didn't take any more steps. They were standing in the open doorway.

"Get out of here!" Caleb said. He took her shoulders and turned her toward the very bushes she had hidden in. "Go find the police, run like hell!" He plunged out of the doorway, then plunged back again. "You can't go past the house. You can't go up the creek. There's no way you can go, and there is no time."

There had been no sign from the house. But any second, now.

"I'll take you past the house. There isn't any car. No matter. You'll have to run for it. Come on!"

He seized her arm and started dragging her out. "What are you going to do?" she muttered. She wound her arms around his once more and hungrily whispered desperately, "Caleb, no! Caleb, we're safe! Caleb, it's murder!" He said, "Who said we're safe?" He broke out of her grasp and thrust her away. She came back again and she would hold on till he knocked her out. He was fighting now. "There are only four shots," she managed to say. He grunted, "I'll only need three," and he broke the clasp of her arms.

AT ONCE she surged back at him. He had got a new idea. He said, "Can you run that boat?"

"No."

"That doesn't matter. Just start."

He was suddenly, completely, and unphantly calm. "I'll start the engine for you. Just back the boat out in the creek. If you sink it, all right. I'll have to swim, swim. Then run. Get the police. Come on."

"And leave you here?"

"Of course."

"We'll both take the boat or we both stay—"

She stopped. A light had gone from the back part of the house. In a second Caleb pulled her to him. "You're the darling of the whole town," he kissed her, shoved her away and started toward the house. Once she flung herself at him.

There was a shot. At the last Caleb stopped. He kicked her feet from under her and she fell head over heels. He said, "Lie there—don't move." He started toward the house. She waited another shot.

(To be concluded next week)

Mistaken in Love

Continued from page 15

"I had a Tom Collins. When he had finished his, Loomis said, 'Well, I've got to get back to the ranch. See you some other time, then.' 'Nice to have met you, Mr. Shute,' Atkins said. 'Loomis,' I said. 'Well, Loomis,' Atkins said vaguely. 'Loomis left and Atkins turned on me. 'You said Shute before,' he growled. 'I seemed greatly irritated. I tried to explain that it was Loomis, this time, but it was somebody else, and even the name was different. Atkins took a deep breath. 'Anyway,' he said, 'it was a good idea not to go up to supper. I was in the first place. Look, I've got to get out of my uniform. I have my keys in my car, and I'll change in the filling station. Wait here for me.'"

"ATKINS hurried out and I took my drink over to a table and sat down. Nethercott came in. 'Have a drink,' he said, 'I have one.' 'I ordered a beer and brought it over and sat down at the table with me. 'Sorry to hear you're not coming up, for all,' he said. 'But we are coming up,' I told him. 'He looked puzzled. He said, 'But I saw the captain, and he said you weren't coming up. I told Mrs. Berrand.' 'Listen,' I said, 'Atkins has got it fixed. Loomis asked us to the Lazy Y for supper, and I said we couldn't come.' 'Then why did what's-his-name say we weren't coming to our place?' 'What's-his-name is nuts,' I said with a spirit. 'It took me half an hour to convince him several people can live at one ranch, and now he thinks everybody in the valley lives at one ranch.'"

"You better go out and stop him," Nethercott said.

"A good idea," I said. I went out. First thing, I ran into Mrs. Berrand. "Sorry you're not coming up," she said. "We are," I snapped. I hurried on. I found Atkins coming out of the filling station in his civilian clothes. I said, "Atkins, let's go over to the bar and sit down. I want to talk to you."

"Fine," Atkins said. "We'll have a Tom Collins."

We went to the bar, the one next to the filling station, and ordered our drinks and sat down. "Now listen," I began, "we're going to have supper—"

"Hello, there," somebody said. I looked up. It was Madison Berrand. He had a pair of riding boots under his arm.

"Hello, Madison," I said. "This is Captain Atkins."

"How do you do, Mr. Madison," Atkins said promptly.

"Berrand," I said futilely. "Berrand."

"Been getting my boots fixed," Madison said. "Rather, trying to. Stupid fool there couldn't do it, got to take them over to the hardware store and have them sent out. When are you coming out to the ranch?"

I felt cold chills running up my spine. "Tonight," I said.

"Good," he said. "Look, I've got to get these to the hardware store before it closes. Order a drink for me, will you, a Scotch and soda, and I'll be right back." He left, with his boots.

Atkins looked at me. I could feel it coming. "How can we go to his place when we turned down all those others?"

I pounded my glass on the table. "Atkins," I shouted, "all we turned down was one man. One. His name was Loomis. He runs the Lazy Y ranch, he is a different man, a different ranch, a

Cars, too, Sunburn

SIMONIZ TO SAVE YOUR CAR'S BEAUTY! What damage the sun's rays do to a car, unless Simonized! They scorch the finish, bleaching out the color. Together with weather and dirt, the sun also dulls and destroys the lacquer or enamel. So, don't let your car's beauty smolder away in the boiling days to come. Simoniz now! If the finish is dull, first use Simoniz Kleener. It restores all the lustre and color your car had when new. Then, each application of Simoniz builds up more beauty . . . and makes the finish last longer. Start saving by Simonizing today!

THE SIMONIZ COMPANY, CHICAGO, U.S.A.

MOTORISTS WISE
SIMONIZ
MAKES CARS STAY BEAUTIFUL

Always insist on these famous products for your car. Sold at hardware, drug, grocery, and auto supply stores, filling stations and garages everywhere.

Try New Way to Simoniz!

"Remember, Haffa, in her own country she is probably considered beautiful!"

GARDNER REA

FAMOUS FLEET TELLS HOW Your Car CAN HAVE FINE PERFORMANCE
"Check Engine Bearings!"
 Say SANTA FE EXPERTS

SMOOTHLY sailing over the nation's highways from the shores of Lake Michigan to the rolling Pacific, Santa Fe buses carry thousands of passengers in comfort and safety. Through Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, Arkansas and Oklahoma, Santa Fe trucks maintain prompt "on time" freight service. To keep almost 600 units at peak performance, Santa Fe Trail Transportation Company service experts say "We check engine bearings regularly to prevent motor-fouling, power-robbing oil waste. When we find worn bearings we replace them to restore power, pep and economy."

Here's a tip for you from experts! When your car loses power, pickup and economy, have a service expert check the engine bearings quickly with the Federal-Mogul Oil Leak Detector. Don't blame piston rings for oil pumping caused by worn bearings! Replace with Federal-Mogul Oil-Control Bearings and restore power, pep, economy. Look for the Federal-Mogul Service Expert's sign today!

FEDERAL-MOGUL CORP., DETROIT, MICHIGAN

THE SIGN OF SCIENTIFIC CHECK-UP

Using oil? Stop where you see this sign. You'll find an engine expert who can accurately tell you what's wrong and what's needed to stop oil waste, restore fine performance! He knows this business. He knows there is no magic cure-all for oil pumping—he will give you the facts! Look for this sign!

GET THIS Quick TEST

Don't guess at the cause of oil pumping! Ask for the Federal-Mogul Oil Leak Detector Test, which now makes it possible to check internal engine conditions in a few minutes, without opening up engine. See for yourself what causes oil pumping, how to stop it!

WORN BEARINGS CAUSE OIL PUMPING • REPLACE WITH . . .

ENGINE BEARINGS FOR EQUIPMENT—FOR SERVICE • ENGINEERED FOR OIL-CONTROL

FEDERAL Mogul

different everything. His name is Loomis."

"Don't talk so loud," Atkins said. "You mean Shute. I see it all now."

"Loomis," I said desperately.

"Loomis," Atkins repeated mechanically, looking at his drink. "You know," he said, "I've never been any good at names. Ever since school. No matter how hard I try, I get them mixed up. For example, who did you say this Mr. Madison was?"

"Mr. Berrand," I said.

Atkins glared at me. Suddenly he snapped his fingers. "Where's this girl I was supposed to meet?" he asked.

"At the ranch," I said.

"This Mr.—this last man who was in, or these last men, whichever it is, told you to order a drink for him. Or them," Atkins said.

"All right," I said. "Go get your car and run it up in front here."

Atkins left and I ordered the drink and Madison Berrand came back.

"Where's your friend?" he asked.

"He went after his car," I said.

We sipped our drinks. We sipped slowly, but Atkins did not show up. "Well," Madison said, "I've got to round up the people, the various people, and get started back to the ranch. See you up there."

Madison left. A few minutes later Atkins drew up in his car. He blew his horn and I went out. Dolly Apperson was in the car with him. Dolly was the daughter of a rancher a few miles up the valley. Atkins had introduced me to her and the three of us had had a few drinks together on several occasions.

"I met Dolly," Atkins said.

"Hello, Dolly," I said.

"Hello," she said.

"Your drink's inside," I told Atkins.

"Hell with the drink," he said. "Look, Dolly wants us to drop her off at her ranch on our way up to the place we're going to. She says it's on the way."

"All right," I said.

"Get in," Atkins said.

Dolly moved over to make a place for me. Atkins was driving a coupé, a small one. I opened the door and started to squeeze in. It occurred to me it would be a tight fit, Dolly's build being what it was, and a man who has had a few drinks needs elbow room for driving. I stepped back. "See here," I said, "you two go on, and I'll go up with one of the others. They've got two cars down here and I'm sure to find room." I looked at Dolly. "Dolly," I said, "can you direct Atkins to Lodgepole Ranch when you get to your place?"

"Sure," Dolly said.

"I'll find it," Atkins said. "Dolly is a wonderful director."

"All right," I said. "I'm depending on you to get there."

"Don't worry," Atkins said, and drove away.

I LOOKED around and saw Nethercott getting into his car about half a block away. I started up there. He backed away from the curb and I began to run. I was almost there when he pulled away, and I was on the point of yelling at him when I saw the big green car just across the square. I stopped running and began to walk across the square. It, too, backed away from the curb. I started to run again. It paused for the start up the street, and I ran faster, and waved my hand. Nobody saw me wave.

"Hey!" I shouted.

Nobody heard me. I put on a desperate burst of speed. So did the car.

"Hey!" I shouted again.

The car turned onto the highway and pulled away, faster and faster. I stopped running and stopped shouting. I stood there in the street. I ought to explain that I did not have my car with me. To save time on my vacation, I had come by plane to Salt Lake City, and in by bus. I went back to the bar in front of which I had left Atkins, and went in and said to the bartender. "What did you do with the drink I ordered for Atkins?"

He reached under the bar. "I see it," he said.

I said, "Give it to me."

He gave it to me and I took it over to a table and sat down and drank it.

I WAS awakened in the morning by somebody knocking on the door of my little cabin. "What is it?" I called.

"You're wanted on the phone at the office," came in a boy's voice.

"I'll be right over," I said. I got up and put on some clothes hurriedly and went over. It was Atkins.

"Boy!" he shouted. He waited for me to say something. "Go on," I said. He said, "Man, she's superb. You said she was 'nice.' Why, she's—incomparable. Not beautiful, not even extra pretty, but she's the most wonderful—"

"So you got there all right?" I said. I'm afraid I spoke coldly. It had suddenly occurred to me that Cristoforo was a beautiful girl. It hit me at once. I don't know why.

"Of course I got there," he said. "Dolly told me the way." He hesitated. "What happened to you?"

"I missed both their cars," I said. "Did you get there before they did?"

"Yes," he said. "Anyway, I guess I did. I'll tell you how it was. I met her at the corrals as I drove in. I introduced myself. She was saddling up for a while, she said she'd had her supper, and I wasn't hungry, so we saddled up another horse and went for a ride. We didn't get back—you know that ranch last night?"

"Yes," I said dully.

"Well, we stayed out until midnight," he said. "When we got back every body had gone to bed. I told her you were expected up and I was to drive you home. She went in and looked around and you weren't there; if you had come, you must have got back some way."

"I see," I said.

"I know the whole thing wasn't very polite," Atkins said, and the jubilation began to come back into his voice. "but I hope you'll forgive me, or will have forgiven me if you'd been there, and the others will forgive me, but the truth is—"

"Come down to earth," I said.

"The truth is," he said joyously, "there was only one person in the valley from the minute I saw her. She's the most wonderful—"

"This sounds serious," I said lightly.

Atkins didn't say anything for a moment. Then he said, "You mean you haven't heard?"

"Heard what?" I asked.

"We're engaged," he said.

"You're what?" I said.

"Engaged, engaged," he sang into the phone. "We're going to be married. I'll stop in later on and tell you about it."

"Fine," I said. We hung up.

I went back to my cabin. I sat on the bed for quite a while. Then I shaved and took a shower and dressed and went out for breakfast. I ordered two poached eggs, orange juice and coffee. While waiting for them I quit kidding myself. I felt terrible.

I believe you can start loving a girl the moment you lose her. What I mean is you have loved her all the time and didn't know it. I believe it is possible for a man to look calmly at a girl years without the slightest conscious flutter of the heart, then to realize madly in love with her the instant she becomes unavailable.

I not only believe these things. I live them.

The waitress brought my orange juice and I drank it, and she brought me poached eggs and coffee, and I ate one of the eggs and drank some of the coffee and paid my check and went out.

After I had walked around the square a few times I dropped in at a bar and ordered a root beer. I hate root beer. The bartender fixed it for me and I told him to throw it away and make me a double Tom Collins. He made it and I stood at the bar and drank it. While drinking it I looked into the mirror.

I decided I would stay in the bar all day. I was determined not to be home when Atkins called. I did not want to see Atkins. I knew that if I saw him I would paste him one on the nose.

Another double Tom Collins," I told the bartender.

He made it and I drank it and I felt nervous so I went out. When I got out I looked up the street and stood dead still. There was the green car coming toward me. I started back into the bar but the horn sounded and an arm waved at me. I stopped. The car drew up. It was Cristobelle.

"Thought you were coming up last night," she said.

"Sorry I didn't make it," I said. My voice sounded hollow and forced. It was now and forced. After all, I was standing there looking at a beautiful girl. I said, "By the way, I have congratulated Atkins. He is a fine fellow, a marvelous fellow."

"Who is Atkins?" Cristobelle said. "Captain Atkins," I said mechanically. She looked at me. "Oh," she said, "the Army officer you have been telling me about. What have you been congratulating him about? Has he been made a general?"

The town square began to revolve. "Come in and have a drink," I said. She came with me. We went up to the bar. "What will you have?" I asked

"Coke with lemon," she told the bartender.

"Two double—no, one double and one double Tom Collins," I told him.

"I don't want a Tom Collins," Cristobelle said.

"You will in a minute," I said. The bartender went to make the drinks. "Look, Cristobelle," I said, "are you or are you not engaged to marry Atkins?" She looked at me, frowning. "I've never met him," she said. "Are you sorry?"

"Yes," I said. I took a deep breath. "Now, Cristobelle," I said, "think hard. As Atkins up at your place last night?"

"Hell, no," she said. "Don't know him."

"Excuse me," I said. "I've got to make a phone call." I went back to the phone and called Atkins.

"Atkins," I said, "who are you engaged to?"

"What the devil's the matter with you?" he demanded.

"Listen," I said slowly, "kindly mention the name of the girl you're going to marry."

"Why, Alicia," he said. "Alicia Fariss."

I hung up. I went back to the bar and stood beside Cristobelle, and the bartender had our drinks ready.

"WHO is the triple one for?" he asked. "Me," I said.

"I wanted a coke with lemon," Cristobelle said.

"Drink your drink," I told her. She sipped it.

"Now, Cristobelle," I said, "who is Alicia Fariss?"

"The Bar BX," she said. "Monty Fariss' daughter. They have a ranch about four miles up the road from us. Why?"

"Never mind," I said. I went back to the phone and called Atkins. "Listen," I told him, "you've made a hell of a mistake. You're engaged to the wrong girl."

"That's what you think," he said.

"Atkins," I said, "have you ever heard of a girl by the name of Cristobelle. Have you ever heard me mention Cristobelle Berrand?"

There was a long silence. "Yes," Atkins said.

"Are you happy?" I asked.

Atkins laughed. "Why," he said, "I was never so happy in my—"

I hung up. I went back to the bar. "Cristobelle," I said, "please step outside a moment."

"Wait until I finish my drink," she said.

I grabbed it and finished it for her. We went outside and I pushed her into the car and got in after her.

"Cristobelle," I said, "will you marry me?"

"Why not?" she said. "I've wanted to for years." She looked at me with wide-open eyes, incredulously. "Oh," she said, opening her arms, "has this finally happened?"

"Yes," I said, "it has finally happened."

I kissed Cristobelle, fervently and long, right there in the big green (Mrs. Shute's) car.

"Those lollipops you used to give me when I was a kid are starting to pay dividends, Doctor"

REAMER KELLER

Look! We can afford a new car right now!

Glad We Sent for That Chart!

See, It Costs Less Than We Thought!

THE only way to be sure about automobile time payments is to get all the facts—and figure the cost yourself! ★ You can do that easily with the General Motors Instalment Plan "figuring chart" which shows, in dollars and cents, just what you pay for financing and insurance. Shows that you get exactly the insurance protection that you want and need. ★ And it's so clear, you can figure your own "deal"—based on the amount of time you want, and the amount you wish to pay monthly! ★ Send for your free chart today! See for yourself that the low cost General Motors Instalment Plan saves you money!

GENERAL MOTORS
"Open Book"
You know what you get You know what you pay
Instalment PLAN

NO
SALESMAN
WILL CALL

GENERAL MOTORS ACCEPTANCE CORPORATION
1775 Broadway, New York 8-6

Please send copy of the GMAC Payment Chart for car checked below.

☐ CHEVROLET ☐ PONTIAC ☐ OLDSMOBILE ☐ BUICK ☐ LA SALLE ☐ CADILLAC

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

County _____ State _____ U. S. A.

This plan is available only through dealers in CHEVROLET, PONTIAC, OLDSMOBILE, BUICK, LA SALLE and CADILLAC cars.

SHOT AS A MAD DOG

—just because you failed to kill his fleas in time!

If your pet were to be shot as a mad dog, when his only trouble was a tapeworm infestation from fleas or lice which you had neglected—how would you feel?

Fantastic? Impossible? Then read U. S. Dept. of Agriculture Circular No. 338 which tells how fleas and lice can transmit tapeworms and sarcoptic mange—how tapeworms can cause symptoms easily mistaken for rabies in a dog.

Don't ignore your dog's scratching. Better take it for granted he has fleas.

Use Pulvex, the powder which kills fleas with incredible speed. None ever revive to re-infest. Pulvex also destroys any lice, ticks, sticktites. Kills fleas when put on single spot. Amazing—unbelievable—but true!

As Pulvex is borated, it makes your dog more comfortable by helping soothe itching from scratching.

YOUR DOG WILL BE ABSOLUTELY PROTECTED AGAINST FLEAS if you use Pulvex by the remarkable "minute-a-week" control method explained in folder on can. Don't let your dog be exposed to possible dangers. If he is scratching now, get Pulvex now! At all leading drug, department and pet stores, 50c.

ASK DEALER
TO SHOW YOU
THIS FOLDER

PULVEX FLEA POWDER

PULVEX FLEA SOAP oils and grooms the coat, deodorizes, cleans and destroys the fleas, only 25c!

Travel CAREFREE

carry

BANK of AMERICA TRAVELERS CHEQUES

Backed by the resources of a billion dollar bank

Issued by Bank of America N T & S A 495 branches in California

Main Offices: San Francisco and Los Angeles

MEMBER FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

Nobody could teach anybody to punch as he does. But he polished his punches against the yokels who were looking for the ten dollars and he learned things. He learned to keep his eyes open and his hands up and to keep punching as long as his man was in front of him.

Katie kept her eyes open while they were tramping with the carnival. It was steady work but dangerous. Lew might break a hand and then where would they be? Here and there she grabbed a fight for him. The fights became more numerous. They abandoned the carnival.

Fifty fights, more or less, he had in the ramshackle clubs of the towns they hit in their wanderings. Winning when he felt good, losing sometimes when he didn't—when he was undernourished and ill-trained or discouraged. And then up through the Middle West. Winning and losing.

They headed back to Dallas, a town that Lew had fled in despair after Wesley Ramey, an old fox of the ring, had painlessly but humiliatingly outpointed him in his ninth professional fight. He had been a drawing card there before that when, as a soldier on furlough, he had run up seven knockouts in a row at the club run by Dick Griffin, blind ex-fighter. He had attracted the attention of Fred Browning, who owns a ranch and a racing stable, bank-rolls Griffin and lives at Arlington, which is between Dallas and Fort Worth.

Browning bought Jenkins out of the Army and signed him up as his fighter but retained only the loosest hold on him until he began to get somewhere. Browning didn't want any of his money when Lew was getting only meager purses. He was waiting for him to hit the jackpot and meanwhile he didn't keep very close track of him and wouldn't see him or hear from him for weeks at a time and Jenkins never asked him for anything but advice.

Katie really managed him and trained him, made his matches for him, saw that he was in the best possible shape and didn't hesitate to belt him when she thought it would help. Once she changed her mind after she had made a match for him on short notice. She didn't think he could get ready for it and the night before the fight was to be held they argued hotly, Katie wanting him to ask for a postponement and Lew insisting upon going through with it because they needed the money and he was sure he could lick the fellow, anyway.

The next day he showed up at the promoter's office and explained he couldn't fight because he had a bad cut over one eye. Later he told some of the mob Katie had hit him over the eye, that being the only way she could keep him out of the fight.

Who's Scared of the Fight Mob?

Jimmy Johnston, who was in Dallas along about that time with his heavy-weight, Bob Pastor, heard about Katie and a plan that she had to take Lew to New York, where she intended to manage and train him just as she did in the sticks. New York was where the big dough was and Katie wanted some of it. That made Johnston laugh, especially after he had seen Katie.

"What chance would a doll like that have with the fight mob in New York?" he asked. "They'd push her around."

"They would, hey?" somebody said. "Don't kid yourself. Katie can take care of herself anywhere."

So she can. She has taken excellent care of herself in New York and while some of the fight mob undoubtedly have tried to steal her fighter she still has him. Browning still holds his contract with Lew and has split it with Hymie Caplin. Hymie's man, Willie Ketchum, trains him. But that's only because the New York State Athletic Commission wouldn't grant a manager's or trainer's license to Katie. Katie rules the camp.

It was Frank Bachman, formerly manager of Slapsie Maxie Rosenbloom, who first took Lew and Katie to New York. Bachman had seen Lew fight somewhere and wrote to him, offering to manage him and promising to put him in the big time. Jenkins, who was in Dallas, told Browning about the letter. Browning asked him if he wanted to go to New York and Lew said he might as well go there as anywhere. He said Katie had been talking about it, too. Browning told Jenkins to have Bachman call him up. When Bachman called, Browning told him he could take the fighter.

"But don't forget," Browning said, "he belongs to me. I'll pay you for your services but you can't have his contract—or any part of it."

So it was with Bachman that Lew and Katie entered New York last summer. Lew's first fight was at the Queensboro Club in Long Island City and he won a close decision over one Baby Breese. He beat Joey Fontana, a good club fighter, also by decision, and then took another decision over Breese. He still was undernourished and ill-trained and he didn't win any of these fights easily.

"Wait," Katie said. "Wait until he gets a few square meals."

He was hurt sometimes and weary and in trouble. But he still could punch. He knocked out Ginger Foran. He knocked out Primo Flores and then knocked him out again. He knocked out Mike Belloise.

Now he was rounding into fighting condition. He was knocking out pretty good fighters. He was punching harder than any lightweight they had seen around New York in years. They were talking about him on Jacobs Beach, that strip of Forty-ninth Street between Broadway and Eighth Avenue where the fight mob congregates. They were talking about how tough he was and how game and how he could punch.

But Lew and Katie couldn't get along with Bachman. Katie didn't like the way Bachman was making his match. They were going back to Texas to the matter over with Browning. Meanwhile, Mike Jacobs, seeing what was going on, offered Katie a match for Lew with Billy Marquart, hard-hitting Canadian lightweight fighting out of St. Paul. Katie didn't consult Bachman. She signed the contract. Jacobs, taking chances, had Jenkins sign it, too. After all, if Lew backed out, Mike could put Katie into the ring with Marquart although it might have been a go-brawl, at that, because Katie never squawked about giving away this pounds or so to anybody, including her husband.

Now Hymie's Sold

The contract signed, Katie and Lew hustled to Dallas to see Browning. Browning, having listened to their story of discord with Bachman, took the fighter away from Bachman and turned him over to Caplin, one of the more energetic fight managers, who has had four champions at one time or another. He gave Hymie half the contract, too.

The first thing Hymie did was to pull Jenkins out of the Marquart match because he didn't like it. If the commission had approved the match and Jacobs had the contract in his hands and there wasn't anything Hymie could do about it, fortunately.

Marquart was a heavy favorite of Jenkins but Jenkins knocked him out in a furious fight. Hymie, having had some doubts about Jenkins before the Marquart fight, but now completely sold on him, matched him with Tippy Larkin, fragile but clever New Jersey lightweight and Jenkins knocked Larkin out in the first round.

That was the fight that earned Jenkins the title shot with Ambers. That was the prelude to the arrival of a champion who was a long while on the way but, because he was new to the big time, seemed almost to have dropped in overnight.

"Funny how things slip you in a pinch. What is it, O-S-O, S-S-O or S-O-O?"

DAVE GERARD

Bargain Vacation Trip of a Lifetime!

This is the year to get acquainted with your country... on one grand and glorious trip. The U. S. Government has proclaimed 1940 "Travel America Year." The Pullman Company, and America's railroads, are cooperating, with this great travel bargain!

BUSINESS MEN: Note savings by "Grand Circle" Plan

The panorama of America's splendors will unfold before you! Mountains, national parks, resorts, rivers, seacoasts, historic landmarks will form an unforgettable record on the camera of your mind!

Make it the most restful vacation you ever had! On Pullman you get a real bed, with a comfortable mattress, clean sheets, and ample toilet and dressing room facilities!

Go in air-conditioned Pullman comfort, at the lowest rates in history. Choose from the many combinations of routes available. Exceptional News!

Copy, 1940, The Pullman Company

SEE AMERICA THIS YEAR! Go in comfort in air-conditioned Pullmans, with a real bed to sleep in every night—with plenty of space for yourself and your luggage. And with the personalized service, convenience, safety and dependability that only Pullman offers to passengers.

Go at a History-Making Low Rate!

The Pullman (1st class) "Grand Circle" Plan enables you to tour the whole country—from one coast to the other—at a history-making low fare. It permits exceptional stopovers. It enables you to choose from many combinations of routes. It entitles you to take part of your trip, return home, and complete the balance later (if you live on a through route and complete your trip within the two months' time limit of your Grand Circle ticket).

You can spend as many nights on Pullman as you wish! Yet the cost is exceptionally low—only $135 for first class rail fare, plus $45 for your lower berth. Thus—on a trip of 10,000 miles—the total 1st class rail and Pullman lower berth cost is actually only 1.8¢ a mile! Think of that!

So, why not decide on a Pullman Grand Circle trip right now? Forget your cares!

IMPORTANT! Be sure to ask your railroad ticket agent about the new "Travel Credit" plan that enables you to make entire trip without paying a single penny down.

Pullman
FIRST CLASS

"Grand Circle" Plan

Slight additional charge for some side trips and on a few indirect routes

"SINBAD'S FABLED VALLEY OF THE DIAMONDS WAS A SMALL SIDE-SHOW COMPARED WITH THIS"

Recording the excitement of early Pennsylvania oil days, a writer said: "Sinbad's fabled valley of the diamonds was a small side-show compared with this, and all the Spanish gold of the Incas looked like a stack of nickels compared with the actual realities of Oil Creek."

Our picture shows Benninghoff Farm in 1866. John Benninghoff, grown fabulously rich through oil, was bound and robbed of $265,000. A paper package containing $200,000, the robbers overlooked! Today the old safe is in the Drake Memorial Museum at Titusville. And today, as the world knows, Pennsylvania Oil is the favored lubricant for motor cars, trucks, tractors, airplanes, giant liners and battleships. Yes, the first oil . . . is still first.

"I've spent my life in refining and marketing the finest motor oil that my associates and I can make," says C. L. Suhr of Oil City, Board Chairman of a large Pennsylvania refinery. "I know that Nature gave our crude oil something she withheld from other crudes—and it's that something that means so much to the man who owns a car."

One squint into this instrument, and this worker at State College, Pennsylvania, answers "yes" or "no" to the question: "Is this a Pennsylvania Motor Oil?" Structure of Pennsylvania Crude is different, so this scientist, who checks samples, can't be fooled. This "sleuthing" is for your protection. Like emblem Pennsylvania Oil, it is dependable.

PENNSYLVANIA GRADE CRUDE OIL ASSOCIATION OIL CITY, PENNSYLVANIA

Copyright 1940, Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil Association

Below is the official emblem of the Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil Association. It is registered in the U. S. Patent Office and protected under federal copyright laws. This emblem is not the mark of a brand. It is a guarantee to you that a motor oil is made entirely from Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil and that the oil is up to this association's rigid standard in every respect.

This advertisement is published in the interests of producers, refiners, wholesalers, retailers, exporters and users of 100% Pure Pennsylvania Motor Oils protected by our emblem. Watch for new announcements in this series.

He was a "big-shot"—James M. Townsend, New Haven banker in the 1850's. He employed Drake to drill the first well; he kept his own name off Drake's stockholders' list, so depositors in New Haven wouldn't know he "speculated." He lent a big hand in making Pennsylvania Oil a reality. Your car runs better today because of this oil pioneer.

"John Jones, you'd save yourself a lot of messy trouble if you'd do as I tell you—use a Pennsylvania Motor Oil."

Of course that is "play" conversation, but it is downright good advice, and about 8 out of every 10 motorists in the U. S. are aware of this fact. An emblem Pennsylvania Motor Oil keeps down repair bills.

Southpaw Blood

Continued from page 20

dous, half Bronx cheer and half excitement. In the midst of it Spud climbed out of his seat, ran up the runway leading to the back of the stands, faced the crowd, cupped his hands to his mouth and yelled:

"Horsefeathers!"

It broke up the booing and everybody laughed but it didn't help the Sox, because that one run won the game and brought their losing streak to seven. Jake Trout came over to Doc in the dressing room just after he had come out of the shower.

"Never mind about that, Doc," he said kindly. "They'd 'a' got the run anyhow. . . . But what's the matter with you when you're up there hittin'? You pull back like something bit you every time you hit one. . . ."

"Got a little stiffness in my wrist from where that Everitt clipped me in that exhibition game over at Dayton," said Doc, "but I'm hitting just like I always did."

"Like hell you are," said Jake, turning around and hunting for somebody. "Johnny," he called to the trainer. "Take Doc down tonight and let Abbott X-ray that wrist. I think something's busted."

IT WAS a small bone broken in the wrist and Doc was on the bench a month with his arm in splints. Just when he was throwing a bit every day getting ready to break into the line-up again, Jake met him one day when he was coming in at noon and said:

"The old man wants to see you. He's up in the office now."

He turned back into his own little office before Doc had a chance to ask him anything more and, from that, Doc knew it wasn't good news. When he went up to the front office, the old man was apologetic.

"Yarnell," he said, "we're on a spot and I want you to help us out."

Doc, being uncomfortable in the front office as all ballplayers are and knowing that something bad was going to happen to him, simply waited and said nothing.

"We're getting Horstman from Oakland but they won't let us have him now unless we send them somebody just as good. We offered them Jenkins or Clark but they said they had to have you."

"I'll be going pretty good again in about a week," offered Doc tentatively, wanting to stick up for his rights but not wanting to be too pathetic about it.

"Certainly, you will," cried the old man cheerfully, "and that's just the point. They have a tough pennant race of their own on out there and they won't let us have Horstman unless they can get you. You'll be coming up again soon. It's just sort of a pinch for us now."

They were pretty good about it, settling up Doc's lease for the apartment and paying the traveling and moving expenses for Bessie and Spud—but Doc never got back in the big leagues. He went good with the Oaks and had four fine years but the Sox never recalled him and everybody else seemed to think he was too old for another chance up there.

With the Sox, Doc had worked his salary up to seven thousand five hundred dollars, and Oakland paid him at that rate the remainder of the season but next year they brought him down to the coast level, which was around four thousand dollars. That sounded bad but living was cheaper on the coast and they had a better family life. Doc never liked night ball but it did leave the days free for running around with Bessie and Spud. In addition there was a double-header every Sunday and an open date on Monday, which gave them a chance to spend the day at the beach or up the mountains. They had a little and lots of friends and things were pretty good. The only one who objected to going to the beach was Spud, who liked his baseball and would have stayed at the ball park if they had let him. He drove them all nuts at the beach keeping a game of his own going hours at a time, throwing a ball up as he could and then catching it.

From all this you might think that Doc was some sort of an American tomato, content to go on being a public spectacle as long as the crowds wanted him, but he actually thought a great deal about the future. Although he had never been an intellectual giant in college, grades were good and he probably would have been a successful doctor. He was tall and good-looking and pretty intelligent. While he was with the Sox he started selling real estate and insurance during the winter and had done all right at it. The only trouble was that just when he got his good prospects all lined up was February and time to leave training camp again.

So as long as Doc had a job and was doing well, they forgot the future. They managed to save a little money every year and things were happy around the house. It was a swell life for Spud and he lied a lot in school about what other players said to him and what inside dope on the team was.

Bessie was the one who got mad when the papers first started calling Doc "Old Doc." It began after Doc had been with the Oaks for two or three years. " . . . Old Doc Yarnell will be back in again this year as good as ever. . . . Doc came up in the clutch and popped one into right field. . . . You never had to worry about old reliable Doc. . . . Of course he's slowed up a bit but he's still powder that apple when it counts." "Old Doc!" cried Bessie angrily. "Why, that makes me perfectly furious. How old do they think you are, anyway? You're twenty-nine and you'd think you were a million to hear them talk."

IN HIS fourth season Doc got a cut in salary and there was talk in the papers that he was a holdout but there was never much chance of that. He knew either had to take what they offered or get out.

In the middle of his last season on the coast, Doc was traded to Louisville. Though Louisville was Double-A, just like the coast, it was a blow to him and he didn't try to pass it off as a promotion. Luckily he had no time to think much about it because Louisville was desperate for an outfielder and he had to get there that night by train. They didn't get moving expenses this time, and Bessie had to stay behind and get things packed. Doc drove east later with Spud.

They liked Louisville but they never felt settled there and that winter was the first time they came back to Coopers town. Doc worked in the feed mill for old Mr. Applegate, Bessie's father, and he felt uncomfortable about it and glad to get back to Louisville in the spring. They finished out the first year there and all of the next season—then Doc was sent to Knoxville as part of the trade that brought young Drews to Louisville.

At Louisville, Doc had got about the same money as in Oakland, but Knoxville was a real drop. They were paying two hundred and fifty dollars a month, and that meant about five hundred dollars a year. They had a little apartment again and found

...ville wasn't a bad town but they
...n't feel very happy about it. They
... back to Cooperstown that winter
... and Doc went to work for Mr.
... and that was how things stood
... Doc told Spud to cut out throwing
... ball against the house.

When Spud came in and started wash-
... his hands at the kitchen sink, he
... hear Doc and Bessie in the front
... room.

"Well, look at it for yourself," he
... hear his father saying bitterly, as
... were handing something to Bessie.
... least they used to write to me about
... how I find it out in Sporting News."

There was a silence and then Bessie
... made a little cry.

"Oh, Doc..." she said piteously.
... there was another long silence and
... guessed that Doc was comforting
... and then Doc cleared his voice and
... in a harsh voice:

"What difference does it make? We
... it as well know it now as later on.
... Smith, Arkansas... I can see it
... The same main street, the same
... apartment for you and Spud. Night
... all the time now and traveling in ... busses. Getting a little older every
... and hoping to get a manager's job.
... maybe I could—but what then?
... managers get fired, too. Then I'd be like ... the other fellows. Going down to
... bush towns and finally ending up
... some coal-camp team or a semi-
... outfit or coaching an American
... on kids' team. I've been a failure,
... I know it now. Thirty-two years
... and all washed up and just starting
... all over again..."

"Don't say that, Doc," pleaded Bessie.
... We've had a pretty good life. We've ... around; we've seen things; we even
... a little money saved up..."
... "I've saved up for what?" said Doc. "If I
... into anything, we'd probably lose
... What do I know about business?
... It do I know about anything? I ... probably go on at the feed mill
... you know they don't really need me
... The old man's been swell but ... his only charity. It's all right for a
... of months but he wouldn't want
... on doing it forever..."

It was then that Spud called in from ... kitchen in a harsh, frantic voice, not ... able to stand it any longer.

"Ma!" he cried. "Am I ever going to ... anything to eat?"

There was a silence from the front
... and then Doc came out with his ... around Bessie. They knew he had ... listening and they knew why he ... yelled. Doc had the Sporting News
... his hand, folded over, and he just
... and looked at Spud, almost as if
... were pitying himself.

"You might as well know it, Spud," he
... finally. "It's here in the paper.
... don't even bother writing me any
... I've been traded to Fort
... Smith, Arkansas?" asked Spud
... erately, as if that might help in
... way.

"It doesn't matter where," said Doc,

"because I'm not going. I'm never going ... anywhere any more. I'm going to settle ... down and go to work like a man should
... do..."

He stopped then because he realized
... that Spud's mind was on something else
... and he wasn't getting it.

"Will you put that damned ball away
... like I asked you, Spud," he said gently
... but tensely. "I don't want you fooling
... around with it any more."

It was then Spud realized that he had ... taken the ball and glove off the drain
... by the sink after he washed his hands
... and had been pounding the ball into the ... glove almost viciously ever since he
... first heard Doc and Bessie in the front
... room.

He took the ball up in his hand and
... looked at it as if he hadn't seen it be... fore. Then he looked up at his father
... in bewilderment.

"But, Doc..." he began.

"Yes, I know," said his father. "You're
... just like all the rest of them. You're like
... I was. Full of dreams. You're a south-
... paw and you've heard me say that ... southpaws got along best. Well, south-
... paw or no southpaw—you haven't got a ... chance. Give me it." He held out his ... hand for the ball. "If I catch you with
... this thing again, I'll take and throw it
... so far eight men won't be able to find it."

Spud handed the ball over, but just
... when he thought everything was going ... to be all right the tears began to run
... down his face and then he started to
... blubber. Bessie turned around sud... denly and sat down in a rocking chair
... and buried her head in her arms. Doc
... stood still and turned the ball over in
... his hands and never took his eyes off
... it. It was as if he were seeing his whole
... past life in a crystal globe.

SPUD, with the tears streaming down
... his face, stood before Doc and looked ... up at him, half scared. Gradually it came ... over him with something of a shock that ... he was being a traitor to his father. In... stead of thinking about what Doc had
... said, he was thinking about his career.
... He could see himself up on the mound
... winding up and getting ready to throw.
... The grandstand would be filled; the ... bleachers would be filled. It was an ... American League ball and the stitches
... stood out, and if you let the ball come
... out over your two first fingers and gave
... a little flip of the wrist just as it left your
... hand, you could get a real hook on it.
... He had heaved a couple like that up ... against the house and the ball had
... bounced off at an angle, showing that he ... had stuff on it. He would get his speed
... as he grew older. Doc had said that ... himself.

Through his tears Spud now became ... aware that Doc had stopped looking at
... the ball and now was looking at him.
... His look was sad and despairing and ... very affectionate.

"I guess I'm just wasting my words on
... you," said Doc finally. And then Spud
... knew that Doc wouldn't throw the ball
... so far that eight men wouldn't be able ... to find it. He knew he wouldn't throw
... it away at all.

Guarantee

"OH LOOK!"

NEW CAR FINANCING
Not more than $6.00
A YEAR PER HUNDRED DOLLARS
BASED ON ORIGINAL UNPAID BALANCE PLUS INSURANCE

OUR GUARANTEE
When your new car is financed anywhere in the United States through any office offering Commercial Credit service, you will pay no more than you should and get everything that you pay for.

YES... look at the wording of the guarantee you get if you finance your new car on the Commercial Credit Plan.

Deduct your down payment from the delivered price of the car, plus insurance. Our charge for financing the unpaid balance will not be more than $6 a hundred, per year.
And you will get the exact insurance coverage you pay for.

Our desire is to help every buyer pay for his car... to shun wage assignments and deficiency judgments. We gladly meet the buyer half-way
in adjustment, if sickness, financial reverses or other personal misfortune justify a revision of terms.

Look now at the table of payments and see how easy it will be for you to arrange, through your dealer, for payments that will fit your budget.

This table shows application of guaranteed new car or truck rate to various amounts, both as to finance charge and amount of monthly payments. Larger or smaller amounts, shorter or longer terms, take proportionate rates.

AMOUNT* TO BE FINANCED	FOR 12 MOS.		FOR 18 MOS.
	Finance Charge	Monthly Payment	Finance Charge	Monthly Payment
$300	$18.00	$26.50	$27.00	$18.16
350	21.00	30.91	31.50	21.19
400	24.00	35.33	36.00	24.22
450	27.00	39.75	40.50	27.25
500	30.00	44.16	45.00	30.27
550	33.00	48.58	49.50	33.30
600	36.00	53.00	54.00	36.33

* NOTE: You take the cash delivered price of car plus insurance cost and documentary fee or tax, if any. (Your dealer will supply these figures.) Then take off the amount of your down payment or trade-in allowance. The result is the amount to be financed.

Commercial Credit Company

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS MORE THAN $60,000,000

TUNE IN! Hear latest news by Bob Trout over Columbia Network. See your local paper for time.

To know exactly what it would cost to finance
any make of new car,

MAIL THIS COUPON!

NO SALESMAN WILL CALL

Commercial Credit Company, Baltimore, Md.
Send free copy of New Car Payment Chart for (make) _____ (model) _____

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ County _____ State _____

GILBEY'S GIN

must be Better...

it's won the whole wide world's acclaim for almost a hundred years!

The INTERNATIONAL GIN distilled by GILBEY in the United States as well as in England, Australia, and Canada

90 Proof. Distilled from 100% grain neutral spirits. National Distillers Products Corporation, New York City

DO YOU VALUE YOUR BENNY?

If you really prize your new benny and your windshield, and if you have fond hopes of not putting the former through the latter, you'll safeguard both with Grey-Rock Balanced Brake Linings. Then the most casual bit of footwork brings you to a quick, quiet, smooth stop—day or night, the whole year round. Truck and bus drivers have gone Grey-Rock in a big way. Follow their example. Stop where you see the Grey-Rock sign—as perfect a “stop sign” as you will find on the highways. Let that mechanic tell you the whole story of these long-lived linings.

Give your car an even brake with
Grey-Rock
BALANCED BRAKE LININGS

U. S. Asbestos Division of Raybestos-Manhattan, Inc., Manheim, Pa.

THIS IS THE SIGN OF A FIRST-CLASS SERVICE STATION

Living at Ease

Continued from page 17

you have set a second batch to washing, and made your ironer ready for operation. The greatest effort it will require of you is to sit in a chair and draw down easily on the operating handle, so that board and ironing surface meet to do in one swoop a job equivalent to that of fourteen hand irons. Maximum total, one day instead of two for washing and ironing.

The telephone company has spared no telephones in putting this House of Ideas in touch with the outside world. Telephones in the kitchen and master bedroom are hitched up for intrahouse calls as well as three-cornered conversations with outside connection. Besides these two permanently located telephones, there are two that move around to suit your convenience. There is an outlet in the many-purpose room, another in the living room and a third, waterproof, on the downstairs terrace. Plug in your telephone wherever you want to be. You can stay put with your sun bath, your easy chair or your dinner, and still get those important calls. The second telephone is for the children to fight over upstairs, for it's meant to be shared by both the small bedrooms. If a guest is occupying one, that settles it.

Radios are standard equipment, too. Small ones in the bedrooms. One in the playroom, with record-playing attachment. Mr. Stone has figured out a colorful and practical filing idea for your separate records—colored tabs fastened to their paper envelopes so that as you line them up book fashion on the shelf you can tell from the color which is dance music, classical, etc., and read on the tab, in alphabetical order, the rest of your information.

The playroom is also fitted out with a moving-picture machine, to be operated from the bar counter. A screen, concealed in a slot in the ceiling, rolls down on the end wall.

For your more creative moments there is a portable typewriter that you can use anywhere, for it carries its own stand with it. Open the bottom compartment of the carrying case, and you'll find folding legs to be extended to any of three different heights. The cover of this compartment, locking open to one side of your typewriter, serves as a work shelf for your papers. The cover of the typewriter case proper, swinging back on its hinges, gives you a bin for finished work.

The camera bug can carry on in the downstairs bathroom. Just push the mirror on the lavatory wall straight up on its track till it covers the window above and you have, literally, a dressing room—complete with photographic supplies on the shelves now revealed. More supplies in the cupboard underneath.

The master bath has a trick of its own—a tandem lavatory. There's a couple of marble extending the full length of the glass-block wall, with two basins sunk into it in very much the same fashion that your kitchen sink is installed. Handsome, and you've got plenty of counter space for spreading out your operating tools. Two basins, with two individual mirrors above and storage space in cabinets below, save arguments.

Plenty of Outlets

The bathrooms are all equipped with scales, to chide you about that extra dessert. Small and neat spring scales, easy to stow out of the way, keep a check on children and guests. The master bath has invested in a sensitive even to that extra quarter pound. It's a miniature of the kind your doctor has in his office, a balance type.

Maybe this is more equipment than any one house would own today. But many of the luxuries of yesterday are now standard equipment—remember the first mechanical refrigerators, the first vacuum cleaners?—that your master idea culled from the equipment of Collier's House might well be prepared for. And that means correctly planned electric wiring. Gas or coal or kerosene may be the fuel you find best and most economical to use for heating and cooking. But lights, appliances and more appliances, radio, much of your heavy equipment, television, inventions of the future, will use electricity.

It is not enough to scatter a few outlets around—though you need more than most houses provide. To get the most service out of the things you install, and to use your electricity economically, you need enough electric circuits with the right sizes of wire in each. The wire must have a large enough cross-section of copper so that it will carry the required amount of current at full power.

"The assembly line jammed at the fender division"

stead of dissipating electricity meter and outlet in the form of wasting the electricity you have and dropping down the voltage point where your appliances are operate and waste additional getting results. Many appliances operating on lighting circuits dim lights.

You need lighting circuits and appliances, and special circuits for such heavy-duty items as the range, water heater and oil. One lighting circuit to every square foot, the experts say, should be of all the light you want and current besides for such things as razors in the bathroom, hand the workshop, clocks, fans. One circuit should take adequate the kitchen and buffet or terrace table cookery may take. Another serves the laundry.

Plan for Later

ough outlets should be simple with this preparation. Double ones, where you need them, with feet maximum space between, you plenty of service and eliminating lamp cords. Also check your electrician on appliance outletting lights and three-way switches where necessary.

aces need their special wiring, with and ground connections. Telephone conduits should be built in, and all outlets present and future decided before a house is built. Just install an iron pipe in the framework as the house is going up, leading to any future outlet. It will then be an easy matter for the telephone company to draw the wires through when you are ready to extend the service.

All this wiring is simple and inexpensive at the time of building—complicated and expensive after a house is up. So plan ahead for everything you aim some day to have—and then allow a couple of extra terminals in your fuse panel just in case. This way your house will keep on working well for you, instead of showing up limitations when you've scarcely got settled.

In the next article you will have a look at the furnishing of Collier's House of Ideas. You will find it full of good ideas—space-saving ideas, ideas about construction for maximum use and minimum care, and the use of natural woods, leather and fabrics for rich, simple beauty. All these add up to modern furniture at its best.

A booklet containing more details about the materials and equipment in Collier's House of Ideas is now available. To obtain one send ten cents to Mr. E. K. Simpson, Rockefeller Center, 630 Fifth Avenue, New York City, N. Y.

Saint on the Spot

Continued from page 13

helled, gassed and bombed to this Gandhi-ji has stolen a and, by practicing Christian principles almost entirely avoided blood—seven millions of people new hope, unity, new ideals, forced a great to surrender much of its power started India on her way to independence. How?

The Golden Rule. Turn the cheek. Love thine enemy. Do them that hate you. The meek inherit the earth. . . . Millions say these things. One brown Hindu, takes them seriously and tries them. And look at the result. Gandhi-ji's hut are others. They are about on no plan whatever. One is the Mahatma's wife; others for children and grandchildren. About years ago Gandhi set about finding a place in which conditions were particularly bad—no easy matter in a land of poverty, disease and debt. In the Central Provinces not far from Bhopal, he found it. Then, near by, he found a lone mud hut made his residence there. You could throw fifteen people into it. At the end there is a mat shed, for sleeping. There is almost no furniture—a stool for those visitors who can't squat on the floor.

Gandhi lived alone here in this hut but he felt he needed solitude to do his heavy thinking and meditation every when you are in the liberty, independence business and against a tough customer like the British Empire.

solitude, however, didn't last long. First, there was Gandhi's notion that he was some punkins as an amateur. He never did believe in medicine, or even hospitals, but he had some simple remedies of his own. People came around with malaria, cholera and worse things and in the end being cured. So he did what he could. Even today he calls his place The Home for Invalids.

Then, all sorts of people began to break in on him. He ran the spinning wheel and listened to British members of parliament and American journalists and big shots from the government at Delhi and just plain American tourists. He still manages to keep Monday as a day of silence and then you can't get a word out of him. But other days he works, talks, and prescribes cures for anywhere up to eighteen hours at a stretch.

He Can't Back Down

He gets all sorts of gifts, too. People used to send him safety pins, which he accepted in great good humor but never used. People contributed money for the cause. People sent goats, hearing he drank their milk; they sent packaged dates from California. They even sent him shirts and western clothes. He gave everything away—and still does, thanking the givers. Their hearts, he says, are all right—even the hearts of the humorists in New York and Ottumwa, Iowa, who sent the safety pins.

For all his power—the terrible force generated by 350,000,000 people all thrusting the same way—Gandhi today is on the spot. The irresistible force of his millions seems about to collide with the immovable object of British determination to keep control of the Indian Empire. For Gandhi, it is a matter of principle; for the English it is a vital question of prestige—and profits.

Gandhi has gone so far now in his demands for complete freedom that he cannot turn back. He dare not compromise. The hopes of too many people have been awakened; too many other leaders are ready to step in and lead the battle. Win or lose, the little brown saint has to go through with it. And he sees, very clearly, that in the present temper

HOME MOVIE HINTS BY HOLLYWOOD'S ACE CAMERAMEN

"For fine movies—
you need a fine camera. I use a Filmo!"

says

Robert Greer
Head of the Camera and Still Depts.
WARNER BROS. STUDIOS
Burbank, California

"THE FIRST 'LAW' of making fine movies is—use a fine camera. That's why my personal movie camera is the palm-size Filmo made by Bell & Howell, who make our professional movie equipment. That little Filmo 8 is a 'jewel.' It makes good home movies so easy to get. Naturally, experience will increase your skill—but you don't have to be an expert to get good movies with a Filmo 8 right from the start.

"JUST PRESS THE BUTTON—what you see, you get, in color or black-and-white, indoors or out, and in slow motion, too. Filmo 8 is a real movie camera. It gives you extra speeds, provision for using special lenses and accessories—everything you want and need, now or later. Then—when your skill increases, you won't have outgrown your camera." The palm-size Filmo costs only $49.50—and may be purchased for as little as $10 down. Its movies cost no more than still snapshots.

YOU'LL BE PROUD of your movies that are taken with a Filmo and shown with a Filmo Projector. The Filmo 8 Projector shown here provides 400- or 500-watt illumination. Result—clear, brilliant, steady pictures—as wide as six feet. Fully gear driven, no belts to slip or wear.

Price, complete with case—$118. Filmo 16 mm. Cameras and Projectors to $1275.

MAIL COUPON!

BELL & HOWELL COMPANY
1802 Larchmont Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Send me all the details about Filmo
Cameras that make movies at snapshot cost.

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State..... C 7-40

PRECISION-MADE BY

BELL & HOWELL

WHEN YOUR STOMACH IS UPSET

You get a lot of free advice when your stomach is upset...and only some of it is good. Remember this:—

Stomach distress from overfullness should not be aggravated by drastic, irritating physics or purgatives.

Take soothing Pepto-Bismol instead. It has no laxative action and is not an antacid. Pepto-Bismol helps to quiet the upset, to soothe the irritated intestinal walls, to retard intestinal fermentation, gas formation and to relieve simple diarrhea. This soothing prescription is pleasant—you'll like the taste.

50 cents at your drug-gist's. Or by the dose at drug store fountains.

Norwich

Makers of "Unguentine"

PEPTO-BISMOL

FOR UPSET STOMACH

* REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

of the British there must be violence and bloodshed. He hates those things; for half a century he has been winning battles by precisely opposite methods.

The Mahatma's demand is that India be turned over to him as is. His ultimatum to his followers is that he will stand for no interference in his plans. If they don't like his methods, let them get another leader. If they continue to accept his leadership, let them discipline themselves, organize and have patience. All in good time he will say what is to be done.

This was the situation as this was written.

What will happen later this summer and fall is anyone's guess, but it is a fairly safe prediction that it will be a bigger and more intense campaign of civil disobedience and nonresistance than ever before in the history of the independence movement.

Gandhi's theories have been explained scores of times in millions of words. Boiled down, they are first this—it takes two to make a quarrel and if you refuse to fight, your enemy loses his moral advantage and finally the battle. The Chinese put it another way: When two people are quarreling the first one to stop using his head and start using his fist is the loser.

The average hard-boiled white man says you can't win battles that way, but Gandhi has proved that you can in India. In a score of years he has won considerable local self-government for his people, together with a promise of a great deal more after this war is over. He could have virtual freedom for India, subject only to British control of foreign policy. But he wants all, or nothing.

Okay, say the English, then you'll get nothing. If you think we are going to abandon our investment here, leave India defenseless and watch Japan step in, you have another guess coming.

To add to the complication of the thing, the Mahatma is more insistent on using the right methods to gain freedom, than he is on freedom itself. His philosophy is: Of what use is liberty if in getting it a man wrecks his own soul by using violence and thus sinning against God? If any sinning is to be done, let the English do it.

Impractical but Respected

Such heretical notions exasperate the British. To a man, they respect the Mahatma. You may travel the length and breadth of the place without hearing him cursed out. The worst they say of him is that he is impractical, or a mystic, or growing senile, or living in a world of dreams. Of course he is a mystic, and left alone he could no more organize and operate a government than a spark plug could build and run a motor.

This is why no picture of Gandhi has much meaning unless it is sketched in against a background of the men around him—the men who will take over the government when—and if—the revolt succeeds. The most mentioned name, of course, is that of Jawaharlal Nehru, so we'll go talk to him first.

The general supposition is that Nehru will wear Gandhi's mantle when the saint passes on and becomes one of the many Indian gods. That may be, and it may not, depending on many things.

Nehru is a Cambridge graduate and picked up most of his liberal notions at that university. He disagrees with Gandhi on most things—in fact, a curious angle of the whole rebel movement is that hardly one of the leaders agrees with the Mahatma, either on methods or the sort of government India ought to have. The only thing on which they're united is liberty.

Pandit Nehru is a tall, good-looking chap, is convinced that the old passive-resistance method will not win independence. For this reason, the British have him down in their books as more dangerous than the old man. Nehru is an aristocrat at heart, scion of an old Kashmiri family; he wears native dress on principle and would much rather use a lounge suit. He majored in geology, chemistry and botany; often dreams he is flying high above the world, and says that for years he has been haunted by the dying eyes of a deer he once shot in the hills.

At one time, Nehru was completely bemused by the Communist ideas and believed all the lovely phrases of Lenin and Trotsky and Marx. But of late he has come to realize the difference between red words and red realities. He is still a socialist and says the Indian change must be a complete political and economic break, made all at once.

"You can't," he quotes, "leap an abyss in two jumps."

Linked with Nehru usually is Subhas C. Bose, a stout, fond-of-good-living direct-actionist. Bose is sometimes called a fascist and is vaguely for a sort of corporative state. He goes about shouting "No compromise!" It is quite likely that, if he can't run the whole show himself, Bose will join hands with Nehru, get hold of the Indian youth movement—which is faintly pink—and lead it still farther leftward.

Then there is Mohammed Ali Jinnah. A few months ago Mr. Jinnah had not been heard of much, except as "The Apostle of Hindu-Moslem Unity." Last spring, however, he turned up at the head of the Moslem League, with a few thousand members, and invented a plan for splitting India into two republics, one Hindu and the other composed of a couple of Moslem states. This was duck soup for the British and Mr. Jinnah began to go places right away. He got so much attention from the enchanted English—who still knew that to divide was to rule—that he was astounded.

"I was wonderstruck," he said, "I was received by the Viceroy as the equal of Mr. Gandhi." So impressed was Mr. Jinnah that he added he rather be ruled by the English than the Hindus. This got him a great deal in all the British-Indian newspapers; didn't seem to disturb old Mahatma. Azad, the Moslem head of Gandhi's India Congress party, which is the independence organization, or the movement of Moslems who are just as anxious for unity and liberty as the Hindus whom they work.

What Do the Rebels Want?

Jinnah is a Bombay lawyer, lives in luxury on fashionable Malabar Road, dresses in western clothes with excellent taste and is quite honest. As long as he plays the British game, he will be kept up mainly for his nuisance value. It is proof that "the Indians don't know what they want and can't get together on a program."

Most practical and down-to-earth man is Gandhi's chief of staff, V. K. Patel. He is a Gujarati lawyer and lives on the Marine Drive overlooking Bombay's Back Bay. Like most rebel leaders, he gave up a good practice to help the Mahatma. Today, while Gandhi does the heavy thinking, Patel does the organizing. He is slated, according to political gossip, to be either prime minister or perhaps first president of the Indian Republic.

What the rebels now want, he told me, is a sort of constitutional convention. This convention, elected by popular vote, would draft a constitution, probably very much along the line of the American history and their writings full of rewrites of Tom Paine and Jefferson and Lincoln.

"We can and will work out a fair way to take care of minorities, including Moslems," he said. "We will ask the rajahs and princes to come in with

"I had to slap him a couple of times, but outside of that, he bored me."

GREGORY D'ALMEIDA

won't, they must stay outside and absorbed. They and their feudal lords will be out of place in the States of India. We think our problems are no more serious than yours in 1776, and we are hoping for—getting—a great deal of American sympathy."

From these leaders you can go as far as you like, ending up with ministers like N. M. Roy and the Mahajan who says that he and followers are "tired of the mysticism of the Mahatma and his fellow Franks," he said, "I do not believe in the transformation of society into a nonviolent one. It is only on the Marxian line that Indian society is rebuilt. . . . There is no time to wait and we should take the plunge into action."

Swami and his crusaders, perhaps, don't cut much ice right now. Gandhi dies and his millions become impatient of inaction, men like him might easily rise to the top. Obsolete direct-actionists have taken over where when the mystics and theologians prepared the way.

Whether Gandhi is really senile or just going out, as his enemies say, is really immaterial. The man's work is done. Twenty years he has taken 350,000,000-account people, submerged in a sea of unpayable debt, almost totally illiterate, half-fed, hopeless and condemned to endless serfdom by the caste system, and given them dignity, courage, new ideals—and hope. He has, in a few years, created the machine. It seems a fair conclusion that, even if he were twenty years younger, the Mahatma couldn't operate this machine. But, for instance, against machine production, though he uses a railway, automobiles, his own newspaper and a loud-speaker—all mass-production devices—he is in his work. He says the key movement is a revival of village life—meaning that peasants in the hamlets would use their better crops time in spinning and weaving on cloth—and thus, incidentally, the British-financed mills that only pay hundreds of millions of dollars in profits to English investors indirectly, to British economy. The British record in India is pretty much a record of the future will be no better.

Time for Material Problems

The Mahatma is on record against trade. Exporting and importing, he argues, leads to rivalries; these lead to violent wars. India must abstain, not merely from violence but from anything that might lead to it. Just how India would exist without trade is one of those crass, real problems with which Gandhi-jis must cope.

On record, too, against education; against modern medicine, which is "magic"; against hospitals; against farming methods.

You analyze Gandhi's philosophy and will probably admit he is fundamentally right. If you add up his ideas, they produce only magical nonsense.

He said, Gandhi's great contribution was taking one-sixth of the world's population and giving it a chance. This is cracking the caste system that damned these millions forever to live in a debased, animal-like manner in which they were born. The British never thought about the system, except to make its more horrible abuses.

Gandhi thought of his Untouchables as "Servants of God." He told them they had a right to rise to any position they wished. He made some of them legislators; fought for laws giving them rights in temples, in courts. And he finally cracked the system. It still exists, in terrible strength, but it is no longer a solid structure.

The Mahatma himself set the example, going about with Englishmen, shaking hands with them, eating with them—treating them as equals. To an orthodox Hindu, the Englishman himself is an Untouchable.

The last visitors come and the evening meal arrives. It is simple—the few dates, a little rice, goats' milk. Afterward, the Mahatma takes a walk, with half a dozen of his grandchildren and other kids. In the evening, there are simple prayers and then Gandhi-jis curls up and is asleep at once.

As you jolt, sweating, back to Nagpur through the hot, dusty Indian night, past the sleeping villages, you try to figure out this little brown man—and the implications of what he has done, is doing—and maybe is going to accomplish.

An Empire Slowly Gives Way

You might dope it out this way: Less than two thousand years ago a new set of ideas came into the world—the familiar Golden Rule—Love thine Enemy—Turn the Other Cheek philosophy we mentioned earlier. Ever since then millions of people, mostly white, have been reading and saying these phrases, but not putting them into practice. Instead these people have been almost continuously at war, slaughtering one another, destroying hard-earned wealth, stealing from one another. And in the end they have all lost.

Then along comes a little brown man who doesn't amount to a hill of beans and says: "Let us take these Christian ideas and put them to work and see what happens." So he takes an objective—independence for 350,000,000 people—and tries to achieve it by applying the rules laid down by a poor carpenter's son.

Surprisingly, the thing works. Without a gun, without a bomb or a pint of poison gas, a great empire, built by violence, slowly gives way. The 350,000,000 gain some freedom, and then some more. Within a few years, half of them are ruling themselves to a great extent. Some of them have been shot down, hundreds have gone to prison, thousands have been clubbed and terrorized. But always they have turned the other cheek; loved their enemies; never resisted violently.

What is going on in Europe is old—violence versus violence—and the result will prove very little. But what is going on in India this summer is new—violence against nonviolence—and the result may prove a great deal. Of course, Gandhi and his millions may lose; it may be that their system—taken, remember, from the writing of their opponents' prophets—will fail in the end.

But suppose Gandhi wins? Suppose, when the trouble is over and the world knows the truth, it turns out that putting Christianity to work has overcome the world's greatest empire and all the empire's machinery of death and disaster.

Well—all the brains in the world aren't behind the little brown man's specs. And millions of people are already convinced that war and violence don't settle anything permanently. If Gandhi's methods win in India, somebody in some other country is going to try them—and if they work in one place, why not in another? Why not all over?

Maybe the big news of today isn't being made in London or Berlin, after all. Maybe it's being made in a mud hut out on the hot, windy Indian plains.

You can't tell.

A sensational offer from KOOLS!

THIS HANDSOME

CIGARETTE CASE

—WRITE YOUR OWN SIGNATURE ON IT!

(CASE RETAILS IN LEADING SHOPS $1.95 AND UP)

YOUR CHOICE OF GOLD, SILVER OR WHITE ENAMEL

Write your own name . . . special ink makes it permanent.

Press the back with your fingers and it snaps open.

Holds sixteen cigarettes. No crowding or crushing.

$1.95 VALUE FOR 50¢

(and two KOOL package fronts)

We want you to try KOOLS and discover for yourself how refreshing they are, how much easier on your throat. That's why we make this unusual bargain offer. It's yours for only 50¢ and two KOOL package fronts (do not send B & W coupons).

MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY

(OFFER GOOD LIMITED TIME ONLY)

Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. (Dept. C)
P. O. Box 1259, Louisville, Ky.

Please send me an "Autograph" cigarette case, color checked below. Also send special "everlasting" ink and instructions for use. I enclose two KOOL package fronts and 50¢. (Send stamps, coin or money order).

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

CHECK COLOR YOU WANT: ☐ GOLD ENAMEL ☐ SILVER ENAMEL ☐ WHITE ENAMEL

This offer good in U. S. A. only

CUTS GAS BILLS...

WAKES UP HALF-DEAD ENGINES

CUTS OIL BILLS...

Triple Action

PERFECT CIRCLE'S NEW OIL SAVING PISTON RING!

Does your car waste oil—use too much gasoline? Is it sluggish and lazy? Then, have Perfect Circle TRIPLE ACTION Piston Rings installed.

These new and different piston rings improve engines three ways instead of one. Not only do they have far more ability to stop oil pumping, even in badly worn engines—but they also give better gas mileage—and improve performance.

Any good mechanic can install a set of the new TRIPLE ACTION Piston Rings in a few hours. You'll be surprised at the low cost.

Smoke MEANS Rings

USED-CAR BUYERS!

Smoke from the exhaust means worn rings and big oil bills. Be sure the used car you buy has been reconditioned with Perfect Circle Piston Rings.

The Perfect Circle Companies Hagerstown, Ind. and Toronto, Ont., Can.

Perfect Circle

Triple Action PISTON RINGS

These Our Rulers

Continued from page 19

by the federal government. It is still due, by the way. And this is a perfect example of the illusion that debts like these are actually paid.

Out of a mess of facts like this grows the legend of Kelly's financial wizardry—this and a little well-managed publicity. When I went to Chicago I was shown a handsome pamphlet entitled "Out of the Red and Into the Black." It was issued by the Citizens Committee on Public Information, composed of leading businessmen. A great State Street merchant was its chairman.

"Chicago today," it reported, "has the best city government in its history." It said that the police department was the best in the nation and the health department a model for the country. It told how the city was living within its income and generally showered upon the Kelly machine a hogshead, not of white-wash, but of eau de cologne. The City Council lauded the committee for its industry in preparing this report and modestly thanked it. It puzzled me—for it purported to be a report of a bipartisan committee of 100 businessmen. I had seen the report of the Civic Federation about the same time saying the city's corporate fund was drifting toward bankruptcy. But the puzzle was soon solved. There was no committee of one hundred. It was a committee of thirty. And twenty-three of them when interviewed by the newspapers said they knew nothing about the report. The Kelly-Nash fifth column in the committee had pulled a fast one.

The city is taxed to exhaustion. The debts are crushing. The relief problem is desperate. But also the city has garbage. Chicago dumps most of its garbage here and there. Out on West 19th and Lincoln is an old, abandoned quarry five acres in surface and several hundred feet deep. As a piece of property it was just a hole in the ground that a wise government would compel the owners to fill up or abandon. But not in the Kingdom of Cook County, the beautiful land of those good fairies, Moe Rosenberg, Bob Sweitzer, Ed Kelly and Pat Nash. The city made a contract with the owners to dump garbage into that hole. In six years, from 1932 to 1938, the city paid $3,476,000 for the privilege of dumping garbage into it.

A Reeking Contract

Every load of garbage added to the value of the hole, for the hole was gradually being made into a piece of real estate. In 1938 alone the cost of dumping garbage in it was $704,740. This old hole is now almost full. Another year of dumping and it will be a nice level piece of property. The owners will have it, plus the bagful of money they collected.

Why did not the city condemn this hole? The city had instituted proceedings to condemn it and pay $650,000 for it—three times its assessed value. But even at that price it would have been cheap compared with the price it paid to dump there. The proceedings were dismissed. And the city made a contract to dump there with the Industrial Refuse Disposal Company. The head of that is Mr. Paul V. Colianni. And Mr. Colianni was then and is now a Democratic member of the board of trustees of Kelly's old Sanitary District.

This is the machine method of dealing with garbage.

The machine method of dealing with taxes is equally interesting. The taxpayer who can pay his taxes and won't pay them, to be sure, must be made to pay them. The Kelly-Nash plan embodied in a law called the Skard. Under it, if the owner of a building, apartment house or office building has any building defaults in his tax, the city authorities can go to court and have the building put in the hands of a receiver, selected by the city treasurer. The receiver must get a fee. He must have a lawyer who gets a fee. And there swarms over the building Nash lawyers, real-estate men, appraisers, coal dealers, contractors of a sort and janitors.

Disfranchising the Drift

This is the most expensive way in the mind of man can invent to get tax out of a property owner who is already in financial difficulties and having to pay the taxes without all the fixes. And as there are thousands and thousands of buildings in default, this has made a splendid holiday for the favored firms and lawyers whose political philosophy is sound. The big political law firm of McInerney, Arvey and Epstein (Arvey, boss of the 24th Ward) has been scalp-deep in the Skard law.

We now come to the latest—another tragic—chapter in the history of this grim political machine. On March 19 of this year a man in his middle years entered St. John's Hospital in the field, Illinois, for treatment. He was entered as Mr. Williams. He was a man quivering with a tangle of nerves, pursued by some dread fear. The next day his nurse, after a short absence from the room, found his bed empty and the bathroom door locked. When she finally forced the door, the patient was found in the tub which was half-filled with water. He was dead. At that time it became known that Mr. Williams was F. Lynden Smith, state director of public works, until recently closest adviser of Governor Henry Horner and custodian of the war chest of the state oration.

The state was in the midst of the election and county primaries. Republican candidates were showering the state with city machines with obloquy.

The Kelly-Nash machine was preparing for the coming of the Democratic convention. It was trying to put its foot forward. But the air was rapidly with ugly rumors about slush funds and a quarrel between Smith and various state leaders over their possession. Smith had been talking about a "little black book" which was filled with dangerous secrets. In the midst of that he was found dead and mysteriously dead. The newspapers and political whisperers began to ask: did he kill himself, did he die of a disease or was he murdered?

Behind this most embarrassing episode is a long trail of intrigue, charges, scandals. It introduced several new characters into this story. First of these is Henry Horner, former governor of Illinois. Horner, former judge, wealthy, cultured, and respected, is one of those who makes admirable window-dress for political machines. Tony Cermak picked him for governor in 1930. He made a liberal state executive quickly commanded the respect of the better elements of the Democratic party. He clashed—inevitably—very quickly with the County ringster, Mayor Cermak. When Cermak was appointed mayor, he was quite as quickly with Kelly.

Horner, determined to make control in Illinois after repeal a institution, told Kelly to keep heads off the liquor business. Kelly was of his own about the liquor business of Chicago. Next Kelly tried to legalize bookie gambling in Chicago. He pushed the bill through the legislature and Horner vetoed it.

Horner's turn for re-election around, Kelly and Nash marked slaughter. They named a doctor, N. Bundesen, health officer of Chicago, to beat Horner. But Horner beat them. He roused the state against Cook County machine and swamped the primaries.

There was a good deal of a black eye for Kelly and his side-kick, old P. A. Kelly, who talked about retiring, but then better of it. And then came another battle in 1938, which introduces more Chicago characters. One of them is Judge Edmund Jarecki. He has been county judge for sixteen years. He had offended the organization many times. He had taken a vigorous for honest election and registration laws. It was base ingratitude. After all, the machine needs votes. It must have the votes of the pay-rollers, the bookie and contractor votes. But this apparently is not enough. There have to be created. So in 1935, the 1936 primaries approached, Jarecki, along with others, urged permanent registration law to prevent rigging the voting lists.

ERIC ERICSON

Pat Nash this seemed a monstrous thing. It meant disfranchising the ignored dead and that forgotten drifting hobo. Nash blocked the bill in the legislature. When he got to him he said in an unguarded moment that this measure would cost the Democrats a quarter of a million votes.

Chief Justice of Illinois Floyd B. Anderson, Democrat, said he resented the statement. If it meant anything, Thompson, it meant that the Democratic party intended to steal 250,000 votes. But despite Nash the law was passed. And so when the leaders met in the house atop a Loop hotel to make the county ticket they just dropped the law, despite his good record and excellent reputation—and assigned no reason for the ballot box a major issue in the campaign. Which is reason for a slight pause to have a swift look at that symbol of our liberties—the ballot box in Chicago.

Stuffing the ballot box and padding the registration lists is one of the oldest and most honored skills of city-machine politics. It begins with the fraudulent registration. Mayor Kelly had started a "Keep Chicago Ahead" campaign to attract people to Chicago. His critics said he had succeeded signally, for his party machine, before election, had filled not only the vacant buildings but the vacant lots—with registered voters.

The registration, said one reporter, "has made railroad yards, garbage dumps and stone quarries teeming centers of population. The mayor has not only kept Chicago ahead, he has kept it ahead of the census taker."

The good old Twenty-fourth Ward of the late Moe Rosenberg holds a high place on the "Roll of Honor" in this field of endeavor for humanity. Moe is dead now, but his protégé and successor, Jake Arvey, Number Three man among the bosses, carries on. Mr. Arvey offers prizes for the precinct captains who roll up the biggest majorities. In that 1938 election that coveted honor went to Dr. Samuel Epstein. The doctor won a fine diamond-studded watch. The gold and the diamonds retain their luster, but the winning majority was later a little tarnished. Some one hundred ballots in this banner precinct bore evidences of having been tampered with. A handwriting expert found that a hundred ballots had been marked in the same handwriting.

Holding Three Jobs at Once

Another Jake Arvey lieutenant turned in a glorious result. He got two awards—one from the Kelly-Nash machine, a job as investigator of the sales-tax office; and one from a petty jury which gave him a year in the penitentiary for padding the election returns. In another Twenty-fourth Ward precinct when Dwight Green ran for governor in 1936 he got 42 votes in the Republican primary, but in the hotly contested general election he got only fifteen.

A grand old ward, the Twenty-fourth! A jury later completed its investigations of only nine of the sixty-two precincts in this ward and indicted forty-six election officials, twenty-six of whom were convicted.

It would be very unfair to the other ward committeemen to infer that Jake Arvey's ward is the only one which can boast of such fine performances. There's Mr. Touhy's splendid old Twenty-seventh on the river. In one election Mr. Touhy was credited with 296 votes in one precinct. In a recount there were only 276. The candidate for probate clerk was given 358 votes. But when recounted there were only 278—eighty votes had vanished.

The honors, however, went to a municipal court judge candidate. The election officials gave him 214. The recount officials could find only 31 in the ballot box. This, it must be conceded, is work of the highest order.

What is more, it calls for a high order of daring. There is such a thing as getting caught. And here the machine, with a fine sense of loyalty to its workers, does everything possible to protect them from that snarling minority of impracticable busybodies who are always objecting to ballot-box stuffing.

A fine sample of this is found in the case of Mr. Samuel Orlando and Mr. Joseph Vinci, precinct captain and aide in the Eleventh Ward. They were charged with doing everything to the ballot box in an election save throw it in the river. They were tried and triumphantly acquitted. But very soon it appeared that six of the jurors had been fixed. The job, according to the prosecuting attorney, was engineered by the court's bailiff. Two weeks after the verdict he was promoted to acting superintendent of

for the New Super-Coach!

Enjoy Perfected Air-Conditioning As You Travel

This Amazing America by Greyhound

● Every-day's a cool day to travel aboard one of these new air-conditioned Super-Coaches! Cruise the continent where you will—a fresh, invigorating climate travels with you. No wonder so many million Americans are choosing the Greyhound way to see the wonders of their native land. No other travel system can take you to so many summer playgrounds—parks packed with Western grandeur, exciting Eastern cities, resorts by the sea or high on the skyline, both World Fairs, Northern lakes where the fish are always biting.

Dozens of innovations in Greyhound's new luxury liners are adding new comfort to travel—but you'll still enjoy that same old saving at Greyhound's lower fares.

Yellowstone—best known of America's National Parks.

See both World Fairs on Greyhound Grand Circle Tour for only... $69.95

Mail coupon to nearest address below—

New York City . . . 245 West 50th St.
San Francisco, Cal., . . . Pine & Battery Sts.
Cleveland, O. . . . East 9th & Superior
Philadelphia, Pa. . . . Broad St. Station
Chicago, Ill. . . . 12th & Wabash
Boston, Mass. . . . 60 Park Square
Minneapolis, Minn. . . . 509 Sixth Ave., N.
Ft. Worth, Tex. . . . 905 Commerce St.
Detroit, Mich., Wash. Blvd. at Gr. River
Washington, D. C. . . .
New York, N. Y. . . . 1110 New York Ave., N. W.
St. Louis, Mo., Broadway & Delmar Blvd.
Cincinnati, Ohio . . . 630 Walnut St.
Richmond, Va. . . . 412 E. Broad St.
Charleston, W. Va. . . . 155 Summers St.
Memphis, Tenn. . . . 527 N. Main St.
New Orleans, La., 400 N. Rampart St.
Lexington, Ky. . . . 801 N. Limestone
Windsor, Ont. . . . 44 London St., East
Montreal, Canada . . . Provincial Transport Company, 1188 Dorchester St., W.

—for pictorial booklets, full facts on summer trips

Mail this coupon to nearest Greyhound information office, listed above, to get an attractive pictorial booklet all about: NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR ☐ SAN FRANCISCO'S GOLDEN GATE EXPOSITION ☐ NEW ENGLAND VACATIONS ☐ MICHIGAN VACATIONS ☐ CALIFORNIA AND THE WEST ☐ COOL NORTH-WEST ☐ GREAT SMOKIES AND SOUTHERN BEACHES ☐.

Please check only the one you desire—or write for rates and information on any special trip.

Name _____

Address _____ COL 7

EVERY loyal American wants to see his country prepared to meet any emergency—and a strong nation needs strong railroads.

The very size of the United States and the need for mass movement of men and supplies over long distances make railroads the foundation of national defense, as well as of our normal transportation system. Other forms of transport which ordinarily haul about one-third of our commerce supplement the railroads, but cannot take their place.

So it's sensible to ask, how is the nation's No. 1 transportation set for doing its job?

And a compact answer to that question is:

In speed and operating efficiency the American railroads today are at the highest peak in their history.

That's a strong statement. Here are the facts—

The average speed of freight trains today is 62 per cent higher than in 1920, at the close of the first World War period. Today, each freight train actually performs more than twice as much transportation service as twenty years ago.

Operating efficiency was tested and proved between August and October 1939, when the railroads handled the biggest increase in traffic ever recorded in so short a stretch of time — and handled it with such smoothness and skill that in the busiest week there was a daily average of 64,299 surplus freight cars in good order and ready for duty.

All this didn't just happen. Despite lean years railroads have recognized and met their obligation to keep fit. Heavier rails have been laid, better equipment has been developed, new terminal facilities have been installed, literally billions of dollars have been put into better and more efficient plant and equipment.

In the operating end, new methods have been developed for having cars available for loading whenever and wherever freight is ready to move — and for sorting and speeding freight cars through classification yards at a rate as high as 1 car in every 12 seconds.

And as an example of how the railroad is equipping themselves to handle increased traffic, consider this fact: In the first six months of 1940, they placed in service more freight cars than in any like period in the ten years.

All of which shows that railroad men know their business — and are awake to their responsibilities.

As an essential arm of national defense, railroads should be strengthened and supported by sound and impartial public transportation policies.

TRAVEL AMERICA—by Rail
See your ticket agent about Grand Circle

the garbage collection divi-$100, twice his bailiff's salary.
jurors—a lady—admitted
She allowed that in another $50 to acquit three men on bookie case. All of these per-been indicted. These be our judges.

up the thread of this yarn—
ed with the mysterious death n Smith in a bathtub—it was right upon fraudulent ballot-box Judge Edmund Jarecki was ticket. The Kelly-Nash ma-hin, two years before, had at-drive Henry Horner from the rip now set out to punish an uge. And once again this pred bitter primary battle. There atorial vacancy and Scott Luenator from Illinois—ran for against the Kelly-Nash can-Mte Igoo.

the figure in this battle was Tom y the state's attorney who had into office by the machine.
y was no lily-white reformer.
ed held three city jobs at the
—one of them a law job in Sanitary District. But he had th Kelly. He began raiding an attempt to enforce the ng laws. He denounced the ers in ringing terms. And ation of Horner and Court-revolt of decent Democrats, to Kelly-Nash machine under primary. Jarecki was re-elected a Scott Lucas senator.

following year Courtney chal-Kelly in the city primaries for at this time he fought alone.
r, it was out of the battle. Court-and Kelly with being in partth the bookies. But Kelly ma signal beating at the polls.

Haberdashery and Politics

ly, with this prelude, we can the dead director of public the bathtub of St. John's Hos-Springfield. And here we shall seems to me—if I may inter-union—one of the most tragic this whole unhappy story.
battles of Horner against cost money—plenty of money.
with the raising of that money concerned. The night of the ecky victory over the Kelly-Horner was taken ill—an ill-which he has never recovered.
as to say about this episode know. How much of it he ible for we do not know.

That question must remain to be settled.

But Horner—or certainly his lieutenants—began to play with a dangerous weapon. These violent struggles with the Kelly-Nash machine have cost immense sums of money. The machine can raise funds. It forces pay-rollers to contribute. It levies on contractors, suppliers of materials, favored bankers,
everybody who benefits by the machine.

Political reformers have long regarded this as one of the most vicious practices of machine politics. It is the thing that keeps it alive. To end this abuse 'civil-service laws have been passed to prevent turning the city pay roll into an army of mercenaries of the bosses. Corrupt-practice laws have been adopted and enforced in some states. The Horner regime was supposed to be a reform regime. Yet, putting victory above reform, it began to model itself on the Kelly-Nash pattern.

This, indeed, has been one of the sad developments of the last eight years.
City and state machines, posing as reform regimes, have come out openly with two per cent clubs and—in Pennsylvania—five per cent clubs, which levied contributions upon the state and city employees to support the political machines that marched under the banners of reform.

F. Lynden Smith, in the lumber business in Pontiac, Illinois, played with politics. He helped manage some of the Horner fights. He succeeded so well he was made director of public works.
That department spends $40,000,000 a year on state contracts. Very soon an organization appeared—the Iroquois-Illinois League. Smith was its head. Its object was to collect two per cent of the salaries of state employees. It was extended to extract a dime a ton from all coal men who sold the state and a settled percentage from contractors. It was a slush fund to finance the Horner battles against Kelly and Nash—and the G.O.P.

At one time there was supposed to have been as much as $750,000 in cash in this fund in Smith's hands. Smith was supposed to have squeezed $33,000 from the coal men and $250,000 from the contractors in 1938—in addition to the hundreds of thousands from the payrollers.

Into these affairs there rose the head of one of the prize exhibits of Illinois politics. Sam L. Nudelman mixed small-town haberdashery and small-town politics in Belleville, Illinois. He owned a small gent's-furnishing store.
In 1932 he faced bankruptcy, made a settlement with his creditors and marched on Springfield, where he got a job as a $125-a-month clerk in the State Finance Department. Today he is the head of that department and, some say in Illinois, is the virtual governor of the state.

When Horner became ill he set up a regency—a bedside cabinet—in which Nudelman, Smith, and U. S. Senator Slattery were powerful. Horner gradually drifted out of affairs though he remained governor. He became a kind of mystical figure behind whose name the regents ran the state.

Democratic leaders who were left out like Lieutenant Governor Stelle and Benjamin Adamowski, Democratic leader in the Senate, became angered.
A serious split developed in the party.
Then a split occurred between the regents over the slush fund. It became a row between F. Lynden Smith and Sam Nudelman. Nudelman was after Smith's scalp. Smith began to lose face with the hidden governor. Nudelman seemed to have Horner's ear. Smith began talking about his "little black book"
—the book of ten thousand secrets—which would blow the lid off. Federal Internal Revenue officers were rooting around Chicago and Springfield. Smith went to the governor for a showdown.
As a result he was fired. Nudelman took over the Illinoisans, the organization that succeeded the Iroquois-Illinois League.

Lawsuits developed over this slush fund. Smith became ill. His nerves were shattered. He went to Florida to rest. Nervous, distraught, he returned to Springfield in March. He told friends he feared for his life. A few days later he rushed into the kitchen of his fine Pontiac home, snatched a carving knife from the drawer, slashed his throat and plunged the knife into his breast. But not far enough. No one knew of this.
Then he went to St. John's hospital and registered as Mr. Williams. The next day he was found in the bathtub dead.

For Roosevelt and Humanity

The coroner's jury said he committed suicide. But that death, coming on the very eve of the state primaries, produced a Grade-A sensation in Chicago and Illinois. The lieutenant governor, Stelle, declaring Horner was too ill to discharge his functions, seized the governorship, called a special session of the legislature, fired Sam Nudelman and ordered his pay stopped.

Meantime Sam Nudelman and Senator Slattery had delivered the state machine to Kelly and Nash. And in the primaries, their candidate for governor Hershey, was named the candidate of the party.

When the legislature met, Stelle, defeated, resumed his functions as lieutenant governor. Horner feebly received some legislators and asserted his right to govern. The legislature named a committee to investigate the slush fund and, as I write this, the committee goes forward with its probe.

But Kelly and Nash now have a grip on the state as well as the county machine stronger than ever. And, as the Democratic national convention assembles in Chicago, they have their eyes fixed upon greater and nobler powers in the national government—in the name of Roosevelt and Humanity.

All have bowed before them. Henry Horner, who denounced Kelly as a boss and blistered him for his tyranny, is now for his candidates—state and county.
Tom Courtney, who said Kelly was leagued with killers and gangsters and bookies, is now Kelly's candidate for state's attorney. In the Democratic party all is peace—the peace of Kelly and Nash, just as along the Rialto reigns the peace of Capone.

These are our rulers.

THE END

New Wax Polish

DOES 2 JOBS
AT ONCE!

IT CLEANS
THE CAR GIVES A WAX POLISH

DU PONT

SPEEDY WAX

(LIQUID)

• Putting a wax polish on your car isn't the long, tough job it used to be. With Du Pont Speedy Wax, you can now clean the finish and give it a beautiful wax polish in one easy operation. You do both jobs at the same time. Speedy Wax is fine for all car finishes.

WANT A SAMPLE?

We will gladly send you a generous sample—enough Speedy Wax for fenders and hood. Just send 6¢, to help cover postage. Clip coupon below.

DU PONT, Chem. Spec. Div.
Dept. 6-B, Wilmington, Del.

Please send me a generous sample of Speedy Wax. I enclose 6 cents to help pay postage.

Name _____

Address _____

City & State _____

(Offer good in U. S. only)

RUST, SCUM AND CORROSION in the radiator cause overheating, reduce the engine efficiency. DU PONT COOLING SYSTEM CLEANSER cleans perfectly without reverse flushing.

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL BEAST IN THE WORLD

More than a million dollars has been spent to rebre the "Golden horses with fair manes and tails" of Homeric poems, and now they are being bred successfully in California

GOLDEN HORSE

By Frank J. Taylor

NEXT WEEK'S COLLIER'S

Ready to Speed National Defense!

EVERY loyal American wants to see his country prepared to meet any emergency—and a strong nation needs strong railroads.

The very size of the United States and the need for mass movement of men and supplies over long distances make railroads the foundation of national defense, as well as of our normal transportation system. Other forms of transport which ordinarily haul about one-third of our commerce supplement the railroads, but cannot take their place.

So it's sensible to ask, how is the nation's No. 1 transportation set for doing its job?

And a compact answer to that question is:

In speed and operating efficiency the American railroads today are at the highest peak in their history.

That's a strong statement. Here are the facts—

The average speed of freight trains today is 62 per cent higher than in 1920, at the close of the first World War period. Today, each freight train actually performs more than twice as much transportation service as twenty years ago.

Operating efficiency was tested and proved between August and October 1939, when the railroads handled the biggest increase in traffic ever recorded in so short a stretch of time—and handled it with such smoothness and skill that in the busiest week there was a daily average of 64,299 surplus freight cars in good order and ready for duty.

All this didn't just happen. Despite lean years railroads have recognized and met their obligation to keep fit. Heavier rails have been laid, better equipment has been developed, new terminal facilities have been installed, literally billions of dollars have been put into better and more efficient plant and equipment.

In the operating end, new methods have been developed for having cars available for loading whenever and wherever freight is ready to move—and for sorting and speeding freight cars through classification yards at a rate as high as 1 car in every 12 seconds.

And as an example of how the railroads are equipping themselves to handle increased traffic, consider this fact: In the first six months of 1940, they placed in service more surplus freight cars than in any like period in the ten years.

All of which shows that railroad men keep their business—and are awake to their responsibilities.

As an essential arm of national defense railroads should be strengthened and supported by sound and impartial public transportation policies.

TRAVEL AMERICA—by Rail
See your ticket agent about Grand Circle Tour

the garbage collection division, $300, twice his bailiff's salary. The jurors—a lady—admitted $50. She allowed that in another case. All of these people have been indicted. These be our judges.

Up the thread of this yarn—started with the mysterious death of Smith in a bathtub—it was lit upon fraudulent ballot-box Judge Edmund Jarecki was the ticket. The Kelly-Nash machine, two years before, had attempted to drive Henry Horner from the ship now set out to punish an edge. And once again this pre-bitter primary battle. There is a senatorial vacancy and Scott Lucas, senator from Illinois—ran for against the Kelly-Nash can-like Igoe.

figure in this battle was Tom the state's attorney who had into office by the machine. was no lily-white reformer. had held three city jobs at the one of them a law job in sanitary District. But he had with Kelly. He began raiding an attempt to enforce the laws. He denounced the shers in ringing terms. And nation of Horner and Court-a revolt of decent Democrats, the Kelly-Nash machine under primary. Jarecki was re-elected Scott Lucas senator.

Following year Courtney challenged in the city primaries for but this time he fought alone. was out of the battle. Courtney Kelly with being in partnership with the bookies. But Kelly a signal beating at the polls.

Haberdashery and Politics

Now, with this prelude, we can see the dead director of public the bathtub of St. John's Hospital in Springfield. And here we shall seem to me—if I may inter-opinion—one of the most tragic of this whole unhappy story. After battles of Horner against cost money—plenty of money. with the raising of that money concerned. The night of the Jarecki victory over the Kelly-Nash machine Horner was taken ill—an illness which he has never recovered. As to say about this episode we know. How much of it he is possible for we do not know.

That question must remain to be settled.

But Horner—or certainly his lieutenants—began to play with a dangerous weapon. These violent struggles with the Kelly-Nash machine have cost immense sums of money. The machine can raise funds. It forces pay-rollers to contribute. It levies on contractors, suppliers of materials, favored bankers, everybody who benefits by the machine.

Political reformers have long regarded this as one of the most vicious practices of machine politics. It is the thing that keeps it alive. To end this abuse 'civil-service laws have been passed to prevent turning the city pay roll into an army of mercenaries of the bosses. Corrupt-practice laws have been adopted and enforced in some states. The Horner regime was supposed to be a reform regime. Yet, putting victory above reform, it began to model itself on the Kelly-Nash pattern.

This, indeed, has been one of the sad developments of the last eight years. City and state machines, posing as reform regimes, have come out openly with two per cent clubs and—in Pennsylvania—five per cent clubs, which levied contributions upon the state and city employees to support the political machines that marched under the banners of reform.

F. Lynden Smith, in the lumber business in Pontiac, Illinois, played with politics. He helped manage some of the Horner fights. He succeeded so well he was made director of public works. That department spends $40,000,000 a year on state contracts. Very soon an organization appeared—the Iroquois-Illinois League. Smith was its head. Its object was to collect two per cent of the salaries of state employees. It was extended to extract a dime a ton from all coal men who sold the state and a settled percentage from contractors. It was a slush fund to finance the Horner battles against Kelly and Nash—and the G.O.P.

At one time there was supposed to have been as much as $750,000 in cash in this fund in Smith's hands. Smith was supposed to have squeezed $33,000 from the coal men and $250,000 from the contractors in 1938—in addition to the hundreds of thousands from the pay-rollers.

Into these affairs there rose the head of one of the prize exhibits of Illinois politics. Sam L. Nudelman mixed small-town haberdashery and small-town politics in Belleville, Illinois. He owned a small gent's-furnishing store. In 1932 he faced bankruptcy, made a settlement with his creditors and marched on Springfield, where he got a job as a $125-a-month clerk in the State Finance Department. Today he is the head of that department and, some say in Illinois, is the virtual governor of the state.

When Horner became ill he set up a regency—a bedside cabinet—in which Nudelman, Smith, and U. S. Senator Slattery were powerful. Horner gradually drifted out of affairs though he remained governor. He became a kind of mystical figure behind whose name the regents ran the state.

Democratic leaders who were left out like Lieutenant Governor Stelle and Benjamin Adamowski, Democratic leader in the Senate, became angered. A serious split developed in the party. Then a split occurred between the regents over the slush fund. It became a row between F. Lynden Smith and Sam Nudelman. Nudelman was after Smith's scalp. Smith began to lose face with the hidden governor. Nudelman seemed to have Horner's ear. Smith began talking about his "little black book"—the book of ten thousand secrets—which would blow the lid off. Federal Internal Revenue officers were rooting around Chicago and Springfield. Smith went to the governor for a showdown. As a result he was fired. Nudelman took over the Illinoisans, the organization that succeeded the Iroquois-Illinois League.

Lawsuits developed over this slush fund. Smith became ill. His nerves were shattered. He went to Florida to rest. Nervous, distraught, he returned to Springfield in March. He told friends he feared for his life. A few days later he rushed into the kitchen of his fine Pontiac home, snatched a carving knife from the drawer, slashed his throat and plunged the knife into his breast. But not far enough. No one knew of this. Then he went to St. John's hospital and registered as Mr. Williams. The next day he was found in the bathtub dead.

For Roosevelt and Humanity

The coroner's jury said he committed suicide. But that death, coming on the very eve of the state primaries, produced a Grade-A sensation in Chicago and Illinois. The lieutenant governor, Stelle, declaring Horner was too ill to discharge his functions, seized the governorship, called a special session of the legislature, fired Sam Nudelman and ordered his pay stopped.

Meantime Sam Nudelman and Senator Slattery had delivered the state machine to Kelly and Nash. And in the primaries, their candidate for governor Hershey, was named the candidate of the party.

When the legislature met, Stelle, defeated, resumed his functions as lieutenant governor. Horner feebly received some legislators and asserted his right to govern. The legislature named a committee to investigate the slush fund and, as I write this, the committee goes forward with its probe.

But Kelly and Nash now have a grip on the state as well as the county machine stronger than ever. And, as the Democratic national convention assembles in Chicago, they have their eyes fixed upon greater and nobler powers in the national government—in the name of Roosevelt and Humanity.

All have bowed before them. Henry Horner, who denounced Kelly as a boss and blistered him for his tyranny, is now for his candidates—state and county. Tom Courtney, who said Kelly was leagued with killers and gangsters and bookies, is now Kelly's candidate for state's attorney. In the Democratic party all is peace—the peace of Kelly and Nash, just as along the Rialto reigns the peace of Capone.

These are our rulers.

THE END

New Wax Polish

DOES 2 JOBS
AT ONCE!

IT CLEANS
THE CAR GIVES A WAX POLISH

DU PONT

SPEEDY WAX

(LIQUID)

• Putting a wax polish on your car isn't the long, tough job it used to be. With Du Pont Speedy Wax, you can now clean the finish and give it a beautiful wax polish in one easy operation. You do both jobs at the same time. Speedy Wax is fine for all car finishes.

WANT A SAMPLE?

We will gladly send you a generous sample—enough Speedy Wax for fenders and hood. Just send 6¢, to help cover postage. Clip coupon below.

DU PONT, Chem. Spec. Div.
Dept. 6-B, Wilmington, Del.

Please send me a generous sample of Speedy Wax. I enclose 6 cents to help pay postage.

Name _____

Address _____

City & State _____

(Offer good in U. S. only)

RUST, SCUM AND CORROSION in the radiator cause overheating, reduce the engine efficiency. DU PONT COOLING SYSTEM CLEANSER cleans perfectly without reverse flushing.

THE

MOST BEAUTIFUL BEAST IN THE WORLD

More than a million dollars has been spent to breed the "Golden horses with fair manes and tails" of Homeric poems, and now they are being bred successfully in California

GOLDEN HORSE

By Frank J. Taylor

NEXT WEEK'S COLLIER'S

SHE'S not ashamed of her FALSE TEETH SMILE

THANKS TO POLIDENT Beauty Bath
Keeps Plates Like New—Without Brushing

False Teeth Wearers Often Worst Breath Offenders

A dark film collects on plates and bridges, that soaks up odors and impurities! It gets in crevices where brushing can't even reach! Almost always it results in "denture breath"—probably the most offensive breath odor. You won't know if you have it but others will! Yet Polident quickly dissolves all film—leaves plates absolutely odor-free and sweet. Millions call Polident a blessing!

Are you letting dingy false teeth destroy your smile . . . perhaps your whole charm? Does the very thought of unattractive plates make you self-conscious when you should be well-poised? The thing to do is—get Polident—a powder that magically dissolves away tarnish, stain, food-deposits from plates, removable bridges—without brushing, acid or danger! What a difference in the way your plate looks and feels! Polident purifies your plate—leaves it clean—attractive! Gums look more "alive" too! Leading dentists recommend POLIDENT. Only 30c, any drug store; money back if not delighted.

Hudson Products, Inc., 220 W. 19th St., New York, N. Y.

POLIDENT

Cleans and Purifies Without Brushing

Do this daily: Add a little Polident powder to half a glass of water. Stir. Then put in plate or bridge for 10 to 15 minutes. Rinse — and it's ready to use.

GET This Smart Safety Fan!

THIS 8 inch rubber-bladed safety fan gives wonderful air circulation and is good for years of service. Sturdy, quiet, streamlined. Assures cool comfort. Single speed. AC current.

WITHOUT a penny of expense. You can earn this streamlined beauty. It's yours for selling only three 1-year COLLIER'S subscriptions at $2.00 each to persons living outside your home. These may be either new or renewal subscriptions.

Offer good in U. S. A. only. Simply send subscribers' names and addresses to us together with your request for the fan and check or money order for $6.00. Write to—

Independent Agency Division, Desk C-28
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Co.
Springfield, Ohio

Write Stories that SELL

Mrs. Grace Blanchard had an IDEA for a story. We criticized her story, gave it a new title and told her WHERE TO SEND IT. She got a substantial check THE FIRST TIME OUT. That is a THRILL many of our graduates have each month. Let 22 years of experience guide YOU. Endorsed by Jack London.

FREE BOOKLET "THE ART OF STORY WRITING" with explanation of our personal criticism and manuscript sales service. No obligations. Write! Hoosier Institute 151 Hoosier Bldg. Chicago

STOP the ITCH of Insect Bites—Heat Rash

For quick relief from itching of insect bites, heat rash, athlete's foot, eczema and other externally caused skin troubles, use world-famous, cooling, anti-septic, liquid D. D. D. Prescription. Greaseless, stainless. Soothes irritation and quickly stops intense itching. 35c trial bottle proves it, or money back. Ask your druggist today for D. D. D. PRESCRIPTION.

3-IN-ONE QUIETS SMALL MOTORS

Regular use of HEAVY BODY 3-IN-ONE Oil will add to the life of small electric motors. It lubricates and cleans, prevents rust and tarnish. Shop equipment needs it. At Hardware, Drug, Grocery, 10¢ Stores. Try it!

Ask for HEAVY BODY

3-IN-ONE Oil

The Army of Despair

Continued from page 11

in the middle of a bridge. Not a good place to be with German bombers overhead. But there was no place to go.

We stood on the bridge, kept from going either backward or forward by the press of cars and trucks and wagons and bicycles and people and by the blackness of the night. Far to the right we could see occasional flashes and now and then hear the sound of the guns. Faintly now we heard the hum of a plane. It may have been the drone of fifty planes, flying high. It's hard to tell at night. Then it stopped. It may have been a French plane or fifty French planes.

Our army resumed its weary, tragic march. Now some turned off the road. We were in a beautiful part of France. It was raining too hard to sleep in the fields that bordered the road. I drove as long as I could but the intense blackness of night strains your eyes as effectively as strong light does and when I had gone off the road twice I gave up.

Occasionally a car crawled by or a silent bicyclist or a few on foot passed. From the thousands and thousands ahead and behind came an overwhelming silence that somehow had the effect of terrific, overpowering noise. This silent symphony of despair never stopped. It was impossible to sleep. We sat in our cars and our wagons and waited for the dawn. It took hours for it to come and when it arrived it was a murky dawn. Without food or drink, we set forth south, always south.

We passed through small towns. Streams of cars half a mile long would be lined up at a gasoline pump that had run dry days before. Now we passed stranded cars every few minutes. Sometimes people pushed their cars, hoping that there would be fuel in the next town. There was no fuel in the next town. There was no fuel and there was no food. We were the stragglers in this army. For more than a week it had been passing this road.

Three Days of Terror

At one town we passed a railroad station. A long freight train was just pulling in from Paris. The doors of the freight cars were open and humanity poured out, spilled, overflowed. These were the cars on which the famous sign, "Forty men, eight horses," was scrawled during the past war. Forty men. There were at least one hundred men and women and children in each of these freight cars. At each station the doors were opened for five minutes. This train had been on the road nearly three days from Paris. Once the train had been machine-gunned. Not one, but every one I spoke to, told me the same story. It had been machine-gunned by eight German planes. French fighters had come and driven them off. Had anyone been hit? No one knew.

The congestion increased the farther south we went. People looked even wearier. Thousands of them had walked from Paris. We were a hundred and fifty miles from there now. Finally I arrived at Tours.

There was no rest for weary wanderers in Tours. The bombers came, aiming for an airport on the outskirts of the city and for a bridge that led south. The huge square in front of the city hall was packed with tired refugees. They ran when the bombs crashed. When bombs fall close to you, your only thought is to get somewhere else. They ran but their heavy feet rebelled and when they fell they lay where they had fallen, shapeless bundles of apathy and despair. Three times within an hour the Germans came and the horrible noise of tearing silk that the made as they screamed earthward the shattering explosions a second drained whatever small vitality was left in the pain-racked bodies of these miserable children of ill

They had to move on. The bled on south, bearing the cross of despair with the same courage and cynicism that another had borne nearly 2,000 years ago. Then we to leave. The government had the wireless had moved south deaux. Tours became another town. I took back roads to Bordeaux avoid the packed humanity of the route. Near Bordeaux I joined the main road and once more became of this army.

Too Much Faith in Ruler

Bordeaux was bulging at the seams. Bordeaux was an overfilled sack tied too tightly around the middle. It was night and thousands were in front of restaurants. When I told that there was no food I continued to stand there. While I chased one another along the packed streets. The cabinet resigned; Reynaud was out; the talk of capitulation. Added to and misery stamped, perhaps, on the faces of these people there was now bewilderment. It couldn't be. This country they had built could not die. They fathers before them had tilled and nursed vineyards and had green leaves grow into sturdy and had seen the wonder of grapes born and living and growing. I had turned the grapes into poison. What crime had they committed they should now lie miserably and in city streets. Had they put much faith in their rulers?

I sat in a crowded restaurant. The lights were out and service ended. A trembling cried: "Fifty Boche planes flying over Bordeaux. I heard it. It is true. Fifty planes will kill us. The voice came from the woman who ran the restaurant. No one man said anything. We were a bit embarrassed for the woman an officer laughed, "Stop talking sense, Madame. Go back to your room and find fifty eggs. We are all here. The woman stared ahead for a moment, brushed the hair back from her face and turned into the kitchen. She was soft, trying perhaps to forget the helpless misery of the homeless who were on the streets of Bordeaux. But no one knew. The magic of the night was gone. People were too tired. The journalists hurried to a destination had been sent for them. They got out quickly. We Americans were safe enough for the moment. It was easy to sleep even on the streets. The flight from Paris had been one and a tiring one.

In the morning the homeless started their pathetic trek to the south. Many left cars on the street was no gasoline. Many broken wagons and cars and bicycles. Where were they going? They didn't know. Writing this, I was on a street below filled with the ragged army of refugees. For weeks they had endured. It is not a pleasant sight to the twentieth-century Gethsemane.

Say It with Music

Continued from page 10

s, said Penny, all very simple. Studio always liked to link the of two of their contract people in a romantic way. It not only helped the office but it kept their names in the papers if they were working on the same picture. So much the better. Of course, it didn't really have to go out to the public, although the studio preferred it. They had pictures of them as their names in all the gossip columns. Penny nodded. "It all sounds very simple," he said. "Especially as it is a time when I shall have—well, a lot of research to do. Indians, Indians?" said Penny, staring at her. "Why Indians?" "I don't know," he said bitterly, "that I have authority on them."

IN two weeks Oliver had good reason to understand why, despite enormous salaries, Hollywood composers were an unhappy lot. In those weeks he had read some thirty books on the red men, their ways and customs, not to mention seeing nine pictures in which they had danced and sung with utter abandon. But, try as he would, each effort to write the appropriate Indian music only succeeded in making him feel like all other Indian music. His company was already well into the studio and for the past ten days he had been on location. When they returned to the studio Penny almost recognized Oliver in the commissary with his hair and his hair was as hollow and his hair was as hollow that might have been blown away by a hurricane.

"Oliver!" she gasped. "Have you been drinking?" "I have not," he said darkly, "although I admit toying with the idea." Penny's eyes were even more beautiful than when he had been so startled, and a less fevered glow had knocked over the taste of anxiety to seat her. Mr. Bradley, however, was in no mood for either soul or body. Miss Ames was something else that reminded him of destiny was in the hands of the book trade.

"You might like to hear how I've been while you were on location," he said.

"You might like to hear how I've been while you were on location," he said. "After she had ordered, he gave her a bitter summary. According to the best gossip columns they had observed at the Grove, the fights, the drinking and eating a hamburger in a car. It was rumored that he had been in the house and she would be one of the things in same.

It was also rumored, he told her, that he was about to leave. Only this morning Mr. Steinberg's private secretary had called, saying Steinberg was anxious to know if he would have something on paper.

She shook her head. "Don't you tell him, Oliver," she said. "They're wanting people to get something out of you. Tell him what the writers do. You can't turn it on like a faucet. They'll leave you alone."

She was staring at her. Things might be much worse than they were. "I'll do it myself!" he said wildly. "I'll do it myself!"

Seven minutes he was back with a dazed look still in his eyes. He had an audience with Mr. Steinberg. He had said what did Mr.

Steinberg think he was, a faucet? and Mr. Steinberg had actually apologized.

"That's wonderful!" said Penny. "I'm so proud of you, Oliver!"

Mr. Bradley blinked slightly. His experience with young women had been limited to those whom he had secretly suspected of being concerned about their grades. To have a beautiful young lady announce she was proud of him was a new and titillating experience.

As he afterwards reflected, it was probably only natural that he should ask her to go out that evening. The studio expected it of him. In an hour he had forgotten all about the studio and was calling her Penny. In two hours, they were parked on the sands near Malibu, watching the long breakers roll in. For the first time since his arrival on the celluloid coast Oliver no longer felt alone and friendless.

"It was nice of you to come," he said. "I—I hope you don't find it boring."

Penny looked at him, the moonlight etching her little nose. He was, she thought solemnly, very nice.

"I think it's fun," she said. "I like being with you, Oliver."

Her simple honesty completely shattered what was left of his reserve. The next thing he knew he was telling her things he hadn't even admitted to himself. That terribly tight feeling he had when he realized this was his last chance to establish himself. The bleak reality that no matter what efforts he made, Indian music was still something derived from tom-toms and not from young men who had been to Harvard. And if he didn't come up with something that even Sitting Bull would have applauded...

"You will," she said, putting her hand over his. "I just know it, Oliver!"

The way she said it was too much. There was nothing he could do but kiss her. When his first dismay wore off it was replaced by the warm and pleasant realization of something every artist should learn. He had never known there could be so many lovely variations on the same theme.

BY THE time Across the Plains was entering the homestretch Oliver knew that only Penny's simple faith had kept him going. He had been seeing her every night (something the Messrs. Sid Skolsky and Harrison Carroll had duly broadcast to all their readers) and each night he had more and more difficulty determining where his gratitude left off and his emotions began.

The days fled across the calendar and he turned out reams of music, each note a little more hopeless than the last. If the picture hadn't been behind schedule his period of grace would have already expired and he would have been shipped east by slow freight. Mr. Steinberg made that very clear.

He called him personally when three weeks passed and no music was yet forthcoming. "A fine artist it makes!" he cried. "I've given you more time than mine own son and nothing happens!"

"I'm sorry," Oliver said dully. "Maybe by the time they're through shooting—"

"You're sorry?" screamed the producer. "I'm with ulcers! By the time the massacre scenes are over you gotta give with the music or else!"

Oliver hung up, looking wanly at the books of Indian lore that were stacked in every corner. There was only one possible source of inspiration left. No matter how degrading it might be, there was no alternative.

The massacre of the wagon train took

CAL SAYS: My taste buds do the tasting and my tongue does the talking — and I'm telling you Old Drum can't be beat for Taste . . . Quality . . . Price.

YOU CAN'T BEAT IT!

Old Drum Brand BLENDED WHISKEY: 90 Proof—75% Grain Neutral Spirits. Copyright 1940, Calvert Distillers Corp., N. Y. C.

MASS DESTRUCTION of INSECTS

at 1/3
the Cost
OF OLD METHODS

TANGLEFOOT DIFUSOR

WORLD'S GREATEST INSECT DESTROYER—does away with all the fuss and muss of conventional methods. Entirely automatic. Made and guaranteed by world's leading manufacturer of quality insecticides.

GETS THEM ALL—DIFUSOR vapor penetrates inaccessible hideouts. Gets roaches, bedbugs, moths and other pests not controllable with ordinary methods, as well as flies, mosquitoes, ants, spiders, etc. Real mass destruction. A boon to stores, apartments, institutions, as well as homes.

SANITARY, ECONOMICAL—no escape for bugs, but entirely harmless to human or animal life. Does not taint even the most delicate foods. Much more economical . . . a little goes a long way.

50,000 SATISFIED USERS—including prominent hospitals, hotels, industrial plants, creeries, bakeries, as well as stores and homes use and endorse DIFUSOR. For full information USE THE COUPON.

TANGLEFOOT WORLD'S BEST INSECTICIDES

THE TANGLEFOOT CO. • GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
Without cost or obligation, send me information regarding DIFUSOR.

NAME _____
ADDRESS _____
CITY _____ STATE _____

CORNS SORE TOES

Try This NEW Amazingly Quick Relief!

New SUPER-SOFT Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads quickly relieve pain; stop shoe friction and pressure; keep you free of corns. 630% softer than before! New, thin Scalloped Edge. Separate Medications included for removing corns. Cost but a trifle. Sold everywhere.

NEW Super-Soft Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads

USE NOXZEMA FOR SHAVING, TOO!

APPLY A BIT BEFORE LATHERING—WHAT A DIFFERENCE!

Barbers find it marvelous for softening beard—soothing skin!

• You've probably used soothing Noxzema to relieve painful Sunburn, for Chapped Skin, etc. Do you know that many of the finest Barber Shops—like the famous Terminal Shops—use Noxzema before lathering to soften the beard and protect sensitive skin?

Make this simple test—Apply a little Noxzema before you lather. Note the amazing difference—no razor pull—and no after-shave irritation! And how cool and soothed your skin feels! Or, use Noxzema alone as a latherless shave. If you've never tried Noxzema send 10¢ for a generous trial jar to the Noxzema Chemical Company, Baltimore, Md.

By the makers of
TANGLEFOOT
• Fly Paper
• Fly Ribbon
• Fly Spray
• Mosquito Repellent
• Tree Tanglefoot
• Stock Spray
• Roach Powder
• Ant Powder
• Gummed Tape

place, per script, during the four days that followed. Four hundred assorted Indians had been hired and each day, made hideous with the war paint applied by the make-up department, they surged down on the beleaguered wagons.

On Saturday, the last day of the picture, the Indians were finally allowed to win a scene. After one final galloping around the besieged principals the maddened warriors were to storm the wagon train and immediately start hacking up all and sundry. At the last moment, of course, the cavalry would appear over a convenient hill but until then the braves could make murder.

It was during the final rehearsal that the melancholy party who served as the sound engineer, a Mr. Norman Zang, could stand it no longer. He walked over to the harassed director and said dolefully, "I'm going to have to change the microphones, Max. I'm still picking up something that ought not to be in there."

The director glared at him. "For four days you've been switching mikes," he bellowed. "Will you make up your mind what's wrong?"

Mr. Zang ran nervous fingers through his hair. "I can't help it," he said wretchedly. "I keep getting a war whoop with a Harvard accent."

A brave standing near by gave a stricken "Ugh!" and hurriedly moved away. For seventy-three scenes, including retakes, Oliver had avoided detection and he had every intention of keeping that record intact.

Desperate, he had bribed a make-up man and to the casual eye he made a quite satisfactory tomahawk artist. His body had been generously coated with liquid Indian make-up and he had been equipped with a black wig, complete with feather. Thus each day, wearing only a breechclout that made him very shank-conscious, he had gone forth in a final, despairing effort to wake the sleeping muse.

Penny's presence had only made things worse. He spent his days skulking on the edge of the crowd, always keeping a good hundred yards between himself and the young lady whom he took out each evening. If she were ever to observe the depths to which he had sunk something big and fine would die within her. One look in the mirror had convinced him of that.

The company was transported from the studio by bus each day and Oliver rode with the other Indians, waiting hopefully for some sudden insight that would set off the spark within him. He developed into a first-rate eavesdropper but so far it had been to no avail. The braves seemed chiefly concerned with a good thing at Latonia or the relative merits of the rumba vs. conga.

Until today he had cherished the forlorn hope that if inspiration were provided he might still come through at the last minute by dint of burning the midnight oil. That feeble hope was perishing with each passing minute but he was grimly determined to stick it out to the last scalping.

THE cameras were now set up for the final sequence. The Indians were ordered to mount and Oliver was seeking a convenient dune in which to lurk when he saw the first assistant was eying him with ominous interest. Having no choice in the matter, Oliver painfully boarded a pinto pony.

"Roll 'em!" cried the director. The Indians tensed to the charge, and off-scene three expert archers awaited the signal that would discharge their flaming arrows. The signal came, the arrows flew, the Indians whooped and were promptly answered with a burst of rifle fire. At that the braves came storming into the scene, doing their merry-go-round act about the wagons. Oliver was holding onto the horse desperately. This time he was careful not to give out with a battle cry. The last one had almost proved his undoing.

The director was standing up now, waving them to close in, and Oliver was swept along in the melee as the braves stormed the wagons. He crashed through the circle and suddenly Penny was standing there right in front of him. The pony swerved just in time to avoid running her down and Oliver let out his breath in one long gulp.

The scene was over then but he did not dismount until he had put some distance between himself and the object of his affections. Then, and then only, he slid painfully to the ground. He limped away, seeking a soft seat in the nearest bus.

He was just about to enter it when the first assistant collared him.

"Come on, Butch," he said. "You get a break."

Oliver felt himself grow numb. "Ugh?" he inquired.

"Sure," said the assistant. "We got to get a close-up of a guy about to scalp Miss Ames when the hero shoots him from behind."

Oliver managed to nod. "Gettun make-up," he bleated.

He wrenched away and by the time the cameras were ready he was simply a small speck disappearing over one of the farthest dunes.

SUNDAY was a long, bleak day coated with the gloomy fact that on the morrow Oliver would have to face Mr. Steinberg and admit his utter failure. He could already picture the producer when he learned there was no music to score his latest epic. And, to make it even drearier, Oliver now knew that his personal life would end with his career.

He had discovered that while he was mournfully hitchhiking back from the location. Instead of the shame he should have felt in being on the public highways disguised as a war-whoop purveyor, he could think only of Penny and what his failure would mean to her faith in him. If he had only come through he could have spoken of the things that must now remain forever sealed behind his lips. A man with no career, no hopes, no future, cannot speak of such things as love and marriage.

Tonight, his last night with her, he must fight off his seething emotions and, ignoring her warmth and beauty, be a model of stony suffering. Then, at the last moment, he was deprived of even martyrdom. George Bates called and blithely informed him that he had fixed it with Penny for them to attend one of the Countess de Marco's famous Sunday night soirees. The countess' marble residence was only slightly larger than a good hotel and all the big names went there. An invitation was the social equivalent to winning an Academy Award.

Glumly Oliver attired himself in black tie and grew even more morose when, calling for Penny, he found her wearing the lovely white evening gown that had always stirred him so. He could feel that she was watching him with childish eagerness, awaiting the word or gesture that he had met with an inspiration. Somehow he avoided the issue and she was looking hurt and a little bewildered when they entered the countess' drawing room.

The butler announced them over the loud-speaker while Mr. Bradley looked morbidly upon the dazzling assemblage. It was even worse than he had imagined it would be. In one corner there was an orchestra and the floor was crowded with famous, pretty people. Other guests were at a modernistic bar that ran the length of the room. It was strictly a production and Oliver found it most offensive.

He turned to Penny and was about to say so when he found himself surrounded by wolves. That white evening

Wine "Cooler" IS POPULAR DRINK THIS SUMMER

YOU REACH for it because it looks cool and pretty. You sip it with ing delight. So wonderfully good new wine cooler that smart hostesses where are serving it this summer. popular because it's on the mode. Mixed in a minute. Why don't you pitcherful next time guests drop in.

Plus fruits, sugar to taste, plenty of ice

OTHER "COOLER" RECIPES FREE at the store where you buy the wines of California. California wines are grown to strict standards of quality. True to type. Well developed. Inexpensive. Wine Advisory Board, 85 Second Street, San Francisco

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE WITHOUT CALORIES

—And You'll Jump Out of Bed
in the Morning
Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pints of liquid bile onto the food you swallow every day. If this bile is not flowing, your food may not digest. You get constipated, feel sour, and the world looks like a mess. It takes those good, old Carter's Pills to get these two pints of bile flowing. To make you feel "up and up." Amazing bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Pills by name. 10¢ and 25¢. Stubborn, anything else.

DURHAM BLADES have what-it-takes!

If your beard fights to the last whisker, try the safety razor that's tough for tough beards . . . Durham Duplex. Its hollow-ground blade and diagonal shaving stroke give you WHAT-TAKES! With this razor you can help shaving diagonally . . . the most comfortable way. While Durham is different, it's no trick to use it. A few shaves and you get the knack easily.

SHAVE KIT $1.00
Compact soft roll case with Durham Razor, pkg. 5 blades, stropping device . . . Money back guarantee . . . At dealers or order direct.

Durham Blade made (15/1) selected hollow-ground stropped. Hardly inspect per blade (less per shave in every blade) and the knowledge she was about achieve stardom had brought the in full cry. One of them swept out on the floor and Oliver retreated to a wallflower's chair.

DURHAM
DURHAM DUPLEX RAZOR CO., INC.

Despite her best efforts Penny didn't escape and Oliver had to be content with just watching her popularity. He was sitting there in a very soul state when he gradually became aware that he was being peered at. He looked up and saw that George was talking earnestly to a large man whose dress glittered with sequins. In fact, everything about the d, glittered, including the lorgnette which she was surveying Mr. Brad-

ROSE and was just about to sidle off when he saw Mr. Steinberg and life entering the room. Oliver had desire to be exposed to public hysteria. He took one look at Mr. Steinberg and fled right into the arms of George Bates.

"Oliver," Bates said briskly, "I want to meet your hostess." Oliver nodded, still glancing appreciatively over his shoulder. The introduction was no sooner acknowledged than the countess had him by the arm and was leading him toward the orchestra. He must, she said, play a little something for them. Her guests would never forgive her if they learned Oliver Bradley had actually been there and they hadn't had the chance to hear some of his immortal compositions. He simply couldn't refuse.

Oliver found she was quite right. He didn't have the chance to refuse. He was going wildly about for Penny when the countess halted the music and begged her hands for attention. "Be quiet, dears!" she cooed. "Mr. Bradley has consented to play for us!" Oliver gave him an arch glance. "Haven't you?"

He looked at her and then at that moment of the offensively successful. His career was about to take wings and now, as a suitable finale, he was employed as a supper entertainer. He saw Penny trying to work her way out of him but rescue was out of the question now. All he could do was face the music and make them like it. A dark rebellion welled within him. At least he could make his first and last appearance as a guest artist a memorable one. A veritable swan song with a vengeance.

"Very well," he said bitterly, "but remember this was your idea, countess." He stalked over to the vacated piano. It was slightly out of tune but he was in a mood for trifles. There was only one piece in his repertoire that fitted that hopeless rage within him. He was grimly determined to let the eardrums shatter where they may.

He sat down at the piano and without any preliminary warning plunged into the New England Hurricane Suite, the most violent passage in his late repertoire. None of the guests had ever seen of his art child, let alone the music therein, and so they were completely unprepared for what followed.

The approaching, swelling storm stealthily working its way up the Atlantic seaboard was ominous enough. By the time it had passed over Long Island and was a howling, roaring gale the sturdiest guests had blanched. Even Oliver was beginning to feel the savage ruthlessness of his own composition. He was playing with more and more savage abandon and once, noting the startled, staring face of Mr. Steinberg, he added some impromptu thunder with his bass hand, and the producer winced and shivered.

The blow was in full force now, tearing buildings from their foundations and sweeping orphans downstream. Once Oliver glanced up and saw that the horror-stricken countess looked as if she feared the chandelier was about to fall on her distinguished guests.

The hurricane had desolated the coast region and was sweeping out to sea and Oliver was busy with the crashing waves when he felt the piano begin to vibrate. Some of the guests felt it, too, and looked uneasily at one another. They had never known that art could be so untamed, so utterly savage. For that matter, neither had Oliver.

His bass hand was pounding, pounding, pounding with the waves and the gale while his upstairs hand provided the lightning. The Coast Guard was about to put out from shore when a Ming vase, long tottering in a far corner, went crashing to the floor.

"Quake!" cried one of the guests. "Earthquake!"

The countess screamed, a high, shrill cry that was immediately lost in all the others that went up. There was the screaming and hysteria and then the sudden, mad stampede for the doors as Oliver, with a final vicious flourish, sank a large steamer with everybody aboard.

After a moment the last shivering vibration died away and Oliver looked up. Only Mr. Steinberg and Penny remained in the room.

Her eyes were misty. "Oh, Oliver," she said shakily, "I'm so proud of you! It's the best chase-music I ever heard!"

HE STARED at her. "Chase-music?" he said numbly.

Mr. Steinberg was beating his head with his hands. "You artists!" he wailed. "It ain't enough you got to worry me till the last minute. You get the most colossal score I ever heard for Indians and shooting, so you gotta preview it before mine own competitors! By morning every studio in town offers with contracts!"

"Contracts?" Oliver said weakly. A great light was slowly creeping across the horizon. "It's—it's up to your expectations, Mr. Steinberg?"

"Up to them?" the producer cried. "Better finale music there ain't! Tomorrow the music department sprinkles in some tom-toms and we record! Only one promise it has to give! You talk with me before you sign anything!"

Oliver was looking at Penny. There was that dewy look in her eyes that told him more than words. Now, there need be no parting. Instead...

He glanced at Mr. Steinberg, filled with that quiet confidence only the successful artist knows. It was wonderful. After all, the score was from his own opera and if it must be shown with Indians, at least the public would finally hear his work. "I imagine a contract can be arranged," he said. "I shall discuss it with you later." He took Penny's hand. "If you'll pardon us now—"

"Oh, Oliver!" she said.

They passed George Bates going out. He took one look at their faces and dashed for the phone. An elopement always made the first page.

THAT HELPS EXPLAIN

Why Sealright Containers mean Better Protected Ice Cream

$100,000 Is a Lot of Money—but that's what Sealright spent to replace a mile of ordinary water pipe with rust-proof, corrosion-proof copper pipe. Why? To help make certain that the paper used in making Sealright Containers is cleaner paper, which gives ice cream better protection. Manufactured under rigid sanitary control, as illustrated below, Sealright Containers for ice cream, cottage cheese and other foods are easily identified by the Sealright Emblem on the cover.

To insure the Purity of the water used in making paper for Sealright Containers, Sealright operates a thoroughly modern and complete water purifying system.

Ingenious Machines contribute to the true cleanliness of Sealright products. Here is one which automatically applies lids to containers and delivers them ready for packing.

Laboratory Tests double-check every step in Sealright's manufacturing operations—make certain that "Sealright Containers to mean better protected ice cream."

Eat More Ice Cream! Patronize dealers and manufacturers who give you Sealright Sanitary Service. They're easy to identify—by the Sealright Emblem on the container cover.

SANITARY PAPER PACKAGING PRODUCTS

Entire contents of this advertisement copyright, 1940, by Sealright Co., Inc., Fulton, N. Y., Kansas City, Kan., Los Angeles, Calif., Peterborough, Ontario, Canada.

Only yourself to blame
IF WINDSHIELD
BUG-SPOTS GET YOU
into an accident...

WARNING: You can't trust your eyes when your windshield is spattered with squashed bugs. This summer make sure bug-spots don't lead you into danger. Make it a rule to clean your windshield regularly with Bon Ami Cake. You'll find this cake cleanser removes stubborn bug-spots almost as quickly and easily as it does road dust and dirt.

SEE FOR YOURSELF how quick and easy Bon Ami Cake makes windshield cleaning. Just rub a thin even coating of Bon Ami on your windshield. Wipe it off while still slightly damp. Result: a crystal-clear polish that tends to "shed" dirt and stay clean longer.

NO DANGEROUS "OILY FILM." If you do much night driving you'll appreciate the fact that Bon Ami Cake leaves no dust-catching, vision-distorting film on glass. That's why many motorists feel safer driving behind a windshield cleaned with Bon Ami Cake.

BON AMI CAKE

cleans glass better leaves no "oily film"

"hasn't scratched
yet!"

A PAYING BUSINESS

for Over 25
Years!

FOR MORE than twenty-five years, Russell Shirk of Indiana has been a successful subscription representative. His magazine earnings enable him to support his family, drive his own car and enjoy a yearly vacation. If you want to increase your income in the same way, try our plan for taking care of subscriptions for COLLIER'S and the other popular Crowell-Collier Publications. For free supplies, write now.

Independent Agency Division, Desk C-27
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company
250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

PLEASE send me full details of the profitable plan that Mr. Shirk is using.

Name .....
Address .....
Town .....
State .....

LAW

Win greater respect and success. Learn more, earn more. We guide you step by step—furnish all text material, including fourteen-volume Law Library. Degree of LL. B. conferred. Low cost, easy terms. Get our valuable 48-page "Law Training for Leadership" and "Evidence" books free. Send for them NOW.

LaSalle Extension University, Dept. 740-L, Chicago
A Correspondence Institution

SAFE!

It's Always Better To Be Safe Than Sorry!

NEW Discovery for Worming Dogs
No Danger of TOXIC POISONING!

Never Before Possible In A Worm Medicine

Thanks to this discovery, you need have NO worry when you worm your Puppy or Dog with the NEW Glover's Imperial Capsules. The danger of toxic poisoning and violent after-effects is at last removed. They not only expel Round Worms (Ascarids) and Hook Worms, but also Whip Worms — ALL 3! Think of the ECONOMY, only 25¢! FREE DOG BOOK—In full color. Gives you valuable advice on Care, Training, Feeding, etc. Write to Glover's, Dept. 16, 460 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

ONLY 25¢ GLOVER'S
Imperial CAPSULES

Here Kitty, Kitty

Continued from page 23

must remember that he is in the cage by the kind permission of the animal. Frighten him and his brain ceases to become your tool; make him hate you and one day he will be at your throat.

His system is founded upon (1) patience, (2) courage and (3) kindness. Court explores the minds of his pupils and tries to discover what they like to do. A bear may be a natural comedian and a lion with a magnificent black mane may be as full of ham as a human actor who loves to pose. Douthka was an actress to the core; even her slow, undulating walk was calculated to steal attention from all the other animals in the big cage.

When Cats Forget Their Lines

Trainers all use some article or instrument upon which the beast is taught to concentrate his attention. The Court college uses a light stick and a short whip. When it cracks, the animal learns to focus his attention at the point where the sharp report originates. Thus, if one of the big cats is to leave his pedestal at the outer rim of the arena and come to center for a pyramid, the trainer points at the animal with the stick (a signal that it is his turn) and then sends the lash hurtling toward the place where the animal is to go.

Once, watching a rehearsal, we saw a black jaguar "forget his lines" and draw a complete mental blank when the time came for him to mount a lofty pedestal and leap over the trainer's head to another high perch. Instead of beating the animal into some sort of blind submission, the trainer coaxed him with a little pole and with the kind of soft talk that wild beasts come to understand means kindness. Even when this proved unavailing, the animal was simply left alone to collect his wits while the routine went along without him.

Alfred Court recently turned a puma's murderous attack into a neat trick and made a performer out of a leopard that was so lazy everybody said he was useless. The puma leaped at Court repeatedly; as soon as the delivery door opened and let her into the big cage, she attacked. Court broke her of this cute little habit and taught her to leap a distance of thirteen feet from one high pedestal to another.

The lazy leopard would do nothing but lie down. It had to be roped and dragged through the delivery runs and once inside the performing arena rolled over on its back for the duration of the act. Court studied this cat; it had cost him a lot of money and it was a splendid specimen. He hated to sell to a zoo, which is what he had done with countless animals that proved bad material for his acts. One day he started playing with the leopard, using a pole as soon as the big cat lay down on the arena floor. He rolled her over. He had been doing it since, as a part of the act.

"The very first time an animal attacked me or starts a fight with another animal I hit and hit very hard. That is to establish discipline at the very first day of school. After that, I do not use strong methods except in an emergency."

The mixed groups afford the most excitement, but a good free-for-all among different kinds of animals in the same cage can cost a trainer the death or permanent injury of animals that come second-best in the scuffle. Leopards are the most savage of all and could wound lions and tigers if they (leopards) were bigger. They are twice as nervous as almost twice as quick as lions and tigers, and the black ones are more diabolical than the spotted variety.

Attempting to separate a couple of male lions in a battle over a lioness years ago, Court slipped and fell to the ground and immediately was attacked by one of the lions, which tried to get off his thigh. A Great Dane dog, member of this mixed group of wild and domestic animals, saved Court's life by attacking the big cat and diverting its attention from the man. But his poisoning set in and Court had to quit his exciting profession. He sold his animals and retired to a hotel he had built in Nice. There, for two years, he fought back to health. "My nerves were so destroyed that I would have committed suicide but for the fact that I was a religious man," he recalls. "Finally with my health returning, I began to think about the circus and decided

"I told Granny I wanted a violin, but I got the drums anyway" needed to keep from growing to live dangerously again. When I got the idea for the big act, my health and general appearance were restored."

JOHN M. P.

fifty-eight and in his twenty-first year in the big cage has trained hundreds of lions and fifty tigers, bears and other animals. He has a quon Danes in one of the cages because they are big and attractive. A rule a Dane is no match for wild animals. The dog that was killed by the lion, Banco by name, was a champion and would take on any fight. He once nearly killed a lion's trainer.

Personnel of the Alfred Court is a junior league of nations. French, Fritz Schultz is German, Kovar is a Czech and his English as Piccadilly Circus. Courtney, Court's nephew and French and English. Damoo is Hindu and finds himself on a circus scene because several ago Court went to India in a black leopard and the ones he belonged to Dhotre, who is going with them.

group, who have relatives on the lines at home, don't talk about war except to regret it. As circus people, they are big their lives twice every day respect the skill and daring of the performers regardless of race or nationality.

Best killer that Court ever had was a Bengal, a huge tiger. He killed two men when Court decided to handle him in his own mixed lions and tigers and bears. For while Court worked the act, there was trouble from Bengal. Then, in the requirements of managing the animal, he so heavily that he had to turn the act over to someone. Patiently he rehearsed the new act, acquainted him with the intricacies of each actor. But in his first performance Bengal killed the new man and nearly bit him to bits. He died in Court's hands. Bengal was sold to a zoo.

Trainers like jungle-bred animals in preference to circus-bred cats. There is danger of inbreeding and consequent loss of intelligence after several generations of domestic-bred animals brought up around a show. Spoiled like a cute child and in spells trouble for the teacher and the school.

Reflexes Reflect on Ability

There has been injured dozens of animals. He doesn't like to talk about it. Many trainers who look upon animals as medals acquired in an exhibition, Alfred Court contends that injury is a reflection upon a trainer's ability or his good sense. Of course, an animal escapes and the trainer is hurt while protecting an outcast. It is something else again. A lion slashed Court during a rehearsal in the circular auditorium of a circus and the lioness did it because Court pulled her tail. He had a lion for it, however; the lioness was to escape over the top of the cage.

Most spectacular wild-animal escape in the Court records occurred in northern France and came through negligence of a cage boy. He was supposed to be cleaning the cages while the animals were in the circus tent, doing their stuff in the training arena.

Two tigers came running through the chutes after the act was over and they ran right on through their exhibition dens to freedom. For the next twenty hours, Alfred Court was the busiest man in town—and the least envied.

The authorities agreed to let the circus man catch his own wild animals, but they made him sign a paper taking full responsibility. As a special concession to this big-game hunt, the town officials agreed to leave the street lamps lit all night.

Two lions were found in a café and, after a brief scuffle, were taken with injuries to their keepers only. A tiger got into a butcher shop and had a wonderful time. He was captured by boarding up the glass front, most of which his entrance had shattered.

A lioness went up a flight of steps to a hat shop and frightened the wits out of the woman proprietor who lived in an apartment behind the showroom. Shutting the animal securely in this room, Court ceased to worry about it; his men could pick it up later; eight animals still were on the loose. He also managed to get the milliner downstairs and into a café where a shot of brandy calmed her momentarily. But all during the night, when Court and his men would have occasion to go past this café as they continued their animal hunt, the woman would cry out that it was high time they picked up the lion upstairs in her shop. "Have a drink on me!" was Court's answer every time until she had imbibed so much synthetic courage she volunteered to assist in the capture.

Fanfare Makes Peace

Six lions got themselves into a blind alley and were taken with comparative ease, but one got into a schoolhouse and was not found until morning.

The last lion was the hardest to capture. This lioness, answering to the name of Fanfare, had jumped through the plate-glass window of a hardware store and concealed herself (all except her tail) between a pair of oil drums. Animal attendants got hold of the tail, but Fanfare wheeled and attacked them, injuring one man badly and then escaped from the store, heading for a canal at the edge of town. There, Court had a round with her, fearing all the while that she might pull him into the water. "I am not a good swimmer," he explains, preferring death at the hands of a raging jungle beast to drowning.

Now Fanfare had been the tamest animal in the whole group, but the confusion attendant to her sudden freedom made her a jungle beast again. She ran out into open country at last and hid in a forest. Seeing her crouched beneath some bushes, Court sent all the other men away and began talking to her. For half an hour the man did not move. Only his soft voice and the heavy breathing of the great cat broke the stillness. At last he gave the command that all his patient coaxing had prepared for: "Fanfare, come here."

The beast quivered, hesitated and then slowly slunk to the side of her master. He slipped a rope around her neck and led her like a docile dog to a shifting den that was waiting for her at the edge of the forest. This was achievement—a dozen wild animals back in their cages. And the little Frenchman even now doesn't think there was anything unusual about the fact that he worked the animal act again that night.

Wild-animal training has been dangerous, but also it has been very profitable to Alfred Court, who is a good businessman from a long line of merchants and manufacturers. His attitude may be summed up in a remark made when he had trained a particularly fine group of wild animals and had sold the act for exactly one million francs. "This is a good business," he said, "if I live!"

Tune-up with KARBOUT and RISLONE

Enjoy Economical Summer Motoring

Now a Motor "Tune-up" in One Package

Whether for week-end trips—or cross-country vacation tours, enjoy every mile of driving—with a snappy, "tuned-up" motor. . . . Get rid of gums and carbon that cause bucking, "motor ping", poor acceleration, loss of power.

A quick standardized "tune-up" is now available—one factory-sealed container—with KARBOUT for Instant Motor Cleanout—and RISLONE in separate compartment to add to your regular crankcase oil.

After the quick KARBOUT Cleanout which includes carburetor, fuel line and spark plug points—RISLONE prevents further gum formations, keeps valve action free, keeps compression and power up—gives you a smoother, quieter running engine, and more miles per gallon.

"Tune-up" Today—No Time is Required

KARBOUT and RISLONE in the combination containers, and in separate cans are carried by dealers, garages, stations everywhere. Over five million cans have been used in the last three years alone. "Tune-up" today—this easy, quick way, and enjoy this summer's driving. THE SHALER COMPANY, Waupun, Wis. In Canada: The Canadian Shaler Products Company, Ltd., Toronto.

SHALER

KARBOUT and RISLONE

The only products of their kind approved by car and engine builders

DEALERS: Get the new life-size Display Cutout in natural colors—Write us or your Jobber.

Ted Ellis, Noted Driver, Makes Speed Records with Rislone

April 15, 1940.
"Established 7 new speed records at Rosamond Dry Lake, California, today with French Citroen stock car. Reached speed of nearly 100 miles per hour over 5 mile course in terrific desert heat of over 100 degrees. Used Shaler Rislone in my motor. Ran under the sanction and supervision of American Racing Ass'n."
—TED ELLIS

The Big Job for Americans

OUR first duty is to recognize our faults. In their governments, the public opinion of democracies long lacked clear-sightedness and courage. The idea of patriotism, of military valor, was neglected. We must admit it once and for all and close this chapter of the history of the world with the indomitable energy of those whose eyes were opened."

The above remarks were made by a man who should have known what he was talking about. The man was Premier Paul Reynaud of France. He made the remarks in one of the series of speeches he broadcast to the French people in the darkening days of the mighty Battle of France, when the German legions were smashing daily nearer to Paris.

In that paragraph, we think, Premier Reynaud outlined about as tersely and completely as might be the main job that challenges a democratic people anxious to preserve its democracy through this era of dictatorships. Those fifty-eight words of Reynaud's seem to us to be worth, to Americans, as much as practically all the millions of words of free advice that our own commentators and orators have handed us since the President first called for a huge and speedy national-defense effort.

Our biggest job, as Reynaud told the French theirs was, is to recognize that we have democratic faults and weaknesses that totalitarianism can pierce if it can find them. Democracy is inclined, as Reynaud said, to be lackadaisical, softhearted, softheaded, factional, ultrapacifist.

Democracy can, however, snap out of those things in a hurry, given just a little time and a strong enough, loud enough warning.

Mr. Hitler has surely furnished us with that warning—and has shown us how to safeguard our right to live under the kind of government we like best.

Our big job is to build up a good-sized standing Army, expand the Navy to far and away first rank in the world, stud our coasts with big guns planted where they will do the most good in any conceivable emergency, ring and stipple our strategic cities with antiaircraft guns, build up a powerful air force, root the dead timber and the gone-to-seed ideas out of all our fighting services, keep this whole fighting machine shined up and abreast of science and invention and pay all or most of the bills as we go along.

So much for the physical part of the job. The mental and spiritual part looks far easier to us than the physical.

We can see no sense in the screams of various cranks, pet-cause pushers and godsakers that we've got to follow them or perish.

For examples: Assorted sourpusses are telling us that we're too lighthearted a people, and have got to forget our jesting optimism and concentrate on life's glummer (and gloomier) side. Assorted moralists allow as how we must have a great Spiritual Awakening, which that may mean in a country full to overflowing with churches and churchgoers. Proud patriots are yawning that we've all got to stop saluting the flag at the drop of a hat anywhere—and the Supreme Court, less, fell for one aspect of this guff in the Jehovah's Witnesses decision. People who hate liquor, tobacco, dancing, the movies, golf, etc., etc., keep yelling at us that we must give up what each yeller hates most, and stop paying tribute to some foreign dictator. You can say "Hokum."

Reynaud, in the passage quoted above, outlined the only mental and spiritual realization we really need to make as a people. What we need to do is to come around, quickly, to a hard-boiled realization that the world has moved into another gangster, pirate, lawless era, and that any nation desiring its independence must act accordingly.

Get that fact nailed into the nation's mind, and get up those defense forces as fast as we can, and we'll have done our whole duty as thoroughly as it can be done. The surplusage—hooey—pap for persons whose minds have never grown up.

Lie Awake and Like It

WE IMAGINE in this kinetic country a large percentage of people have one or more bouts of insomnia—sleeplessness—per week, though we don't know of any statistics on the subject. Ordinary insomnia, we mean; the kind you don't have to see your doctor about.

Well, one of the better tricks in life is to make your misfortunes and mistakes work for you whenever you can; and you certainly can make simple insomnia work for you.

The essence of the secret is not to fight insomnia. Relax, from tip to toe, inch by inch, in the most comfortable position you can assume. Then DON'T lie there wishing sleep would arrive and despairing because it doesn't. Forget about sleep. Think about anything else under the moon but sleep.

To make insomnia work for you, the thing to do is to think about whatever most pleases and entertains your own mind.

If you're fond of music, you most likely have a good memory for music. Well, then, let imaginary orchestras, brass bands or boogie-woogie killer-dillers play your favorite pieces for you in your brain. One old lady of our acquaintance used to while away sleepless hours very enjoyably by repeating poems she knew by heart, she knowing plenty. Another, who had a vivid visual memory, kept her occasional sleepless interludes calm by running through in her mind a lot of her favorite pictures, their colors and details and lines all over each time.

The point is that in an attack of insomnia your mind is asking for an attack of entertainment while your body wants to sleep. You'll humor your mind by letting it play what it likes best, you'll not only refresh it for the day's work, but you'll also get just as much physical rest as you can get from sleep.

July 27, 1940

5¢ A COPY

Collier's

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY

Bathtub Melody

A SHORT STORY
BY HOWARD RIGSBY

Now! Amazing Opportunity to Get Started in AVIATION!

...without Leaving Home and at UNBELIEVABLY Low Cost!

J. E. Fechet, Retired

More Than 60 Top Ranking Experts

Nationally famous in military, and naval aviation, have prepared course under the direction and editorship of following eminent of Editors:

Advisory Editor, Military Aviation
James E. Fechet, Retired

Formerly Chief of Air Corps, U. S. Army, commanded numerous Army Flying Fields; formerly Chief of Training and War Plans Division, D.C.A.S.

Advisory Editor, Civil Aviation
Alexander Klemin
Chairman Engineering, Guggenheim School of Aeronautics, N. Y. U.

Advisory Editor, Naval Aviation
Capt. Holden C. Richardson, Retired
Formerly Bureau of Aeronautics, U. S. Navy; also rector of engineering, Allied Motor Industries

General Editor, Don Ryan Mockler
Famous in the industry, the conspicuous part he played in Aviation's astounding growth; intimate acquaintance of the industry's key men.

AT LAST you can get ready, right at home, to prepare for a real job in the Aeronautical Industry—or to learn the principles of flying—through these complete, brand new LECTURES IN AERONAUTICS! Just finished, they include the very latest developments in every department. Written especially for The NATIONAL AERONAUTICAL COUNCIL, by outstanding leaders in Civil, Military and Naval Aviation, assisted by dozens of top-rating Government Specialists! Now you can give yourself a thorough foundation knowledge in every branch of up-to-date Aeronautics, and be ready for progress as a flyer, airplane mechanic or expert factory worker.

ONLY 25c A WEEK...and You Can Stop Any Time!

Prepares for Written C.A.B.* Examinations for Pilot's License!

HERE, at last, is the really simple, comprehensive, low-priced Home Study Instruction in Aeronautics for the air-minded men and women of America.

If you are eager to fly, or to get a job in an airport or factory—but can't attend a technical school—you are one of those for whom the National Aeronautics Council has made this complete low-cost home instruction possible. Be among the first to benefit from this great achievement!

How Could It Be Done at Such Trifling Cost?

It was possible only because The National Aeronautics Council was able to secure the co-operation of the most famous and most highly qualified Civil, Military and Naval leaders. With their aid, instruction has been prepared which is outstanding in completeness and unquestioned in authority.

The Council's aim is to make easily available the practical basic knowledge for work in all branches of the rapidly expanding aviation industry! Whatever branch of Aeronautics you prefer, this clearly written, easily-understood home-study instruction will give you a valuable head start—will help you to qualify more quickly for the job you want.

Weekly Lectures Instruct You in All Branches of Aviation

The lectures come to you each week, for 54 weeks, in AERONAUTICS. From the very first instructions, you will be guided forward steadily and surely, week by week, until you have a firm grasp of every subject which relates to designing, servicing, and flying all the chief types of aircraft. Famous authorities like

*Civil Aeronautics Board

Col. Roger Q. Williams, Major Augustus Post, Dr. Jean Piccard, E. A. Link, inventor of the famous Link trainer, and over 60 others have been among the contributors to this remarkable home-study instruction—yours for only 25c a week!

Over 1,500 Photos, Charts and Diagrams All Instructions Easy to Understand

All through the N.A.C. Lectures, clear pictures assist you in comprehending the lectures quickly and completely. Wherever a photograph or drawing will help, it is furnished. Sometimes, as in the illustrations showing the vitally important folding and manipulation of a parachute, you find a whole movie-like series so that you cannot fail to understand every step. The specially prepared illustrations average 2 to a page!

Air Photos and Maps of 24 Principal Airports—Without Extra Expense!

These Airport Photographs are accompanied by carefully drawn maps which indicate every feature of each landing field, including—area, altitude, surface conditions, lighting, beacons and indicators, signals, obstructions to avoid on all sides, etc., etc. Aeronautics will contain an Airport Photo and Map every other week.

ENROLL NOW!

Only 25 Cents Starts You!

Mail the coupon below with only 25c for Issue No. 1 of AERONAUTICS, which will come to you weekly. You do not obligate yourself to accept all 54 weekly issues of this instruction. If you are not completely satisfied, you can stop when you please. (Handsome leatherette filing case available at trifling cost.) National Aeronautics Council, Inc., 37 West 47th St., New York, N. Y.

216 LECTURES ON AERONAUTICS!

Below Is Just a Part of the Complete List

Theory and Practice of Flying

Civil Air Training Plan in National Defense (Requirements for enrollment—procedure of applicant—training plans.)
Military Training for qualified Civil Air Training Pilots (Qualifications—Extent of training—Pilot Status at Completion of Course.)
The Student Permit
The Private License
The Commercial License
The Transport License Instrument Rating
Instructor Rating
Theory of Flight
Ground Training
Field Regulations for Flight—Inspection of Plane Before Flight Safety Measures in Air Control of Private Aircraft
Primary Flight Instruction
Primary Flight Training
Advanced Flight Training
Army Flying Training
Naval Flight Training
Lift Increasing Devices Light Plane Operation
Float Plane Operation
Big Flying Boats
Gliding and Soaring
Lighter Than Air
Principles of Rotating Wing Aircraft
Civil Uses of Autogiro
Military Uses of Autogiro
The Flight Surgeon
Pilot and His Parachute
Aerobatics
Formation Flying
Civil Airway Regulations
Civil Airport Regulations
Flight Records
Glossary of Aviation Terms

Blind Flying
The Link Trainer
Radio Navigation
Contact Flying
Radio Communications
—Private
—Airline
—Military
Flight Instruments
De-Icing
Electrical Installations
Engine Instruments
Airport Aids to Flight
Electrical Interference in Flying
Notes on Sextants
Naval Air Organization
Shipboard Catapults
Aircraft Carriers
Aerial Photography
Hydraulic Controls
Aeronautical Inventions
Radiosonde
Blind Flying Instruction
Artificial Horizon
Blind Flying Panel

Acceptance Tests of Airplanes—Military Carburation Adjustment for Aerobatics
Anti-Corrosive Measures
The Aircraft Industry
Air Corps Material Division
Naval Aircraft Factory
Naval Design and Research
Army Maintenance
Navy Maintenance
Stratosphere Operations
Trans-Oceanic Operation Research Flying
Faults Revealed During Flight
The Air Ambulance Operations, Communications, General Applications, Military and Civil Army Aviation Careers
Naval Aviation Careers
Civil Aviation Careers
The Army Air Corps
GHQ Air Force
Aircraft versus Battleship
Aircraft in National Defense Defense Against Aircraft
Dive Bombing
Dog Fights
Bomber versus Pursuit
Army Expansion Program
Naval Strategy and Tactics
Airline Operation
Airport Management
Air Traffic Control
Night Flying and Airport Lighting Launching and Beaching
Giant Flying Boats
Application of Model Experience to Airmanship
Map Making from Air Photographs
Air Show Organization and Management Air Work in Canada
Aerial Forestry Patrol
Charter Flying
Fixed Base Operation
Plane Rental Service
Production Engineer
Television in Aircraft
Mountain Flying
Airline Maintenance
Sky Writing
Government Civil Service
Civil Aviation Careers

Airplanes, Engines and Accessories

Transport Planes
Uses and Types of Military Airplanes Private Aircraft
Principles of Aircraft Engines Engine Types and Specifications Engine Testing and Rating
Causes of Engine Failures Engine Starters and Starting Engine Top Overhaul Engine Superchargers
The Diesel Engine
The Water and Chemical Cooled Engine Engine Accessories
Fuel and Oil Systems
Retractable Landing Gear
Fixed Pitch Propellers
Controllable Pitch Propellers
Routine Test Flights
Performance Test Flights Flying Boat Operation
Care of Hulls and Floats
Flotation Gear
Multi-Engine Aircraft
Military Procurement and Production
Lightning and Aircraft Acceptance Tests of Airplanes—Civil

3,328 Pages! A marvelous "refresher course" for those who wish to brush up on earlier training and get the "last word" on every subject!

Only 25 cents a week - and you may stop anytime!

Copyright, 1940, by The National Aeronautics Council, Inc.

Mail this Coupon with 25c for Your First AERONAUTICS

National Aeronautics Council, Inc., Dept. 327, 37 West 47th St., New York, N. Y.

For the enclosed 25c, please send me the first issue of AERONAUTICS containing the first group of lectures (THEORY AND PRACTICE OF FLYING; METEOROLOGY, NAVIGATION, AND INSTRUMENTS; AIRPLANES, ENGINES, AND ACCESSORIES; and OPERATIONS, COMMUNICATIONS, GENERAL APPLICATIONS) prepaid, and enroll me for one year. You may send me AERONAUTICS weekly at the rate of 25c a week until I give you notice to cancel my enrollment. For convenience in bookkeeping, you may bill me once a month for such lectures as I receive.

Name..... Age.....

Address.....

City..... State.....

WILLIAM L. CHENERY Editor
CHARLES COLEBAUGH Managing Editor
THOMAS H. BECK Editorial Director

WALTER DAVENPORT
AIMEE LARKIN
QUENTIN REYNOLDS
KYLE CRICHTON
KENNETH LITTAUER
JAMES N. YOUNG
MAX WILKINSON

Politics
Drama
Sports
Screen and Theater
Fiction
Fiction
Fiction

WM. O. CHESSMAN
HENRY L. JACKSON
GURNEY WILLIAMS
DENVER LINDLEY
FRANK D. MORRIS
IFOR THOMAS
CLARENCE H. ROY

Fine Feathers
Humor
Articles
Articles
Photographs
Syntax

W. B. COURTNEY
FRANK GERVASI
MARTHA GELLHORN
JIM MARSHALL
WM. HILLMAN
ROBERT McCORMICK
JOHN T. FLYNN

Medi
Sci
Th Euro
Wa
Assoc

THIS WEEK

JULY 27, 1940

SHORT STORIES

HOWARD RIGSBY

Bathtub Melody. Wet romance, set to music. Page 9

ERNEST HAYCOX

Dark Land Waiting. Neighbors really meant something to a pioneer woman. Page 14

THOMAS McMORROW

Dusty Death. Crime and drama in the pine woods. Page 16

F. R. BUCKLEY

Childhood of Miss Churt. Why Mr. Wharton brought a kitten to his wedding. Page 22

THE SHORT SHORT STORY

The Alarm Clock, by Mark Saxton. Page 20

SERIAL STORIES

WILLIAM C. WHITE

Occupation: Widow. The fourth of nine parts. Dangerous intrigue. Page 13

JOHN AUGUST

Rain Before Seven. Conclusion. When conspirators fall out. Page 17

ARTICLES

ROBERT MONTGOMERY

An Open Letter to a German Hero. From an American movie star. Page 11

FRANK J. TAYLOR

The Golden Horse. The gorgeous Palomino stages a comeback. Page 12

JIM MARSHALL

End of a Dream. The Philippines take a second look at independence. Page 18

WALTER DAVENPORT

The Winner—FAMINE. Europe faces its most horrible winter. Page 21

FRANK CONDON

Leave the Lady Be. Jean Arthur, who's supposed to dislike inter-viewers. Page 24

DAN PARKER

When Seconds Count. Handlers can make or break a fighter. Page 30

FRELING FOSTER

Keep Up with the World. Page 6

EDITORIALS

If Germany Wins.

Give Us Machines and Men. Page 58

COVER

ARTHUR CROUCH

ANY WEEK

WE'VE just been to the movies. We're sorry you weren't there. But your movie theater is probably one of the many that has turned this film down. The exhibitors say that you're protesting against newsreels of war; that you don't want to see Hitler's mechanized waves and diving airplanes sweeping to flaming victory over Holland, Belgium and France. But you should see it. It should be a must picture. And Congress should be compelled to look. We were glad to hear that the General Staff of the United States Army has "consented to see it." It's about 7,000 feet of film shot by official German army photographers from planes and on the ground. Here's your lightning war. Here's your modern army racing to conquest. Here are Norwegian, Holland, Belgian and French cities transformed in a few seconds from caressing peace and quiet to blazing inferno. In the streams of terror-stricken civilians fleeing the storm of fire and steel we saw our own neighbors. In the stunned faces of the Allied soldiers, taken prisoners, we saw ourself. But that's incidental. Hitler's army is an assembly line turning out wholesale murder. Its attack was a beautifully rehearsed hell. From the dive bombers to the parachute troops, from the huge hell-roaring tanks to the simple soldier, every man, every wheel, knew exactly what it was doing and what it was going to do next. We left that projection room frightened. We were afraid that something—politics, stupidity, mental paralysis in high places, frozen military minds—might not see this preparedness program of ours through. If we make a botch of it and Hitler assembles his machine somewhere in the Western Hemisphere—well, it's goodbye to all of this.

WE ARE warned that this war will leave us holding the bag; and the bag will be heavy with hatred. France will hiss us for not sending those clouds of airplanes we didn't have. England who wasn't prepared will be sore because we weren't prepared. Germany will despise us for neither putting up nor shutting up. Our Latin-American brethren will spit in our eye knowing that we'd do nothing about it even if we could. Japan will take the Philippines if she wants and the Dutch East Indies if Hitler doesn't object. Russia will ignore us, and Italy's attitude will be dictated by Il Duce's Fuehrer.

Moreover, we shan't love ourselves devotedly. At least so we're assured by Mr. G. Lambert Hush of Columbus, Ohio, and we've no reason to suspect Mr. Hush of not being truthful. "We'd better give ourselves a New Deal in politicians, generals and radio commentators," says he. "This is no time for sucker government. Mr. Roosevelt seems to have run out of tricks. We need a fresh crop of generals who believe that the airplane has come to stay. We need radio voices whose first concern isn't the mispronunciation of European names. We've got to put the well-filled sock on professional Friends—Buddies of Britain, Friends of France, Pals of Poland, Rousers for Russia and Idolators of Italy. Let's elect a crew of hard-boiled realists who'll run this government and our armed forces (if and when) as if they didn't give a damn for any country but the United States. Let's grow up—suddenly."

AS a peaceful interlude we acknowledge a protest from Mr. Raul Martinez Ostos of Mexico City, Mexico. In Frank Gervasi's recent article Swastika Over Mexico, Mr. Ostos was listed as one of the "men to watch." Mr. Ostos denies this with heat. "I do not know the source of Mr. Gervasi's information," says he, "but he states a falsehood when he refers to me. I am neither a member of the fifth column, as charged by Mr. Gervasi, nor a private secretary to the secretary of the treasury nor member of the Communist party. The imputations made in your magazine . . . hurt my reputation seriously. At this moment in the history of the world I feel it is a crime to serve underground forces of national disintegration. It would be more useful to the United States if the press would publish articles that do not antagonize public opinion against Mexico for we have many things in common—the need of defending together our existence."

MR. AND MRS. WILL BELL of New York City stopped for breakfast at one of the numerous restaurants in the German Yorkville sector of that overcrowded city. Mr. Bell ordered scrambled eggs, Canadian bacon and French fried potatoes. So did Mrs. Bell. The waiter snapped to attention. "It is not possible. Sorry!" said the waiter in unmistakable gutturals. "A German restaurant this is, yes, and we are not permitted to discuss the war."

MRS. OTTO PROBST of South Bend, Indiana, read Frank Gervasi's Swastika Over Mexico, particularly the paragraphs setting forth the lamentable death of Otto Ernest Friederich Probst, with some interest. Her telephone has been ringing ever since. She would like to have it known that the Mexican Mr. Probst was not her husband. "My Otto Probst," writes

she, "is very much alive, an ex-statistician, plays slightly ungolf, does not drink to excess, a retiring nature and does not have a fat neck. We have been married months."

WHILE you're rejoicing with South Bend Probsts, Jim Marshall, Far East correspondent, is coming people to tell them that in Bombay saw a large colored boy beating drums in a dance band. "America asked Mr. Marshall. "Alabama the drums. "Like it out here," said the relentless Mr. Marshall. "Sho does," replied Alabama. "India boys treat us white folks."

IT WASN'T long after that that Marshall was on the Pacific, sailing home on a ship which he said run in the interests of the comfort those who didn't sail on her. One night during a despairful quiet dining saloon, the sharp voice of a lady passenger was heard. There was having major trouble with the steward. "Remember," she said, "some day you may be a passenger on this ship." And the steward: "I won't be sucker enough to pay."

SUCH incidents will not happen. Professor Jethro Peace Blair of Los Angeles, California, is elected president. Ignored by the Republicans and Democrats, Professor Blair pushed to run independently. And the says, will be "inconvenient, but means forbidding." Anyway, he tells us that the chief plank in his form will be that "every American family will be given a home, free cost and free of taxes, with the proviso that they move in at once and stay there continuously for not less than two years."

ALAS, all we can tell Mrs. T. DuBois Gross of Miami, Florida, that the gold she's worrying about we hope, still buried under Fort Kentucky. So many things have happened lately that we'd sort of forgotten about it. Not that we're doing Mrs. Gross asks: "If the stock market takes another dive and this goes for inflation and we get into against the public's wish, what they do with all that gold we bought higher than the market."

MAKE swell bullets. . .

A Lot of "Heart Trouble" Isn't!

D MANY PEOPLE have fear in their hearts—at their hearts.

They have been told that "heart trouble" usually announces itself by such warning symptoms as shortness of breath, sense of oppression or acute pain near heart, or fainting.

However, no one symptom should make you decide, "I have heart trouble!" The cause may actually be disease of the lungs or digestive system, or nervous strain—or it may be something relatively unimportant. But, whenever any signs appear—your physician should be the one to decide if it's really wrong!

Such aids to accurate diagnosis as the stethoscope, the fluoroscope, the electrocardiograph, enable him in most cases to determine the heart's condition. He may be able to assure you that your heart is sound, that something minor needs correction.

Even if the trouble is in your heart it need not necessarily mean that you will be an invalid—if it is detected in its early stages. You may be able, by following the doctor's instructions, to continue working and enjoying life for many years.

► Today, many men and women whose hearts are not normal lead useful, active lives. They and their doctors know what their hearts can and cannot do; their habits of work, exercise, recreation, rest, eating, and drinking, are sensibly regulated.

The most common forms of heart trouble strike most frequently after the age of 40. As you and your heart approach this period, it is wise to modify your work and play so as to avoid overexertion. Too much of either is dangerous. Get plenty of rest and keep your weight down. Remember, too, that sudden indulgence in unusual or over-long exercise is apt to place too severe a strain on the heart.

► And at this time—more than ever—it is important to have thorough annual health examinations. Such examinations often can detect trouble before serious symptoms appear.

For valuable information concerning the hearts of young and old, send for the Metropolitan's free booklet, "Protecting Your Heart."

COPYRIGHT 1940—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

Frederick H. Ecker, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD

Leroy A. Lincoln, PRESIDENT

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company
1 Madison Avenue, New York, Dept. 840-C
Please send me a copy of your booklet, "Protecting Your Heart."

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

Plan to visit the Metropolitan's exhibits at the New York World's Fair and at the Golden Gate International Exposition in San Francisco.

Eleanor Holm . . . star of Billy Rose's Aquacade at the World's Fair . . . says:

"Four performances a day would be ruinous to my hair if it weren't for 'Vaseline' Hair Tonic. I use it regularly to keep my hair soft and lustrous and to protect my scalp from the drying effect of too much sun and water."

Keep your hair lovely the ELEANOR HOLM way!

DON'T let sunshine, swimming and outdoor sports dim your crowning glory this summer! Follow the advice of America's number one outdoor girl, Eleanor Holm, and keep your hair as lustrous and lovely as she does!

Rub plenty of 'Vaseline' Hair Tonic on your scalp before every shampoo. Then before going for a swim . . . or out in the sun . . . smooth a very few drops on your hair. Not only will you combat dryness this way . . . but also help protect your wave, make your hair easy to arrange.

Start using 'Vaseline' Hair Tonic today . . . and see what a difference it makes in your oomph!

BEFORE SHAMPOOING
... Be sure to massage scalp liberally with 'Vaseline' Hair Tonic.

BEFORE GOING OUTDOORS . . . apply a few drops to supplement natural scalp oils and keep hair lovely looking.

'Vaseline' Hair Tonic is the OFFICIAL hair preparation of both World's Fair Aquacades.

Vaseline HAIR TONIC

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

Copyright 1940, Chesebrough Mfg. Co., Cinc'd.

KEEP UP WITH THE WORDS By Freling Foster

Nearly eighty different infectious diseases are transmitted to human beings by animals. The cow is the source of twelve, the dog eight, the pig, cat and horse five each. Other animals on the list include sheep, goats, wild rabbits, squirrels, rats, parrots, fish, oysters, clams and several species of insects.

A calorimeter now used by an American university will record on paper the amount of heat produced when one thousandth of a gram of sugar is dissolved in a quart of water.

When a person is shot or otherwise injured while in a state of intense fear, the excessive amount of adrenalin in his blood at the time contracts the blood vessels and arrests the hemorrhage to such an extent that coagulation takes place from two to four times faster than under normal conditions.

One-sidedness in a person is shown not only in the use of the hand, but also in the use of the eye and the foot. In other words, a left-handed individual will normally use his left eye to look into a microscope and his left foot to kick an object out of the way.

Although America is one of the best fed nations, more than forty per cent of its people suffer from dietary deficiencies. Experts estimate that if all families had sufficient purchasing power and knew the kind and quantity of food required, the consumption of butter would be increased 15 per cent, milk 20 per cent, eggs 35 per cent, tomatoes and citrus fruits 70 per cent, and leafy, green and yellow vegetables 100 per cent.

Within the past ten years, the tourist-camp business has developed into a $300,000,000 "motor court" industry. There are now more than 20,000 of these courts, a large number of which have cabins with garages, tile bathrooms and telephones. Many are highway hotels, costing as much as $350,000 and offering such conveniences as air-conditioned rooms and restaurants, swimming pools and shopping facilities.

The quantity of wood the average person utilizes during the course of his life—in house construction, furniture, musical instruments, motorcars, sports goods, pencils, magazines, papers, books and other paper articles—is equivalent to the amount of wood required to build about four hundred large trees.

All ships at sea and all wireless stations in contact with them are required by international law to stop transmission for five minutes, at the 15th and 45th minute past the hour, Greenwich time, to listen for distress signals.

When the moon is a crescent, the light that makes the whole moon faintly visible is earthshine, the sunlight that is reflected by the earth. At that time of the month, the earthshine on the moon is estimated to be twelve times as great as the light of a full moon on the earth.

The San Jacinto Monument at Houston, Texas, is the tallest monument of its kind in this country, standing twelve feet higher than the Washington Monument. Costing more than $1,000,000 and dedicated April, 1939, it commemorates the famous twenty-minute battle at San Jacinto in 1836, in which the United States defeated Santa Anna and freed Texas from Mexico.

Although the land area of Canada is nearly 500,000 square miles, less than that of the United States, more than ninety per cent of its population live within two hundred miles of the American border.

The Japanese catch a species of octopus, Eledone chata, in an earthen jar, fasten a rope, which is lowered to the bottom, ranging from 60 to 120 feet. The octopus crawls into it and is lodged, when brought to the surface, by pouring hot water into the hole in the bottom of the jar.

Five dollars will be paid for each interesting or unusual fact accepted for this column. Contributions must be accompanied by a factory proof. Address Keep Up With the Word, Collier's, 250 Park Avenue, New York City. This column is copyrighted by Collier's. The National Weekly. None of the material may be reproduced without express permission of the publisher.

Nature makes Beer

A NATURAL PROCESS
CONVERTS MALTED
GRAIN AND HOPS
INTO BEER AND ALE!

Beer and ale are produced by fermentation—one of the most familiar and useful natural processes known to man. The brewing of beer and ale was first discovered thousands of years ago.

CENTURIES OF BREWING EXPERIENCE ARE APPLIED TO MAKE
BEER TASTE BETTER

Although Mother Nature brews beer, the Brewer's skill is needed to make beer taste as good as it does today. Modern knowledge of brewing is the result of centuries of experience.

A wholesome beverage, it deserves to be sold only in wholesome surroundings

Simple natural ingredients—malted barley and other grains, yeast, pure water, and hops for flavor—that's what beer and ale are made of.

A natural fermentation process converts these ingredients into foaming beer and ale—low in alcoholic content, but rich in flavor—the beverages of moderation.

But it is not enough that beer itself is wholesome. For your protection the place where beer is sold should be clean and wholesome, too.

That is why the Brewing Industry has instituted a "clean-up or close-up" program to eliminate any undesirable beer retail establishments. This program is now in effect in a number of states. It is being extended.

We'd like to tell you about it in an interesting booklet. Write:—United Brewers Industrial Foundation, Dept. B16, 21 East 40th Street, New York, N. Y.

TODAY... A NEW KIND OF TAVERN BRINGS YOU GOOD BEER AND ALE IN CLEAN, WHOLESOME SURROUNDINGS

Most beer taverns today are respectable, and law-abiding, and inviting. The Brewing Industry wants the few but objectionable "black sheep" establishments eliminated. To do this, the Industry now cooperates closely with law-enforcement officers in a growing number of states.

BEER... A BEVERAGE OF MODERATION FOR THE NATION

Sails and salt water—palms and pools—'dobe and d
—saddles and snow caps—Long Distance will help have a carefree vacation wherever you go!

Telephone ahead to check reservations and arr visits with friends along the way. Telephone home to sure the rest of the family and get the news from the o

It's fun to share your fun by telephone. Breaking hooking a big one, snowballing in summer sun, all pa
double thrill when you tell some one far away about (Rates for all transcontinental calls and most other calls over 420 airline miles were reduced May 1.)

The Bell System cordially invites you to visit its exhibits at the New York World's Fair and the Golden Gate International Exposition, San Francisco

Young so nicely in your bath," he said. "What was that song?"
He couldn't stop now—not even for her. He whirled, stumbled and lunged through the door

Bathtub Melody

By Howard Rigsby

ILLUSTRATED BY GILBERT DARLING

No matter what anybody says, the handsome stranger in the beautiful lady's tub was only a worried song writer waiting for his muse

JAKE SPEER woke with what he hoped were the rudiments of the tune he wanted running through his head. It was just a bar or two, but after six weeks of sterility even that was something. He got out of bed humming it as he put on his robe and slippers so that he wouldn't lose it. He knew the thing; he'd never work it out into a good song in a shower. He was glad George Blair had been down and fixed it so he'd have a tub. That, he realized now, was what had been bothering him ever since he came west. There were only two tubs in George's beach house, and up in Hollywood the rooms hadn't been right somehow. He sighed, thinking of the old bathroom back on East Fifty-eighth Street. He hoped George's aunt would have a nice one. "She's got a couple," George had told him. "She won't mind at all." He threw a big, fluffy towel over his shoulders and let himself out. Still buzzing with melody, he crossed the street, giving the notes more volume now because the roar of the morning traffic was distractingly unharmonious. That would be the house George had pointed to last night, he thought—that charming, white one. He let himself through a picket gate, passed along a shrubbed path and stepped onto a bricked porch. The front door was open, revealing a room pleasantly filled with paint-chintz and morning sunlight. Jake knocked, hesitated a moment and then walked in.

He was just supposing the old lady still abed when he saw her. She was seated at breakfast in a windowed alcove, a half-raised coffee cup pointing her surprise. She was gray-haired and quite nice-looking, but undoubtedly startled. Jake hoped she hadn't forgotten about George telling her he'd be over.

"Good morning," he said, looking for a likely exit to the bath. It wouldn't do to get involved in any distracting conversation at this moment of creation.

"Good morning," his temporary hostess replied faintly.

He supposed she was getting ready to ask him questions about his work or something, involve him in a nice long chat.

"Well," he said hastily, "I hope you don't mind my bathing at this unseemly hour." He laughed; then, resuming his humming, crossed the room, entering a hallway.

He tried a likely door. It was a bedroom. He had a glimpse of dark hair spread out on a pillow, and a tanned feminine arm. Shutting that door, he tried another, then immediately gasped with pleasure. He was, he realized, standing on the threshold of just about the nicest little bathroom he had ever seen. Hearing the scrape of a chair in the other room, he entered quickly and locked the door.

The walls were done in pale yellow and there was a tub in cheerful aquamarine, a beautiful, adequate tub, long enough for a tall man to stretch out in. It was, Jake thought, a décor sprightly, yet not garish. Windows opened out into a sunlit garden where gaily plumaged birds were singing in a eucalyptus tree. Entranced, he went over and turned on the hot water, then mixed in a little of the cold. Like a symphony, the water thundered into the tub. Steam rose, and even as Jake slipped out of his robe he felt the melody bubbling within him.

"So that's it!" he exclaimed. "You're a puritan. Full of musty old orthodox scruples!"

When the sting was gone from the hot water he lay back and closed his eyes. After ten minutes he began to tap on the edge of the tub. The melody came, and words to fit the melody. Drying himself, he sang the chorus. He was ready for the piano now—quick.

He opened the door, concentrated for a moment on the melody in his head, then bolted.

"Was it a nice bath?" someone asked him as he reached the front door.

Something about that voice stopped him dead. It was not George's aunt speaking. He turned his head.

The girl was wearing a striped Roman-silk housecoat, drinking coffee, dangling one mule on her toes as she watched him. Hers was the long, dark hair he had seen on the pillow. But there was nothing in all this to make him gasp: it was her face, the tilt of the nose, the mouth just so. . . . He stared at her speechlessly for a moment, his eyes still foggy with creation.

"You sing so nicely in your bath," she said. "What was that song?"

That song! He couldn't stop now—not even for her. He whirled, stumbled, muttered a curse, and plunged through the door. He cast a slipper as he fled down the path, and lost his towel on a picket of the gate.

WHEN Joe Haver phoned from Hollywood that afternoon, Jake, still in his robe, was halfway through, picking it out on George's baby grand, pausing to jot it down when he got it right. He let the phone ring for a long while, then answered savagely.

"Jake?" said Haver. "This is Joe."

"Oh," said Jake. "Hello, Joe. Listen—"

"You listen!" Haver cried. "I want that music! You been out here six weeks and I haven't got a single note of music from you. You got three numbers to do for me—remember? I got to have the first one day after tomorrow."

"You'll have it tomorrow!" Jake shouted, and hung up.

He worked all that night.

At dawn he dressed, rolled up his music and got in his car. He stopped for breakfast on the road, reaching the studio at nine. He ran through the piece for Joe Haver and George Blair, then spent most of the rest of the day discussing the score with the music director. It was a real bang of a tune everybody said.

"The only thing worries me, Joe," Haver told him, "is that it took you weeks to do it, Jake. You got only two weeks left to get out two more tunes."

Jake waved airily. "You don't have to worry," he said. "I'm in the groove."

"How do you like my aunt's bathtub?" George asked him when the producer had left them.

"It's wonderful!" Jake said. "George, your aunt's bathtub is simply marvelous!" He became less eulogistic, more casual. "I was just wondering what the girl is that's staying with her."

"Girl?" George said. "What's she look like?"

"Dark hair," said Jake. "Very interesting sort of girl."

George seemed puzzled. "It might be my cousin," he said finally. "She lives in Phoenix. She drives out sometimes. He looked thoughtfully at Jake. "She's married," he told him.

"Married!" Jake said. "Oh. . . ."

NEXT morning he woke with only a record in his head. He lay brooding, thinking how unjust it was that after all these years he should find her married. But, he reflected—desperately grasping at any straw in sight—perhaps she was unhappy. Maybe her husband who was there in Phoenix was cruel to her. He had left him there, hadn't she? She'd come out to the coast alone!

He leaped out of bed. He put on his robe and slippers, noting when he cleaned his teeth that he'd better shave. He shaved carefully and brushed his hair. She simply couldn't stay married to anyone else, he decided. Even if he were happily married, he must explain to her that it was all a mistake. He would have to get a divorce. Why, then, since he had written the music for his first Triangle Show, five years before, she had been his girl. He had fallen asleep with his head on the keyboard one night and he had dreamed about her; then he'd written that song, You Girl. That was she. And now that she had become a real, live girl in a housecoat she belonged to him.

He absently took a shower before he left, then, selecting a towel and putting on George's best beach robe, he went whistling across the street.

As before, the door of the little white house was open and the morning sun was streaming in, lighting up the many paintings, scapes of sea, of dunes, of the serene, rolling hills of southern California. Jake tapped on the screen and stepped inside, his glance going directly to the breakfast alcove.

She was there alone, the silk housecoat proving indubitably that there was not a thing wrong with her figure. The sun made a nimbus of the curling ends of her dark hair; her blue eyes regarded Jake levelly.

For a moment he was speechless again, his expression rapt and almost unbelieving as he stared at her. Then he said with hearty joviality, "Good morning! Well—I've just come to take another tub in that splendid little tub."

"I thought that might be it," she said. "Won't you sit down and have some coffee, Mr.—"

"Speer," he said. "Jake Speer. I'd delighted."

He sat down and she poured a cup of coffee for him, her eyes still regarding him. (Continued on page 39)

An Open Letter to a German Hero

OTTO, FRITZ OR EVEN ADOLF:

You'll probably wonder why I'm writing to you without knowing your name. You'll have to put that down as an act of the war. Things happen fast over there and you don't get much time for social business. I suppose you know that as well as I do.

A matter of fact I almost met you. You remember that day on the road between Corbeil-Cerf and Marines? You must have been there and gone when Jack Thorsen and I drove up. We only missed you by about fifteen minutes. That's why I wanted to let you know how things came out.

I don't know how it is with you fellows but I once had a boss who was a real pro on reports. He wanted us to fill in the blanks every day and he was really sore when we didn't. This is just to let you that if you have any trouble with your boss you can get in touch with Jack or me and we'll back you up. You did a fine job that day. That French ambulance was a mess when you finished.

It almost seems as if I ought to know you. Were you with that bunch up around Beauvais? You certainly bombed the hell out of us that time when you came with the two hundred and fifty Messerschmidts. We saw a lot of German planes that way but the German aviators I talked with were the kids who bailed out south of Amiens and were captured by the French. One was sixteen and the other eighteen. They were pretty scared but they gave us a good idea of why you guys are so tough. When we mentioned Hitler their eyes lit up as if they had just seen God. Suppose you're pretty young yourself. We were with the American Field Service, Section One, Jack and I. That's where we happened to run into you. We went into action first around Amiens. Two of our ambulances got busted up there and four of our men were reported missing. I don't need to tell you much about how the ambulances work. We were supposed to stay eight kilometers behind the line and bring cases from the dressing stations to the emergency hospitals.

We'll back you up. You did a fine job that day. That French ambulance was quite a mess when you finished."

Robert Montgomery on duty with the American Field Service in France

The only trouble was that the line was all over the place. Your infantry was alongside of us and behind us and everywhere. We had to retreat.

Well, that's how it went. We had to evacuate the emergency hospitals and try to keep the men coming from the dressing stations. We got down to Beauvais and were bumped out of there and then Jack and I worked between Corbeil-Cerf and Marines, where we almost met you. We had to go over a bridge at Pontoise, single file, and that was a torture every time. One day Jack and I were halfway over when the military police shunted us to the middle lane and made us wait there till a military column went past. There were seventy-five trucks in that column and it seemed to take hours to get by and we sat there with our hearts in our mouths and scared pie-eyed.

Why didn't you ever bomb that bridge? Do you remember it? Some of the fellows said it was because you wanted to use it yourself later but I never found out. But you were certainly on the job other places. Up around Amiens we never saw an Allied plane. You birds had a picnic there. We learned something, though. We found out that the safest place was right under the motor. When you fellows came over, we'd hop out, if we didn't have any wounded in the car, and crawl under the front end and stay there.

But what you're really interested in, I imagine, is that day when we missed you by fifteen minutes. You know that road between Corbeil-Cerf and Marines. Sort of a country lane with no houses around. A driver could see for miles in either direction. When we came battling along we saw this French ambulance in the ditch. Thought, first, it had just run off the road and was waiting there for the repairmen. But when we got up closer we saw the bodies. There was a French captain on the front seat, leaning against the side of the car. He was dead. There were three stretcher cases in the back of the ambulance, also dead.

We saw two farmers in the next field and they told us what had happened. They said the ambulance was driving along alone when you came over in a formation of twenty-five planes. Suddenly you left the formation and swooped down. You dropped one bomb behind the car and that made it swerve into the ditch. Then you dropped another one in front of it. After that you swerved around and came back and machine-gunned the ambulance.

There were big Red Crosses painted on both sides and on the top of the ambulance, so you had a good target. The driver was the only one saved. He had been carried off, wounded, just a few minutes before we got there. The captain seemed to have been killed by the bomb in front. The stretcher cases were killed by the machine-gun bullets. We could see that for ourselves.

I'm afraid I'm boring you with some of this stuff because you know it yourself. I just wanted you to know how it came out. You did a good, efficient job and nobody can take it away from you. People get bored with war stories after a while but you needn't worry about that. You can keep this letter to show them you were good. If you ever have any children, you can tell them about that day on the Corbeil-Cerf road. If there are any skeptics around doubting you, have them write to Jack Thorsen or me. We'll back you up. We'll be glad to tell anybody what happened.

Yours,

ROBERT MONTGOMERY.

PAYMENT FOR THIS "LETTER" HAS BEEN MADE, AT MR. MONTGOMERY'S REQUEST, TO THE AMERICAN FIELD SERVICE

THE GOLDEN HORSE

By Frank J. Taylor

PHOTOGRAPH FOR COLLIER'S BY J. WALTER COLLINGS

After vanishing for 400 generations, the world's most beautiful animal, the Palomino horse, is being revived

IMPATIENTLY Mr. Dwight Murphy waited for the sun to burn through the overcast hanging above Rancho San Fernando Rey in California's pastoral Santa Ynez Valley and then he hustled us out into the exercising yard behind the palatial stables to view "The King of Kings" in all his glory.

"Bring him out, Guy," he called.

And when Mr. Guy Rutherford led out El Rey de los Reyes, head high, eyes sparkling, coat glistening, feet prancing and muscles dancing we knew why horse experts have called this gorgeous Palomino the most beautiful animal in the world. As the sunlight rippled over his coat, El Rey looked like a horse freshly gold-plated, except for his silvery mane and tail and white nose and feet.

Palomino enthusiasts the country over are pinning their hopes on El Rey, and his sons Hijo and Conejo. Their blood is to restore again the glistening golden hue of a strain of royal riding horses purposely bred out of existence two milleniums ago by the Arabs. An amazing strain, this Palomino, with traits so prepotent that after four hundred hidden generations it is reviving itself on great ranches in California, Texas, Colorado, Oklahoma and other Western states.

How the Palomino acquired his golden hue in the first place is a hot, moot question among horse authorities. Fiery little Dick Halliday of Ojai, secretary-treasurer of the Palomino Association and keeper of the official stud registry, thinks he has traced the animal back to ancient Chaldea. He isn't quite sure, because the professor who was doing the best job was a Pole, and during the Nazi-Soviet digesting of Poland the professor and his records were lost. Meantime, Mr. Halliday cites the "Golden Horses with fair manes and tails" mentioned in the Homeric poems as the animals that carried the Greek demigods to victory. They were, he says, Palominos.

In his most enthusiastic moments, Mr. Halliday holds that the Palominos were the forerunners of the Arabian strain, and not just an offshoot of the Arabians, as other golden-horse enthusiasts like Mr. Dwight Murphy contend. Then there is Mr. Ed Borein, the Santa Barbara cowboy etcher and sketcher, who insists that "palomino" is just a lost basic color of horses, and not entitled to capitals.

(Continued on page 28)

Most famed Palominos are the three handsome stallions bred by Dwight Murphy on Rancho San Fernando Rey. El Rey de los Reyes, right, sired Conejo (center) and Hijo del Rey

Occupation: Widow

by William C. White
Illustrated by George Howe

Story Thus Far:

BERLIN, Paul Lesser and Rolf Blaerchen start a night at the Krokodil. Due largely to the attractiveness of Dirling, a singer whom they employ, they do a good deal. Then Lesser marries Carola, and, sent to Warsaw on a "government" mission, is killed in an automobile accident.

Heartbroken, and strongly suspecting that her husband's death had been planned by Blaerchen (a Nazi), Carola leaves Berlin. Three years later, a Nazi agent finds her in Rome and orders her to report to Blaerchen (who has become a power in the German Foreign Office) in Berlin. Knowing that to resist would be dangerous, she returns to the German capital. There Blaerchen informs her that she is to work for him as a spy; presently she is ensconced in a charming apartment, with a maid (Maria Kunkle, who is in Blaerchen's pay) on eye on her every move.

Sara Mainescu—a woman who, once engaged to Blaerchen and working for him, now hates him—calls on Carola. She makes no effort to hide her feelings toward her former employer. A few hours after she leaves the apartment, she is arrested.

Carola has one real friend in Berlin: Karl Dietrich. Once a soldier at the Krokodil, he had offended the authorities, and, just out of a concentration camp, he is deep in an anti-Nazi plot. Among those with whom he is working are: Hans Klaus's son-in-law, Franz Ranke; and a man named Heller, who works in the Foreign Office. Although Karl is on Blaerchen's black list, he and Carola meet—surreptitiously. At a brilliant party to which Blaerchen takes her, Carola meets Franz Wagner, who is interested in several theaters and she is introduced to Signor Froschetti, who is attached to the Italian Embassy. Wagner offers her a job. Froschetti's gallant advances, suggests that Carola lunch with him some soon.

Wondering about Blaerchen's true status at the Foreign Office, Karl queries Schebeler. Schebeler says that Blaerchen and Wilhelm Praut—both of whom are among Ribbentrop's favorites—are using the Foreign Office as a base for intrigue against Goering and Himmler.

Karl calls on Carola. They go for a walk, discuss the perils of their situation. Karl suggests that, should Carola ever receive from him, she send him a telegram. It is night. The street is dark. And their future—?

IV

CAROLA woke on a sunny February morning, the memory of Karl's deep, pleasant voice very real. Every word that he had said to her was something to be considered over and over again. On other mornings in Berlin she had awakened and the streets outside were quiet as they were quiet now. On other mornings, as now, she had heard the familiar sounds of family life in neighboring apartments, of breakfasts prepared, of children sent to school, of dogs taking the family dachshunds for a morning walk. Yet this day was different from all others and because of the first hint of warmth in the sunlight; after meeting Karl last night she knew that from now on she was not alone.

Her telephone rang early. Maria answered it. Herr Praut, of the Foreign Office, wishes to speak to you.

He called each day just as Blaerchen had prophesied. "I have a little free time today, meine Liebste," he said, clumsily intimate. His voice was as cautious as his manner. "I hoped I might see you today."

"I'm sorry, Herr Praut." The thought of a meeting with him made her shudder. "I shall be busy all day." "Perhaps you won't be busy the next time I call." "Perhaps." She hoped that gave him no encouragement.

He laughed lightly. "I shall be very patient." Blaerchen also called each morning. When Carola mentioned Praut, he was annoyed. "The Dumkopf could have more sense." Then, less heatedly, "I could advise you not to see him."

"I do not intend to see him," Carola said sharply. Blaerchen assumed the right to tell her whom to see and whom to avoid and she resented it. He had used the same phrase in speaking of Karl.

As she sat combing her hair, she thought of Karl. He had shown her a clear picture of her own situation. More than ever she would have to remain in

"I shall spend my life finding out who is to blame," he exclaimed. "And when I do—!"

Berlin, and pretend to Blaerchen that she was sincere, eager to do whatever he asked. But less important than learning the truth about her husband's death was finding some way to slip safely away from him. There would be some way! Her position here might be desperate and grow worse, yet she was less acutely worried about that than about Karl. He had no job and he probably had little money in this war-torn Berlin.

In worrying about him Carola felt released from her own worries; in having another person to be anxious about she felt something new. It was tantalizing to know that he was somewhere in this city and that, except in emergency, they had to stay apart. When worrying about Karl made her restless, she told herself that any man who had been through Karl's experience could take care of himself.

Without plans for the day and with her concern about Karl, time went slowly.

One habit she had acquired in the old days of itinerant cabaret singing was doing her own laundry. She still insisted on ironing even though Maria had objected.

While Maria watched disapprovingly, Carola set up a board to iron a few handkerchiefs and a dress. Usually Maria, whether working or doing nothing, went about smiling. For the past days she had been worried. As Carola spread the dampened dress before her, Maria said: "I'm anxious, Fräulein. I've had no letter from Fritz for more than three weeks! He used to write so regularly."

"I'm sorry," Carola said sincerely.

The telephone rang again. It was Froschetti, from the Italian Embassy, sounding annoyingly genial. "I've waited two days until I was sure I knew what I wanted more than anything else in the world."

"What is it?"

"To lunch with you." (Continued on page 41)

HE CAME out of the prairie from Virgil way, driving two matched bays and a light-paneled rig. His name, he said, was Crabtree and he sold a line of household articles. This prairie would one day blossom like the rose and towns would stand where mourning doves now nested in the river willows, but meanwhile would she kindly put him up to supper? Therefore Mrs. Rand had fed him and had been lavishly complimented. "You are," said Mr. Crabtree, "a rare cook." He removed the feed bags from the horses and tossed them into the rig; he donned his yellow duster, laid half a dollar in her palm, and prepared to go.

"I had not intended to charge," she said.

"Ah," said Mr. Crabtree, and gave out a sharp, cheerful laugh. "In a new land the religion is water and food and shelter. I respect religion." He lighted a cheroot and adjusted it at an angle that expressed his benevolent self-content. "Let me give you some practical advice. There are four hundred families newly arrived around here. Many drummers like me will be traveling through. You could make money feeding them."

Harriet Rand stood by the water barrel, watching him pass Brewerton's and diminish into the twilight, into the sea of breast-high yellow grass. All along the prairie the shanties and tents of homesteaders broke the evening horizon and, with the rapid arrival of darkness, points of topaz light winked forward from them. She closed her hand tightly on the half dollar, thinking that Mr. Crabtree would never know how it had strengthened her heart. This was the first money she had ever earned.

She heard her small daughter's feet scuffling around the shanty, and called at once: "Tara, don't go into the grass." The grass was beautiful but, deep in it, anywhere and everywhere, a cold and immaculate deadliness waited, with no warning to precede it but a dry rattling that was usually too late. She moved into the trapped summer's heat of the eight-foot square shanty whose flat tarpaper roof rendered out a strong asphalt smell.

There was a bed at one end of the room and a round-topped trunk with all her possessions, and a stove and table with two chairs, and two condensed milk boxes tacked on the wall for cupboards. This day she had made jelly from a gallon of blackberries given to her by the Bergs, who had traveled twenty miles to pick them on Crow Hill. Fear lived with her a great deal these days and it was a comfort to know she had made one thing with her hands, against the coming winter.

WITH half an ear she listened to the errant pattering of Tara's feet behind the house while she did the dishes and wiped the table's oilcloth. She put the half dollar on the table, gently worshipping her achievement. Money was life, though she had known nothing about that as long as Lieutenant Philip Rand had been alive to shelter and spoil her. She had one hundred and fifty dollars in her purse, her clothes in the trunk, the jelly in the cupboard, and this half dollar. Money was life and for a woman one year widowed there were so few ways of earning it.

She sat still before the table, a small woman who at twenty-six still displayed a girlish immaturity in her soft face and great round eyes and hesitant voice. Her quarter section would be worth two thousand dollars when patented. That was a year ahead and meanwhile how could she make her way? Since the day of the land rush, two weeks before, that question had never left her.

Black night moved in, so still that the oncoming swish of a body moving through the high grass seemed very loud. She slipped the half dollar under the oilcloth and turned to discover Clyde Jacks beyond the doorway.

He said: "If you want, I'll cut your hay and give you half of what we sell it for."

He was a dry, close, plugging man who thought of things like that. Salt sweat crusted his temples and sun had burned him a violent red. He was flat-chested and long-faced, with a slight stoop to his shoulders and he stood before her in a pair of trousers whose suspenders looped over the shoulders of flannel underwear turned gray by dust.

"All right, Clyde."

He said, as though it were an afterthought: "This country's no place for a single man or woman. You can't farm and I can't handle a house. It takes two."

That had been a growing consideration in his eyes during the last week and she wasn't surprised. "It is nice of you to think of me, Clyde."

"Your quarter section and mine would make money. As for Tara, I don't mind children." Then he added quickly, "Though I'd expect some of my own."

"I'll think of it."

"Let me know in a few days. I'd rather it was you, but if it ain't you it will have to be some other woman."

SHE moved to the doorway, watching his angular frame sway through the dark toward Brewerton's. All her tenderness and need of love made its silent cry and every fastidious instinct she owned shrank away from Clyde Jacks. Then she thought: "I am a widow with a child. I can expect nothing more than he offered. If I cannot make my own way I shall marry him. I have got to think of Tara."

Wagons moved down the road toward Brewerton's, and people walked the night, their voices running bell-clear through the dark. Two weeks before they had all flooded this land in one wave of land rush, hungering for escape and a fresh start on the breast of a rich land whose treasures were lush beneath their feet.

The land was as rich as they had dreamed, yet it lay hard and immobile and stubborn beneath them, its riches to be torn out only by sweat and thirst and hunger.

She was thinking: "If I fail here I can't go back. There is nothing behind me and not money enough left to move again. I must make my own way or I must marry." She took three jars of jelly from the cupboard and caught her daughter's hand and turned toward Brewerton's. Tara would grow up, and Tara must have a good life, one that would not end against a stone wall at the age of twenty-six. There had to be ways for a woman to live out here. But if there were not—

"Mommy," said Tara, "your fingernails bite and you are walking awfully fast."

Brewerton's lights cut round, warm holes in the complete black, and horses and wagons stood about the place and people's voices sent twining echoes abroad. Tara heard a boy's voice and ran ahead, crying: "Georgie, Georgie, can't catch me!" Brewerton's house was a shanty with two rooms and an adjoining lean-to for his blacksmith shop. Hospitably he had scattered boxes around the yard for seats and his daughter Letty moved through the small crowd with a pitcher of lemonade. She said: "I was about to come and get you, Harriet. You shouldn't be alone too much." The Websters were here and Clyde Jacks and the Bergs with their daughter Ingrid who was barely a woman, and Ben Lowe with his nondescript flock of children and a wife whose acid, unhappy voice now and then rasped through the general talk.

Dark Land Waiting

By Ernest Haycox

They were hard people in a hard country. But they were better neighbors than she had ever had before

ILLUSTRATED BY HARRY MORSE MEYERS

"It gets monotonous out here," he said. "When we live alone, we've got the worst companion in the world." He was an educated man turned sour, a man who believed in nothing

Tom Kertcher came out of the dark and paused and Harriet Rand noticed that his glance followed Letty Brewerton until she turned and saw him.

Webster said: "I don't make out what kind of plowin' you're doin' down there at the foot of your gully, Kertcher."

Kertcher sat back on his box, the tip of his cigarette setting up bright thin flashes against his eyes. "An earth dam to catch winter and spring rains. You've got to think of water out here."

Brewerton said: "We need wells, too. Haulin' water from the river takes too much time."

Mrs. Lowe's high, unhappy voice clashed through the silence. "We need a lot of things—and money to do it with. It is a year till crops. How can people live?"

A wagon's wheels groaned on the uneven road ruts and Curtis Kilrain drew into the shanty light's beam. Elizabeth Marsh sat beside him and a young man, thin and sick, pulled himself slowly from the wagon bed. Kilrain called: "I need two rolls of barbwire, Brewerton," and descended from the seat. He turned, holding up his hand to Elizabeth Marsh; and the silence in the yard was very strong.

"NO," said Elizabeth Marsh, "I'll wait here." She looked at the gathered people, her beautiful and rebellious eyes hating them.

Mrs. Berg said: "We need a school. We need a store and a post office."

Brewerton moved back of his shanty with Kilrain for the barbwire. Harriet Rand walked toward the young man beside the wagon. "This jelly is for you."

"Why," he said and showed her a strange, pale expression, "why, thanks."

"Then," said Webster, "we need a hotel. Lots of people passing through here."

Kilrain moved back with his barbwire, throwing it into the wagon. He stood a moment, watching the group, ironic and disbelieving; and looked up at Elizabeth Marsh on the wagon seat. Letty Brewerton came forward with her lemonade jar. "Elizabeth," she said, "are you thirsty?"

"No," said Elizabeth Marsh.

Curtis Kilrain swung up the wheel hub to his seat. Somewhere on the prairie horses rapidly ran and a man's voice yelled one word. He came into the light and hauled his horse back and jumped to the ground, flinging about to show the group a strained, wild expression.

Tom Kertcher said: "What's up, Pete?"

Pete Eccles breathed: "Mullan," and retreated slowly into the small crowd as Brazil Mullan rode out of the night. He stopped, three other men behind him, and from her place by the shanty, Harriet Rand saw Mullan's lank-long cheeks tilt down on Pete Eccles, and lift and go around the circle of people, and turn sly. He said: "Next time you take a pot shot at me I'll run you to hell and gone."

"Stay off my land and quit cuttin' my fences!"

"I'm warning you," said Mullan.

A voice said: "Hello, Brazil," from some yonder angle of the night. Mullan's head jerked upward and Harriet Rand noticed an alert and squeezing care come to his features. A rider drifted forward, a long young man who swayed on the saddle and gave Brazil Mullan an amused smile. "At it again, Brazil?" he asked and rested both hands before him. He belonged on the horse, he was part of it. Sun had bleached his eyes a pale blue that showed bright in the lamplight and sun had turned his cheeks a dark, smooth bronze. He was silently laughing at Brazil Mullan, yet it was the kind of amusement that made Harriet tremble.

(Continued on page 47)

Dusty Death

By
Thomas McMorrow

ILLUSTRATED BY JAMES E. ALLEN

He wasn't looking for murderers. But they were looking for him—and they didn't lose much time finding him

HOW I came to meet up with the Dust People, I was down in the Carolinas looking into some claims for stolen cars. I'm an investigator for insurance underwriters.

It was funny about that batch of claims. They weren't made by the owners we insured but by their heirs and families, and all they could tell us about the cars was that they had disappeared somewhere in the Carolinas, and the owners with them. Well, we were holding the claims up till we knew more, and I was seeing what I could find out.

Do you know the eastern Carolinas? It was new country to me. I certainly saw woods. People that say most of the woods in this country are cut down are not talking about the Carolinas.

Pine! I drove all afternoon and was still in the pine, except it might be an acre or two every few miles. It's not a pretty country. Pine woods are dark any time, and when the country is flooded and you look back under the trees it does not look homey.

Well, I was driving along and I got to noticing these little clearings every few miles. They were taken up with low, yellow hills maybe twenty feet high or so. I thought they were clay. And thinking of it later, I noticed the witch water was heavy on the road that afternoon.

The sun went down on me while I still had five miles ahead to the town where I wanted to talk to the state police. It grew black as sin under the pines but was still bright on the road. I was moving along at fifty miles when I saw a young lady in the road ahead of me.

She was facing me, giving me the once-over, I guess, and I was driving a snappy new sports roadster, as it happened. When I was almost up to her, she tumbles to the road, falls down. She lay there and I pulled up and got out, as you would.

She was groaning and I asked her what the matter was and could I help her and all like that and she said she'd been knocked down by a hit-and-run. I told her to get in my car and I'd take her into town, but she said she lived "up yonder," pointing to a dirt road that ran off through the pines, and would I take her home. Well, certainly, and I helped her into my car.

The young one went back and helped the old one. The old one cried like a cat, but it was all p

The dirt road was narrow and with swamp on both sides and I remember thinking I might have a little trouble getting the car out again, and that was once I was right.

I didn't observe the young lady particularly as my only idea was to get I could and get on my way, but I had an impression later that she was young and husky and good-looking and very clean and refined; dressed in men's shoes, and her hair like a nest. And I did remember she had like some outdoor animal, green and bright, such as you will see through in a zoo, not mean, but more unattractive. Well, she'd just been knocked down and might look a little wild and stary. And she had six fingers; and

We drove down this road a mile or into the pine.

WE CAME to one of these clearings with the yellow hills. She said where she lived, and I looked at the house in against these hills.

Now, it was getting twilight and I was only interested in getting going. I saw a one-story house with an eighty-foot front, and there was a window and a door. Through the window I could make out a big room and light was burning in back.

I gave them the horn but nobody came, not even dogs, and the young lady asked me to go knock on the door. So I got out.

The house was a little up on the hill and I started up for the door. The low ground felt like walking on a just outside the door it was piled high on both sides, three or four feet high. I stepped along, thinking of nothing much except that somebody would be home and help the young lady and could be on my way. And all of a sudden the ground gives 'way under me and down I go. The ground opened and swallowed me up.

I would not know how far I fell because it was such a surprise that I fell myself down under the ground. I was swallowed up, over my head, in soft stuff.

The stuff choked me, blinded me. I was drowning dry, there was a roaring in my ears; I'll tell you frankly, I'm on going to be closer to death once more all my life. But I am a long fellow, six foot three, and able to handle myself. I got my hands up through this soft stuff, clutching to try and grab something and haul out. I plowed my way trying to haul up, but the stuff held me in a grip all over. Well, I'm skinnier than a wire. I twisted like a worm, I worked with my feet and butted with my shoulders. Up there was the air. I just made it. The stuff seemed to be a little lighter and I could breathe a little and rest a little.

And then I came up like a man from the grave, head and arms, and there I stayed for a bit, coughing and sneezing and seeing only a blur out of my eyes. You know what the stuff was, don't you? It was sawdust. Those yellow hills were sawdust.

I could see the house, though it was good, and it wasn't where it belonged right in front of me, it was off to the side; unless I burrowed a long way under the dust. I gave a sneeze and wiped my eyes, and when I looked at it, I couldn't see the house where at all. My car was gone, too. I am telling you this thing just as it was, and there was a roaring in my ears as if the top of my head were coming

(Continued on page 55)

ain efore even

John August

WRITTEN BY C. C. BEALL

Sry Thus Far:

... fighting together on the Loyalist side in Spain, Caleb Thatcher, of Wallisport, Massachusetts, and Bert Hendricks also lost their lives when a fifth columnist, "Gabriel," betrays their unit to the enemy. Following the outbreak of the war in Europe, Caleb returns to Wallisport, where he meets Hope Shaler, who is engaged to Gabriel, whose machine-tool company is feverishly filling order for overseas. ... joining a labor union, Hendricks comes aboard. A few days later, one of Gabriel's factory buildings is burned. Whereupon, he accuses Hendricks of incendiarism. Caleb helps his friend to make his get-

... Gabriel, the widow of John's brother, is infatuated with Greg Ashburn, who, with a man known as "Sir Eric Bramm"—Heinemann!—has convinced Natalie that he is a British spy, whereas he is emulating the Nazis. Natalie passes on to him documents that Gabriel keeps under lock and key. ...

... is drowned—according to the popular opinion. But, having learned that Heinemann has come to Wallisport, Caleb feels sure he has been a victim of foul play. While attempting to find Heinemann, he asks Hope to help him. Ashburn promises to do his best. After which, Caleb disappears.

At this time, the realization has come to Caleb that she loves Caleb; and she has broken her engagement to John Gabriel. Worried that Caleb does not get in touch with her, she and two together—fragments of evidence which make a fairly clear picture of the situation; and, certain that Caleb is in the city, sets forth to find him. Meanwhile, Hope—who, conscience-stricken at last by the betrayal of John Gabriel (with whom she is in love), has gone to Ashburn's home to clear an important document she had hidden for the spy—encounters Heinemann. Heinemann does not hesitate—he pinions her behind her, slaps his hand over her mouth and shouts for Smurthwaite, Ashburn's

... kidnapped by Ashburn and Heinemann, in an attempt to kill him, Caleb is being held in a room near Ashburn's house. Hope succeeds in finding him. He is bound. Hope releases him. As she does so, a shot rings out. She kisses her. "Stay here," he says—and goes toward the house.

Conclusion

... THAT John Gabriel had achieved his purpose was simplicity. He was in love. And leaving the house when he thought there was no longer, he understood that he was jealous too. Nothing was important.

... had endured suspense easily, up to dinnertime. The impact that gripped him was impatience. Natalie—it was not mingled with other emotion. The afternoon had passed that the whole basis of his life had changed, that he was an altogether different man from what he had thought. He realized that change must have been coming for a long time, however suddenly discovered. Up till today he had thought such a disclosure as Natalie's must have shattered a priggish, conventionally moral young man. It was not. After no more than a moment's reflection, there had been only anger because Natalie persisted in denying him the madness that she felt such grief for something that did not matter. Did not matter at all. For the blinding light that burst on him showed things as they were. All that mattered was that, at last, he understood himself and she answered his kiss.

... whatever quixotic guilt or contrition was making her raise a barrier between

Her hands gripped the window sill and her feet swung down till there was support beneath them them was silly—and cruel. He knew exultingly that it was as cruel to her as it was to him. ... He dressed for dinner with minute care; that formality, he told himself, was all that remained of the conventional John Gabriel. The new John Gabriel was the man who was remembering. And who was anticipating.

Whatever painful and preposterous effort she was making to degrade herself in his eyes was not finished—she did not come back for dinner. He contrived to seem self-possessed, talking with his frail, distinguished father—who could never understand Natalie's conflict as John did and so must never know it. Afterward they sat in the library, where John was rapt with the memory of what had happened here. Here a few hours ago he had forced the miraculous truth from her. Here a few nights ago he had kissed her for the first time—how soft her body through that fragile robe! Here, with Natalie gone, he must now talk attentively with the old general.

It was about eight-thirty when the telephone rang. He snatched it up and he, and the butler, at an extension, said "Yes?" simultaneously. No one answered. He said, "Yes? ... Hello. ... Natalie!" several times, with increasing urgency, but there was no answer. She had called him—and then thought better of it.

With that, the agony began. It was barely tolerable till his father retired, then it was intolerable, for he had to face a simple fact. Whatever errand she had gone on, whatever penitence was in it, whatever she meant by saying she must make him despise her—it must involve Greg Ashburn. The world had narrowed till it held just three people, and one of them was Ashburn. So for something under an hour John Gabriel sat in his library and realized that Natalie was with Ashburn, who up to two weeks ago, she said, had been her lover.

While the slow moments dragged, the world, made simple that afternoon, got simpler still. Till there was only one thing left. Till he found himself on his feet and heard his own voice say with ineffable derision, "And you let her go!"

(Continued on page 33)

End of a Dream

By Jim Marshall

The Philippine dream of independence fades as Japan and her navy eye the rich, orphaned Dutch East Indies. Practical Filipino politicians aren't deluded about their chances for survival if the United States turns the islands loose

Much of the Philippine revenue has been used by politicians for public buildings. Right, the provincial capitol on Cebu Island

The Dutch East Indian navy is small, but it will fight Japan if necessary. Above, its flagship, the cruiser De Ruyler

SOME time soon, there will come a faint tapping at Uncle Sam's front door. That will be the Filipino nation, wanting to know if it will be all right to come back under old Mr. Whiskers' roof and settle down as one of the family, instead of helling off like Little Red Riding Hood in a world full of wolves.

For a couple of years now it has been a good bet that the Filipinos would, in the end, decide a junior partnership in the United States was better—and considerably safer—than the complete independence the islands are scheduled to achieve on July 4, 1946. But what happened in Europe this summer made it practically inevitable.

This, oddly enough, brings us right into a sunlit harbor on the east coast of Borneo, facing Macassar Strait, and a place called Balikpapan, of which few Americans ever heard. Balikpapan is where the pipe lines come down to the sea from the Dutch oil fields. Trim Dutch tankers slide in riding high, fill up and slide out, deep-laden. Dutch freighters and liners running between Java and Manila stop to tank up.

Going into Balikpapan you zigzag through a mine field. Up in the air, above the oil tanks and refineries, are hidden batteries of coast-defense guns. Not far away—at Soerabaja and Batavia—is the Dutch East Indian navy's headquarters. It has half a dozen small, fast cruisers, a half dozen destroyers, two dozen submarines, a dozen modern bombers and a few mine layers, their decks chock-loose with black eggs.

Today, five nations are intensely interested in Balikpapan: The Dutch, because they own it and intend to keep it; the Americans, because the Secretary of State Hull has more guaranteed Dutch ownership; the Japanese, because their navy wants Balikpapan the worst way, as a fuel base; the British, because an anese base there would menace their own bases at Singapore and Hong Kong. And finally, the Filipino nation, because with Japanese bases on Formosa, north, and in Borneo to the south, it knows full well that its independence would last only until the Japanese are around to absorbing the Philippines the empire.

Off the Asian coast lie twenty sand islands. In the north, they are Japanese. Then come the Philippines. South of these are the East Indies, mainly Dutch, although the British parts of Borneo and New Guinea are between Japanese, American and British Dutch possessions are only narrow channels.

There is practically no oil in Java, very little, apparently, in the Philippines; plenty in Borneo and more in New Guinea, which hasn't been thoroughly prospected yet.

Control of Balikpapan, Borneo's oil port in the Dutch East Indies, would give Japan a naval base that would make Philippine defense impossible. Dotted line shows Manila is about equidistant between Japan and Singapore, from which base our Navy could defend the Philippines

The oil port of Balikpapan, richest prize of the Dutch colonial empire, would be extremely valuable to the Japanese navy both as a naval base adjacent to the Philippines and a source of oil supplies. Balikpapan is the terminus of the pipe lines from Borneo oil fields

GENDREAU

Hitler drove northward through ark and into Norway and invaded he gave Japan an opportunity rt a claim to the Dutch East Inneaning mainly Borneo and New a, the two oil-producing islands.
d, after being invaded, said the Indian islands were capable of ing themselves independently, f Hitler conquered Holland per-
tly. Down in Batavia, in Java, ronized Dutch colonials told your er they proposed to maintain their ndence and fight Japan, if neces-ut this time, you remember, the d States issued a statement to the al effect that she was on Holland's own in DEI. The Dutch down said thanks a lot, but we think we andle Japan without help, for ■ anyway.

s American offer was the result announcement by the Japanese through Foreign Minister Arita, Japan proposed to "preserve the quo in the Dutch East Indies." reserving the status quo" in this meant the taking over of the DEI, e Japanese navy. It was this apt inability to translate Latin es that called forth from our Mr.
ll Hull the mild announcement ve too were going to preserve the quo in DEI—and the Japanese better look up what status quo
t. The reason for our interest, of e, is that Japanese bases on For-in the Carolines (near Guam), at Balikpapan would cut the ican-British-Dutch defense line now protects not only the Philippines, but the DEI and Australia and New Zealand.

This brings us, in a roundabout sort of way, to the fact that when Hitler marched north he practically ended the Filipino dream of complete independence six years from now. Every Filipino, from Don Manuel Luis Quezon, el presidente, down to the lowliest tao behind his carabao in the paddies, realized that the Philippines—abandoned by old Mr. Whiskers and his nice shiny Navy, would be merely an overnight stop on Japan's southward march.

A few Filipinos, immune to the facts of life, still thought they could have independence without responsibility and that the United States would do their fighting for them after 1946—but the majority had no such illusions.

No Wonder They're Bewildered

Don Manuel, ■ practical if somewhat impulsive little dictator, is frankly skeptical of the islands' ability to stem a Japanese invasion. He recently told graduates of the Philippine Normal School that an independent republic on the eastern edge of Asia couldn't defend itself, and couldn't possibly build up an efficient defense for some decades.
He added that the islands could be safe from attack under the American flag—and then, remembering suddenly that he was the Number One Champion of Independence, added that he didn't favor remaining under the flag.

This slightly bewildered the graduates and the rest of the Filipino people, who construed the speech as meaning the islands would haul down the Stars and Stripes, be an independent republic for ten or fifteen minutes and thereafter become part of Dai Nippon. The main result was to crystallize a sentiment that had been building up for some time: The idea that the whole independence question ought to be reopened, considered in the light of recent events and a new setup invented.

Nobody knows what cost the Japanese navy might think worth paying to open the road southward. Cost counting and profit taking don't seem to enter much into Nippon's empire-building plans. For example, even if they captured Borneo, the Dutch would—and could—destroy every refinery, drain the tanks, dynamite the oil wells, wreck the whole oil plant. The Japanese are not good oil technicians; it would take them months—maybe years—to get the layout into production again. But they seem to have ignored this in their plans.

Incidentally, of course, we have a stake in the DEI oil business. We have sixty per cent of the concession in New Guinea, with the Dutch and English splitting the rest; we have "interests" in Borneo and Sumatra. . . . But naturally this wouldn't affect our desire to maintain the status quo.

Or would it?

The DEI flurry brought to a head the growing feeling in the Philippines that, for the present and near future, independence is just ■ grand, vague idea—and that some sort of alliance with the United States, and that comforting Navy, is a sound, practical plan. Clinging, verbally at any rate, to the freedom theory, were el presidente and most Filipino politicians.

On the other side were lined up nearly all Filipino and American businessmen, the sugar interests and some down-to-earth legislators. Their arguments were that "independence" could result only in the islands becoming ■ Japanese colony and that if, by some miracle, this didn't happen, the islands would be ruined economically.

It's the Filipinos' Play

What is now going on is a poker game, with each side waiting for the other to bid. Quezon and the Nationalists, though most of them know independence is dangerous, feel they cannot make the first move for a new setup.
They want our Congress to make the suggestion. On the other hand, the feeling in Congress is that, having given the islands the freedom for which they shouted so long, the play is now up to the Filipinos.

There are also American business and the American farmer. Between them they sell the Filipinos one hundred million dollars' worth of their products every year—one hundred boxcarsful every day. Forty years ago the Filipinos spent fifty cents each with us each year; now they're spending nearly six dollars each.

Have a look at what the boys and girls have been doing since 1936 when the "transition period" started. At that time there was a cash balance of $17,- 500,000 in the treasury; we handed it to el presidente and his legislature.
Since then, we have given the islands refunds on coconut-oil excise taxes and

(Continued on page 32)

John had installed them. Good machinery and apparatus were personal to him

The Alarm Clock

By Mark Saxton

JOHN ACKER quit work ten minutes early and left the lab. He didn't want to go to the apartment. He hadn't been there since the night Sue told him she was going to Reno and hadn't been able to tell him why. He still didn't know and he didn't like to think about it.

John walked slowly as he came near the building. He nodded to the doorman and stepped into the elevator. On the way up he reached into his pocket, and by the time the elevator stopped he had the key in his hand. It always took him just that long to get out his key.

He closed the apartment door behind him and went into the dim room.

When he pulled up the Venetian blind on the west window, Sue's square wooden clock on the desk said five minutes after one. The ships were still sailing across the blue water painted on the glass door below the dial. He felt lost; the clock stood for so many things. Involuntarily, John looked across at the electric clock on the mantel.

"Still going," he said aloud, and pulled out his watch. "Twenty seconds fast in a month."

Sue's clock never had kept good time even when she wound it. A few days after they moved in John asked her if she wouldn't rather have the radio on the desk and move her clock to the kitchen. She looked at him as though she hadn't understood him and then said no, she'd like to leave it where it was. The same thing happened with the two plain, high-backed rocking chairs by the window. When he bought the new furniture suite for the living room, John suggested moving them out.

John ran his hand along the arm of the couch. It was chromium. He looked at his fingers; there was some dust but not much. He crossed the room and turned on the radio. Nothing happened. Then he reached around the side of the cabinet and threw the switch that cut in the regular radio circuit. As soon as he saw the light on the dial, he turned the radio off. The wiring was in the bedroom.

Because the clock on the mantel was running and because the wiring was still there, John felt comfortable. He had installed them and they were dependable. Good machinery and good apparatus were personal to him; he felt friendly to them.

John put in the extra switch as he bought the radio. He wired to the alarm clock in the bedroom every morning at seven-thirty that went on automatically. John had the alarm out of the clock when he found a program that started with the alarm going off and then played the radio. He had always dialed the radio station on the remote-control turn before he went to sleep. Sue's radio alarm was a good idea.

John reached into his pocket for two lists Sue had sent him from Reno. One list gave the things of her he wanted stored and the other gave the clothes she wanted John to pack for her.

John checked the first list again for the furniture in the living room and then walked out to the kitchen. In the kitchen he threw another switch.

The swinging door into the kitchen opened in front of him as his legs touched the beam of the photoelectric cell. The cell had been more than worth the money; it took him to install it. Sue had never got quite used to it, but it had saved her endless trouble. She had been able to carry plates and food in a basket of the kitchen without having to push the door open.

John went into the bedroom to check the second list. The two beds were made and the lamp was on the table between them. But not the alarm clock. The soul of the place wasn't visible anywhere. Its absence made John feel uncomfortable again. What could have happened to it?

He went to the window, raised the latch, and heard the latch click. He pushed the catch. The window came slowly open.

That had needed a bit of doing. He had taken out the sash weight and put in the catch to hold the window open. The catch had been rigged for the alarm clock, now missing, so that the radio went on in the morning when the window closed by itself, and the room had a few minutes to warm before he got up. John had been working on the idea for automatically closing the window during thunderstorms, but he had no time to work it out.

The light in the closet went on when he opened the door. It had been easy to put in. This closet was Sue's. It was so full of her that for a moment John couldn't believe she wasn't in the apartment. Four dresses were on hangers. He remembered specific times when she had worn each of them, things she had done. He reached and felt the sleeve of the green one. They had been crossing Fifth Avenue and Sue had looked up at him and put her hand on his. She had said, "It's nice out, John. I don't go home yet." The cloth was smooth and soft under his fingers.

If she had only told him why she was leaving him, he wouldn't have been quite so hard. When he had asked her she was sitting at the desk with her hands in her hands. She looked at him, shook her head and said there was no reason she could give.

John closed the closet door and turned to the bureau. Whenever Sue closed that door, she always started to open it again to see if the light had gone out. Her picture was gone from the bureau, but the silver-backed brush were still there. He picked one of them up. Behind it on the runner were the remains of the alarm clock. It had been beaten and pounded with a hammer.

John took it and ran his fingers over the dents. "Why did she do that?"

The Winner - FAMINE

By Walter Davenport

Here for the first time are the hard facts on the coming famine in Europe—what crops are growing and where, how much meat is still on the hoof, and how many mouths these must feed

NE followed Hitler through Europe. One by one, as nations fell, he sent his man-reaper, conquered, and sat down to starve. This winter will eat the wheat of France and the Danube, the cattle of Scandinavia, the pork of the Low Countries. Her doors millions of her human may die the most horrible death and may survive the German terror. In any rate her western gates are closed. Her government can flee to colonies. Her children may be shipped off to North America or New Zealand and Australia where starvation await them nor famine follow. The colonies and the United States can help. The British navy may patrol the Atlantic, blockading Hitler from beyond the seas. Similarly it will deny bread and meat to Belgium, France, Norway and beaten beyond. But the victor shall not win. Neither will Italy. She will get Germany gives her as her reward a brief season of cautious combat. Have the story from the files of J. Edgar Hoover, former President of the United States. He fed Belgium after the first World War. He led a mercy crusade to Finland after Helsinki surrendered to Moscow last March. A director and high mind of the Polish relief. And he's trying to help Belgium again. When Belgium surrendered Germany in May she had food enough for a few days.

There is nothing emotional in the facts, although horror is their theme. Before Germany invaded Poland in September, Europe knew that her peasants were poor. Had Germany, England and France consulted together to plan a year for war that would have ended a punishing peace they could not have done better. Poland was invaded as the farmer was sowing his winter wheat. Germany's potato crop was being ravaged by that voracious pest without a country, the Colorado Beetle. Drought had withered the fodder fields of Scandinavia and Holland and their herds of beef cattle had dwindled. They imported fodder but sources were reluctant. Even as England and France declared war upon Germany, Europe's farm economists reported that the Continent's crops of wheat would be anywhere from twenty-five to fifty per cent below normal. Last winter was yet to come.

Danubia Can Starve

Winter brought the bitterest cold that Europe had felt for years, the deepest frosts, the vastest blights of ice. And while Hitler bided his hour and the Allies cozened themselves with the thought that he didn't dare strike, food hopes died in the ground. Spring came late and cold. Belated frosts killed successive plantings. England made overtures to the wheat growers of Rumania, Hungary, Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, thinking thus to make them her allies and ignoring as something that would always be hers Canada's 300,000,000 stored bushels and Australia's 125,000,000. But Germany's Or Else diplomacy won the Danubian granary and this winter she'll make the most of the dismal fact that whereas normally that fecund sector provides about sixty per cent of the bread requirements of North Central Europe and the western occupied countries, this year it will be different. The Danubian yield is off a third, is not expected to exceed 3,540,000 tons, and Adolf Hitler's Reich will eat almost all of it. Danubia can starve in the shadow of her own bursting grain elevators or beg from her knees for a loaf of her own bread.

EUROPEAN

Conquerors eat first and non-combatants get what's left—if any. These are German troops lined up at a field kitchen at what was their western front. Below, Rumanian peasants, despite rich harvests of grain, starve in the midst of plenty

What sick Nature hadn't done to Europe's grain and cattle, fruits and hogs, iron heels and steel wheels did. Armies leave nothing in their wakes except people and poverty. What marching men don't devour as they go, they destroy. Even the deep-delving Hoover records cannot estimate how many food animals died in Hitler's fire. And nobody knows how many hundred thousands of tons of grain and meat were destroyed by terrified farmers before they fled with their soldiers before the German wrath.

That's the picture you see in the Hoover files. No pretty phrases nor wishful thoughts are going to mellow it. There's nothing so drear as lost harvest hopes. The picture is painted in black-and-white statistics and tells you that at best, in normal days, Europe could not feed herself.

They've Always Needed Help

There's the fundamental table, for example, which shows you in percentages the self-sufficiency in foodstuffs in normal crop years of the various nations.

For example, Great Britain is only twenty-five per cent self-sustaining. Remember that we're talking about food. Norway is only forty-three per cent, Belgium fifty-one, the Netherlands sixty-seven, Finland seventy-eight, Germany (prewar) eighty-three, France (prewar) eighty-three, Sweden ninety-one, Italy ninety-five, Poland (prewar) a hundred and five, Bulgaria a hundred and nine, Rumania a hundred and ten, Russia a hundred and one.

These are samples and can be mis-
(Continued on page 38)

Childhood of Miss Churt

By F. R. Buckley

ILLUSTRATED BY HARDIE GRAMATKY

What if she has only eight lives left to give for her country? The one she has lost was dearly bought

MISS CHURT—British, like one else aboard the Malvern, sat on the storm sill of the Atlantic and with glazed eyes surveyed the North Atlantic.

Miss Churt was meditating on the rump steak the cook had given her. "Eat it up, Kitty; good!" she had said, and Miss Churt had accepted the suggestion.

Now—although the steak had been delicious—Miss Churt was experiencing certain qualms; a sensation, as if cannon balls in the midriff, had been put there.

Miss Churt decided that she would get a little fresh air and drop in on her friend Mr. Wharton.

She dropped from her perch a few feet at its meridian height, walked steadily toward the cuddy stairs.

THE Malvern was moving unsteadily also, and likewise because of the feeling in the midriff; caused by the cannon balls but by much more by the munitions of war. Never on very bad terms with her rudder, she had never been shelled and be-packing-cased by an airplane-parted until she would soon go anywhere as anywhere else, and was constantly trying to do so.

In a room on the boat deck, the first officer and the chief engineer were discussing this phenomenon and other related to the comfort and well-being of the ship's company. Mr. McIvor, who was naturally the engineer, had been in New York and was absorbing lessons from Mr. Wharton.

"He's a kind of mixed product of the flu and the board room," said the first mate, alluding to his captain. "Well, you saw him."

"I saw something," said Mr. McIvor cautiously.

"That'd be him. Chairman's nose on the beach for years; war comes along—old Stokes gets flu—hand o' providence—an' here I am sayin' 'Ay ay ay sir!' to that. If he'd got eyelashes I wouldn't mind it so much, but—"

Mr. McIvor nodded, and his upper lip said, "Cluck, cluck."

"Have any trouble comin' over?"

"Subs, you mean? Naw. Well, sweetheart! Hello! Come to see Papa."

Mr. McIvor, thunderstruck, made an instinctive motion to smooth his hair but it was only Miss Churt. Mr. Wharton went over, picked her up out of the aperture of the hooked door and let her sit down again on his berth spread with a month-old newspaper carefully on the carpet. The page uppermost bore a picture of Lady Somebody's wedding to Captain Gossakes-Whosis of the guards; Mr. Wharton, bending with his back to the wall, surveyed Miss Churt sprawled over his palm, surveyed orange blossoms, smiles, teeth, the arch of swords with a nitric eye.

"There, sweetheart," he said, putting Miss Churt down on them.

"You a morried mon?" asked Mr. McIvor.

"Nah. But I will be. That's how it is."

The engineer rolled an eye at the picture on the bureau.

"Nice gurrul."

"You said it. Canon Hobson and I speakin' of cannon, have you seen 4.7 on the poop deck?"

"To my grief. But what's this?"

Mr. McIvor, whose intake of personal news was disproportionate to his position, put, "about a canon? The young lieutenant no got a smash on um?"

"On old Hobson? Not that kind," said Mr. Wharton; and his look told Mr. McIvor whether he should Miss Churt ran away now, her ears cocked for the sound of belching footsteps pursuing. And they came asld. "Fact is—that's a good sweetheart! Come to Poppa! 'At's ie!" e sem fond o' yon kitten." m ad about her. And she's just abot Harry, aren't you, pet?" ss hurt licked a gnarled and ed and. It tasted something like um steak, flavored with tar, salt, and Mallinson's Wonder Oint- for superficial cuts and bruises. . . herwhaur does this canon come ll to girls round our way in Liver- arenad about him. See—he had all a Sunday school; children's alild, he called it; us boys got ater we'd been confirmed, of at you can believe it or not, I've on the swearer I ought to have." nced that when we was warpin' stream," said Mr. McIvor. "I h' maybe ye was a nance."

ullen squeezing of Miss Churt's eyed a mew. d hurt ums bellah?" asked Mr. rto. "Dere. Snuzzle down, a good e; ch a full ickle tummy . . . Ho, di hah?"

In we met," said Mr. McIvor in e. But—he canna be a young mon, paon?"

ANN," said Mr. Wharton. "Naw, arhe's no beauty neither. But he's bes knees so far's Annie's con- dan' she's goin' to be married by onobody, so so far it's been no- n' now they go an' put this -viskered nincompoop in over my At's it matter who morries ye? It s longer than havin' a tooth out." d doesn't it? That's where you yur tow. Old Hobson's strong for al and all that; and that means s' orange flowers for Annie an' a he an' tails for me."

It not in wartime!" do you know?" go," said Mr. McIvor after re- id "an' see the old mon an' say sh to um."

Ye would not," said Mr. Wharton d "not if you saw him. He's only ative foot six, but I've seen him r stevedore with one look—cold rin' askin' for coffee. He's got one ne kissers you carve out o' granite a road drill. Looks something like h chief engineer considered this dly, and put his glass down. eel," he said, rising. "It's the wull h, I suppwse, that some of us u be morried an' hae bairns, while r lovish their possions on tobbys. Guid nicht, Mr. Wharton."

he doorway he turned to see the s of this Glaswegian bomb. Miss who had been awakened by hing that felt like an earth tremor, d at him and went to sleep again. e've naval ratings aboard to work un?" McIvor asked, to cover his morbid curiosity.

e have," said Mr. Wharton, "an' body asks you who's in command t gun crew, it's me. Naval re-ou bein' in turn commanded by in Timbs. Weel—guid nicht." ou heard about that timber ship r torpedoed?" Wharton asked. o. What was that?"

n, just that they thought she n't have sunk properly, an' be ct hereabouts. Timbs has been in' everybody bar Churchill an' dent Roosevelt, but nobody's her. Dark night, too. Well—pleas- dreams."

certain pensiveness marked Mr. or's departure but the first mate ed to feel better.

extracted Miss Churt gently from and of nod, held her up with fore-

"Forgotten something?" said Mr. Wharton. "I've left my cat behind." From the bow came a chuckle legs dangling, treated her to a gigantic smile and kissed her unhygienically on the nose.

"Azza booful girlie!" said Mr. Wharton. "You like Poppa go home to his other girl an' get married, please, an' zen you have lovely house an' garden to scratch in?"

Miss Churt was exceedingly drowsy; moreover that rump steak seemed still to be clogging her articulation. She opened her pink mouth, but no sound issued.

"I'll bet you," said Mr. Wharton. "And that reminds me—"

He had just risen to pick up the newspaper with the wedding on it when from for'ard, out in the starry dark, there came a thunderous crash.

The Malvern stopped in her tracks like a dowager smitten in the breadbasket.

Simultaneously, the lights went out.

It was, of course, that derelict, floating bottom up at what the French so prettily call the flower of the water, or, in Anglo-Saxon sea talk, awash.

Having accomplished the destiny given her by those heavenly lights overhead—Neptune afflicted by Mars, perhaps; who knows?—and buckled the Malvern's blunt bows backward like the bellows of a concertina, the timber ship rolled, spewed a few hundred thousand board feet from a new gash and sank; while down behind the forepeak of the Malvern, Mr. Wharton and a number of nearly naked shipmates strove to save their tub from doing likewise.

IT WAS a question of strengthening a bulkhead, and strengthening bulkheads is uneasy work in the pitch dark.

It was an hour before Mr. McIvor and his horde got the uprooted dynamo going again; and then what was revealed by hand lights led into the hold was the reverse of encouraging.

Not only was the bulkhead spouting water through the holes of deracinated rivets; it was bulging bodily and visibly inward, so that it was obvious that no time remained for carpenter work and fancy shoring.

Mr. Wharton's eyes, under a mop of embattled hair, shuttled desperately about the hold. The port and starboard sides were solid-packed with minor munitions, forming admirable buttresses for the wings of the forward wall. But in the midst stood two cases that had taxed the stevedores; they were large and heavy enough to have contained whippet tanks, and the Malvern's notorious instability had caused them to be stowed well aft of the bulkhead.

The space between was filled with (Continued on page 53)

Leave the Lady Be

By Frank Condon

Jean Arthur detests press agents and interviewers. So Gate-Crasher Condon decided to interview her to find out why

MISS JEAN ARTHUR has a nice voice and I am a fan for a beautiful young woman with a nice voice, especially if it is low and sort of lilting. I have returned from Tucson, Arizona, where I had a good chance to hear her in the rear of a tin garage, with a machine blowing, and I will tell you voice comes spang up to all sorts of conditions, hints and rumors. The reason Jean Arthur makes when talking is that you don't care a hang what she is saying about and are content to be lulled.

Regarding the trip to Arizona, there were a few ominous preliminaries that were explained, with some of them that Jean Arthur avoided no men, press agents, lady interviewers and any person carrying a sheaf of low paper in a side pocket. It was said she had a poor opinion of all interviewers, who are apparently people who do not listen carefully to what a person says and then write something.

There was a slight chill of the air in the Tucson air, which could be a little chilling, as it was other than 100 degrees in the sun, 100 in the shade. Even her own press department was a little scholarly lads from Columbia who spoke of her remotely as Miss Arthur and she was said to address them as Mister Wiles, causing him some uneasiness. I suggested to Lou Spence that he had bounced all the way over on a midnight plane: "Maybe we better wait around and go on home."

Well, I'll never understand the reason of it, because, as I say, I sat in a tin garage and Jean sat opposite me on a wet hospital cot, for which she had actually paid $1.39, and we got along. The garage was part of the set and the trailer was backed into it and they shot a blast of air over the whole thing. We talked for two hours about pictures, actors, people, the war, and myself, pictures, actresses, people, the supreme efficiency of the war, and about her, the war and why she likes to pose in the studio for pictures, holding a bottle of catsup. She hates to sit anywhere for still pictures and studios must have still pictures.

I said: "What do you do about still pictures?" She said: "I don't go."

Meanwhile, the air machine continued to mure steadily, and after a long time the publicity staff figured they would investigate and see if anything had happened to me in the meantime. Miss Arthur was clad in an ivory white, with lace, two scuffed-looking shoes and a bride's veil, which she presented on a horseshoe.

Tucson's Ready for War

Tucson in June is one of the hottest hot spots, although the residents appear not to notice the heat. The houses and homes are equipped with air-conditioning machines that work all right but make alarming noises, and you buy a cooler-box starting as low as $10 dollars, so even the Indians have cooled tepees. Tucson lies a few miles north of the border of (one word) and enemy bombers could drop their eggs on Tucson within twenty minutes. It is close. Tucson gave this some thought, and with the help of Columbia Pictures it is now the only camouflage city in America and ready for war. It did, along with Columbia, was to another Tucson, a phony Tucson, seventeen miles due south of itself. In case of military activity the boys are expected to leave (same word) and fly north and mistakenly drop their bombs on the imitation Tucson.

(Continued on page 50)

'Cross Town and .....

'Cross Country

TRY THIS YOURSELF.

Of all the trucks you see on city streets and country roads, notice how many of them are Internationals. And when you know the figures you won't be surprised.

For nine straight years more heavy-duty Internationals have been bought than any other make.

There's a very good reason for this year-after-year preference of truckmen who know their business—Internationals give them the best all-around performance, economy, and hauling satisfaction their money can buy.

For the 'cross-town hauler Internationals meet the exacting requirements of multi-stop delivery at lowest cost. In addition, their latest streamline style lends prestige to any business.

For the 'cross-country hauler Internationals provide low-cost performance over longer years of service. You can always have the perfect combination of capacity and power, gear-ratio and wheelbase-length, for every load and route you have to haul.

Internationals are built in sizes to fit every job.

Furthermore, International Service is always close at hand wherever your trucks may go, through the largest company-owned truck service organization in the world. And dealers everywhere. Write for catalog.

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER COMPANY
(INCORPORATED)
180 North Michigan Avenue Chicago, Illinois

INTERNATIONAL TRUCKS

Copyright 1940, by International Harvester Company, Incorporated

Something

lady appreciates...

YOU know yourself that a motorist can't be too careful about some things . . .

So let the neat green-and-white Registered Rest Room signs at Texaco Dealers be your motoring guide to clean attractive rest rooms all over the country.

At Registered Rest Rooms you will always find running water and full equipment that is essential to your comfort.

In each Registered Rest Room we Texaco Dealers have pledged you spic-and-span cleanliness and many free accessories for your convenience.

Trained inspectors in the famous "White Patrol" inspection cars are on the road in all 48 States to help us maintain this high standard of service.

Stop at our Registered Rest Rooms. Try the exceptional performance of our two great gasolines, stepped-up FIRE-CHIEF and our new luxury motor fuel, Sky Chief—for those who want the best . . . You'll also find Insulated Havoline and Texaco Motor Oils. Let us help in many ways to make your trips more enjoyable.

TEXACO DEALERS

originators of REGISTERED REST ROOMS

Texaco Dealers invite you to tune in The Texaco Star Theatre—starring Kenny Baker and Frances Langford—Every Wed. Night—Columbia Network—9:00 E. D.T., 8:00 E. S.T., 8:00 C. D.T., 7:00 C. S.T., 6:00 M. S.T., 5:00 P. S.T.

Texaco "White Patrol" inspection cars, like the one shown below, guard Registered Rest Rooms. Many inspectors have first-aid training and carry first-aid equipment.

The Golden Horse

Continued from page 12

The Real McCoy for good smoking

BENNY McCoy
$45,000
2nd-sacker,
Philadelphia
Athletics

There's a triple play in every tin of Velvet... it tastes right in a cigarette... it smokes cool in a pipe... bite is O-U-T! Made from maple-flavored Burley, aged two years or more in wood... it rolls a better cigarette and packs easy in a pipe.

Velvet

the Right Word for Smooth Smoking
MILD and COOL
Positively NO "BITE"

Copyright 1940,
LIGGETT & MYERS
TOBACCO CO.

This may seem like splitting hairs, but it is not trivial to the folk who are heart and soul for the Palomino. The record is pretty clear that golden horses were plentiful until the Arabs discovered that a warrior riding a Palomino was about as safe as a belted burglar. The Arabs deliberately bred the golden color out of their horses by getting rid of the Palomino colts and keeping only the darker animals or the pure whites, whose very lack of color blended into the horizon.

Though this had gone on for fifteen centuries, which is a long time in horse language, when the Moors invaded Spain, bringing their Barbs of Arabian lineage with them, the mares still dropped an occasional Palomino colt. The gold-loving Spaniards regarded these as gifts from Heaven. Among them the rare Palominos were rated as badges of royalty. The Spaniards called them "The Ysabellas," after the great queen who drove out the Moors and launched Spain on her era of conquest.

A Mate for Blondie

It is a matter of record, says Mr. Halliday, that though there were only a few score golden horses in Spain at the time, Queen Isabella sent a Palomino stallion and five mares to her viceroy in New Spain, which is to say Mexico, to perpetuate the golden horse in the New World. From this nucleus, the blood spread to the Texas plains, and from Texas it came to California. In the notable trek of the de Anza party from Mexico across the deserts of New Mexico and Arizona to California to colonize the San Francisco Bay region for Spain, there was a doughty caballero named Juan Palamia who rode a golden stallion. It is probable that the name Palomino, distinctly of California origin, springs from Palamia's stallion.

The Spaniards released a number of horses in the California valleys and allowed them to propagate in their wild state. Before long, the wild herds were numbered in the tens of thousands, particularly in the San Joaquin Valley. The occasional Palomino colt found in these wild herds was sought out in annual forays by hard-riding young bloods.

As a matter of fact, Palominos were so highly prized that it was the unwritten law among Californios that they could not be sold. A caballero could give a Palomino to another caballero as a gracious gift ranking next to the gift of his daughter in marriage. But no hidalgo would think of buying or selling a golden horse.

Although the hidalgo who lacked a Palomino to ride in the fiestas was considered practically on foot, the easy-going Californios made no effort to breed golden horses scientifically. In fact, they wanted good wagon and plow horses so they crossed the sleek, fleet, graceful riding horses of the early Californians with draft horses of European stock.

Yet in spite of these overwhelming odds, an occasional golden horse of good conformation turned up in the herds on the Western ranches, and in Texas, where a similar evolution almost wiped out the Palomino. Wherever cowboys gathered, tales were told of the legendary feats of riding and roping possible with Palominos. Members of sheriffs' posses in the Western country readily hocked everything but their six-shooters to buy the rare horses of golden hue to ride in parades and fiestas.

The only breeder who has set the strain so far is Dwight Murphy, whose Rancho San Fernando Rey is a thousand-acre pastoral paradise, stretching across the oak-studded Santa Valley, forty miles north of Santa Barbara. It is the last remnant of the Rancho San Marcos on which the people of Santa Barbara Mission raised cattle and horses.

Mr. Murphy first came west in 1880 as a young fellow seeking health instead of loafing in the Santa Barbara sunshine, he joined the U. S. Forest Service and, being single, was around from lookout to lookout, pinch hitter for the regular foresters when the regulars took vacations. He fought fires, rode ranges, slept in the doors every night for three years, gained his health, fell in love with a Santa Barbara girl. She thought he was marrying a humble ranger, but he covered when they returned to the burgh to see the folks that her husband was one of the richest young men in the country, one of the heirs to a great way-equipment fortune.

His heart and hers still being bated in the Santa Barbara hills, Dwight Murphy sold out as soon as he could and came west to stay. He bought the Rancho Los Prietos in Santa Ynez Valley and acquired a riding horse named "Indie." Desiring another golden horse, Blondie's mate, Mr. Murphy rode all over California seeking another Palomino. He returned from the excursion without one because there were no Palominos for sale.

"All right, I'll raise some Palominos," said Mr. Murphy.

The decision launched him on a career that has consumed a good deal of his life for the last twenty years. He came to Texas, returned with a load of Palomino mares. Through centuries of running wild, the Texas ponies had bred themselves smaller and lighter than the horses the Californians liked.

But the colts were everything but Palominos. They included bays and grays and some were albinos with red eyes. The next year's crop was equally disappointing, and it dawned on Mr. Murphy that he had made a false start. Later he learned that most of the Palomino breeders did this, too.

He talked with geneticists and one of them suggested that he inbreed for a time between Palominos.

This experiment, at first, looked promising. Then the colts took a turn for the worse, and after wasting several years trying to breed Palominos scientifically and scientifically, Mr. Murphy was back exactly where he started. Comparing his results with other breeders, he learned, as they had, that Palominos were as elusive as the wind o'-the-wisp.

Every Man a Don

By this time, Dwight Murphy decided to build Palomino stock from the Arabian strain. He bought a great Arabian stallion, Swedish King, from the famous Lucky Baldwin stables. This time he was with him. Bred to light Palomino and Barb mares, Swedish King sired a number of promising colts with a golden tinge in their kinky, cream-colored coats. One of them as he grew older, grew more golden. He was Del Rey, rated the first bred-to-order Palomino in Mr. Murphy stables. Now nineteen years old, Del Rey is the retired patriarch of the rancho.

In his prime, Del Rey sired El Rey los Reyes, which Mr. Murphy named "The King of Kings" because the c

g w into a young stallion, demonted that he had everything for which om o fanciers had prayed. His coat luscious light golden hue, with plati-n and mane and tail. He has the cat head of the Arabian, the dark, light eyes, the crested neck, the les, the good manners and easy of parade horse. More important he was able to perpetuate his qualities most of his progeny. Among the Conejo and Hijo del Rey, the almost a spitting image of his not a decade ago, Mr. Murphy in-the Santa Barbarans to revive the Spanish Days Fiesta and don besombros, tight black pants and stripes, gay sashes, whiskers, on. The women dressed in gay and the big occasion was the Pa-which everyone rode his best preferably a Palomino, which in akes every man a Don.

first year the Santa Barbarans skeptical that Don Dwight had to send down to Hollywood umes and hire cowboys to bring galia and ride, cutting $10,000 his own bank roll to put the show se. But after that first year, the ame in droves, bringing their urs, their horses, and their silver-and saddles with them. This Au-ere'll be a thousand horses in the

Stall and Bath

Murphy, the Irishman from Pitts-has succeeded in rekindling the Spanish Californian enthusiasm horses to ride in the Rose Bowl in Pasadena on New Year's Day,
Sinas Rodeo cavalcade and others
California's endless round of fiestas.
body in any parade craves to ride amino, because the golden horses ably steal the show. The Califor-have managed to round up per-three hundred bona fide Palominos state, about as many, Mr. Dick ay estimates, as there are in Together, Colorado, Oklahoma, aska, Oregon, Arizona and New to have enough more to bring the y's Palomino population up to as a thousand head.

is not so many golden horses, but ering that a few years ago the seemed doomed to oblivion, it is azing comeback. Other breeders, ing Mr. Dwight Murphy's lead, successfully breeding Palomino
notably John J. Mitchell's Juan y Ranch (Lolita being Mrs. Mitchene former Lolita Armour), and Spaulding's Rancho Tecolote,
n Santa Barbara County, Karl D.
niott's Rancho Carmelo in Mon-County, and Wallace Smith's nine Ranch in Yuba County.
ward Cox of San Angelo and W. B. ell of Marfa have fostered the back of the golden horse in Texas, he Texans now have an annual Allmino Horse Show each October at ne.

e Palomino breeding business, in case you want to muscle in while it is still in the ground-floor stage, is a bit on the capitalistic side. Dwight Murphy probably poured close to a million into his operations before he produced The Big Three of the Palomino Stud Registry, as Mr. Dick Halliday calls El Rey, Conejo and Hijo, and his thirty dependable brood mares. The other breeders have had to dig into their socks, too.

Where do all the dollars go? Take a look around the stables at Rancho San Fernando Rey. A little on the fancy side, according to fellows like Leo Carrillo, for example, who was practically born on horseback.

Major-domo Guy Rutherford, who used to valet the steeds on Mr. Hearst's baronial estate at San Simeon, and his staff keep hustling all morning to get the Murphy horses ready for exhibition each afternoon. Every stallion has a separate room, not a stall, with running water, electric light and a thick layer of clean straw on the floor.

Each stallion, from El Rey down, has to be taken for an eight- to ten-mile morning constitutional, which begins with a trot, winds up with a gallop, and while he's lathered each horse is turned into a yard filled with beach sand for a good roll. The sand idea is partly to keep him clean, partly to burnish his golden hair and make it shine. After the roll, each stallion goes like an athlete to the showers for a bath. Later, his mane and tail are shampooed separately. On Fiesta days, there's a special bit of primping. Each stallion's mane and tail has to have a permanent wave!

A Palomino's color continues to develop from cream at his birth to a fixed golden shade by the time he is two years old. Not until then do you know whether it is going to stop at the luster of new-minted gold bars, the most highly prized color, or continue on to the burnished copper shade, which isn't so bad, after all. Either way, if he is of good conformation and fine riding habits, you have an animal that will bring some real money, anywhere from $1,500 to $5,000 for a stallion. If he approaches perfection, like El Rey, the rainbow's the limit. Mares and geldings bring from $200 up, depending upon how much somebody wants them and how unwilling you are to part with them.

Most of the Palomino breeders are like the old Spanish-Californian hidal-gos. They dote on their golden horses to the point where they don't like to think of them in commercial terms.
More than one modern Don has given Palominos to his friends to avoid selling them. Leo Carrillo, already a Palomino owner and enthusiast, was up at Rancho San Fernando Rey a year or so ago, admiring the colts sired by the great El Rey. Leo fell in love with one frisky little squirt, "Conquistadore," about the cutest, finest colt El Rey sired that year. Don Dwight Murphy watched the movie star and the colt and everybody could see that he was having a soul struggle within himself. Finally, he called the movie star over.

"Leo, that little colt is yours," he said.

MUTT AND JEFF

—by Bud Fisher

HOW about you? Would you like to be free of those heavy, logy days due to constipation — and free from the pills and purgatives, too? You can — if your trouble is the common kind (due to lack of "bulk" in diet). It's no harder to do than just eating a delicious breakfast cereal — crisp, crunchy, "bulk-forming" All-Bran. Eat it for breakfast every day, drink plenty of water, and see if you don't get more kick out of life!

Copyright, 1939, Kellogg Company

Join the "Regulars" with
KELLOGG'S ALL-BRAN

WHEN SECONDS COUNT

By Dan Parker

Handler Ray Arcel, for his speed and closing cuts, demonstrated on fighter Bernie Fr

The bell clangs, the boys go back to their corners, then the second's job begins. And forty seconds is all the time he is given to perform his miracles

FOUR nights before Bob Olin lost the light-heavyweight title to John Henry Lewis in 1935, Ray Arcel, famous handler of fighters, was awakened from a sound sleep in his St. Louis hotel by a series of bloodcurdling shrieks. Thinking murder was being committed outside his room, Arcel jumped out of bed, grabbed the nearest weapon for protection and flung open the door, prepared for the worst. Instead of a mangled corpus delicti, Ray was confronted with Olin, doubled up as if in the throes of death and howling like a troupe of Banshees.

"Get me out of here! I'm going to die!" screamed the big, healthy brute as he took a fresh purchase on his midriff. Ray, who knew Olin as a timid chap outside the ring, although a lion once inside the ropes, sensed the situation in a flash. He knew Olin was suffering from a bad case of ante-bellum jitters such as seize even the bravest of fighters, if they happen to be high-strung.

"Okay," said Arcel to the world's champion. "I'll call the fight off. Now, go back to bed and get some sleep and tomorrow morning we'll catch a train back to New York."

Relieved instantly of his "frightful pain," Olin went back to bed and was snoring like a boar with adenoids within five minutes. The next morning, Arcel took his fighter to the office of Dr. Raines, a noted physician and psychiatrist, and introduced him as Ray Arcel, a local clothing salesman who wanted a complete checkup. This subterfuge was necessary because there was a tremendous advance sale for the fight and even the rumor of a postponement might ruin the gate.

Dr. Raines went over Olin's body like a pair of gymnasium tights. Finally, after an examination lasting a half-hour, he broke the silence by exclaiming: "Young man, you ought to be a fighter! I never encountered a finer, healthier specimen in my career!"

Olin felt both flattered and sheepish as the doctor pronounced his verdict. Arcel felt relieved. He knew now that the crisis had passed and that there would be no trouble getting his fighter into the ring.

Bob Olin's Best Fight

Bob lost his title to John Henry Lewis a few nights later but only after putting up one of the gamest exhibitions ever seen in St. Louis. Draped across the middle strand of the ring ropes in the 13th round and saved by the bell, Olin was carried to his corner by Arcel and Harold Scadron, his manager. It looked as if the fight was over. But, reaching into his vast store of wisdom, Arcel came up with a mixture of water and strong ammonia which he forced Olin to drink. As the powerful concoction brought the groggy fighter sharply to his senses, Arcel pleaded: "Bob, please don't let this guy steal our title. Okay, Ray!" growled the champ.

For the next two rounds, Olin was Lewis the worst beating he assigned until a chap named Joe Louis came along four years later and topped him. John Henry was barely able to stand the referee held up his right hand and proclaimed him "the winner and champion!" Olin had lost after putting up the best fight of his career. Yet a few days before he had tried to blow a powder, in a fit of panic.

"Fighters are funny people," said Arcel, who has worked behind many of them than any man living, during the quarter of a century of serving as Jeeves for the Jab and Jolt Jack. "More fights are lost on the way out of the dressing room to the ring than in the ring itself. Some fighters are outside the ropes but tigers once the bell snaps the tension. Some of them have to be conned. Others are bullying. Some can think for themselves. Others follow instructions and are incapable of original thought."

"The successful second must be able to double for a mother, a physician and a mind reader. If you've worked behind five or six hundred fighters, like I have, it becomes second nature to you, like swimming typewriting. You've got only a few seconds to work on your fighter between rounds. Often you have to stop a hemorrhage or bring a fighter back. (Continued on page 51)

Just off the Boat from Havana

OWL: Greetings, Everett—have a pleasant Havana vacation?

MARSHALL: Grand time—most enjoyable place!

OWL: Well, as a discriminating cigar smoker—some of the enjoyment must have been those Havana cigars!

MARSHALL: You're right—brought a few back with me. Here—try one!

OWL: Okay—swap you for a new White Owl... Tell me if it's got real Havana taste—will you?

EVERETT MARSHALL approves Havana taste of New White Owls

MARSHALL (after several puffs): Say—it's a good smoke, milder than a Cuban cigar—but it certainly has true Havana taste.

JUST BACK FROM HAVANA, Everett Marshall—whose baritone voice has been heard at both the Metropolitan and at George White's "Scandals"—steps ashore.

We interviewed him right at the dock where the boat from Havana comes in. And while the taste of Havana cigars was more than a memory—he still had a pocketful. We asked him to check on the Havana taste of the new Blended-with-Havana White Owl.

The new Blended-with-Havana White Owl does have a rich Havana flavor—thousands of smokers will go along with Everett Marshall on that. And the fact that you now can get this preferred cigar taste in a good 5¢ cigar accounts for the popularity of the new White Owl. Try one today.

NOW
BLENDED WITH HAVANA!

Try a NEW WHITE OWL—Today 5¢

New White Owls made in America—See how at New York World's Fair, 1940

Copyright, 1940 by General Cigar Co. Inc.

Me—I discovered something

Me—sunk. Second day at the shore—dying to see more of that handsome lawyer who's staying at our cottage. But I had barely reached the beach before I knew: "All this strange food and all this sun have got you, my girl!" You know that sickish, headachy feeling!

Me—learning. "Why, that happens to a lot of folks on vacation," consoled a girl at my cottage. "You just take some Sal Hepatica!" And she told me how Sal Hepatica acts fast as a laxative—usually within an hour. And in addition it helps counteract the excess gastric acidity that you usually get right along with constipation—helps turn a sour stomach sweet again. Well, I took Sal Hepatica pronto, and soon....

Me—amazed. Head clearing. Pep returning. I marveled. And as said lawyer and I romped off down the beach before a whole porchful of craning necks, I thought, "What a come-back! From now on I'm traveling with Sal Hepatica in my suitcase." Who knows? Maybe I'll be packing for a honeymoon soon.

SAL HEPATICA

for a faster come-back

TUNE IN! Abbott and Costello—laughs, music—Wed. at 9 P. M., E. D. S. T.

End of a Dream

Continued from page 19

sugar-processing taxes—all paid by American taxpayers. Up to the end of 1939, these gifts totaled about $75,000,000. Until 1946 they will amount to about $17,000,000 a year.

All these millions were given to help the Filipinos adjust themselves to the new economic setup that would follow independence. But today the original nest egg has all gone; so has the $75,000,000; and the annual gift has been appropriated right up to 1945. It has been spent on gaudy new buildings, a glamorous private recreation park for Don Manuel and his guests, and a lot of other trinkets that can hardly be said to contribute to "economic adjustment."

There is, however, a great shortage of school buildings and teachers in the islands and thousands of kids can't attend classes in consequence.

The Philippine army, too, is being economized on; its budget cut, its operations curtailed. This army is supposed to number 400,000 trained men by 1946, but judging by progress so far it won't have much equipment. There is a skeleton air force of training planes and a couple of motorboats are supposed to form the nucleus of a navy.

Some Philippine political leaders say frankly they might as well spend the money while they have it, because after independence comes there won't be any money; and there's no use making "economic adjustments" because the islands' economy is going to collapse, anyway.

Meanwhile, under the guise of encouraging native enterprise and putting the islands' natural resources under native control, a brisk campaign is under way against foreign business, which is mainly American. All foreigners are called "exploiters."

Now, if there is one thing we have not done in the Philippines, it is exploitation. Our sins, if any, have been on the other side. As a matter of fact we have given the Philippines a square deal; the islanders are vastly better off today than any other people in Asia, and some people in Europe.

In spite of all this, there is in the islands a bitter underground battle against American business. American firms are taxed to death, enmeshed in red tape, discriminated against, threatened with expropriation.

Freedom is Expensive

Canny Filipino businessmen and politicians agree that unless the United States keeps control and the Philippines keep our market a great many Filipinos are going to starve or go back to semi-barbarism after 1946. Some orators know this, too, and tell the natives in long, grand phrases it is better to starve as free men than live well as slaves. The fact that the Filipino is today a free man and hasn't been a slave for forty years is conveniently forgotten.

And so is the other fact: That if he insists on independence in 1946 he is going to be a slave again in 1947, yelling "Banzai Nippon!" at the sun flag. Or else.

Under the pressure of events the Filipinos have actually less liberty today, under their own government, than they had under ours. They live under a virtual dictatorship.

Quezon is not a bad dictator and there is no doubt he has the welfare of his sixteen million subjects close to his heart. He has his faults, but he is not vicious and probably his administration is as good as any other would be.

No one holds office in the islands without the nod of Don Manuel, and this goes for lordly governors of provinces down to meek justices of the peace in remote Ifugao and Ilocano. Only a short time ago el presidente all but two of Manila's city council and replaced them with his own men.

The fantastic height to which nationalism and nationalism has risen is well illustrated in the official use of the American language. For forty years this language has been taught in schools; most islanders have a knowledge of it. When independence comes, American will be replaced by an obscure dialect, Tagalog—which happens to be Quezon's native tongue. Tagalog, a poor language of only a few hundred words, is spoken by less than a fifth of the Filipinos.

Manila's city council, in an outbreak of patriotism, once tried to conduct a meeting in Tagalog. The mayor, in the middle of the second sentence of his opening address and bogged down by almost impossible to express in Tagalog any scientific, economic, political business idea; hardly anyone on the islands ever has heard of the idea of let alone being able to understand it.

Profits Without Responsibility

Many Americans think we should get rid of the Philippines" because they may involve us in war—but they don't like to continue selling that $100,000,000 worth of our products to the Filipinos every year. We want profits without responsibility.

The Filipinos—most of them want substantially the same thing, plain feeling that they are completely free. Quezon knows full well that's possible and frankly tells his people that freedom will entail hardship, sacrifice and sacrifice. He thinks the price is worth the price.

What it adds up to is that if the islands want freedom in fact, which they have now, they will have to accept our continued management. And if we want to keep the Philippines as a good, profitable market we will have to accept the responsibility of defending that market.

That defense, in a showdown, is not going to be easy—but it is not as ugly as you might guess from the map. Apparently, we would have to fight the Japanese navy seven thousand miles from our Pacific Coast battle bases; nearly five thousand miles from Pearl Harbor, in Hawaii. Fighting at such distances from supplies, fuel, munitions and repair facilities would be an enormously hazardous undertaking.

But—and it's a big but—there's Singapore. Singapore and the Japanese naval bases are about equidistant from Manila—say sixteen hundred miles. The British have formally offered—in 1939—to "lease" the Singapore base any time we need it. The base has oil supplies, two enormous drydock and plenty of repair facilities. Basing our fleet in Singapore would wash out the advantage the Japanese might gain making the battleground near the Philippines.

Still, Japan's only chance to win in the Philippines would be by defeating the Navy near the islands and destroying or capturing our bases on Luzon. She would have no chance whatever of a naval victory within a thousand miles of Hawaii. And there lies the danger.

There—and at a steaming battleship port called Balik Papan, where the lines come down to Macassar Strait—the ships zigzag in through the fields, picked out by white searchlights under the muzzles of hidden guns.

Continued from page 17

There was a crash of laughter from the big chair, where Heinemann seemed to grow steadily more like an American clown of a Nazi. "Does it matter what time it is at eight o'clock tomorrow morning?"

His forearm was paralyzed by a sudden blow of Heinemann's fist. "Stay where you are!" Heinemann growled. He forced Greg into a chair and stood over him. "Must I slap your face or can you act like a man?" The hoarse voice had sunk to a guttural and Heinemann

ARE BAD NEWS FOR YOUR HAIR!

HELPS KEEP HAIR HEALTHY AND HANDSOME!

swore violently in German. "We are not leaving for a minute or two. We are waiting for Smurthwaite."

Greg got out of the chair. "Smurthwaite has been seized."

"He has not! Stay where you are!" The bellow stopped Greg and restored his intelligence. It was going to be necessary to shoot Heinemann. The butt of his pistol was hard against his thigh. Heinemann said, "There are lights at his house! What of it? In ten minutes we will be out to sea."

"We will never get to make the start."

"Bah! You did right to play you were an Englishman! You are yellow through and through. Lights? It is the girl. She is still looking for her lover." That was possible and Greg's alarm lessened somewhat. Heinemann went on: "I grant you, we will move fast now. Not even an American could fail to get the idea when he does not come home all night. But there is plenty of time, I am counting minutes for you. You may stop trembling. I promise you, there is time enough."

Greg stood irresolute, twitching, unable to decide anything, aware that he must decide something in the course of a second. Heinemann's pig eyes watched him narrowly. Something was happening to Heinemann. It would be necessary to act at once, to shoot. . . .

Suddenly there was an unmistakable sound upstairs. Greg shrugged. He said, quietly, "That is the police. They sneaked in upstairs over the shed roof." The tenth part of a second. He leaped for the door.

HE DID not get there. He crashed into Heinemann's chest and Heinemann's gorilla arms went around him. "That is Smurthwaite," Heinemann was muttering. Greg could do nothing against that tremendous strength. Pain flashed along his arm, a forearm across his throat was strangling him, his knees buckled. Heinemann wrenched the pistol from his pocket, snarling, "Firearms are not for women." He lifted Greg off the floor and hurled him into a corner. He struck on his forehead and shoulder. The room spun and swung and came out of darkness into light again. Heinemann was ten feet away, pointing the pistol at him.

"You can get up and sit in a chair," Heinemann said. Nausea and dizziness ballooned in Greg but he shook his eyes clear, trying to focus them on the brute figure that, half crouching, still held the pistol pointing down at his chest.

Heinemann said, "Too bad but necessary. I must take no chances with you." He sat down, crossed his legs, leaned back easily and kept the pistol pointed at Greg. "That is Smurthwaite upstairs. He is carrying out my orders. He brought the boat up while you were having hysterics about some lights in a farmhouse. He went at once to do what I had told him to do."

Greg's tortured throat could produce no sound, one of his arms was wrapped in pain, something had happened to one of his legs. But his mind was clearing. He tensed his legs.

"No, don't do it," Heinemann said, conversationally. "This is too bad. You are not allowed a pistol. Smurthwaite will keep this one pressed against you in the boat." The apelike face blurred in Greg's eyes and Heinemann was chuckling. "You see, while you were gone this afternoon, there occurred an episode. It was advisable not to let you know about it. Smurthwaite is getting the other passenger we must take on the boat. You will help him with Thatcher. I will devote myself to the other passenger."

Heinemann stood over him, touched his ribs with a foot, and spoke sharply: "Stand up! We are going now. You will help Smurthwaite with Thatcher.

If there is one moment of hesitation, I will shoot. . . . Get up, I say!"

Greg got to his knees. But Smurthwaite came in. Smurthwaite said, "She is gone!"

"Gone?" Roaring, Heinemann turned away from Greg. "She cannot have gone!" He ran out of the room. Smurthwaite followed him. Greg got to his feet. He could stand up by holding on to a chair.

NATALIE felt herself being lifted. She screamed against the pad that had been bound across her mouth. Useless. It was only breath, not sound, and her throat ached. She was being carried somewhere in darkness. A voice at her ear said, "I'm Smurthwaite. Be quiet, please."

She twisted, squirming against the ropes that bound her arms, bound her legs together. She had been squirming against them for an eternity. Smurth-

"Run fast." The shed roof was silver with moonlight and she saw the dark edge beyond. She hung on to it, dropped her feet, let go. She sprawled on the ground. She got up.

Now she came alive. She was not going to run. She was not going to get into the trees. She was going back into that house, and keep on trying to get that paper back for John.

She went around the corner to the back door. It opened on the kitchen. Darkness here, after the moonlight. But someone was running upstairs—running and roaring. He was running down again. A light went on in the hall.

"She is gone!" That was Sir Eric Bramwell. He cursed in German. She heard Greg's voice and there was something wrong with it: "Who is gone?"

They came into the hall and she shrank back through the pantry door. A light went on in the kitchen. They were hardly ten feet from her. Bramso violently that she brought up a door. He had dropped her because he had said, "Damn you!" and had started to move toward him. Greg's arm was dangling grotesquely and must be hurt in the leg too, for steps were infinitely slow and falt. Bramwell said, "Stop!" and leveled his pistol. Natalie could not scream. Greg took another step, his sound rising. He took another one and the room split with the thunder of the charge.

Bramwell bumped into her, going through the door, and she sprawled the stoop. She got up. He was running toward the water. But he stopped, reaching the edge of the house's shadow. He stood for a moment in the moonlight, turned toward the front corner of the house and fired into the night. He began to run again—and stopped. He saw a clear silhouette in that silver light. The pistol rose. It fired again. More. Again, out of the moonlight came another shot. The silhouette started and went down.

Natalie got into the kitchen. She was crumpled face down on the floor. She had no sensation whatever—she was a concentrated purpose. But he said, "The thin shadow of a sound, Natalie—in my coat pocket. What do you want?"

She had it. A moment later Thatcher was with her. A moment later that she was safe, for here was John.

WHEN Caleb measured it some time later, they found that it was ninety yards from where he had thrown Hope to the ground to where Heinemann had stood in the moonlight and fired three times at Caleb. Neither of them was just where Caleb had stood to avoid that fire. Hope did not care. When it was, the scene was photographed on her memory forever in black and silver and the crimson jets of fire. She had lain there with the bullet knocked out of her and watched Caleb with a desperate unhurriedness, toward the house. Then chaos. A woman and a man burst through the kitchen door together and the man was running straight toward Witchcraft, straight toward Caleb and her. The man stood shot once—that was at John—was running again and stopped again. At ninety yards, in the moonlight, she saw the arm rise and saw the four fiery flashes. She saw Caleb raise his arm.

She was reduced to pure instinct and will. She got to her knees, she got to her feet, she started to run—it was more like crawling. Caleb was leaning over the man on the ground, then ran on to the house. She crawled, onward and someone said to her, said, "I thought you were Natalie" and abandoned her. That was John. He got inside the house before she did. But she got there, and Caleb was being held by Greg Ashburn, who was holding John and John was holding Natalie in his arms. . . . Another tableau engraved on her memory forever.

It was only the beginning of the night. Nothing had been explained, little had been said, when Nate Jenkins arrived. Hope's mind whirled and ballooned with light and sound coming through meaning little, and it seemed only seconds till the place was swarmed with police. Town police, state police—doctors—an ambulance in the yard—sirens—a furious activity—ten thousand questions. One flurry was special, tense when Caleb and Natalie made clear that Smurthwaite had to be taken and innumerable policemen surged after him without diminishing the number in the house. Then the four of them were taken away to Greg's living room and were answering questions, or to answer them.

Presently someone saw that

"Git in there, moths, an' select me a fall outfit!"

WILLIAM WILLIAMS

waite muttered in German. He stopped and, dimly, she saw a ceiling just above her. The attic stairs. Smurthwaite whispered, "I am getting you away. You must make no sound. Be still. Do not scream. Do not struggle."

With infinite slowness he went down the stairs. It was a little lighter here—this would be the second floor. He laid her on the floor and bent down till his mouth was at her ear. "There is only a minute or two. If you cry out we are lost." He unbound her arms. "Work your hands. You will need them." He got the rope off her knees and ankles. He pulled her to her feet. "Good!" She swayed against the wall. "You must have strength," he commanded her in a whisper that reached her intelligence at last. Inch by inch, making no sound, he got a window open. He pulled her to it. "A minute or two only. The roof of the shed is three feet down. Drop from the roof to the ground. Then run. Get into the trees. Thank you for caring about Radnor."

She was paralyzed. Smurthwaite shook her. "Be quick!" He shoved her to the window sill, shoved her over it. Her hands gripped it and her feet swung down till there was support beneath them. "Run!" Smurthwaite whispered, well shouted, "There is no time. We will go now," and Greg shouted something, and Bramwell cut across Greg's shout, "Smurthwaite, get him into the boat!"

There was no one else to stop them. She had to go into that kitchen. She was going into it. She went.

They were stopped—frozen motionless where they stood. Smurthwaite by the hall door with his face stupefied, Bramwell nearest her with a pistol in his hand and his face frightful, Greg with blood on his forehead and one arm dangling, a terrible comprehension coming into his battered face.

Time was turned off. It began again when Natalie's tranced eyes saw Smurthwaite disappear through the hall door behind him. No one else saw that abandonment—they were all talking now, or shouting. Greg had said, "Natalie!" and turned painfully toward Bramwell, "She was your passenger!" Bramwell had said "Ja" in a choked voice, and filthy German words followed that syllable. And Natalie had said to Greg, "I've found out. Give it to me."

Bramwell leaped for her, and she screamed once before he got his hand over her mouth. He was yelling "Smurthwaite!" as before, hours since, but he dropped her, flinging her aside

Distinguished too for its smoothness...because

GOOD OLD-FASHIONED BULKING MELLOWS THE SMOKE

● PALL MALL has reached into the past and revived an old-fashioned, painstaking, almost forgotten method of bringing out the full goodness of fine tobacco ... "BULKING."

In "BULKING," the superb Pall Mall tobaccos are mingled together and left to rest in big, fragrant heaps. Here they generate their own heat—and bask in it. Given sufficient time in this beneficial warmth (careful, old-fashioned, conscientious workmanship just can't be hurried) the tobaccos merge into one supremely mellow blend. Harsh qualities grow mild; subtle flavors and aromas are released, to permeate every shred of tobacco. Thus "BULKING" mellows the smoke ... gives you a really smoother cigarette.

A significant fact, established by independent research: With Pall Mall, there is noticeably less finger stain, or no finger stain at all.

Pall Mall is a cooler cigarette, too—because the additional length travels the smoke further.

Yourself, try Pall Mall critically!

"WHEREVER PARTICULAR PEOPLE CONGREGATE"

could not talk very well because she was shivering, and gave her a big glass of whisky. She made them understand that she wasn't frightened any more, she was just cold, and someone wrapped a blanket around her. She told what she knew, or disjointed parts of it, but couldn't have told it intelligently, for the whisky made her mind spin faster and float higher.

At least she made out that Caleb and John were rapidly piecing things together, even if she didn't understand; that Natalie had been tied up like Caleb, that mystery was being chipped away in large chunks. She made out that John had taken hold of this thing and was running it himself. And she saw John suddenly put an end to the ordeal—getting up and ordering it stopped.

"Take my car and drive these women to your house," he commanded Caleb. He blazed at Jim Dowdy and the state police lieutenant, "I will not permit you to harass them after what they've been through." He glared at Hope, "Take that man's blanket off!" That seemed so logical and was so forcible that she fairly shrank out of the blanket. Now, for the first time, somebody noticed that there was a trickle of blood on John's wrist—yes, and he had left a spot of it on Natalie's cheek—and at once no one could misunderstand how Natalie felt about it. But when they got the cuff back it was only a little nick in his forearm, hardly even a scratch, and that was the last damage Heinemann had done to anyone. A surgeon came in, now, and said that Heinemann wasn't dead. Caleb said, "If he lives he'll just fry." The curt, hard words stopped Hope's vertigo. She began to understand. It was over, this was the end, what had begun in Spain had now stopped threatening Wallisport, and they had come through.

Caleb took them to his house, and her mind was clearing and quieting. It had been lived through! Caleb was free of danger, she had come out of the shadow. Then Caleb swept away the last vestige of disbelief and horror, and released a catch that let joy flood over her in a great, rising wave. He opened his bedroom door, gestured Hope and Natalie inside, said, "You can put on some of my clothes," and shut the door on them.

There it was! She was all mirth, all delight. For this was how it had begun, they had come around the circle to the starting place. Stripping off her sodden clothes, washing caked mud from her face and arms, toweling herself till her skin glowed, catching sight of her inconceivably bedraggled hair in the mirror, putting on Caleb's underwear and trousers and sweater—why, she had done this before, the broken tune had been caught up again and would be finished, she wanted to laugh, she wanted to cry, and if she cried it would not be for sorrow.

Natalie was still and silent. Hope studied her covertly. That pale face was different; something had subtly refined it so that it seemed gentler, less arrogant. A depth that was not altogether horror had been added to the sea-blue eyes. Natalie was changed—and you didn't need to guess twice. But the change had not impaired her immaculateness. She had spent hours bound up in Greg's attic, she had twisted and rolled and fallen and been tossed about, but her hair seemed to be freshly waved, her dress was hardly wrinkled, and she could have paid a formal call just as she was.

Except—Hope said, "Oh, Natalie, you slattern! There are runs in your stockings! They're ruined. How slovenly, how vulgar!"

They clasped each other and laughter rose up from the very depths of Hope's being. It was a laughter that cleansed and healed. But Caleb knocked at the door. "Natalie," he said, "there's a fireplace there."

That meant nothing to Hope but Natalie's cheeks grew even paler, then a slow flush came to them. She took a parchment envelope from the bodice of her dress and withdrew from it a thin, creased packet of papers. Confusion, fear, repugnance moved across her face. She looked at Hope, a question in her eyes, didn't ask the question, stood irresolute.

Hope said, "After tonight, nothing matters."

Natalie whispered, "I believe you." She laid the papers on a charred log and set fire to them. When they had burned away, she stretched out a toe—and be sure that was a fashionable slipper—and slowly ground the ash to powder. A shudder passed over that fine body, and then Natalie's cheeks were stained a still deeper red.

The aroma of coffee invaded the room—and the exultation in Hope's blood grew stronger. She had stood in the kitchen, had seen the interrupted preparations for a meal, and had thought that Caleb might be dead. He wasn't dead and now that meal would be completed. Much else would be completed.

Later, John had come, Caleb and Natalie were eating, and all four were talking rapidly and easily, held in a new friendship there was no time to speculate about. The others were impelled to ask and answer all the questions, but not Hope. She just wanted to sit by Caleb, touch him sometimes, and wait—wait patiently enough for what would surely come. She didn't care what happened to the puzzles. But if the others did, let them talk—at last there was plenty of time.

"If there had been any way of getting all four of us together and pooling what we knew!" Caleb said. "It could all have been prevented. But no, we had to go on quarreling about women and Red plots and who is jealous about what and why don't you leave my girl alone!" He scowled and banged the table. "Four damned fools! But in a championship contest, I'd win in a walk."

The new John Gabriel, who had a much quieter assurance than the old one and seemed much more formidable, said, "From here on, we aren't going to call ourselves fools."

They had thrashed all this out at Greg's, but Caleb had to go on: "Bert must have caught sight of Heinemann right after he left Hope. He must have started to follow him and followed him right up into Greg's yard, right on into the house. We'll never know—"

"They'll get Smurthwaite in an hour or two," John pointed out. "They'll turn him inside out. They'll clear things up."

"And inside the house was—a damned Nazi that two of us had taken for a gentlemanly British agent who didn't count. Bert didn't have a chance." Hope saw the passionate despair in Caleb's eyes—the deeper because he too had lain bound and blinded, waiting to be drowned. Her breast rose in a great sigh—we can't do anything about Bert, but we're safe, it's over. She pressed Caleb's hand. He went on talking: "Ashburn must have been pretty high up. Wallisport must have been a focus in the system. Well, Uncle Sam's boys will find out about that. Yes, and we'll all be talking to them till we're bored. . . . Everything keeps coming back to Ashburn. He had brains. Heinemann must have demanded his help when he got here and found Bert on hand. Heinemann knew his life wasn't worth a nickel if Bert saw him."

Caleb got up and began to stride about the room, seething with explanations: "The whole plan was not to do anything about Bert themselves. Greg had an agent in the mills—we'll turn him up now. So he had his agent set a fire—a crude, suspicious fire that would make Gabriel believe Bert had set the fire—Gabriel could have him put away. So they set the fire. But they hadn't counted on someone's blundering in the back door. Hope and I did—the very night of the fire. The boat Greg kept at Gorham and no one ever saw it because no boats ever come through the Farrow Shoals and no boats are kept on Witchcraft. Particularly, a country gentleman wouldn't keep a boat—he loved dogs and horses. Smurthwaite must have brought a lot of callers to Greg, up Witchcraft, after midnight, when nobody would see. And the boat was coming for Heinemann that night. But Hope and I blundered into that. That was the pay-off. I had to be discredited, and it would be great stuff if I got jailed too. And still they had to work around a corner."

He turned to Hope: "It was Ashburn who phoned about your car. It was Ashburn who kept telling Gabriel, with the greatest reluctance, that I must be engaged in some fiendish Red business with Bert. It was Ashburn who planted that paper here and told John fairy tales about my secret communications with Bert after he'd gone into hiding."

Hope wanted to say, It doesn't matter any more, darling. But there was no stopping him. "It didn't work. Luck and chance were on our side. Neither Bert nor I got put away. They weren't so bright! So then there was nothing to it but murder." He stopped, then went on much more slowly: "We weren't too bright! It was a damned close thing!" He faced the others. "The moral is: take Hope's word for it, she knows best! She suspected the beggar all along. If I had listened to her—"

"I didn't suspect him," Hope said, "I just didn't want him playing with my garters. No, the moral is: don't believe Caleb when he says he's in no danger. The moral is: what are the police for? Any one of us could have broken it up at any time, if we'd told the police the truth. No, we wouldn't—we might hurt somebody's feelings, somebody might be embarrassed, somebody might get mad! Or maybe the moral is: just wake up when a boat happens to come by."

"Five minutes!" Caleb said. "They lost their game by not more than five minutes. And you licked them."

"Did I? They lost it by just one minute! Who got that minute for us? Natalie! Maybe the moral is: be kind to servants. Or: feel sorry when dogs are shot! One minute more would have . . . changed everything. And that was Natalie—with Smurthwaite's help."

"The moral is—" This was Natalie, and her voice was deep and strange. She got up from the table. She said, "No, I won't tell you what the moral is." Her face was pale again, deadly pale, but she stood straight and calm, looking at John. Clearly, John was the only person in this room. "You can draw whatever moral you like. But I'm going to tell you—"

"Nothing! Nothing at all!" This was John, and he was pale too. He had stood up but he wasn't calm. Far from it. He looked like a man who was holding himself back by the collar of his own coat. "There is nothing I want to know. There is nothing I will listen to. Good God, Natalie! I came to a house where I knew you were and heard shooting!"

"Nothing can stop me—"

"I can stop you!" That was a kind of bellow, and John looked accusingly, wildly, at Hope and Caleb. Oh, wildly!

Caleb said, "Well, stop her," and that seemed to be what was needed. It got action. John walked toward Natalie and she shrank away, her arms trying to keep him back. They didn't keep him back, his arms went around her and she tried to strain away from them, turning her head away, desperately keeping her chin down. Her bitter resolution was not last. Suddenly her arms locked behind his head, she sobbed and rose to his kiss. . . . They stood wondering, looked confusedly at each other, and Caleb, seemed abashed and away, arm in arm, and went out the room. Outside, the engine of John's car whirled awake. John's hat and gloves were on a chair.

"Well!" Hope murmured. "I say, he never found it in his head to be like that."

"I told you months ago you'd never be Mrs. Gabriel."

"Mrs. Gabriel will be Mrs. Gabriel. What was that paper you told me to burn?"

"I don't know," Caleb said. "I think John will ever know. He could stop her from telling him, as if he can."

"And there she goes with even a pin in place and her make-up aged and not an inch of slip. And here I am with slime under my fingernails and my hair full of not a stitch of womanly clothes."

"You look fine," Caleb said. "I be surprised how fine you look."

So suddenly it was very quiet in the room, the room that had seen so much intense and heartbreaking things, a room where, a few hours ago, they thought that Caleb was dead, that she could not go on living. Those hours between! The power of them had lost its power now but would come back, would have to be dealt with and subdued. Some other time! Now was just quiet here, with a sense of marshes and the sea beyond, where Bert had been drowned but hadn't been. Now it had all ended could begin.

The moment was so quiet, so line, so taut with peace that she was most reluctant to have it end. But it ended!

She said, "We can break out of about Bert and all the rest. Or we can not break them. I can come this way toward you. Or you can come this way—your legs are longer than mine, darling."

But Caleb was like rock. "Well, I shot him. Maybe he's going to die, but I would have any time I could, or he was dead. Nothing could have stopped me. You couldn't have stopped me shot him. What about it?"

Tears came storming to her eyes. "What about it? I saw you walk away some grass with moonlight on it, and him raise his gun and shoot at me. Yes, and had seen him walk away death without flinching from it."

He said, even more slowly, "I saw something else. You saw a boat waded up Witchcraft. You saw me through a window and saved me. 'I didn't do it so that you'd be there and make speeches,' she said. 'Does it turn out that Gabriel knows more about women than you do?'"

No. At last, no. . . . And she had never been kissed before. It would be kissed again. . . . The clock on the mantel struck once. Thirty! Hope said, "Aunt Elinor got to tell her that the worst she hoped for has come true. Dear care where I am at three-thirty for she knows where I am."

At last she moved out of the room. She became aware again of her dress—sweater, trousers, socks, slippers—had begun with a drenching in the craft and putting on Caleb's clothes. It had got around to that again. The starting place. This time the going on from there.

"Yes," he said, "you're beautiful. I'll tell Aunt Elinor."

THE END

like the 20th Century, the primary comfort of a roomette, the most innovation in sleeping accommodations, is available at little more than the cost of an open section. Despite fastidious living, the roomette has a luxuriously soft, full-sized concealed toilet facilities, a clothes closet, and such welcome refinements as air conditioning, individualized light-heat regulation and temperature control.

The famous hospitality of the 20th Century is nowhere more apparent than in its diner. For here, when you choose to be alone, you can have a table to yourself . . . here, too, when you feel like mingling with people, the opportunity is made each evening. For, after the last meal is served, this magnificently decorated car becomes a night club complete with colored lights, swing music and secluded conversational nooks.

The drawing room on the 20th Century resembles a living room. One full-sized bed folds into the wall. The sofa and upper also make up into full-sized beds. But when all three beds are made down for the night, ample space remains for moving about. Of course, in the drawing rooms on this magic train, the complete toilet facilities are concealed and, in many instances, adjoining rooms are available.

NEW YORK CENTRAL'S World-Famous

20TH CENTURY LIMITED

BUILT BY PULLMAN-STANDARD

THE WORLD'S LARGEST BUILDERS OF RAILROAD AND TRANSIT EQUIPMENT

Almost 40 years, the Twentieth Century Limited has been one of the most famous and luxurious trains on earth. Today, streamlined into beauty by Pullman-Standard, it has taken on a new and even greater significance. For the train, flashing over the countryside as silently and majestically as a meteor aptly symbolizes the efficiency with which the railroads of America have set about the task of making modern streamlined transportation available.

In the last 16 years 16 railroad systems have added Pullman-Standard streamlined units

Think back, you'll remember that in February 1934 there was but one streamliner in the country . . . and that, built by Pullman-Standard, was exhibited at the second opening of the Century of Progress.

By way of contrast, today practically every city can boast of this modern service . . . practically every section the pleasing and whistle of these trains has become a familiar sound. For within these six eventful years the number of railroads operating Pullman-Standard streamlined trains or cars has increased from one to sixteen . . . the number of track miles served by them, extended until they span the country from coast to coast, from Maine to Mexico.

Pullman-Standard streamliners are putting profits back into railroading

As the American creator of this type of transportation, and as the builder of over 70% of the lightweight, streamlined units which have been purchased, Pullman-Standard's role in the achievements of this phenomenal record has been vital. Yet in an important sense it has been secondary to the one which you, a representative of the American traveling public, have played.

By riding these Pullman-Standard-built streamliners in such numbers that you have made them the most popular and profitable trains on earth, you have encouraged the railroads to put an ever-increasing number into service and enabled them to pack a lifetime's advance in safety and comfort, within the limits of six short years.

A visit to the bar lounge of the 20th Century is an experience akin to being a guest in a famous and exclusive club. For rarely does the Century move without a quorum of internationally known people aboard. And, as the social center of this magnificent train, it is here that you will encounter them.

PULLMAN-STANDARD CAR MANUFACTURING COMPANY—CHICAGO

Copyright 1940, by Pullman-Standard Car Manufacturing Company

"Tops"
IN STREAMLINERS ARE BUILT BY

Pullman-Standard

*My best customer WOULD come to town at the peak of the HOT SPELL!

HOT-WEATHER PERSPIRATION GAVE ANDY

B.O. (BODY ODOR)

AND NERVOUS TENSION MADE IT WORSE

WE'LL HAVE TO BE ON OUR TOES TONIGHT, HONEY. NELSON IS AWFULLY IMPORTANT TO ME

LATER I'M SORRY WE MUST LEAVE SO EARLY. THIS UNFORTUNATE HEADACHE - ER - ER -

I DO HOPE YOU'LL COME AGAIN MRS. NELSON

I KNOW WHY THEY LEFT. BECAUSE OF THE THING I'VE BEEN HINTING AND HINTING TO YOU ABOUT. NOW I'LL SAY IT RIGHT OUT - 'B.O.'!

BUT JEAN! YOU KNOW HOW OFTEN I BATHE!

JEAN FOUND THE ANSWER ALL RIGHT - LIFEBUOY IN MY MORNING BATH REALLY PREVENTS 'B.O.' THIS BRACING, PURIFYING LATHER SURE PUTS THE FIGHT IN A FELLOW, TOO

Take Note! "B.O." A DOUBLE DANGER IN SUMMER!

● In hot weather we all perspire, and that's just an invitation to "B.O." Nervous perspiration that comes from excitement or emotions doubles the danger.

Lifebuooy Health Soap in your daily bath really protects you. It's the only popular soap especially made to prevent "B.O." Lifebuooy puts tang, refreshment into your bath. Loads of purifying lather. Lifebuooy has an exclusive deodorizing ingredient. More folks use it for their bath than any other soap. Get it today!

I SPENT THE DAY WITH MR. NELSON. HE GAVE ME A BIG ORDER AND WANTS TO TAKE US TO DINNER.

THAT'S SPLENDID!

TO HERSELF ANDY WON'T BE SHADOWED BY 'B.O.' THIS TIME!

LIFEBUOY HEALTH SOAP

Its crisp odor goes in a Jiffy - Its Protection lasts and lasts

The Winner—FAMINE

Continued from page 21

leading. These percentages of self-sufficiency are influenced by the size, eating habits and distribution facilities of the various countries. There can be, and too often is, famine among peoples in countries that are almost and even quite self-sufficient. Russia has furnished an ugly example. Moreover England, France and Germany, being more elaborately educated in the art of eating might, in normal crop years, be nearer to self-sufficiency were their appetites as simple and as easily appeased as Estonia's, Rumania's and Bulgaria's where the ordinary menu, particularly that of the peasant, might strike you as a bit monotonous.

But all that's beside the point. You may reduce these percentages of normal self-sufficiency by a quarter to a half and view the outlook from Europe this winter from there. All the contributing reasons for this prospect that we've set down above are complicated and even multiplied by the problem of dislocated peoples. Until long after peace returns on broken wings to Europe and Hitler finishes his task of repatriating nationals, redrafting maps and segregating the unwanted, there will be hundreds of thousands of people, whom war has robbed of their homes, wandering up and down the continent living, starving, dying and being killed on the roadsides. In any famine conditions, Mr. Hoover has learned, the job of feeding the helpless is not one to be undertaken by those easily discouraged.

As usual Mr. Hoover has gone to standard sources for his statistics and has relied upon long-established authorities. Reports from various American consulates contribute. And research has been made into the files of The Economist (London), Foreign Commerce Yearbook of the United States Department of Commerce, The League of Nations, the report of the Delegation for the Promotion of Economic Co-operation Between Northern Countries, the Berlin Institute for Business Research, the Institute for Economic Research, Louvain University, and so on.

Facing a Black Winter

Germany has been as coldly efficient at going to market as she has going to war. Into that portion of Poland not absorbed into the Reich and annexed by Russia, the so-called Government General, Hitler has packed more than 15,000,000 people where fewer than 10,000,000 lived before. These 78 counties are chiefly industrial. They must import food or starve. They will eat what Germany and Russia give them in payment for their labor.

The Hoover files have it that "almost seven million of these people" are on the verge of starvation and that "one thousand of them are dying daily for the want of food." An influenza epidemic is helping them die. As Germany and Russia took the agricultural sectors of Poland, so may she quarter other conquered lands, including France. She will not starve in Europe's famine. Starvation can solve the political problems she acquired with victory. Poland's great food staple—peas—has been cut in half by crop failures. And Germany has taken most of that to augment her own soya-bean stores—the famous Nazi Food Pills made from soya, the "Magic Bean." Normally Poland raises more than 7,000,000 beef cattle. The fodder failure reduced these herds to 2,400,000. And Germany shipped them to her abattoirs against the black winter that is to come.

We've cited Poland as a horrible example. Norway is rationing flour at a rate of three ounces a week per person. Germany has forbidden the Norwegians to feed grain to the too few cattle remaining in their barns. Norway depends upon imports for seventy-five per cent of her breadstuffs. She is getting less than five per cent of that today and that by the grace of Adolf Hitler. Her margarine, fats and sugar are exhausted. She is eating fish but no meat. A whale oil, an important element in her diet, is being diverted to Germany for the winter is months away.

Defeated Nature—Triumphant Famine

Denmark is slaughtering live stock because she cannot feed them. And many takes them as they fall. Belgium and the Netherlands are already going bankrupt. Milk and beef are mere memories.

Even Russia, the nervous neutrals lying awake at nights wondering about next winter's food. That's why she demanded—and got—Bessarabia. She wants wheat. She can't afford to let Germany and Italy gobble Danubian food. The Hoover files lack specific information about Russia's food situation. Equally reticent are other sources. Such are the bare facts. The situation has only one direction to travel—downward. A defeated Nature and a triumphant Hitler have seen to that.

Outside Europe there is plenty. Argentina mourns the loss of twenty per cent of her export trade because she may not sell her meat and wheat to the low countries, Belgium, Denmark, Poland, Sweden, Finland, Switzerland. Nor may she sell to France, whose ports are held by Germany and Italy and closed to trade by the British blockade. Italy and Germany used to take thirty per cent of Argentina's food exports. They're no longer customers. They're taking their food where they find it and death can play with what's left. Likewise the United States, Brazil, Uruguay and Chile may gorge themselves on their own crops and herds and leave what remains to rot while Europe starves.

Mr. Hoover's files tell us that in the meantime the United States, Canada, Australia and the Argentine are at the wits' end to find storage space for excess foods left over from past harvests. The world has 1,433,000,000 bushels of wheat left over from crops it couldn't eat and couldn't sell. The United Kingdom and Ireland expect to buy 233,000 bushels this year, chiefly from the British dominions. The rest can rust and mold while ten million hands reach for a loaf. America sent $40,000,000 to the relief of the desperate peoples of foreign countries last year. She could multiply that by ten if she would, and still the famished victims of embattled political systems would starve. A child can die in the Baltic countries for five cents a day. And yet refugees and observers send word that the streets and the roads are filled with kids already horrible caricatures of childhood—bird-legged, reed-armed, fever-eyed and bald-headed. An adult can be fed for as little as seven cents a day. But you can't live on seven cents.

Germans tell Mr. Hoover that the war will soon be over, Britain gone the victor of France. The British report that many will be starved into submission next winter and the world will be saved to Democracy. In either case the picture you read in the files is not altered. Famine is stalking Europe. She is nobly ally.

Vive la guerre.

Bathtub Melody

Continued from page 10

readily. He grinned. "Splendid," he said.

"Is it in Phoenix?" he asked. He set down the coffeepot carefully. His eyes still held his own with that gaze, and it seemed to Jake that, at her beautiful tan, she had paled.

"I don't know," she said slowly. "I don't know how it is in Phoenix." He noticed that her hand shook as she gave him the sugar. Then he noticed her finger. There was a large diamond there, but she was not wearing a ring. Jake's heart leaped.

"Understand," he said softly, giving her a warm, knowing glance.

"Let that pass. 'Tell me,' she said, 'do you bathe here, Mr. Speer?'"

"No," he explained, inching his chair a little closer to her own, "it's not my thing. A bathtub's the only place I really relax. When I've got the beat of a tune in my head I just draw a hot tub. I get in there and work until I could never think of a single shower bath."

"I love shower baths."

"You're all right," Jake agreed. "But I'm composing music. A tub is the best for that." He sipped his coffee, made motions of looking around. "Is this your aunt this morning?"

"My mother?"

"No," he said. "She's gone back to San Francisco. She's just visiting me for a while."

"At, with a horrid sensation that something had gone wrong, set down his coffee. 'You are George Blair's cousin, aren't you?' he asked hopefully."

"No," she said. "I'm afraid I'm not. Your mother is certainly George's."

"How me to decide that," she said. He stared at her. "I have a feeling I've been some mistake here."

"He smiled at him. 'Yes,' she said. 'Who are you?' he whispered."

"Jane Mays," she said. "I'm a mother."

"Then you're not married!" he cried. "No," she admitted. "I'm engaged."

"On it Jake saw a picture of a man with a very positive expression."

"I guess I must have gotten the wrong house," he muttered, feeling only acutely embarrassed.

"I guess so," she said. "I'm so glad you got this straightened out. Mother wants to leave me down here alone with strange men wandering in and out."

"Got up. 'Did you ever hear of a girl called My Girl?' he asked her."

"Yes, indeed."

"Just wondered," he said. "Well—"

"Isn't there some way I could go in there sometimes?" he asked.

"She shook her head. 'It really doesn't look right, would it, Mr. Speer?' She smiled up at him sweetly, 'You were some kind of lunatic. 'I'm red that you want to think up your own in my bathtub, but—'"

"Never mind," he interrupted stiffly. "I'm sorry I mentioned it. I'm sorry about everything." He bowed, glared at the picture on the secretary and went to the door.

"You didn't let the water out of the tub last time, either," she called after him. He reddened, then went on out.

He felt like crawling.

The next house was indeed similar to the one he had left. A tiny white-haired lady responded to his knock. She looked him over, smiling.

"I know," she said. "You are George's friend, who's come to take a bath."

Jake smiled wanly.

"Come right in," she said. "I've two lovely baths, and you may make your choice of them."

Both baths, Jake found, were of the noisy variety. One was done in old lavender, with vermilion accessories, the other was a nightmare of orange and navy blue. Faced with a choice, Jake indicated to George's aunt that he would prefer the vermilion-and-old-lavender number.

It was the most unsatisfactory bath he ever remembered taking. When he lay in the tub with his eyes open he could only shudder, and when he closed his eyes he saw the girl.

He climbed out of the vermilion horror, as barren of melody as when he had entered it.

After three days of sitting at the piano, biting his nails and brooding, he went to see a real-estate agent. "I'd like to look at some nice bathrooms," he told him.

"You want houses with them?"

"I don't want anything gaudy," Jake said.

The agent drove him around to see some. Jake would enter a house, go directly to the bath, or baths, and walk right out again. They all were wrong. The agent appeared heartily relieved to get rid of Jake.

Jake went home to George's house and put on some swimming trunks. The weather was fine and hot. The birds, the fragrant air, the flowers and the people all seemed full of the old allegro as he walked gloomily down to the beach; large . . . Large Jake.

He found a secluded cove and flopped on the sand, staring out at the glistening surf. He wondered if he could think up a tune in the Pacific. Deciding he might as well try, he got up and trudged dourly into it. If there were only some way to heat it, he thought. It was really a very pleasant décor, what with those fleecy cloud effects, the aquamarine, and that pale sky-blue. It really reminded him of that old bathroom of his back on East Fifty-eighth. Or—some-what—of her bath. Stingy—that's what she certainly was. Unimaginative! He lay on a tilting swell out past the surf and tried not to think about her.

AFTER half an hour he emerged shivering on the lip of a wave. He picked himself up and hummed a bar or two unenthusiastically. He had the beginning of something, but he didn't think it was anything very good. Then he forgot about it entirely. Someone had usurped his cove. She had!

Clothed in a play suit, she was astraddle a camp stool, daubing at a canvas fastened to a portable easel.

Jake walked up and stared somberly over her shoulder. Waves were taking form on the canvas. A small figure was lying on one of them.

"Like it?" she asked, without looking up from her work.

"No," he said.

She indicated the minute figure of the bather with the tip of her brush. "That's you."

"I still don't like it," he said. "I'd rather be in your bathtub. You don't know what you're doing to me. You don't seem to realize."

She looked up then, wide-eyed; said:

THREE KINDS OF MONEY NO MAN SHOULD BE WITHOUT

EVERY man who faces reality finds—eventually—that he really needs not one, but three kinds of money.

Sudden misfortune such as illness can deal special punishment to the man who is not prepared for emergencies. So, he needs a kind of money that is always ready to his hand—cash in the bank.

For the sake of his family, he needs still another kind of money . . . money that can shoulder his responsibilities in case of death.

The need for both of these types of money is well recognized. One out of every three families in the country has a savings account. One out of every 2 has life insurance.

But today, many, many people are awake to the urgent need for a third kind of money . . . money which will be accumulated persistently step-by-step during the years of a man's best earning power to take care of the years that follow. This kind of money is, truly, a kind no man should be without.

♦♦ The First Step ♦♦

If you make a regular and adequate income, yet still find yourself unable to accumulate money, the first step is to find out where your money goes. Keeping a record of what you spend is essential if you want to make the most of your income.

To help you take this first, important step, Investors Syndicate offers, without obligation, a booklet, "Living" Expenses . . . a simple, easy way to find out where your money goes. This is not a budget book. For your copy, mail the coupon immediately to Investors Syndicate. Enclose 10c in coin or stamps to cover handling and postage. Do it now!

Home Office, Minneapolis, Minn. Affiliates: Investors Syndicate Title & Guaranty Co., New York; Investors Syndicate, Limited, Canada

INVESTORS SYNDICATE

Living Protection... Estab. 1894

INVESTORS SYNDICATE Dept. C-70, Minneapolis, Minn.	Please send me your new booklet "Living" Expenses. Enclosed is 10c to cover cost of handling and mailing.
Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____

EASY WAY TO MAKE YOUR CAR LOOK

NEW!

Take off Dirt.. Bring Back Lustre

MOBILGLOSS does two things at once. It cleans—and at the same time it polishes.

The special, rapid-acting solvents Mobilgloss contains quickly remove grease, grime, oxidation, and road film. The original color and beauty of your car reappears. With little effort, and in surprisingly little time, you can give your car a brilliant, long-lasting polish, and have it looking brand-new.

Try Mobilgloss on your car. Get some from your nearby dealer today.

MOBILGLOSS

Preserve the gloss— Protect the finish

If, in addition, you want a wax finish for your car, give it a protective coat of Mobilwax. This special blend of waxes in cream form is easy to apply—rubs up quickly to a lustrous, long-lasting finish.

MOBILWAX

Buy where you buy Mobiloil or Mobilgas

Mobil Specialties

MOBILGLOSS • MOBILWAX • MOBIL STOP-LEAK
MOBIL HANDY OIL • MOBIL RADIATOR FLUSH
MOBIL WINDOW SPRAY • MOBIL UPPERLUBE
MOBIL HYDROTONE • MOBIL SPOT REMOVER

BY THE MAKERS OF MOBIL OIL

"What am I doing to you, Mr. Speer?"

"You're ruining my career."

"Well, I can't help it. You just can't use my bathtub to think up your songs in. What would people say?"

"So that's it!" he exclaimed. "You're a puritan. Full of musty old orthodox scruples! No wonder you don't paint better."

She bent over her work again, dipped some blue from her palette and began daubing out the figure on the wave. "I didn't want to say so," she remarked rather absently, "but I thought that song, My Girl, was one of the corniest little numbers I ever heard."

Jake snatched up his towel, laughing bitterly. "I'm beginning to think so myself!" he cried.

The telephone was ringing when he got back to the house. It was Joe Haver.

"Well," Joe said. "Been down bathing, have you, Jake? Been down sporting with the girls on the beach?"

"Listen—" Jake began patiently.

"You listen!" Joe said. "When you going to give me some more music? We're trying to start shooting up here."

"It's the bathtubs," Jake said.

"What did you say?"

"Bathtubs," Jake repeated. "I'll have something for you in a day or two."

There was a silence on the other end of the wire, then Joe Haver said, enunciating very distinctly, "I don't want any bathtubs. I don't want any nuts. I want two more tunes—quick!" He hung up.

Jake put down the receiver with his ear smarting. He went over and sat down on the piano bench in his wet trunks. He made a violent glissando, then started picking out the notes.

He had gotten away with worse tunes before, but it wasn't the sort of thing that had gotten him where he was. It wasn't what made him worth the money he was getting. People wouldn't walk out of the theater whistling this one. He didn't even dare take it up to the studio; he mailed it.

Two days passed, days of utter frustration, then Joe Haver was cooing in his ear again. "We got a tune here in the mail," Joe said sweetly. "Was it something from you, Jake?"

"Yes," Jake said.

"Don't you think it's just a little sour, Jake?"

"Well," Jake said, "it's where this hooper thinks he's lost the beautiful chorus girl, and he's supposed to be sort of sad. It's moody—see?"

"Moody—sure!" Joe screamed. "But the way you got it he'll be committing suicide before the end of the picture. So will everybody else! Now, listen—I can get boys a dime a dozen to turn out a dirge like that. That's not what I'm paying you for. You're Jake Speer. And the next one has got to be a Jake Speer tune—plus! You get what I mean?"

"Sure," Jake said wearily. "I know—the old allegro." He hung up.

HE HAD gone at it all wrong; he could see that now. He should have been nice to her, showered her with attentions, and pretty soon she would have been begging him to use her bathtub.

He waited at the window until he saw her coming up the street from the beach, then strolled casually out to his mailbox.

"Why, hello!" he called, pretending to notice her with great surprise. He walked over and took her easel from her. "Let me carry this."

She opened her gate without comment and walked up the path to the porch. She turned and put out her hands for the easel, looking into Jake's eyes.

"I was just thinking," he said. "How would you like to go out for cocktails, and some dinner?"

"Why?" she asked.

"Don't be mad at me," he begged her. "I'm not mad at you. I'm sorry I said that about your painting. Having the artistic temperament yourself, you can understand how a fellow gets."

He noted, with a kind of stricken detachment, that she seemed to be getting very angry. She suddenly jerked the easel from his hands. "I understand!" she cried. "I understand perfectly well! You're just trying to be nice to me because you want to use my bathtub. That's all you're thinking about. Why—that first time when you came out of there you didn't even look at me!"

"Oh, no," Jake said. "You're all wrong. I looked at you. Stop! Believe me—"

"Get off my porch!" she cried.

JAKE left—went across the street to sit wrapped in lonely melancholy while the sun fell splendidly into the sea. He knew now that he needed more than her bathtub for inspiration. He needed her—just as he had always needed her.

Two funeral days staggered by, and then Joe Haver was on the phone again. "You got just three more days to write me a smash hit," Haver said very softly. "If you don't do it, Jake, you'll never write a tune for anybody else. You can't let me down. If you don't do it you're through for good—in Hollywood, on Broadway and even in Timbuktu!"

Jake wandered glumly over to the piano with the last of this threat running through his mind: "... in Hollywood, on Broadway and even in Timbuktu!"

Timbuktu—you!

Standing, he played a few chords, sang it. Then he went out into the evening, across the street. No lights were burning in the little white house. He seized the pencil that hung on a chain by the door and wrote hastily on the note pad:

"This is the end! Either I use your tub tomorrow or I am ruined."

"P.S. And it never was just the tub!!!"

As soon as he woke next morning he opened his front door and looked at the slate tacked up next to it. "Well, all right," was chalked there. "At ten."

When he entered she was sitting in the breakfast alcove in the striped housecoat. She looked at him levelly. "Go right on," she said. "You don't have to bother to stop and talk."

"I can't talk anyway—now that I'm practically a failure," he said. "That is, I can't tell you what I'd like to. I just want to ask you if you remember what color hair that girl in the song, My Girl, had?"

"Brown," she said. "Dark brown."

"What color eyes?"

"Blue," she said. "Eyes so blue."

"While I'm taking a bath," he told her, "you ought to go look in a mirror."

He sank his melancholy length wonderful tub and sighed with pleasure.

He closed his eyes and began to hum happily: "In Hollywood, on Broadway and even in Timbuktu..."

After a while he began to sing it and he became aware of the disharmony a loud, angry voice. He stopped, singing. Someone pounded on the door.

"Come out of there!" someone cried.

"Come out or I'll break in the door!"

Jake leaped furiously from the tub and put on his robe. He unlocked the door and stepped out. The young man with the positive expression took a horrified look at him, then turned bitterly to Jane Mays.

"I might have known it!" he said. "Letting you live all alone down here. I suppose this is just some queer Bohemian custom!"

Jake, having taken in the delicate situation, made protest. "It wasn't her fault," he said. "I just wandered around, going into strange houses and taking baths."

"Oh, sure! You just dropped in to take a bath!"

Jake nodded innocently.

"Would you please go now," Jane begged him tearfully.

"Well, I was just taking a bath—help me!" Jake declared.

HE SAT on the piano bench, peering deeply. Had she known her husband was coming down? If he only knew that, Jake thought, he would have plenty.

After a while he heard the sound of a car starting. The sound came from across the street. He rushed to the window but was not in time to see her had driven away in the car, him or not. He looked at the clock. It was noon. He had just two and a half days now to write a smash hit, a tune he knew that if she had gone away in a car he would never write it. He went over to the piano and sat down, slipping on the keyboard with his face buried in his hands.

Presently he heard the door open. He looked up and saw her in the doorway. She smiled and walked directly across the living room. She had a package thrown over her shoulders. She disappeared into the bath.

After a moment Jake heard the sound of the shower. He sat up and began to play.

It was the old allegro again—even though he was bawling.

"Let him save you for a while. I want to swim"

HOWARD B.

Occupation: Widow

Continued from page 13

are agreed. To stay by herself and found the trodden track of her thoughts would do no good, and she was pleasant company. "Visit me at the Adlon at one!" she thought of any sort of social life again was not unpleasant. She was even a little excited. No one taken her to lunch at the Adlon for some time. She wore a gray dress with a jacket, a little round gray hat. She stood by approvingly and said, "Look like your own daughter, Carol!"

was at the Adlon on time. The glass, the shining metal of the table were unchanged. War or no, nobody began polishing here at eleven morning. At the little tables in the corner of the lobby near the bar, the sort of people Carola remembered from the past. The stiffly starched white tablecloths were unchanged, the waiters, in uniform, ran about like clockwork machinery. It was curious to look for some sign of change, to feel its absence, as if war would change things physical as quickly as it changed things personal.

FROSCETTI entered on a wave of goodbyes, and led Carola to a table in the dining room.

"I'm going to order the most elaborate lunch in the history of this hotel," he said. "Have you any preferences?" He looked at the menu. Here, for the first time, who could afford it, was no sign of wartime stringency.

"I'm not very hungry," Carola said. "Nonsense! This is a gala occasion, isn't it?"

"What does it celebrate?" he asked. "Lunch with you the first time," Froscetti said. Then he debated for a few minutes the choice of wine. He had a likable boyishness and he laughed.

"Other thing!" He was dreadfully honest. "I have known you for forty years. I should have known you twenty years ago. I resent all that waste of time and I have to hurry to make up for it."

He kept up a continual chatter and tried to become interested in what she was saying but it was difficult. Somewhere in Berlin at this moment, Karl, probably lunching, if he had not, in a cheap bowl-of-soup restaurant.

Froscetti was talking about his work: "Diplomacy is quite a different thing than in my father's time."

"My father was a diplomat, too?" he asked. "And his father and grandfather before him," Froscetti said proudly. "It is tradition in our family. My grandfather was here in Berlin and knew Bismarck very well. My father was here at the outbreak of the World War. He died today but insists that I write each week about everything I do, to someone I meet. He will have a lot to say in my next letter."

"Really?" he asked. "About Carola Dirling!"

She laughed. "And you will probably have more to read in his answer."

"He will order me to bring you to Berlin at once," Froscetti had long, delicate hands. They showed best as he lit a cigarette. "I wish you were there. Berlin is not a very relaxing place for a young lady."

His sureness, in contrast with her own uncertainty, was so definite that she remembered, remembering how Karl had told her a future even more uncertain.

"Boring you," Froscetti said. "I should talk about you and I shall. But first I want you to know everything about me!"

A waiter brought a tray of elaborate pastry.

Carola refused it.

"Do you know why I ordered so large a lunch?" Froscetti grinned. "I wasn't hungry either. But the larger the lunch, the longer I have to be with you."

Carola laughed at his confession.

"That's my chief problem now!" Froscetti continued. "I'm making up a list of places to take you, things we are going to do together."

"That sounds like a busy winter."

"You will see. First is a party at the home of a friend at the end of the week—Peroli, the second secretary of our Embassy. May I—?"

"I shall be glad to go." That was probably the sort of invitation that Blaerchen had hoped she would get.

Froscetti smiled happily. "Then there's a party—"

A voice behind interrupted, the voice of Blaerchen. He came up to the table while Froscetti jumped to his feet.

"I hope you are enjoying a pleasant lunch," he said.

"Uniquely pleasant," Froscetti said. "Will you join us?"

"No, thank you," Blaerchen smiled at Carola as if the smile had some inner meaning that she should know at once. "I'm delighted to see you enjoying yourselves. I have to attend to affairs of state."

When he had gone Froscetti asked without any lightness in his voice, "Do you know Herr Blaerchen well?"

"He and my husband were once partners in business."

"Indeed!" That might have meant anything and Froscetti sounded as if that was what he had implied.

IN THE hour before darkness Carola left her apartment for a walk.

A man standing near the doorway looked at her sharply as she passed, as if he were watching for someone. She told herself that he might be interested in any one of fifty families in the house. Yet as she moved down the street she could not resist looking back. The man was walking after her, a hundred feet away.

Carola held down a swelling dread by reminding herself that she had no one to fear, unless Blaerchen had learned of Karl's coming the night before and had decided to have her watched. She walked faster, wishing that she could lose herself among people, but the wind had driven most pedestrians indoors.

Then a hand touched her. "Fräulein Dirling?" The hand held tightly to her arm.

For a second Carola could not take another step. This was what the moment of arrest was like, like the turn of a switch that cut off strength and power and clarity. She could only ask weakly, "What do you want?"

"I want to talk to you." The voice was harsh, unfriendly. "We will go to the nearest café."

That did not sound like arrest but the man's silence was not assuring.

They entered a café and sat at a small table. For the first time Carola saw the man's face. It was a young face, marred by thin red ridges across one cheek that marked university sword scars. Everything in the face implied the German aristocrat, as unyielding as a boulder.

"I am August von Maurer," the man said as if speaking to a menial.

Carola smiled at him, to reassure her-

It's easy to understand why the gear principle is used for nonslip power transmission on all kinds of machines, from watches to ocean liners. Those sharp-angled gear edges really grip and hold...

Just as the tread of a Miller Geared-to-the-Road tire grips and holds. The same nonslip gear principle gives you better nonskid safety on slippery roads—there are 1453 sharp gear-like edges ready to "bite in," and protect you against skids and slides.

Geared-to-the-Road safety doesn't come on ordinary tires—it's an exclusive Miller design. You'll find it only on tires of extra strength and quality all through—Miller tires—blowout protected, long wearing, quiet running and comfortable riding. And your Miller dealer's prices are lower than you'd expect for so much extra value.

MILLER TIRES

GEARED-TO-THE-ROAD

1940 IS MILLER'S 48TH YEAR IN RUBBER

gn wanted him to do just what he s, to run errands, to help in genrutine. The temptation each day in touch with Carola was strong.
telegram would do it. But unless re was some real emergency, it was lis to court the danger that would invariable if Blaerchen found out the meeting. Here in Wagner's ce, here might be a chance for an asual casual contact. And if Carws ever in any trouble, she would g ph.

left Wagner's office in the late on to keep his appointment with eller of the Foreign Office. It was ment of dangerous Underground not in itself important. But a nd men or even a hundred men an cities, doing little things, had e their results. From Klauss he arned nothing about the organiand it was better to know little.
e an, he gathered, knew little about ecept who his superior was and as enough to know.

made a point of being at the café
the and was annoyed when Sche-e was late. But Schebeler came, ing the inevitable brief case, and ilg, like a man finished with a tire-n day's routine, glad for a chance at across a glass of beer with a er.

er a few minutes Schebeler took velope from his pocket and handed uer the table to Karl. "Here are randa of some Foreign Office con-nsions with our friends in Rumania d Turkey," he said. "The Italians nd give a lot to get hold of this."
Anything that showed Nazi activity here could be useful to the Under-nd and Karl took the envelope.

"Or a little while coming here I frightened," Schebeler smiled. "I I was being followed. Nervous-
" "know what you mean," Karl said.
inevitable in this activity, I pre-light movement of Schebeler's arm e table attracted Karl. The man's was blotchy. "I told you I thought s being followed—there's the man, e at the door! Get away with that elope. If they should take me and sh me they'll find nothing but if e search you—!"

Karl got up and wrapped his coat around him. He started for the door, not hurrying, like a man loath to leave what little warmth there was for the cold outdoors. A man was standing at the door, searching for a familiar face when Karl brushed by him. At each step he expected a hand to reach out and stop him. On the street he did not hurry until he had gone a hundred feet.

The arrangement Klauss had suggested for delivering the material was simple. Karl was to go to Friedrich-strasse station and wait near the downstairs ticket windows. He went there and waited. A few minutes before five-thirty Ranke came by, like a man hurrying to catch a train. Karl joined him.
As they went up the stairs he gave him a newspaper folded around the envelope.

"No trouble?" Ranke said nervously.
"I had a scare," Karl said.
"You get used to them." Then Ranke hurried away.

THE party at the home of the second secretary of the Italian Embassy had been going on for some time when Fro-scetti arrived with Carola. Except for one attaché from the Foreign Office, all the guests were foreigners. The table that held bottles was twice as long as the table holding food.

"We have to do something in Berlin at night," Froscetti said. "If only we were in Rome! Here we have to see the same people at every party. There's nothing else to do."

The host, Peroli, and several men gathered around Carola. Serving her from the buffet became a minor but acute competition. Froscetti looked angry. He looked angrier when he heard Peroli, whose wife had been spoken of as a resident of Rome and jealous, ask Carola for cocktails "later in the week."
The party showed signs of going on through most of the night but shortly after ten o'clock Froscetti said, "I think we had better go."

"Very well," Carola agreed. She was not enjoying herself.

On the way home Froscetti complained, "I thought it would be fun but I didn't have any fun."

"Why not?"

"With all those men around you?
Even that old fool Peroli was trying to make a date with you. He has a wife and five children and if she ever heard

"Don't be so particular. You know she's the first traveler from Europe we've had in weeks"

GUSTAVE LUNDBERG

CORYTHOSAURUS, THE "DUCK BILL"

dinosaur, lived over 60 million years ago. But even before he was born, Nature was mellowing and filtering the crude oils used today in refining Sinclair lubricants.
These oldest crudes
make such fine lubricants that...

... MOTORISTS TRAVEL 41 MILLION MILES DAILY ON

SINCLAIR Opaline and Sinclair Pennsylvania Motor Oils. These oils are not only dewaxed but also de-jellied by an extra refining process. You'll find they last so long they save you money. Ask your nearby Sinclair Dealer for Opaline or Sinclair Pennsylvania.

Nan Grey, star of the Universal Picture, "You're Not So Tough."

SINCLAIR

That man who took lessons in smiling, on the opposite page — knows that the

HOTEL PENNSYLVANIA

is the Statler Hotel
in New York

If you plan to visit New York this summer, I'd like to welcome you to our Hotel Pennsylvania.

Room rates have not been raised one penny during the World's Fair. Our new air-conditioned Coffee Shop serves delicious meals at low, budget prices. And, for your extra enjoyment, air-conditioned bedrooms are available.

As for location — we are fortunate, indeed. You walk through a passageway to the special World's Fair trains in Long Island Station — then, just 10 minutes, 10 cents to the Fair. And we're near theaters, department stores, and dozens of New York's sight-seeing "musts." I suggest that you send us your reservation as early as possible.

James H. McLea
General Manager

More for your money at Hotel Pennsylvania
NEW YORK

Your World's Fair Headquarters
Rooms from $3.50 single, $5.00 double

→ DON'T MISS OPPOSITE PAGE! →

of it she would cut him down six inches shorter than he now is."

He sounded as if he wanted to quarrel and that was ridiculous but they rode on in silence, slowly and carefully through the dark.

He asked suddenly, "What do you do here, Carola?"

"Do?" she repeated.

"You are attractive. You once had a wide reputation. You came back suddenly and live here comfortably although few German women today live with any ease. You seem to."

She was sure curiosity and not suspicion explained his question. "I got homesick abroad and came back. That's all."

He accepted that. "Aren't you lonely?"

That could scarcely be called a subtle approach. "I keep very busy."

"But you go out very seldom. I've asked about you!" He said it proudly. "Few people even know that you are back."

Along with his remark he came a little closer.

The car stopped at her house. "Will you let me come in for a little while?"

"It's rather late."

"I have something to tell you that concerns you vitally."

She hesitated. That remark could be taken several ways. Then she remembered that he was in the diplomatic service and that he might know something that would be valuable to her.

"Please! Just for a minute."

"Very well," Carola said, "but just for a minute."

Once in the apartment he looked around with curiosity. "This room is charming."

"It is very comfortable."

He sat on the divan while Carola took a seat across the room. He seemed unwilling to begin to talk and Carola reminded him, "You said you had something vital to tell me."

"I have." He lit a cigarette, then suddenly turned toward her: "I have fallen in love with you, Carola."

She could not help laughing but she was sorry at once. She could see on Froschetti's face that he was hurt. Very gently she said, "You've only known me for a few days."

"Who can measure emotion by time? I'm serious. I would have told you yesterday but the Adlon dining room—"

"Is not famous for its privacy," Carola agreed. Before she could say anything else the telephone rang. "Excuse me!"

Froschetti looked displeased and said something under his breath.

Carola lifted the receiver. "Hello?" "Fräulein Dirling?" The man's voice was unfamiliar. "Say only 'yes' or 'no' to my questions. Is Signor Froschetti with you?"

"Yes," Carola said nervously. She glanced at the Italian who was looking more displeased than ever.

"LISTEN to me carefully." The voice was most businesslike. "It is now ten-thirty. In ten minutes you will please scream."

"I don't understand."

Froschetti heard the tone of her voice and was looking at her questioningly.

"I am speaking for Herr Blaerchen." The voice was impatient. "Understand? In ten minutes you will please scream. Scream loudly so that it can be heard in other apartments, on the street—"

"But—"

"You will please do as you are told. That is Herr Blaerchen's wish." The voice was cold, impersonal. "Do not disobey!"

Froschetti was by her side as Carola put the receiver down. "What's the matter?"

"Nothing."

"Is anything wrong? Are you ill?"

"Just get me a glass of water." That would give her time to think. She would scream and men would come rushing in, find Froschetti there and involve him in a nasty scandal.

She knew she had nine minutes more!

Froschetti brought the water and she drank it. He looked much concerned. "Carola, what is the matter?"

She knew she had eight minutes more.

This was probably Blaerchen's way of arranging things in the diplomatic world. That Froschetti was nice, young, and harmless enough, with family tradition and background, did not matter. A scandal would do more than embarrass him. Yet, not to do as Blaerchen had ordered would bring certain punishment of some sort.

SEVEN minutes more!

The Italian stood in the middle of the room, curiosity blended with impatience on his face. The street outside was quiet, the corridors in the house were quiet. Carola did not know how many minutes were left. To go through with this assignment or anything like it would be impossible. In a few minutes men would be waiting outside to hear a scream from her apartment, a betrayal of a man who had done her no harm.

She had time for a quick decision. Her voice was firm as she said to Froschetti, "Please leave at once!"

"Why?" He looked astonished. "I don't understand."

"Please leave!"

"Without an explanation?" No trace of his role as suitor remained. "Are you angry because I spoke of being in love with you?"

"Yes. Please leave!" She emphasized each word.

With set white face Froschetti put on his hat and coat. As he reached the door he turned and said coldly, "I should certainly not want to embarrass you if you're expecting someone else!"

There was scarcely time now to think of excuses before impatient men would knock at her door. With or without excuses, Carola was glad that she had had enough courage to tell the Italian to go. The thought of what Blaerchen might do, in retaliation, if he doubted her excuses, was a growing, ominous thing, a thought that might choke her to speechlessness. Karl had said, "Wait until you have a definite reason for breaking with Blaerchen." This might be it! She only wait and wonder.

Five minutes passed before she heard a knock. Three men, strangers were there. They pushed into the

"Will you please explain, Fräulein?" one of them said impatiently. It was the voice she had heard on the telephone.

"Froschetti left your house immediately after we called," another man added.

With as much self possession as possible Carola looked at the men. She said coldly, "I think it is you who explain."

"You were given an order—"

"Without proof that it was an order?" Carola looked at the men scornfully. She grabbed at any explanation. "How could I know that it was not some of Froschetti's friends playing some practical joke?"

"In Germany today no one dares to play such a practical joke."

"I suppose not."

"Did you tell Froschetti what we said on the telephone?" one man asked rudely.

Carola snapped, "Of course I did." "It is curious that he stayed in your apartment for such a short time after we called."

"That is my affair!" She was not afraid. "You used Herr Blaerchen's name. Let me see credentials giving you a right to use it."

"You will ask no questions! Your duty is to obey orders."

The men turned to the door. One of them added: "We shall report to the Fräulein!"

THEY left abruptly. To her own surprise Carola did not feel frightened.

She decided to be aggressive and to call Blaerchen the next day but before she could reach him he called her.

"Hello, my dear, how are you?"

"I'm glad you called. Some merest night—"

He interrupted: "I know all about it."

"But—"

"I'll drop in for a little while late in afternoon."

His voice gave no indication of what he thought but she was not as sure as she had been that she was not frightened.

"There's a Democrat right ahead of you, Senator, passing out taffy to the babies you're going to kiss!"

THURSTON GENTRY

The man who took lessons in smiling

FIRST TIME he registered with us, he was one of the grouchiest guests we'd ever met. But, as he returned again and again, we noticed him gradually changing to something akin to good humor.

One day he told us with a grin, "I'd like to see the man who could continue being a hotel grouch in the face of Statler service! Your employees really take an interest in making a fellow comfortable!"

"In the morning, there's my newspaper under the door. Plenty of man-sized towels in the bathroom. At breakfast, service is quick and courteous. First thing I know, I'm out and about my business feeling swell!"

(Statler employees are not only highly trained, but a majority are "career men" on their toes to advance in the hotel business.)

"When I've been in a hurry," the man continued, "your employees have packed my luggage. Your floor clerks have handled my messages as though they were my secretaries. You've loaned me everything from a hot water bottle to a typewriter."

(Statler hotels will lend you, among other things, an ice bag, an electric iron or an overnight kit—all without charge!)

"If you need further proof that Statlers have taught me to smile," concluded the ex-grouch, "just ask my wife. She says I'm a changed man."

More for your money at a Statler

Service that guarantees your complete satisfaction, the greater comfort of spacious rooms, unusually fine food, meticulous cleanliness—these and many another Statler innovation give you, at Statlers, what we confidently believe is the greatest hotel value in America.

At the World's Fair!

... The charming Romanian House Restaurant is Hotels Statler operated. Really delicious food, at reasonable prices—luncheons from 65¢, dinner from $1.50.

STATLER OPERATED
HOTEL PENNSYLVANIA $3.50
NEW YORK
HOTEL WILLIAM PENN $3.50
PITTSBURGH

More for your money at a Statler Hotel

HOTELS STATLER IN BOSTON . . . $3.50
BUFFALO . . . $3.00
CLEVELAND . . . $3.00
DETROIT . . . $3.00
ST. LOUIS . . . $2.50

RICHES from the waters of MASSACHUSETTS

RICHES from the hills of PENNSYLVANIA

Copyright 1940 by Tide Water Associated Oil Company

Nature gave them both that EXTRA SOMETHING

MASSACHUSETTS pulls Nature's riches from the depths of the sea. Pennsylvania pumps Nature's riches from the depths of the earth... But even with riches there is often a best! In Pennsylvania, it's Bradford crude oil. From this choice, top-price crude, Veedol Motor Oil is refined... Yet Veedol costs little more than ordinary oil. Veedol is inexpensive because every step in its distribution, from oil well to oil can, is controlled by one company... That's why every quart of Veedol is uniform, why every drop of Veedol forms the famous "Film of Protection" that has safeguarded America's finest cars for over twenty-five years... You can pay more for oil than the Veedol price, but you can't buy better lubrication at any price.

Ask for VEEDOL Safety-check Lubrication

A PRODUCT OF TIDE WATER ASSOCIATED OIL COMPANY... MAKERS OF "FLYING A" GASOLINES

ened. She thought of going to Karl for advice but it was better not to risk that until she knew exactly what Blaerchen was going to say.

Maria usually came by nine o'clock but this mornnig she was late. Carola was in the kitchen preparing her own breakfast when the telephone rang again. It was Froschetti. If she had never heard from him again she would have understood; yet here he was on the telephone, speaking pleasantly with no slightest trace of annoyance.

"I hope you had a pleasant evening after I left," he said courteously.

"Thank you." Carola was still surprised that he should call.

"Could we lunch together today?"

Carola knew she owed him some explanation. "I would like that."

"I'll pick you up at one."

The only explanation to make to him was the truthful one. He might be able to explain why Blaerchen had chosen to set such a trap.

THE telephone rang later in the morning. A man's voice asked, "Do you know who this is?"

Carola knew. "Yes, Herr Praut."

He seemed flattered that she should recognize the voice. "I told you I would be patient. May we lunch today?"

"Sorry." She felt grateful to Froschetti.

"That's too bad."

She put the phone down, sure that Praut would keep on stalking her. The whole situation was getting too complicated and she wanted to run from it. Instead of running, it would be better to plan what to tell Blaerchen when he called this afternoon.

Maria had not come by one o'clock when Froschetti came to the door. As Carola left the house she wondered about the maid's absence and could not understand it. Maria had never missed a day and was always prompt.

"Where shall we lunch?" Froschetti asked.

"I'm not hungry. Let's drive for a little while. I'd be grateful for some air."

"Very well." He turned the car toward the suburbs. Then he asked very quietly, "If I am not being rude, could you possibly tell me what happened last night?"

"Yes," Carola said. "I had no time to explain." She turned to him, to watch his face. "That telephone call was from a man who asked me to wait a few minutes, then scream. I am sure that men were waiting outside to break in as soon as I made a sound and create as much embarrassment for you as they could."

Froschetti turned red, then white. "Oh!" He had not expected that. "Then

I should be grateful to you. I am grateful." The boyishness that was able was like a garment put away to think," he said sharply, "that I know the name of the man who told you."

"Who?"

Very slowly he answered, "Blaerchen of the Foreign Office."

Carola shook her head. "He came from a stranger."

"Probably hired by Blaerchen," a pause he said, "That would have been a very embarrassing situation."

"Really?" She wished he would explain.

"That is not a new trick. It is done by other Foreign Offices in an attempt to place a diplomatic agent in a position in which publicity would be very ruinous. For me it would have been disastrous—my family in you know!" He concluded: "The choice is then offered the choice between publicity and becoming amenable to suggestions." He added bitterly: "The first step in the manufacture of a roll."

"Why should you think it was Blaerchen who called?"

Froschetti did not answer at once. He looked at her quickly. "That is a innocent question, Carola. How do you know that you aren't working for the Foreign Office?"

"Had I been part of a plan to get you," she said simply, "I surely would not have warned you."

"Of course not," he said. "Forgive me but it was a natural assumption. Blaerchen is a friend of yours and a very bad friend to you. You'll pardon me. There are many that he has approached other in the diplomatic circle at times."

WHAT does he want? Here in some way to important knowledge.

"Money, I suspect," Froschetti said. "These big Nazis can't get money, and why? To deposit it abroad. That's what they think. Hitler's statement that the Nazis will endure a thousand years. Perhaps Blaerchen's short of money for little petty intrigues. The war has made it difficult for those gentlemen to transfer their assets back and forth the might like." He paused. "He is desperate for money!"

Then he was intent on his thoughts.

"I really am obliged to you," after a time. "If ever I can do for you—!"

Carola smiled. "Thank you." When he left her at her house she knew this was a short chapter closed.

(To be continued next week)

"You play the National Anthem and we'll grab the chairs"

LEONARD

Continued from page 15

means a good Roof

You wouldn't fly in this 1908 Airplane

But do you use a SAFETY RAZOR INVENTED BEFORE 1900?

The first successful safety razors came on the scene about 1900—40 years ago. Since that time, few really important advancements were made in razor design until the invention of the Schick magazine-type razor. Improvements in that product resulted in the Schick Injector Razor. Already, over 5,000,000 men have switched to this razor.

THE SCHICK INJECTOR RAZOR CONTAINS THE GREATEST IMPROVEMENTS IN SAFETY RAZOR DESIGN IN MORE THAN 35 YEARS.

1. Blade Corner Guards... among the most important contributions to safer shaving are Schick Injector's corner guards which shield your face against nicks and scratches from sharp blade corners.

2. Solid Guide Bar... Schick Injector perfected solid "toothless" guide bar to control skin "action" in front of blade edge; avoids nicks, scratches by flattening skin. You can even shave against the grain.

3. Oil-Sealed Blades... Schick Blades are sealed in this metal Injector cartridge in a bath of oil. Keen edges suspended in space. Nothing can rub or dull them. You buy blades 20 or 12 at a time.

4. Automatic Blade Change... A pull and push on Injector shoots out old blade, slides in fresh one instantly. Nothing to take apart. Nothing to reassemble. Saves valuable time every day you shave.

THE "POPULARITY" KIT $1.00

COMPLETE WITH 12 BLADES

20-year razor guarantee stamped in bottom of every Kit. Magazine Repeating Razor Co., Bridgeport, Conn. and Niagara Falls, Ont.

SCHICK INJECTOR RAZOR

want to build this. How much would the lumber cost?"

He said, "You're Mrs. Rand," and smiled, and gave the slip of paper his thoughtful attention. Then he added: "You've got a shanty now. What's this house for?"

She hated to tell him, for men were practical and they had no faith in women's ideas. She stood small and dramatic before his great bulk, her eyes very dark. Her voice came out with a smothered faintness. "For a hotel. There's no place to eat or sleep out there—and a lot of travelers come by. I am quite a good cook."

"Looks like three, four hundred dollars for lumber."

Money was life. She dropped her head so that he would not see her face. "It is more than I have," she murmured. "I could only pay fifty dollars now and the rest when I earned it. Maybe—"

"How would you get it built?"

"I don't know."

His gray-green eyes remained on her like weight and the painful silence ran on. She wanted to say, "Trust me and I'll get it built," but her pride held back the words. Everybody had their troubles; she would not share hers.

"If you can find a way to get your hotel built," Mr. Jessup said, "you can have the lumber. I'll write a note to Brewerton. I'll take fifty dollars when you start building—and the rest when you earn it."

Gratitude rushed through her, so great that she was motionless and speechless. Long moments later she looked up to see him smiling. Then she said, so softly: "You will be fully paid."

AFTER a cold supper Harriet Rand put Tara to bed and moved to the yard, grateful for one slow, soft breath of wind moving up from the south. The odor of cut grass was a fragrance all around her and the crickets were singing and Clyde Jacks walked across the prairie, dim and lumpy in the night until he came within the lamplight's beam. He had not washed and he had not shaved and he wore the same blackened underwear. She tried not to see these things, for he was a hard-working man and would not be deliberately unfair as a husband.

He said: "A man gets lonely. You made up your mind?"

"Not yet, Clyde."

"It is you or some other woman," he said in his flat voice, and moved away toward Brewerton's. She listened to his shoes solidly scuff the ground. That sound got into her and was like the beat of a hammer nailing down every hope and every dream. She turned into the shanty and sat at the table before her hotel plan, thinking, "It needn't be that big," and drew another plan, one front room and a kitchen and four small bedrooms on a single floor. It would take less lumber and less time to build. John Madden, south of Kertcher's place, had been a carpenter in the East; in the morning she would see him.

After breakfast she took a jar of jelly and went down the road with Tara, through the sweet, bright morning air. Two miles forward, she stopped at the Eccles shanty to leave her jar of jelly and met Mrs. Eccles in the yard. "Pete's sleeping," said Mrs. Eccles. "He was up all night guarding the place. It's hard enough without the fear of Brazil Mullan to contend with. We've talked of goin' back to Ohio."

"You must never do that," said Harriet vigorously. "Nothing's that bad. There's always a way."

"And you so small and alone," said Mrs. Eccles. "You give a person hope."

Mrs. Rand left the main road and followed a lesser road wiggling through the grass. Along the prairie, shanties made black points against a yellow earth, and a rider trotted out of the middle distance, and dust boiled like fire smoke from the gully where Tom Kertcher fashioned his earth dam. She turned onto Mr. Madden's quarter section and caught him at his mowing. Mr. Madden was a man with a scarlet face and dust-inflamed eyes; he stopped willingly to rest.

SHE said: "You are a carpenter. What would you charge me to build a house? A big room and a kitchen and three bedrooms."

"You got a shanty. What you need a house for?"

"I have a use for it." She couldn't tell him the real reason, for she knew she was small and helpless before this man's eyes; he would think her foolish. "The rooms," she hastily added, "would be small," but all the conviction had left her voice.

"It would run pretty high," he told her. "Anyhow, I couldn't get at it this summer."

She said, "Thank you," and turned about, moving back through the dust and stubble with her head lifted; she looked straight into the blue distance, and felt the sharp, stinging effect of his presence. He tipped his hat, then riding on.

She made supper and later sat in the doorway, watching dusk move over the other black night. Perhaps one of the two small bedrooms would be enough. She could use the shanty for a kitchen. Everything smaller and smaller as she sat over, hands tight across her chest, blinked on the prairie; in the sc flat gunshot barked out.

There was a quick series of visions after that first one. The echoes faded and the vibration of the horses lifted from the direction and rapidly strengthened. Harriet Rand, facing south, saw no the wall of black, but she observed Clyde Jacks had extinguished his light. She turned into the shanty with her head down and said, "Stay here." The beat of the hoofs grew flat and loud and she the sound of a man's voice, half crying. She moved to the table, lifted its cover, taking up the revolver which had belonged to her husband, and returned to the yard.

"Look, lady! It isn't necessary to give your reasons why you're picking him!"

her lips pressed tight. Tara said, "Mommy, you're walking too fast." The solitary horseman now coming up was Curtis Kilrain, who waved at her. She went on, keeping her head up with effort. She lifted a finger and pressed it slowly across one eye and then the other, and then thought of Otto Pedersen, who was also a carpenter, twenty miles down the river. She moved steadily through the heated day, stopping again at Brewerton's to speak to Letty:

"Do you suppose I could borrow your team tomorrow to ride to Pedersen's?"

"I'll drive you."

"That's very nice," said Mrs. Rand gratefully and went on. It had been very hard to ask the favor.

She made a cold lunch and put Tara to bed for a nap and stood in the yard, idle and hating to be idle.

At three o'clock the sun was a livid brass flare half down the western sky. The cattleman, Andy Pierce, trotted casually out of the Virgil road and paused to murmur, "Warm," and to roll a smoke. When he lighted the cigarette his eyes struck at her, keen and curious. He was very tall and he sat on the saddle with a beautiful ease, as though nothing in the whole world had the power of disturbing him. The black edges of his hair lay against the smoothest, most completely self-controlled features she had ever seen in a man. She said, "Yes," to see Pete Eccles rush out of the shanty. He cried at her: "Have you got any cartridges? My gun's empty!"

Other riders were sweeping in a line, knew at once who they would be. He said: "Get down. Get into the shanty and stay there!"

Fear changed the shape of his face that he was not the same man; a man who had lived so long with her own fear. She felt a great pity for him and for the anger at Brazil Mullan. Eccles slid from his horse and gave it a great kick to the flank to send it away. He brayed desperately: "You got a gun, Harriet! Mullan and his men were very near they would kill Pete Eccles, as they threatened. Harriet took Eccles by the shoulder and pushed him into the shanty and pulled the door almost shut behind her back to it as Mullan came around the house and stopped, with other riders behind him.

HE WAS in the beam of light when he came out of the shanty window. She noticed the flash of his eyes and the long and morose shape of his jaw. "Get him out of there," he said. "Right now!"

The revolver was behind her back. She was quite small against the shanty, the thought of Pete Eccles' fear raged her and made her completely helpless. "You go on," she said. "You must be ashamed of yourself." Someight other riders seemed to be adriding rapidly. "You get out of uln said: "I'll pull him out," and swinging from his saddle.

claimed, "No, you won't," and the pistol from behind her back.
the hammer to cock with her band aimed the gun at his hat.
gave her the blackest glance she received and his voice was like slap of his hand. "Put that of the other men said: "We got to up here."

was then too late, for men closed all quarters of the night, or so ed to Harriet Rand. Mullan ened on his saddle and whirled a hand clinging to the butt of his he was like this when Kertcher ly Pierce galloped into the yard opped before him. They were not Brewerton and Kilrain and Web-re up; and she saw other home-drift around the shanty and ring. Pete Eccles opened the door, saying in a half-embarr-voice: "I only had six cartridges ldn't've run. They started across at again and I told them to quit it.
umped me. Four against one is ds."

her said: "Put up your hands."
everything in the yard was black and yellow glow, with disturbed ing up like tawny steam. Mullan reat sigh out of his chest and Rand heard his teeth grit to-
For a moment she thought he to fight, and that moment was ng. But at last a change came s face, a kind of dismal, secreculation, and he put up his Kertcher moved in and jerked s gun from the holster. Andy rode around to the other three ok their pieces.

won't have this business," said
er. "There's too much work to be be troubled with a bunch of chieves scarin' hell out of decent You catch on, Mullan?"

an turned without a word and to the night, his three partners him.

Pierce said: "You've still got b to do, friend Kertcher. I know country better than you." His swung around to Harriet and ly all these men were watching eing the gun in her hand, seeing tly resolute expression she wore.
Pierce murmured: "You weren't

" she said. "I wasn't afraid."

cher said an odd thing then to erton. "Is she helpless, Adam?"

ly Pierce lifted his hat. "They bother you again tonight. Eccles, le home with you." In a little the homesteaders drifted away, voices dying out at last in the dis-

M the seat of the Brewerton on, Harriet Rand watched it roll as one beautiful fold upon an-gently dipping and rising and on. Letty stopped the horses at ver for a drink and afterward east. It was quite early, the sun lly up, yet people moved on all s of the prairie, the wake of their and wagons lifting golden smoke against the light. Harriet Rand "Where's everybody going?"

gil, I suppose. This is Saturday." ad forgotten," said Harriet, and ted to her anxious thoughts. Letty erton was a competent girl with a she walked and trotted them by and covered the whole width of the by noon, reaching Pedersen's
y. There was a woman in the door-carefully watching them—smiling served.

Harriet Rand said: "I wanted Mr.
Pedersen to build a house for me."

"Why," said the woman, "he's gone towards Virgil." She gave Harriet a close look, and added, "But he wouldn't have time for that. He's got a steady job with the Wagonwheel outfit. You girls come in and eat."

"I am not very hungry," said Mrs.
Rand and sat lost on the seat until Letty's arm urged her to the ground.

They were back in the wagon by two o'clock, homeward bound along the rim of the river. Mrs. Rand bent her head against the sun and held her hands tight-crossed in her lap. At five o'clock they paused in a clump of willows. Letty said: "I'm sorry, Harriet. Did it mean a lot?"

"Why, yes," murmured Harriet Rand.
"But it is all right." There was no use explaining it. People had to take care of their own troubles. All that morning she had nourished her last hope, and now it was dead. The land was too big for a woman alone and there was nothing left but Clyde Jack's offer. She was long silent, struggling with her own personal tragedy, reproaching herself for false dreams. She had been foolish to think she was still young enough to expect happiness. "But," she said aloud,
"it will be different with Tara. She will have what I lost."

"WHAT was that, Harriet?"

"I am going to marry Clyde Jacks." Letty gave her a shocked glance. "I had not known it meant so much to
you."

"People must keep their own troubles."

They drove on against the burning flare of the sun. At darkness they turned to the north and aimed at the glitter of a homestead light. A rider whirled up from the distance and hailed them and vanished again.

Letty said: "It needn't be Clyde Jacks, Harriet. There are other single men."

Harriet thought of Andy Pierce and put the thought away with a sense of guilt. "It doesn't matter," she said.

Blackness was a velvet depth all around, all the prairie lights somehow lost. This had seemed like the way home, but now Harriet was confused.
"Are you sure we're on the right road, Letty?"

A voice came from deep stillness.
"Letty?" Letty Brewerton said, "Yes," and curled the wagon toward a long low shadow bulked against the earth. The smell of coffee drifted in the warm windless night.

"Where is this?" asked Harriet.

Another voice said, "All right," and suddenly lights flashed along the earth—many lights brightly gleaming, and Harriet faced the glowing windows of a house larger than she had ever noticed on the prairie. It had two stories and an outside stairway. Beside it—recognizing it with a wrench of heart—was her own small shanty. In front of the house people stood very still, the shadowed and bronzed faces of men and the smiling eyes of women watching her. It seemed all the prairie was here. Tom Kertcher moved up from the crowd with Curtis Kilrain; she saw Andy Pierce in the background. It was the embittered and half-savage Kilrain who said, "Here is your hotel, Harriet. We built it today."

She was crying, though no sound came out of her, and those kind, dark faces moved away behind a blur that no light could break. Letty Brewerton's arm was around her in strong comfort and somewhere a voice lifted and in a moment all those people, tired from the hard day, caught up a song and the song lifted their spirits and the words of the song moved out, far out to the dark and waiting land: "Mine eyes have seen the glory—"

62 years ago...in 1878, Edison created his electric light bulb

313 YEARS AGO...IN 1627 the Haigs were making Scotch!

No matter where you buy your Haig & Haig you can be sure of its never-varying quality... a fine mellow-rich flavor that has the unequalled record of 313 years of satisfaction behind it! And yet
...Haig & Haig makes no extra charge for its great name and fame!

PINCH BOTTLE 12 YEARS OLD

Haig & Haig
THE OLDEST NAME IN SCOTCH

BLENDED SCOTCH WHISKY - 86.8 PROOF

SOMERSET IMPORTERS, LTD., NEW YORK

Leave the Lady Be

Continued from page 24

Here's a summertime drink that doesn't
"talk back"!

● You can't be too careful about what you drink these hot days if you want to avoid upset stomach.

That's why so many folks play safe and stick to grapefruit juice as their hot weather cooler. It's a grand thirst quencher, this tangy, delicious Florida canned grapefruit juice that's loaded with vitamins and minerals. Best of all—it's good for you in a dozen different ways. And you can't drink too much! Your grocer has it.

FLORIDA CANNED GRAPEFRUIT JUICE

FLORIDA CITRUS COMMISSION, LAKE LAND, FLORIDA

REWARD! For a little of your spare time as a special Subscription Representative. WRITE TODAY.
Independent Agency Division
THE CROWELL-COLLIER PUBLISHING CO.
250 Park Ave. New York, N. Y.

FEET HURT?
QUICK RELIEF FOR TIRED, BURNING, TENDER, ITCHY, PERSPIRING FEET. SOFTENS CORNS AND CALLOUSES.
•AT ALL DRUGGISTS SINCE 1870•
JOHNSON'S FOOT SOAP
BORAX, IODIDE AND BRAN

FOR THE 1 MAN IN 7 WHO SHAVES EVERY DAY

A Special Shave Cream—It's Not a Soap, Needs No Brush!

Daily shaving leaves many men's faces raw, sensitive. This is especially true of the man who, because of his business and social status, must shave every day.

To meet this condition Williams, for 100 years makers of fine shaving preparations, has now developed GLIDER—a special cream for daily shavers. With no soap base, it's a complete departure from ordinary shave creams. No brush. No lather. Not sticky or greasy.

A superabundance of moisture in this rich cream softens each whisker, yet forms a protective layer over your face to keep blade from scraping. Swiftly, gently your razor glides over your skin. Like a cold cream, Glider helps smooth, soften your skin and prevent chapping and roughness.

FREE—tube of Glider. Send name, address today. The J. B. Williams Co., Dept. EG-12, Glastonbury, Conn.

Offer good in U. S. A. and Canada only

thus sparing the real city. If this doesn't work, it will be just another plan gone wrong.

That's where I found Jean Arthur, in the bogus Tucson, now officially called Old Tucson, with a post office where you can buy genuine stamps and post cards, ninety-four buildings, ten streets, thirty-five dogs and two hundred movie people, making the picture Arizona, directed by Wesley Ruggles from the story by that old-time cowboy, deer-slayer, buffalo hunter and dutch-treat maestro, Clarence Budington Kelland. The first time I met her, she had just finished shooting Indians with linen bullets—a touch of authenticity—and she looked highly uncomfortable, but was smiling. She wore a pair of thick blue overalls, a thick leather jacket over a thick blue undershirt, a pair of cowhide boots, an army hat weighing one pound and she carried a rifle. Temperature in the sun, where she was, 130.

"It's a little warm, working down here," she admitted. "But I have gained four pounds."

She then gave herself another back-pouring and resumed shooting Indians. In Old Tucson and on the various near-by locations, she lives in her own trailer, air-cooled and full of feminine gadgets. Mr. Ruggles and his men live and eat in the heat under canvas flaps and take it like soldiers. At night, Jean rides home to her ranch, which she rents from a man named Walt Coburn, who writes wild-western stories and must be doing all right. It is a fine ranch, and should be, for she pays seven hundred and fifty dollars a month rent. Walt moved out happily with the first month's rental and took a place at Del Mar, California, where it is cool and sea-breezy in summer.

She Knows What She Wants

When the company arrived in town, they stowed Jean away in the royal suite at the Santa Rita, parlor, bedroom and bath, and hoped she would be happy. This is the hotel where, in the construction days, Chris-Pin Martin carried water at fifty cents a day. Chris-Pin is now an actor himself and can afford to pay fifteen dollars a day for a room, although such a thing has never happened.

For one week, Miss Arthur remained in the hotel, not sleeping much. At two each morning, and muttering to herself, she would put on a red robe, walk across the street and make herself comfortable on a park bench until dawn. She was never disturbed, so it must be Tucson has no drunks, for the robe was quite red. After a week of that, she rented Coburn's ranch, where she lived thereafter with two maids, a cook and a hair-dresser.

Every so often, her husband, who is Frank Ross of Los Angeles, flies over for the week end. . . . He always returns on the five-o'clock plane—that is, five o'clock in the morning—and the lady always gets up and sees him off with a merry smile, so the Rosses must be getting along fine.

She is five feet, four inches, weighs 110 pounds, has calm, gray eyes, blond hair, speaks deliberately in that voice I mentioned and has definite notions about what she wishes to do in pictures. She has had her battles with the film magnates and was set down for eighteen months for rebellious conduct.

Wes Ruggles thinks and says Jean is really a great actress, touched with the magic wand of genius. If you are a list liker, these are some of her pictures:

Diamond Jim, The Plainsman, Easy Living, History is Made at Night, Mr. Deeds Goes to Town, You Can't Take It With You, Only Angels Have Wings, Mr. Smith Goes to Washington and Too Many Husbands.

Of these, she personally likes best The Plainsman, Mr. Deeds, You Can't Take It and Mr. Smith.

She is unquestionably a softhearted person and sympathetic, although a little short with photographers holding a bottle of catsup. For example, she bought hay for the goats and took over the thirty-five dogs. These mutts were on their gassy way to the next world when rescued from the city pound. Dogs were required for the scenes in Old Tucson, so Jean stepped in and had them cleaned up, debugged and reconstructed. She bought them licenses, which they lacked. She had them examined by a good dog man, and soon they were washed, fed, bedded and happy.

After the company departs from Arizona, the dogs will remain, all of them

we don't like and nobody can

"How about releasing them?"

"You can get a release for a picture any day in the week. If you make poor pictures and lose the lease, what good does that do you?"

"Statistics show," I said, "that ninety per cent of all pictures independently made are flops. They broke."

"We shall not. Banks are lending us the money. If they thought we were going to fail, they wouldn't be anxious to lend money, would they?"

Afternoon With the Indians

Here a man named Carter called and asked Miss Arthur if she was ready in five minutes to be married. William Holden in the grand scene, where Phoebe Titus finishes Peter Muncie. She nodded and the veil off the horseshoe. In mortal hours, the six hundred had been milling about in the sun and nobody fell over dead, but you could fry the well-known usual place.

For the very last scenes in the picture, they went off fifteen miles into the desert, rented a ranch and built a cienda, set in a pool, dug a well, a road and grew alfalfa and hay. These scenes are brief and show the newlywed Phoebe and Peter sitting on their own porch, looking at a peaceful country, waving at them. After that they walk inside the house and walk out. That's all. It costs a lot and makes you wonder why they shoot it in the studio with a few sets and some stucco. When they leave they will give the improvement ranch man, who came out from Hollywood seeking quiet. . . .

In this particular location Jean has an arrangement with the Indians and Mr. Ruggles. She starts one hour earlier than normal. When lunchtime arrives, she has to go to rest, everyone else one hour earlier hurries into her trailer and takes a shower. Then comes a light lunch which she swabs down the way with water and dozes another hour. She is then ready for a tough afternoon with the Indians.

In shooting at these early scenes, she noticed she kept biting the bullet. She learned these were the liners that came after the muzzle-loading of our early wars. The little bag of powder, with the bullet fastened to the end and a piece of string to throw. When you snap the string with your teeth, the powder can be poured out of your gun, the bag becomes the bullet and you're ready to shoot. Jean has about thirty of these quaint bits in one scene.

Miss Arthur has a clear notion of her job is and what a person should do.

"You just go ahead and play your part as well as you can, and if moments like you they'll keep on coming."

"No publicity? No interview?"

"Those are not necessary. I don't do on the screen and nothing. If people don't like your work, still pictures in the world can't be made and nothing written about you. Oceans of it, will make you popular."

The last I saw of her, she was up a lace dress and stepping through the dusty street on her way to be wedded, and her water boy along behind. It was still 130 degrees and the extras waited patiently, but stepped along exactly like a cheerful bride in the sunshine.

IN NEXT WEEK'S COLLIER'S

HERCULE POIROT

Begins investigation of a series of mysteries that lead to a solution of historic significance

The Patriotic Murders

A NEW NOVEL BY

Agatha Christie

having homes with the Tucsonites, all with three-year licenses, bought by this Miss A. The goats in the vicinity made her unhappy, as they had nothing to eat but cactus, which is tough eating, even for a goat. She dug down and ordered in some tons of new-mown hay, had it spread over the goat country and the goats went right on eating cactus.

The best moving picture she ever saw was Pygmalion by George B. Shaw. She saw it repeatedly and there was sadness even in her joy, because that was the picture she wanted and that was the role—the little guttersnipe gal—she long had craved, and when she pleaded with the studio to buy and make Pygmalion they assured her it was old-fashioned Shaw and of no merit. . . . They lived to eat them words.

Now she would love to make Joan of Arc, a remote notion. At this point a note of defiance appeared:

"I'm going to make my own pictures soon. Mr. Ross and Norman Krasna and I are going to do things our way and put in everything we like and leave out what consciousness in that fleet-footed second who can save a fight and a water-bucket totter can't. The popular conception of a fight second in a jersey who talks out of the corner of his mouth, swings his arms and urges his charge to "don't fight him!" Except for that towel-swinging has been changed by most state boxing commissions, the popular conception is rather than a caricature. As many really competent business as there are second-knockout count.

When Seconds Count

Continued from page 30

Requisite of a good handler is a cool head. He cannot, as Harry did after the thrilling round of the Dempsey-jump around the ring hysterically, "Where's the fight?" while holding it in his hand all the time. Nor can he, as a whole, in his excitement, as a whole, one of Joe Louis' did on one of the few occasions worked in Joe's corner.

Four Eye on the Referee

must be able to see his opponent's beating without fainting. Harry did when his immortal second, Terry McGovern, was out by Young Corbett. On the other hand, he needn't be as callous as was the late Leo P. Flynn, who used the slogan: "He can't hurt me." As he was seconding a big, raw-horn named Tim Kelly one day, Tim was qualifying as the fish catcher since the heyday of Bresnahan. After one parting round, Kelly came back over discouraged and wailed: "I'm dead if I go out for another round. Faith, I'd better give up." "You mean by talking such nonsense," roared Leo. "Why, he didn't go on you that round."

"Well, jabbers, you better keep your eyes on the referee!" moaned Tim, beaming lips, "because someone's givin' me a helluva baytin'." As he is noted in the fight game without a peer at the art of seconding. It looks simple the way he does it in his allotted forty seconds but that's only because, after years of acting as an emergency physician, he has acquired skill in the particular field beyond that of a hold medical degrees.

According to popular belief, all cuts are treated the same treatment. Fighters are bleeders and some are not. Professor Arcel. "I know I require only the application of a line and a little pressure to stop a wound. Others will bleed from a small cut that we have to the dynamite. Know what I mean? Monsell's Solution. It's harmless. I don't know how to use it and in some states.

A popular solution is liquid adrenaline but you've got to know your opponent's it's safe to use this. In some cases it acts as a perfect styptic and in some cases it increases rather than stops the bleeding. Sometimes it acts as a stimulant, even when applied externally in such cases it increases the action and thus promotes the blood instead of stemming it. It is also a snake-venom preparation on the market which is effective in some cases. The important thing, no matter what styptic agent is used, is the application of pressure."

Arcel is qualified to handle a fighter both orally and manually. Although he will yield to the manager in the matter of advising a fighter between rounds if requested to, he insists on taking complete charge of the job of administering to the fighter's physical needs.

Before every fight in which he works, Arcel buys a pail, sponge, bottle and supply of ice. These, with his medicine cabinet, comprise his working kit. Besides the styptic agents, Ray carries a bottle of smelling salts, a little brandy and a mixture of honey, brandy and lemon. Some fighters when fatigued are refreshed by a drink of water and aromatic spirits of ammonia. Others are nauseated by such a mixture and require brandy. Still others go for the brandy, lemon and honey mixture. Brandy stimulates the heart without intoxicating, honey supplies energy and lemon juice chases away the nauseous feeling a fighter gets when tired.

Forty seconds is all a second has in which to work between rounds although there is a one-minute interval. Arcel explains that it takes ten seconds for the handlers to climb into the ring and the fighter to get to his corner after the bell. All handlers must leave the ring when the warning whistle sounds ten seconds before the bell rings for the next round. A wise second will try to cut down on the twenty seconds that are wasted by rushing out to meet his fighter, dousing him with a spongeful of water and removing his mouthpiece.

Ice is almost as important in boxing as in hockey. Nothing refreshes a weary boxer quite as much as a piece of ice held against the forehead or back of the neck, says Arcel. A new ice technique was introduced in the art of seconding a few years ago by Pete Reilly, the Silver Fox. A great believer in proverbs, Pete decided that the ounce of prevention which lies in an ice bag, rubbed over a fighter's face between rounds, is worth the pound of cure that is contained in the various preparations for closing wounds. Now, every up-to-date second uses ice bags to freeze his fighter's physiognomy so that it won't cut easily.

Pete Shows the Proof

A daring soul, Pete also originated the dented protector gag, in the days when fights could be won on a foul in New York State. One night when Pete's fighter, Jack Delaney, was having a bit of a joust with Paulino Uzcudun and not making much headway with the job, he fell to the mat, doubled up like a jackknife at parade rest and moaned the baritone to Pete's tenor cry of "Foul!" The referee, a music-lover, listened for a moment, then disqualified the astounded Paulino, who hadn't landed a punch below the Adam's apple in three rounds. Pete the Fox made a flying tour of the press row a minute later to exhibit a dented protector cup. The newspaper boys were deeply impressed until the thought occurred to them next morning that Pete would have had to undress his fighter in public to produce the cup Jack wore.

Pete's prize-winning performance, however, was that of seconding one fighter for the first seven rounds of a fight and his opponent for the last eight. This quaint little dodge took place in Hartford, Connecticut, the night André Routis lost the featherweight title to Bat Battalino. By a strange coincidence, Pete not only turned up in Bat's corner in the middle of the fight but he

Highest Honors In Dogdom Go To Ken-L-Ration Fed Champs!

BEST OF BREED

Famous Hertzville Headstudy again won honors at the Chicago International Dog Show, March 30.

A GREAT WINNER!

Ch. Winalaby Vol-sung. A bright-eyed, beautifully furnished, ruggedly boned Schnauzer. Topped his breed in Chicago's biggest show of the year.

Keep Your Dog in Championship Health with the Lean Fresh Meat and Extra Vitamin B<sub>1</sub> in Ken-L-Ration

• Even if your dog doesn't have a mile-long pedigree, he can have the rugged health that helped these great dogs to win. That's why thousands feed Ken-L-Ration—the dog food that contains a high percentage of lean, fresh muscle meat that's best for your dog. Ken-L-Ration has all seven vitamins—with a big BONUS of Vitamin B<sub>1</sub>—a safeguard against nervous ailments that take thousands of dog lives every year. Get Ken-L-Ration at your grocer's today—it costs no more!

Ken-L-Ration
The Food of Champions

ATHLETE'S FOOT

ITCHING FEET and TOES

Broken Skin, Blisters Or Itching Here May Mean You Already Have Athlete's Foot

In summer, your feet are more apt to sweat easily between the toes. In this hot, moist area the spores of Athlete's Foot Fungi thrive, burrow deeply in the tissues and spread rapidly. If itching on your feet occurs and the skin between your toes cracks, is thick and white or reveals tiny blisters, it may mean this dangerous and stubborn infection has already taken place and may spread to other parts of the feet and body.

Be on the alert—look between your toes tonight. If there are tiny blisters or the skin is broken, use Dr. Scholl's SOLVEX, a treatment exclusively for Athlete's Foot. Quickly relieves intense itching, kills the fungi of Athlete's Foot it contacts and helps heal the broken tissues. Get Dr. Scholl's SOLVEX (Liquid or Ointment) 50c at your Drug, Shoe or Dept. Store.

Free Booklet on Foot Care—write to Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Chicago, Ill.

Dr. Scholl's SOLVEX FOR ATHLETE'S FOOT

PREVENT ATHLETE'S FOOT

To prevent reinfection of Athlete's Foot, spray inside of shoes with Dr. Scholl's Shoe Deodorizer and Fungicide, kills the Fungi it reaches on insoles and shoe linings; dispels odors caused by sweaty feet. Large bottle with sprayer 50c, Drug, Shoe, Dept. Stores, everywhere.

WANT
This Juicer?

THIS polished chromium juice extractor will not rust or corrode. Light and powerful, it strains the last drop of juice. Saves time and fruit!

GET yours by selling only two 1-year COLLIER'S subscriptions at $2.00 each to persons living outside your home. Offer good in U.S.A. only. Simply pin subscribers' names and addresses to this ad with check or money order for $4.00.

Independent Agency Division, Desk C-29
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company
Springfield, Ohio

turned up as his manager after the battle. Droll fellow, that Reilly!

No second can hope to handle successfully a fighter whom he doesn't know. Handlers like Ray Arcel who regard their work as a profession and take deep pride in it wouldn't think of going into a fighter's corner until they have had a chance to study him. That means his personality as well as his style of fighting. It would be fatal to a sensitive fighter's chances, for instance, to bawl him out for a mistake.

"You've got to know which fighters to con and which to bawl out," says Ray. "Also, you must know whether your man tires easily, how he reacts to punishment, what stimulants he requires, how easily he bleeds, whether or not he can think for himself—all these and a hundred other things you've got to file away in a card index in your brain."

"Probably the greatest obstacle we have to contend with is the poisonous advice given to fighters by wise-guy friends. They're whispering free advice all the time and, though they don't know what they're talking about, the average fighter will listen to them. Years ago, there weren't so many boxing 'experts' at large. Today, every barber, boot-black and cigar salesman knows more about our profession than we do ourselves, to hear them tell it."

A good second doesn't need to have been a boxer himself. In fact, most ex-boxers are so excitable they fail as seconds. Abe Attell was one of the greatest featherweights who ever gouged an eye or busted a nasal bridge. Yet, so excitable does he become when handling a fighter nowadays that he works himself into a state of complete exhaustion. Abe's fighter always finishes in better condition than Attell, who has used up all his strength jabbing, hooking, ducking, side-stepping, bobbing and weaving, outside the ropes as he follows the action and imagines himself in his fighter's place.

The Caplin Curse

An excitable, two-fisted second and one of the most comical in the business is Hymie Caplin. No one has really seen a fighter seconded ambidextrously and bilingually, until he has watched Hymie Caplin in action. This East Side Hebrew who had been told (but not by the Duchess) that he looks like the Duke of Windsor, is the most individualistic of all the strange clan. It is told of Hymie that he once had to retire temporarily from his trade of beseeching pugs not to box him but to fight him, because a sprained wrist left him speechless. Caplin is equally fluent with the left or the right hand but is at his best when speaking with both.

In addition to the best pair of talking dukes in the business, Hymie is unique in that he owns the greatest collection of klulas of anyone in the fight racket. A klula isn't something you dunk in your coffee. It is a Yiddish curse, uttered half humorously and half maliciously. Sometimes Caplin lays the curse on his own fighter for refusing to obey his instructions but more often he utters his imprecation against the chap in the other corner, providing, of course, he is Jewish and understands what is being wished on his hapless head.

Lou Nova trained for his fight with Max Baer in the summer of 1939 at the beautiful estate of Dr. Pierre Bernard, at Nyack, New York. Dr. Bernard, known to the tabloids as Oom the Omnipotent, is a practitioner of Yogi and interested Nova in the Oriental cult. Arcel, who trained Nova for that fight, says Yogi exercises hindered rather than helped him. Yogi stresses will power. Nova confused will power with stubbornness and almost lost the Baer fight by disobeying orders. His disastrous defeat by Tony Galento in Philadelphia a few months later was due entirely to his refusal to do as he was told. Instead of boxing Galento as he was instructed, Lou tried to show his contempt for Tony by slugging it out with him. They say in South Orange, New Jersey, a locomotive once tried to do the same thing with Galento and it's still at the roundhouse, being patched up. Arcel did one of his best jobs of patchwork on Nova that night. Almost every round, Lou came back to his corner bleeding from a new gash that Galento had opened. Ray used up all his blood-stanching drugs and chemicals in that fight and his skill enabled Lou to weather it out until the 14th when he collapsed. Nova hasn't fought since then. If he ever does again, he'll pay attention to his seconds instead of to good old Yogi.

Colored Boys Fight Best

Working behind fighters five nights a week, fifty-two weeks of the year, in cities from Coast to Coast, Ray Arcel has a better grasp on what's going on in the boxing game than anyone else connected with it. Conclusions that he has reached after a quarter of a century of experience are:

1. Negro fighters have a tremendous advantage over white boys in the matter of stamina. With fewer generations of the softening influence of civilization behind them than their white brethren and inured to hardships by the less favorable living conditions under which they are brought up, colored boys not only have more endurance but can take more punishment. The thicker skull of the Negro also helps make him a better shock absorber. Henry Armstrong stands out not because of any superiority in boxing or punching ability but because he can outlast all his opponents. A white fighter who tempted Henry's nonstop style of fighting would have been burned out long ago. Joe Louis' tremendous punching power is due to the same set of conditions.

2. Of the white boys, the Italians have the sturdiest physiques. This is accounted for, not only by the fact that Italians eat rough, wholesome food but also because Italian children aren't pampered and learn to fight early in life.

3. The Irish and Poles excel in courage, determination and initiative. Late the Irish have softened up because of the progress they have made in America. The Poles has improved their mode of living measurably. When the Irish were picks and shovels, they were to the game what the Italians are now. Braddock was a throwback to the style Irish fighter and Leo Lomskey fied the Poles at his best.

4. Jewish boys are the smartest fighters and fastest thinkers. Two of them, Benny Leonard and Barney Ross, stand out as the intellectuals of the ring.

5. There are fewer and fewer fighters as the years pass because of the modern pugilist's requirements. Cream puffs and manure have replaced roadwork, plain, substantial food and brine baths for the hands in the modern pugilist's regimen.

6. Boxing, despite all the sins committed against it, chiefly by those who earn a good living from it, can be a builder of character as well as of physique and must be essentially a struggle to survive all the attacks from outside and within.

"We don't want to spoil your fun. Take the party to our apartment downstairs—we'll sleep here!"

GREGORY D'ALE

Childhood of Miss Churt

Continued from page 23

nd that, in packets weighing mere eds of pounds.

"Get that junk out o' the way!"
said Mr. Wharton. "C'mon, boys!"
Himself was about to seize a crate
the third mate grabbed his shoul-ay, Wharton—" "He hell you do. Muck in an' shift thing. I'm goin' to shove these motives up, or whatever they are."

sten! The Old Man's in a sweat nk—sendin' out SOS till the ether's ots in it—" "He hell with him!"
h' now he's gettin' ready to abanor hip."

N. Wharton disposed of his current a and dashed forward to cut the key out of a jam. Somehow or other shirt had disintegrated, and his trouconsisted of but a breechclout and neg, but still he was not swearing.
Onon Hobson, at that moment asleep off Liverpool, his craglike nose in st pillow made for him by a parish-n, would have been gratified could ave known.

"HAT are you goin' to do?" demanded the third officer. "He's got the ship's papers ready, an' he says uty's to his men, an' unless we get by dawn he's gonna take to the s."

you don't get outa my dog-rammed we won't be afloat till dawn," said Wharton. "Hey—" "But you got to stop him!"

an' risk my ticket—mutiny? No,
I obey—get that stuff movin', you
h o' lobsters! Come along aft here, knob-eyed slackers—want me to e this myself? You Fawdry—you on—"

leared space now lay between the head and the first tank, which, of se, was not really a tank, it just felt one. Anyway, the problem was to it up to that bulkhead—and the r one up behind it, if possible. And bulkhead was remarking, in the uage of tortured steel, that it would damned if it was going to wait for a support much longer.

You can't shift 'em," said the third e weakly, "an' if you do, you'll shove bow down an' we'll slide."

Like the Tornado at Coney Island," ed Mr. Wharton, grinning. "Down
t McGinty—ready, boys? Line up, your shoulders against it. It's shove row gills! Now—one—two—" "The case didn't move."

The Old Man says—" gasped the d mate.

Give us a chantey," grunted one of men; and Mr. Wharton obliged. It ght almost be said that out of the ness of the heart the mouth spoke.
could hardly be called singing, and verbiage was bald and incomplete;
in topicality, direction and—yes—passion of love denied, Mr. Whar-s chantey might have claimed ship with the romaunts of the troulours.

Ca-a-a-ptain Ti-i-i-mbs," he emitted a wavering roar, "is a son of a—ve!"

The men had had their leave stopped
Staten Island.

Ca-a-a-ptain Ti-i-i-mbs," they agreed sively, "is a son of a—heave!"

The case budged.

Ca-a-a-ptain Timbs—heave!"

t moved six inches.

—son of a—heave!"

six inches more.

Up on the bridge, the subject of the chantey was talking to three naval ratings who seemed not to like him. They were the men responsible for the 4.7 aft, and they seemed to be suffering from the spirit of Nelson, or Collingwood or somebody.

All they did about it, though, was to say they didn't think—

"You don't have to think!" said Captain Timbs.

"You're not our officer, sir," said the senior rating.

"You're under my orders! If I say to abandon ship, we'll abandon ship!"

This made it the turn of the junior rating.

"Aye, aye, sir," said he. "If you say so."

Captain Timbs swallowed a large and visible lump in the throat. "That's the order," he said. "Soon's it's dawn.
We're ripped wide open."

"Roughish sea, sir," said the senior rating impassively.

"I've got a Swedish freighter on the radio—she'll be here by then, standing by. Who the hell are you, questioning my orders?"

"Nobody, sir," said the second rating.
"Get to hell out!"

"Aye, aye, sir," said the third; and out they went.

What they said as they went below is nobody's business; such low speculations about the sums payable by government to bereaved ship owners; so much plain, vulgar swearing. One may, however, make extracts to the extent that the senior remarked that dawn was breaking already; the second said that the old gal felt like taking the high dive,
at that; while the junior, peering aft, remarked sentimentally that anyhow she'd go down with her flag up and her gun shotted.

"Might go an' fire her off for once,"
said he.

"Might go down an' give Wharton a hand," said his senior severely; and so they did.

SOME time later, Miss Churt, whose rump steak had filled slumber with dreams of gigantic rats chasing her down unending alleyways, awoke with a start and a bad taste in her mouth.

She yawned and decided that a little fresh air, again, would do her good.
Jumping down from the settee, she found that the floor was not exactly where she had left it—it sloped downward now, and before she could correct her stance her for'ard legs had given way and she had rolled into a corner.

Picking herself thence, and reaching the doorsill, she rolled forth in search of company. It was light, so she gave the yawn and stretch by which cats thank God for each night spent in shelter
—but something appeared to be wrong.

Where was everybody, to start with?

And why wasn't the deck vibrating as it always had, except just before and after mother left? And then the cargo winches had been working, with a roar that set one's ears back; now there was stillness—and behold! as one crossed behind the charthouse the bulwark of boats was gone and the wind smote one unimpeded.

Just some ropes trailing . . .

Miss Churt walked forward a few more paces and sat down, like the treble clef in a musical stave. Far in the misty distance she could see a ship standing still; and as for the Malvern's boats, they were on the water—swimming,
actually, and swimming away from her.

And in one of them, along with the three naval ratings and some other able-bodied gentlemen who disapproved of Captain Timbs and were saying so, Mr.
Wharton was at this identical moment

Calling AUGUST vacationers!

The Wayne Blockhouse, Erie—replica of that in which Gen. "Mad Anthony" Wayne died in 1796
—stands over his grave.

Typical of Pennsylvania's fine highways, Route 209, north of Harrisburg.

Ticklish Rock—curious formation of stratified rock near Whirl's End State Park.
It sways when touched.

Come to the cool playlands of PENNSYLVANIA

WHEN YOU GO TO THE
NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR, BE SURE TO VISIT THE PENNSYLVANIA BUILDING

FREE PICTORIAL MAP AND FOLDER HOSPITALITY PASSPORT

Send for this complete guide to Pennsylvania—the historic and picturesque—illustrated in color. Out-of-state inquirers also receive the Hospitality Passport that assures Pennsylvania's guests of a cordial welcome. Address Pennsylvania Department of Commerce, Division D-21, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.

From breeze-swept, pine-rimmed mountain lakes; from silvery waterfalls in forest depths, comes the call to Pennsylvania. Come play in comfort.
Drive through the Keystone State's picturesque countryside, along any of its 40,000 miles of safe, easy highways.
Follow the story of America's beginnings as told by historic shrines along your way. Or head for a mountain-top resort where the tang in the air adds zest to your favorite sport. There's pleasure as you like it awaiting you.
So pack your bags and come now.

TO SEE AMERICA FIRST . . .

FIRST SEE

Pennsylvania

THE NATION'S BIRTH-STATE

ARTHUR H. JAMES, Governor

RICHARD P. BROWN, Secretary of Commerce

Ted Ellis,
Famous Speed and Endurance Record Holder

WESTERN UNION

NEWCOMB CARLTON
CHICAGO, ILL. 60611
subject to the terms on back hereof, which are hereby agreed to LOS ANGELES CALIFORNIA
Sent 4/15/40

ESTABLISHED SEVEN NEW SPEED RECORDS AT ROSA-MOND DRY LAKE CALIFORNIA TODAY WITH FRONT WHEEL DRIVE FRENCH CITROEN STOCK CAR. BEFORE RUN EACH INNER TUBE WAS PURPOSELY PUNCTURED AND A SHALER HOT PATCH VULCANIZED THEREON.
REACHED SPEED OF NEARLY ONE HUNDRED MILES PER HOUR OVER FIVE MILE COURSE IN TERRIFIC DESERT HEAT OF OVER ONE HUNDRED DEGREES.
USED SHALER-RISLONE IN MY MOTOR. RUN UNDER THE SANCTION AND SUPERVISION AMERICAN RAC-ING ASSOCIATION. NOT A SIGN OF TIRE TROUBLE DURING ENTIRE TEST. ANYONE CAN STAKE THEIR LIFE ON THE SAFETY OF A SHALER HOT PATCH. I DID AND WOULD AGAIN.

TED ELLIS

FOR SAFETY'S SAKE INSIST ON GENUINE SHALER "HOT PATCHES"

Ted Ellis, famous speed and endurance record holder, deliberately punctured all inner tubes on stock car and repaired them with Shaler Vulcanized "Hot Patches" before speed record runs at Rosamond Drylake, Calif. Despite heat of driving at 100 m.p.h. and terrific 100° desert temperature, the Shaler repaired tubes held perfectly—because the "Hot Patch" is welded permanently to the rubber of the tube—in fact it becomes part of the tube. . . . When you have a puncture, take it to one of the 128,430 service stations, garages and repair shops who are Authorized to repair tubes with genuine Shaler "Hot Patches". Accept no substitute. THE SHALER COMPANY, Waupun, Wis. The Canadian Shaler Products Company, Ltd., Toronto.

SHALER
"HOT PATCHES"
The Safe Tube Repair for 35 Years

Look for This Sign

remembering that he had left Miss Churt aboard.

"Noah's nails!" he ejaculated; and Canon Hobson, still sleeping, smiled in his distant dreams. "Why—"

The oars lifted.

"Forgot something, sir?" asked the senior rating.

"Forgotten something?" said Mr. Wharton. "I've left my cat behind!"

From the bow of the boat came an imperfectly stifled chuckle.

"You laugh at me and I'll put a head on you," said the first officer; and silence redescended on the ocean.

"Want to go back, sir?"

"I—think I will," said Mr. Wharton.

"If we're to save our dirty hides when there's no need to, I don't see why a poor dumb animal should suffer. Unless these gentlemen object? Pull stabdud, back port! Come on, you bunch of tailors!"

"Captain's boat's stopped rowin', sir," said the bow oar.

"Ne'er mind," said Mr. Wharton, "we can rat just as well in ten minutes' time. An' that Swede can wait. Some expensive nephew for—c'mon, put some beef into it!"

A distant hail came over the water—which, by the way, was now astonishingly calm.

"I'll just swarm up the falls an' be back in a jiffy," said Mr. Wharton—not knowing that a mile the other side of the Malvern the sea, hidden from him by the wallowing bulk of that ship, was just being broken by the conning tower of a submarine.

Her commander, a pleasant enough fellow named Koenig, usually resident in Munich, Glocknergasse No. 8, had heard the frantic distress signals wireless by Captain Timbs and had wondered if perchance they might portend something in his line of business. There was, he knew, a temporary scarcity of destroyers in this area; but the event was turning out better than his hopes. Through the periscope he had watched the crew abandoning ship, and, when the Malvern failed to slide precipitately out of sight, had commented soul-ticklingly to his men on the un-sea-to-dare-worthiness of British sailors.

That this was no Q-ship he was well assured, both by the presence of the Swedish ship and the perilous trim of the Malvern herself. So it was his intent to combine business with pleasure by letting the fleeing crew watch him use their vessel for target practice. He thought he would use percussion fuse and blow the funnel out of her first.

As the submarine came awash her gun crew tumbled up, ran for'ard and proceeded to clear their gun.

And simultaneously, the longing gaze of Miss Churt was gratified by the spectacle of Mr. Wharton, shaggier than ever. Miss Churt liked shagginess, it gave one more corners to nestle in.

HER master, landing on the boat deck from the falls, didn't seem as cheery as usual; something seemed to be bothering him; he didn't smile.

But Miss Churt knew how to remedy that. When anybody looked sad, she ran away, and Mr. Wharton ran after her and picked her up and called her a little devil and corrected himself and said "weevil" and kissed her on the end of the nose.

Miss Churt therefore ran away now, skidding slightly because of the slant of the deck; her ears cocked for the sound of beloved footsteps pursuing.

And here they came.

But here came something else.

Something terrible. A long, increasing noise, coming out of the middle of a distant thump, boring into her ears—so terrifying—and then—a vast flash of light, taking up the whole world and tearing it to pieces, shaking her stomach so that the steak didn't matter any more. . . .

Mr. Wharton, rushing from behind the wireless house, paused a moment.

He saw a very large scorched hole in the boat-deck planking, around which he had to pick his way.

While thus engaged, he saw Captain Koenig's submarine, lying perhaps three quarters of a mile off.

But what he was looking for was a small ball of soiled fur; and this he found, very limp, just for'ard of the bridge-deck ladder. The curious thing is that Captain Koenig also adored cats, and had three at home in the Glocknergasse.

But that's war.

Mr. Wharton took up in his very large hand what war had left of Miss Churt, and he laid the other hand over her like the lid of a little coffin; and then he raised both his arms and, still holding the limp form in his right hand, cursed Captain Koenig and his superiors and inferiors and all his works in a voice that almost carried the distance.

Indeed—in St. Mary's Rectory, Canon Hobson awoke with a start; looked at his bedside clock and found it was 5:25; rolled over—but somehow was disinclined to go to sleep again.

"You bloody, sneaking bloody butcher!" Mr. Wharton was now shouting; and there came a sudden crack in his voice. "My little—"

A voice spoke from just behind him. It had not seemed quite proper to the naval ratings that their officer should go aboard without escort, so they had swarmed up the falls also and here they were. The voice was the voice of the senior rating, as was proper.

"How about giving 'em a packet, sir?" he inquired.

Mr. Wharton had forgotten the 4.7 gun aft. Now he remembered and gave a perfect snarl of assent.

The body of Miss Churt he crammed into the side pocket of his coat; and then down the ladder he went, and after him came the ratings.

They had to descend another ladder and cross the aft well-deck and then climb the poop; and it was now that Captain Koenig saw them.

With a welter of ow sounds and a swamp of terminations in ch, he directed his men to shift target and give Wharton et al a packet; so that the question resolved itself roughly into one of who should give whom a packet first.

The U-boat, being in the groove, got her shot off the earlier; but the altered aim was high and the shell missed the Swedish ship by more than half a mile (Memorandum March 27, 1940, paragraph 2.).

Meantime, the senior rating had various manipulations of various and now, with a nod of the head, pressed himself satisfied. Quite necessarily, he looked at Mr. Wharton opened his mouth and was just to ask if he should open fire when the officer (not a regular navy man, of course) shoved him aside, seizing firing lever and got the shot off her

IT WAS just luck, blind luck, concerned; but the fact remained that unconventional, almost illegitimate shell flew as through a tube to the U-boat's gun, bent it, thereoff without touching Captain Koenig or his men, and smote the lip conning tower, where it exploded the abandon peculiar to high explosives. Nobody was hurt, save Seaman brecht Otto of Bremen (deaf-mute scratches)—but the conning tower impossible to close. That meant submersion—

And on the southern sky line had appeared, and was approaching smudge of smoke which betokened destroyers. The ratings pointed to one another.

Meanwhile Mr. Wharton, at the rail, was expressing his complete berserk opinion of Captain Timbs and all men who would take to boats lifeboats on perfectly sound ships badly needed munitions.

This expression, in addition to tending (if the third officer may be believed) the paint on the thwarts of Lifeboat No. 1, left Mr. Wharton exhausted. And softened in mood.

He put his hand into his pocket, pulled out the mortal envelope of Miss Churt. The bluish eyes were closed, her head rolled on the neck, and her whiskers had been singed away.

"You want us to come back, sir," came a hail from the boats.

"You can go to hell!" roared Mr. Wharton; so they started toward the shore.

But a voice pitched to carry a quarter of a mile is tremendous at close range.

Miss Churt vibrated in every corner. Her stomach began to trouble her again. There was a familiar smell in her nostrils, seeping past the steel-burned whiskers—tobacco, tar and linson's—

"I think it's wonderful how you wardens begin as mere convicts and work up in the ranks"

DAVE BRIDGES

She opened her eyes and said: "Mew!"
 All it was wartime, the parish of St. Mary's was properly decorated for this wedding; though in view of circumstances, Canon Hobson had wanted to relax the clothing rules so the bridegroom was concerned.
 Miss Woollard, however, was in the prescribed raiment even down to the twenty-ninth orange blossom; albeit she seemed, apparently, to take nervous out of her veil. She was more nervous than brides usually are; more nervous even than seemed warranted by the fact that her bridegroom had three medals—the senior, junior and middle ratings, all with medals but one inferior to that which had been won on Mr. Wharton.

The cause for this uneasiness came to light when Canon Hobson, opening his prayer book, first glanced, then looked, then stared at the bridegroom's hand coat pocket.
 He should perhaps be mentioned here in addition to a granite face and an extraordinarily soft heart, the reverend Canon was equipped with eyes that seemed to have been chipped out of a hard and ground to fine points.
 He furled the prayer book and spoke in a low, dazed voice.

"Henry," said he, while the congregation craned, "that cannot be a cat you have in your coat pocket? Not a cat?"
 This was rather an exaggeration of the status of Miss Churt, who was six years old that day and had just put her shaven face out for a little air.
 The general proposition was unde-niable.

Dusty Death

Continued from page 16

When I got my wind back I dragged and crawled downhill to the wood and I couldn't see more than just a few and nothing clear on account of my which were burning and running in the dust, but I came to the road got up and staggered off along it.
 After a while, I wouldn't know just how long, I got back to the highway. I caught the next car that came by and the driver picked me up and rode me to the town I'd been heading for.

He didn't make much sense out of what I told him because I could not make much sense out of it myself. He seemed a bit and reckoned, I guess, that was full of corn.

He dropped me off at a local police station and I showed papers I had in my pockets and they sent me on to the next station of the state constabulary.

The state police got me a room at one of these tourist homes and I had a bath and got the sawdust out of my system.
 When I went back to talk to them again, they had told me to come back in an hour or so and there would be an officer there who would know what I was talking about.

This officer was a sharp fellow. His name was Linsey. I told him my business, that I represented insurance companies, and I said, "We are getting a lot of claims for cars lost in these parts, Mr.
 Linsey. We are not paying them till we know more." I said, "but we think we better look into it. What's the matter with you coppers—no good?"

He lit up his pipe and puffed and said,
 "Don't blame you, Mr. MacLaine, and it can't make us look so good, but wait till I tell you. It's happened the same way eight times in the last six months.

"The first thing is, sir," he went on,
 "that we get a telephone from somebody that says he represents a finance company that is selling a car on install-

"Yes," said Mr. Wharton. "It is."
 "He would bring it—he would—I said—" quavered the bride; but Canon Hobson paid no attention to her, though she began to sob.

Meeting the bluish eyes of Miss Churt, however, his adamant orbs underwent a peculiar process. First they flickered from their condemning stare;
 then, as it were, they liquefied, so that their penetrative qualities became nil.

He spoke:
 "Am I to presume that—this—is some kind of mascot? Connected perhaps with the recent—? What has happened to her whiskers?"

"I'll tell you about it in the vestry," said Mr. Wharton; and, meeting the canon's gaze, mourned for the misjudgments of his youth.

Canon Hobson nodded; opened the book which he had closed on a probationary thumb, and cleared his throat.

"Dearly beloved," he proclaimed, "we are gathered together—"

Miss Churt could not quite identify all the smells (largely lilies) or sounds (mostly Canon Hobson) that were going on.

They were interesting, and she had a vague idea that something of the same general purport might be her personal concern one day.

But not now.
 Not for a long time yet.

And meantime she had had enough air.

She withdrew her head from the atmosphere of St. Mary's into the warm tweediness of Mr. Wharton's pocket and composed herself to sleep.

ments, and he says that he just grabbed a car—repossessed it—because the owner is back in his payments. He gives us the car number and the owner's name, and says, 'If he complains that his car is stolen, tell him we got it!' That's good enough for us and if the owner would call up we would tell him to go talk to the finance company—but the owner don't call up."

He puffed his pipe, staring at me.
 "Then what, Mr. Linsey?"

"THE next thing, Mr. MacLaine, is after three or four days, or it might be a week, in walks some friend or kin of the owner of the car and tells us the owner is missing. He hasn't showed up, him or his car, at some point where he was expected so many days ago. And, Mr. MacLaine, we never find hide nor hair nor hear tell of any of those owners after, or their cars either. That's the last we hear of it, sir."

"Well, Mr. Linsey," I said, "it's not the last we hear of it because we might have to pay for the cars, and that's my interest in the matter. Now let me tell you what happened to me tonight."

I told him about meeting up with the young lady on the road and falling in the dust. It seemed to fit into something he knew and he took me over it several times. About thinking I saw the house off to one side, and then not seeing it at all; and the roaring noise.

"You didn't see the house when you got out, Mr. MacLaine?"

"No, I didn't. Or my car either," I said, looking at him.

He knocked out his pipe.
 "I reckon you fell in with the Dust People, Mr. MacLaine!"

"Who are the Dust People?"

He chuckled. "You know most about them, sir. You are the only body ever seen one and lived to tell. Now, sir, it

ATHLETE'S FOOT INVADES Hot, perspiring feet

● When you pound hot summer pavements your feet soak and steam in a welter of perspiration. This irritates the tender skin between your toes often to the point where it cracks wide open, exposing raw flesh. When this happens —look out! Your feet are all set for an attack of painful
 Athlete's Foot!

CRACKS between your toes WARN YOU

The fungi that cause Athlete's Foot grow twice as fast when your feet perspire profusely.
 They feed on this excessive perspiration and dead skin until cracks appear. Then, through those cracks, they spread quickly. Red, itching toes and dead, white skin peeling off in patches tell you Athlete's Foot has struck!

Drench those cracks TONIGHT

Look carefully between your toes.
 At the first sign of cracked and moist, dead skin, drench the entire foot with Absorbine Jr. full strength, night and morning.

1. Absorbine Jr. is a powerful fungicide. It kills the Athlete's Foot fungi on contact.
2. It dissolves the perspiration products on which Athlete's Foot fungi thrive.
3. It dries the skin between the toes.
4. Soothes and helps heal broken tissues.
5. Relieves itching, pain of Athlete's Foot.

Guard against reinfection. Boil socks 15 minutes. Disinfect shoes. In advanced cases consult your doctor in addition to using Absorbine Jr. $1.25 a bottle at all druggists.

ABSORBINE Jr.

Kills Athlete's Foot fungi on contact!

Photomicrograph of the fungi that cause Athlete's Foot. This parasitic plant life burrows under the tissues and attacks the delicate nerve endings. No wonder Athlete's Foot causes such severe pain!

Photomicrograph showing that Absorbine Jr. kills
 Athlete's Foot
 fungi on contact—
 they can't grow.
 No longer can they spread,
 causing misery.

Sample
 Bottle
 FREE

Also QUICK RELIEF for:

Sore, aching muscles • Tired, burning feet • Sunburn • Bites of mosquitoes and other small insects.

W. F. Young, Inc., 201Q Lyman St., Springfield, Mass. Send me sample bottle of Absorbine Jr. FREE.

Name _____
 Address _____
 City _____
 State _____

Now you can really SEE what you're getting!

No squinting at a tiny image, no guesswork, no doubt! You SEE your scene large and clear—and snap exactly what you want. You'll get a new thrill from this easy way of making grand pictures!

BRILLIANT VIEW-FINDER SHOWS THE SCENE LARGE AND PERFECTLY CLEAR.

2 1/4 x 2 1/4 Pictures.

Uses Eastman or Agfa 12-picture roll

Sold everywhere with 12 months guarantee.

$3.98 Complete

Falcon Magni-Vue
REFLEX STYLE CAMERA
FREE Write for free catalog of all latest Falcon models.

UTILITY MFG. CO., INC., 40 W. 25 ST., NEW YORK

PROTECT YOUR HEALTH! AVOID TOBACCO JUICES

with the BUILT IN

AMBER TIP SANITARY MOUTHPIECE

ASK FOR

EARL MARSHAL CIGARS

Mild blend of Havana and Domestic tobaccos

If not available in your neighborhood, send 25c (no stamps, please) for 5 cigars (postpaid). State size desired: Perfecto or Panetela.

A good 5c cigar, plus the "Amber Tip"

* Amber Color Plastic

For RELIEF of

Sunburn

Cooling, soothing MENTHOLATUM relieves sunburn quickly.

MENTHOLATUM

TRUTH ABOUT CORNS

• Corns are caused by pressure and friction. But now it's easy to remove them. Fit a Blue-Jay pad over the corn. It relieves pain by removing pressure. Special formula acts on corn—gently loosens it so it can be lifted right out. By avoiding pressure and friction that caused corn, you can prevent its return. Get Blue-Jay Corn Plasters—25¢ for 6. Same price in Canada.

BAUER & BLACK

BLUE-JAY CORN PLASTERS

SPRINKLE A-1 SAUCE

Only Sandwiches

"ASK FOR IT IN EATING PLACES AND AT HOME TOO"

might be all silly talk and you know how a story gets around and builds up, but it is told anyway that some right strange and mean people live in the dust hills.

"I'll go bail, Mr. Linsey," I said, "that your Dust People are not all silly talk."

They sent out an alarm for my car and I promised to come back in the morning when we could find that house in the woods.

I went back to the tourist home and had a sleep and went to the state police post next morning and met this copper. We got in his car and drove back for five or six miles till we came to the wood road. I'm sure I found the right place, that was where I picked up the girl.

We drove into the wood road for a mile or so, which was as far as I thought I went the night before, and, sure enough, we came to sawdust hills just where they ought to be, about a mile back on the left side of the dirt road. But there was no house.

We went along the road farther and looked but we had to come back; that was the only clearing for miles.

It had me fanning. "But look," I said, "the tracks of my car going in! And see that low spot? That must be where I fell through the ground."

He couldn't see it. "Mr. MacLaine, that looks like where some farmer around here drove in and helped himself to a load of dust. And where's the house?"

"Search me, Linsey," I shrugged. "It should be standing right there."

Well, we weren't making any money sitting there gaping at the sawdust, so we went back to the state police post, and they had some news for us.

About my car. It hadn't been found, and the alarm hadn't done any good, but my car had been reported as "repossessed." Somebody had called up state police headquarters about midnight and given the number of my car and my name—my license was in the glove compartment—and reported that it had been grabbed by a finance company.

The same thing that happened in the other cases, the only difference being that I was above ground instead of being in the dust.

It got me thinking.

So far as the Dust People knew, I was lying dead, six feet under; then why were they calling the police to say anything about my car at all? Nobody was going to complain that my car was stolen, so far as the Dust People knew. It was funny. If they called the police, they were asking for trouble.

It couldn't have been the Dust People that called the police. That was the first leak of light I got on the case.

"AS I see it, Linsey," I suggested, "there must be two mobs working here. The Dust People that grab the cars, and another mob that is probably their outlet, don't you think? And the second mob doesn't know what happened to the drivers, so they work this wrinkle of calling the police and reporting the cars as repossessed, to head off an alarm."

"I think you got something there, MacLaine," he agreed. "It makes sense of these telephone calls. The Dust People would have to tell their pals that the cars were stolen, but they sure wouldn't want to tell that the owners were murdered. Yes, sir, that's sense."

That was a little light, but what there was no light on was how I was so dumb as not to be able to find that house again where I had lost my car. Linsey and I drove back on every woods road up that way for fifteen miles and we saw some houses and looked them over but I couldn't recognize any of them.

It made Linsey laugh. "I reckon you looked too much in that girl's eyes, MacLaine, and she witched you!"

But it was mighty serious business.

Let alone that my people would have to pay for a lot of fine new cars, there was the serious fact that this mob working the roads thought no more of a man's life than of a sparrow's.

It is generally bad policy to tell the public about a police matter like this, because no matter what you tell them they will tell one another a different story and you might have a panic. So after I told my story the motorcycle men simply told lone drivers not to pick up pedestrians but to report them to the next police station if they needed help.

Linsey was one of their best men and he had been detailed to try to get a line on these missing drivers and cars, and that is why I was turned over to him. We went to work on it together.

I GUESS my people were a little surprised when I put in my claim for a stolen car, but it showed them anyway that I had got in touch with the situation.

I got me a new convertible coupé, with a shelf in back of the seat and I had a job done on the shelf so it could be raised up like a lid. Under the shelf was the trunk. When the lid was up, Linsey could sit in the trunk, sitting sideways and quite comfortable, and ready to duck and pull down the lid, while I drove.

This was our idea: there were two mobs. If we grabbed the first mob—the Dust People—we would never get to the second mob that was disposing of the cars. So Linsey was to stick with the car in hopes of going with it to the second mob, and I was to deal with the Dust People. I was to locate their den right this time, and let them grab my car, only taking care to keep out of the pit.

It mightn't be the house I was taken to. We figured that the Dust People had different places, because drivers and cars had disappeared in different directions, but it would be in the pine country.

Linsey and I mapped the whole section, and we drove it from light to dark, expecting all the time that we would hear of some other lone driver that started out in the morning and never arrived at night. But during that ten days nobody was reported missing.

This afternoon we were moping along at thirty miles and watching ahead. I remember we were talking about witch water that was heavy on that day for the first time since I picked up the she-devil; you see the ahead flooded over with water when you get there it is nothing dry. I do not believe in witches, it is only what I have heard people say about the witch water.

It came sundown, but still bright then we saw these two ladies on the road ahead. One was sitting on a bench by the road and the other was standing up, and as we came along the one was standing up stepped into the ditch and flagged us, and Linsey ducked into his box and pulled it down behind him.

I pulled up, and this lady came forward me, holding up her hand, and noticed she had six fingers. She was young and husky and she said the mammy had been hit by a car and I ride them home. This was a good thing, miles from where I had picked up the she-devil, as I called her to me.

"Sure thing, lady," I said, getting the gun out of the glove compartment. "You can crowd up."

The young one went back and the old one. The old one was a lady and all bent, with one good leg and one shrunk leg. She came along crying like a cat in the dark. It was all put on, because I could see her watching me out of her rear window. They crowded in. The old one held up to me and kept up this low howl and working on her ball of snuff, put it up under her lip. I didn't look at her claws.

The young one said they lived "down the creek," meaning a creek that went down the road there, and would I take them home. Well, certainly.

I TURNED into the road, along the creek, and drove onto a bend, and there was a clearing and the hills, and a house. I knew it again, away though the last time I saw it was a hundred miles off.

It was the house and I took a good squint at it this time. It was painted yellow, with a flat roof, and eaves, and it had a dead sidewalk with no window; just the window in the door and a door. There was a curtain in the window but I could see the big

"The girl I marry must have a sense of humor"

FRED

LET 'EM PLAY
IN, ON OR AROUND THE WATER!

Stay-A-Float
for SAFETY

Don't worry when your youngster is playing around water. A Patented Ta-pat-co STAY-A-FLOAT will keep him SAFE. Safe—because STAY-A-FLOAT is 6 times more buoyant than cork... has nothing to puncture... has double safety straps in front... has patented leg and shoulder straps which prevent belt slipping up or down. Soft and comfortable to wear. Small and medium sizes $1.99.

AMERICAN PAD & TEXTILE CO.
MAIN STREET, GREENFIELD, OHIO

BOOKS TO ENJOY

What is your home like? Does it contribute while books that give you your family stimulating contact with minds, or does the sum total of resources for reading consist of novels or the daily newspaper resting today but of no value mental stimulation or information now?

All want our homes to be real warm and hearty, where the string of welcome is prominently red, a place where our friends want to come and return again and To make our homes attractive draw about us interesting and gaining friends, we too, must be interesting and entertaining.

Eliot, America's greatest educator, for forty years President of Harvard University, chose for his Harvard Classics, the books that are the backbone of college education. Enlightenment, stimulation, a distance from reality, an ability to soar to heights of thought, explore new fields of interest and experience new pleasures of enjoyment are in store for those who own

DR. ELIOT'S FOOT SHELF OF BOOKS

Collier & Son Corp.
432 HS

Mr. _____
Mrs. _____
Miss _____

inside because there was a light in there and the sun was down in the pine.

"Would you like me, lady," I offered, "to knock on the door?"

"Would you very kindly, sir?" she squealed softly. "Mammy's hurt bad and she can't walk good." So I got out and edged up toward the door.

I had hold of my gun in my pocket, and I was watching the door with one eye and the corner of the house next me with the other, and the far corner and the ladies with the other, so to speak, and all I was not watching was the house wall, because nobody is coming at you through a solid wall, and that's where I near got a knife in me.

Because that's where he came from. The house wall next the window folded—it was only a canvas drop with a window in it—and out through the opening he jumps; but I got a flash of the knife. He bounds on top of a dust heap with his knife up ready to give it to me; but he got two in the belly—bang—bang. I was backing up fast, and he plunged down from the heap and hit the ground in front of me and was swallowed up.

The ground went right down with him out of sight, and the dust heaps on both sides slid down on top of him. It was a spread of canvas over a pit, and dust heaped on the canvas on both sides, and when you hit the canvas and went down you pulled everything in on top of you and were sunk without a trace. It made me dizzy to see, but that was no place to wait around, and I turned and lammed.

As I went by the car, I got a flash of Linsey with his head up peeping, but he pulled in his neck when he saw I was doing all right.

I hit the road and ran along it to the edge of the clearing but I did not hear any bullets following me, so I had a look back, and I was just in time to see the Dust People folding up their house. Linsey was right there but he did not see it, having his head down, or he could have saved himself a lot of trouble as I will explain; you will laugh when I come to that.

The two ladies that I brought in my car were unhooking the front of the house and taking it down. It was only painted canvas with a window in it and a door hanging on it; the old lady with the shrunk leg was a good worker; she went like a spider.

What was left when they took the front down looked to me like a big truck with the back door standing open, except I did not see any wheels. Then somebody—the first young lady I met, I guess—drove my car up into the house or truck, and they closed the back door on it.

IT WAS a truck all right. It began to race and roar, and moved toward the hill and came backing out over the dust; a big truck, a motor van. The big room I thought I saw through the window was the inside of the van, and the part of the front that had the door on it had nothing behind it but the back door of the van. I went off the road among the pine and the truck went by at forty miles for the highway, and I came out and hiked after it, wishing Linsey luck.

I was almost up to 17 again when I thought of the bird with the knife that I left in the dust. He mightn't be dead. Well, if it was me I'd go back and shovel on a little more, the way I felt about him, but you know what a jury is, even a coroner's jury. One of them thinks he was rooked once by an insurance company, or there's a reporter listening in. So I turned around and hiked back and looked for the spot but it was dark now and one place looked like another. I gave it up for a bad job and felt my way back on that black woods road to the highway.

It was quite a hike to some place where I could talk to the state police, as cars weren't picking up pedestrians. The police sent for me and rode me to the nearest barracks.

We would not want to do anything more that night as it might interfere with Linsey, who was in a fair way of finding out what happened to cars grabbed by the Dust People, if nothing happened to him, so I found a bed in the police barracks. And who should be sitting on the foot of my bed when I woke up with daylight but Mr. Linsey.

He was a tough man, a Carolina mountain boy and old revenuer, and he was fresh after being up all night. "Got them, Mac!"

"Where?" I said.

"In North Augsburg, half across the state," he says, fetching my clothes to help me get up. "A garage there was the drop for the cars the Dust People ran off. I got the little crippled woman and the two young ones and the garage-man that was buying the cars off them, and they were some surprised when I popped out of your car. Do you know how they moved your car, Mac? They rode it on a big truck!"

NOW comes the laugh. "Jump in your pants quick, Mac," he said, "and let's get back to that house in the woods, and see what we can get there!"

"What house, Linsey?" I said. And I laughed; it was one on him. He had rushed all the way back from North Augsburg to raid the Dust People's house. Because he did not see the house fold up and he did not know it was only the motor truck, so he leaves it in North Augsburg and races half across the state to look for it. A smart man like him. When I stopped laughing I asked him if he didn't see a door and window on the truck and he said there was something under canvas but he didn't look.

The Dust People were a family named Sawney, a family of road tramps. We found old man Sawney in the pit with my two bullets in him. The district attorney put the heat on the North Augsburg man to tell what he knew about the Sawneys. Well, he didn't know much, or he wouldn't be phoning in to the police to say a finance company was grabbing the cars; but the D. A. didn't need much, as there were belongings of the eight missing persons on the Sawney truck. The last I heard of the ladies they were being looked over to see if they were wacky.

It was a nice thing for Linsey and he got all kinds of credit and he is a lieutenant in the state constabulary now; and I got kind words too, but it was not all milk and honey, not all credit. You see, there was the matter of losing that first car.

It was not my fault but after I put in for my theft-insurance money my chief wrote me from New York that the insurance people were doing quite some complaining about sending an investigator to check on claims for stolen cars, and the first car they really got to pay for and no getting out of it is the investigator's.

So I asked Linsey about that car I lost the first time.

"Nice work, old-timer!" I said to Linsey that morning after I was done laughing at him for coming back to look for the house. "Drove my new car back, I suppose, did you? But say, what about the car I lost the first time? Did you get a line on that? Some people in New York are bringing the matter up."

"No, Mac," he said, "I did not get a line on that first car you lost. And no, I came in a police car and did not drive your car here. While I was covering the North Augsburg garageman and the Dust People last night, one of his helpers jumped in your car and went off—but you got insurance on it, I reckon. Put a claim in on that one too."

"WE KNOW OUR PENCILS!"

"You bet we do. They're Ticonderoga Pencils—44% easier to write with than wasteful, inferior brands."

"Our Purchasing Dept. figured we are paid to work quickly and efficiently. So we switched to Ticonderoga pencils."

The Tested Labor-Saving Pencil
DIXON TICONDEROGA
An extraordinary 5¢ pencil—get quantity quotations from your dealer.
JOSEPH DIXON CRUCIBLE CO., Dept. 52-37, Jersey City, N. J.
*PROVEN BY INDEPENDENT SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH. Copyright Joseph Dixon Crucible Co. 1940

Yes!
Here's How To Treat DANDRUFF!

—the medicinal way—Glover's Mange Medicine and massage. Also helps check excessive Falling Hair, relieve Itching Scalp. Results will delight you! Ask your Barber—he KNOWS! Shampoo with Glover's Medicated Soap.

GLOVER'S MANGE MEDICINE

Extra Wear
for MEN WOMEN and CHILDREN

BILTRITE

WILL NOT SLIP HEELS and Cord-on-End SOLES

Get the BEST - insist on BILTRITE

Give Us Machines and Men

THE thoroughgoing Burke-Wadsworth proposals for selective compulsory military training look to us like the best scheme advanced for the quick rounding out of the country's defense effort.

You know the general outlines of the Registration of our approximately 40 million men between ages 18 and 65 . . . the scheme between 21 and 45 to be subject to eight months of military training on call . . . the other 18 million to be available for home-guard work . . . selection to be made by local boards as in World War I days . . . the country's business, professional and artistic life to be disrupted as little as possible in the actual calling of men to arms.

This scheme looks far better to us than the assorted vague plans for noncombatant military training, whatever that may mean. We hope it will win out over an even more dangerous fallacy that is in circulation: the belief that war machines are more important than trained fighting men, and that we can safely go easy on training men if we can round up enough bombing and fighting planes, heavy tanks, big coast guns, anti-aircraft guns, battleships, dirigibles.

The fact is that both war machines and fighting men are essential in modern warfare. Many, for example, had both, in the 39-day Battle of France which ended in a disaster. The Maginot Line was essentially a huge, stationary war machine which it was hoped would save France a lot of the expense of training a lot of fighting men.

Another fact is that we are seriously under-equipped with trained fighters. At this time, for example, our populous and rich First Corps Area (Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island and part of Long Island) is guarded by only 5,131 Regular Army officers and men. Another example, our 600,000-sq.-mi. Territory of Alaska, off whose island nose we are settling colonists in numbers such as even the local Eskimos, has 363 Regular Army officers and men—though, to be sure, we are now strengthening our manpower defenses at the Anchorage, Alaska, air base.

It all boils down to this: That we cannot defend ourselves by the naked magic of modern machinery any more than by the naked men unequipped or underequipped with the best modern war machinery. We've got to have both, and plenty of both.

We'd better just go ahead with a comprehensive system of compulsory military training, and be done with our qualms and squeasiness on the subject. This will be a single piece of insurance we know of, and any of our men ever having to fight for this nation's own choosing.

IF GERMANY WINS

AS THE world spins on through the piratical, Napoleonic period to which Mr. Hitler has brought it, let's renew our determination just about every morning to hang on to our democracy. Let's revamp our democracy only as much as we absolutely must to keep it working.

We've lived as a nation through such periods before, when we were far weaker than we are now. We did it by insisting on living under the democratic system which most of us believed and still believe to be the best system yet invented. At the same time, we recognized other nations' right to live under whatever systems they prefer, so long as they don't step on our toes.

We believe the United States can still carry on along that line even if Germany wins this war—which Germany may do. We can't string along with those who think a German victory will send us into a nose dive.

Specifically, we can't see how the United States will have to go partially or wholly Fascist even if a German victory turns all Europe Fascist.

In such a case our best bet, it seems to us, will be to try to get along as a nation just as successful persons get along in the world as persons.

The successful person takes the world as he finds it, from year to year, with a calm and cheerful determination to live in that world and enjoy his reasonable share of its goods and pleasures.

He does what he can to improve the world. But he never forgets that if he doesn't survive and keep building up his own influence he can be of no use to himself, his family or his fellow men.

We believe the democratic system is most productive and most efficient in serving the wants and fulfilling the aspirations of the largest number. We believe more people are happier under the democratic system than under any scheme of government yet devised.

We believe that the dictatorship of Hitler has no better prospect of surviving than had the one-man rule of Napoleon. We managed to live without abandoning our principles while Napoleon ruled. If we are alert we shall be able to survive without any surrender during the dark period within which Europe bows under the savage ideas of Hitler.

But neither democracy nor any other system can be sustained by weakness, indolence or a lack of discipline. We sing of America as the land of the free and the home of the brave. Let's not forget the last word. We can be free regardless of what occurs in Europe if we are hardy enough to maintain our freedom.

Collier's

5¢ A COPY

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY

August 3, 1940

THE PATRIOTIC MURDERS
NEW NOVEL
BY AGATHA CHRISTIE

DWELL-COLLIER PUBLISHING COMPANY
PUBLISHERS OF COLLIER'S—THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE—WOMAN'S HOME COMPANION

1/2

8

1

21940X

PUB. LIBR.
BURLINGAME
CALIF.

"Boys through t our new

LISTERINE

BEFORE BUSINESS AND SOCIAL ENGAGEMENTS

WILLIAM L. CHENERY Editor
CHARLES COLEBAUGH Managing Editor
THOMAS H. BECK Editorial Director

WALTER DAVENPORT
AIMEE LARKIN
QUENTIN REYNOLDS
KYLE CRICHTON Screen and Theater
KENNETH LITTAUER
JAMES N. YOUNG
MAX WILKINSON

Politics
Distaff
Sports
Fiction
Fiction

WM. O. CHESSMAN
HENRY L. JACKSON
GURNEY WILLIAMS
DENVER LINDLEY
FRANK D. MORRIS
IFOR THOMAS
CLARENCE H. ROY

Art
Fine Feathers
Humor
Articles
Articles
Photographs
Syntax

W. B. COURTNEY
FRANK GERVASI
MARTHA GELLHORN
JIM MARSHALL
WM. HILLMAN
ROBERT McCORMICK
JOHN T. FLYNN

THIS WEEK

AUGUST 3, 1940

SHORT STORIES

WILLIAM MacHARG

The Girl Talks. And Detective O'Malley listens, with surprising results. Page 13

DONALD HOUGH

A Man Takes His Vacation. Hubert was a hero—off of a horse. Page 14

HARRY SYLVESTER

Fog on the Bay. And behind it, a terrifying drama. Page 20

EDWIN LANHAM

The Devil Beats His Wife. A kindly man leaves a legacy. Page 23

THE SHORT SHORT STORY

Night Work, by Meyer Levin. Page 16

SERIAL STORIES

AGATHA CHRISTIE

The Patriotic Murders. The first of nine parts. And here's Hercule Poirot again. Page 9

WILLIAM C. WHITE

Occupation: Widow. The fifth of nine parts. Carola gets a new job. Page 18

ARTICLES

QUENTIN REYNOLDS

Inside Job. What the fifth column did to France. Page 11

FRANK J. TAYLOR

All Ready to Eat. Picnics in a really grand manner. Page 12

HERBERT RAVENEL SASS

White Dawn in Oregon. And blood on the settlements. Page 17

BOB CONSIDINE

Ivory from Cuba. Our underprivileged baseball players. Page 19

C. M. BLACK

He Serves Up America. Pare Lorentz, picturemaker. Page 22

FRELING FOSTER

Keep Up with the World Page 6

EDITORIALS

Lay Off the Italians.

What Broke France?

T. B. is on the Run, But— Page 54

COVER

ROBERT O. REID

ANY WEEK

IF YOU insist on reading a parable into this report from Mr. S. Dillon Ripley, the relentless aviculturist and escapist, there's nothing we can do about it. However, we hastened to do so, being somewhat low in the mind as the result of the floods of political oratory that have flowed over us lately. From his farm in Litchfield, Connecticut, Mr. Ripley writes that his favorite wood duck has been hopefully sitting on a setting (or whatever it is with wood ducks) of seven eggs. A wood duck must sit on eggs twenty-eight days if her object is more wood ducks. So she sat there twenty-seven of the twenty-eight when suddenly one of the eggs exploded. Mr. Ripley, hovering near by encouraging the creature in the final hours of her devotions, says that the odor emanating from the overwrought egg was memorable. The wood duck arose unsteadily, managed to make a near-by tree from where she eyed the remaining eggs with angry suspicion. And then came the part that seems to us to carry a nice broad political hint. Her head cleared, the wood duck flew back to the nest and proceeded to kick therefrom the remaining six eggs. Mr. Ripley seems to think this remarkable. We don't. We think that the honest creature had read all about what the Republicans had prescribed as being necessary in Washington if this country is to continue to be a country and that she was merely setting a good example for them—which nobody, including the Republicans, has any intention of emulating.

WE'VE been visited by a gentleman from Helena, Montana—Mr. Charles Wesley Grabbock. Mr. Grabbock too had been taking the convention oratory on the chin. But he's a practical fellow, thinking of taxes and similar catastrophes. "Understand," said Mr. Grabbock, "I'm practically rabid about free speech—in favor of it. But this country needs dough for bombs and similar entertainment for visiting totalitarian firemen. Therefore, why not impose a microphone tax upon political orators this fall. Let's not weasel. Say five cents for every word of ballyhoo entering the mike. And just to encourage the boys to spend, let's show listener patriotism by writing them fan letters exhorting them to louder and longer speeches. There'd be a lot of battleships in it, my friend."

RAMBLING around as we do, we hear a great many things that don't help much. But every now and then we pick up a grain of comfort. For example, we've been talking to a gentleman, part of whose job it is to play poker with legislators and be careful to lose. Sometimes he finds losing a far from simple matter especially when he's holding a full house against two pairs in the hand of a lawmaker whose vote this gentleman's employer needs. We got somewhat stuffy about it, telling him that it was a pretty commentary on Democracy. "Don't be silly," said he properly enough. "If we had one of these Fascist setups we'd lose our dough without sitting in and get nothing for it."

AND WE are trying hard to understand the panic of Mrs. Lulu H. Truance of Buffalo, New York, although it's asking a lot. Mrs. Truance says that she awoke "trembling all over" and that it was noon before she had recovered her composure. "I dreamed that I had been invited to the wedding of Miss Dorothy Thompson and Walter Winchell. It was to be broadcast—responses and all—with Father Coughlin performing the ceremony. But it wasn't that, terrific as it would be, that frightened me. I found myself thinking of the ensuing children."

IN A recent editorial we let go with this: "This is a hot spot we're on. But we've been on hotter ones in our time as a nation, and we've always worked off them." Our editorial writer was speaking of Europe's war and the kettle of fish the United States is floundering in as a result. Mr. James Lowell of Houston, Texas, read that sentiment several times, thought that it sounded familiar, and then wrote us a very few pointed words, to wit: "All you guys need to go with that," says he, "is an umbrella."

ANOTHER warlike note was detected in Hollywood, California, by one of our more reliable agents. Mr. W. C. Fields who, as far as we're concerned, is the greatest comedian in the world, was discussing universal military service with his director, Mr. Eddie Cline. Both Mr. Fields and Mr. Cline were as one in favor of it, Mr. Fields waxing so enthusiastic that he said that it didn't go far enough, that it ought to be compulsory. Mr. Cline declared that he'd lose no time in recruiting a regiment of fat men, training them to fight sidewise. Mr. Fields' enthusiasm became almost unbridled, volunteering at once and dragging in Andy Devine, weight 255. Whereat the question of a proper drill grounds was raised but soon disposed of by Mr. Fields who offered the spacious lawns around his home. These lawns are bordered and otherwise made beautiful by huge trees closely spaced and grouped. But Mr. Cline doubted there'd be room for the trees too and said there was to do but cut them down. "We'll cut them down," roared Mr. Fields. "Where would we practice hi-

AND ALL this talk of universal training and service, with his approval, lacks "at least an element" in the mind of Mr. B. Vansleeve of Jacksonville, Fla. "The harshness of unrelieved life," thinks he, "tends to make men go into battle shoulder to shoulder, under their beloved banners, their bugles and drums, their souls, with songs on their lips. This is the American way. Let our congressmen and the gallies of our Army to write into the law an hour a day be devoted by our drier sons to mass singing. Our let their mass songs, a million be broadcast to the mother, wives, children and sweethearts of land. Thus we who must bore home will know that there is but a song, in the hearts of our

THERE ARE still optimists there. For example, Mr. W. B. of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, h. dollars he'd like to bet with that America will still be functioning customary happy-go-lucky no matter what happens. E. or who wins the election is. Faced with a vast array of sn. candidates to choose from, M. B. proposes to vote for them according to their wealth and not their principles. If a guy's safe, he says he, he is apt to give the better break than he who "s. his time trying to legislate. roll out of existence and the trying to get it into his own. But either way," concludes Mr. jers, "this country will go rolling sometimes in the wrong direction sometimes in the right but the guy who gets in the way."

AND IF that isn't enough to busy, you might work on this tossed this way by Mr. Quir. of Richmond, Virginia. "Is reason," he asks, "why something what happens here is so damned necessary?"

WHEN?

Vol. 106, No. 5. Entered as second-class matter at Post Office, Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A., under Act of March 3, 1879, and at Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, Springfield, Ohio. Publishers of Woman's Home Companion, The American Magazine, Collier's. Copyright, 1940, The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company, in the United States, Canada and Great Britain. Executive and Editorial Offices: 250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.; 6 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London. Published weekly at Springfield, Ohio, U. S. A. Joseph P. Knapp, Chairman of the Board; Thomas H. Beck, President; Albert E. Winger, Executive Vice President and Treasurer; Gertrude B. Lane, Vice President; John S. Brehm, Vice President; William P. Larkin, Vice President; J. A. Welch, Vice President; Denis O'Sullivan, Secretary. Manuscripts or art submitted to Collier's, The National Weekly, should be accompanied by addressed envelopes and sufficient postage for their return. The Publisher assumes no responsibility for return of unsolicited manuscripts or art. Price, 5 cents a copy in the U. S. A., $2.00 a year, $3.50 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $4.00 a year, $7.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $4.50 a year, $8.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $5.00 a year, $9.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $5.50 a year, $10.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $6.00 a year, $11.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $6.50 a year, $12.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $7.00 a year, $13.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $7.50 a year, $14.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $8.00 a year, $15.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $8.50 a year, $16.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $9.00 a year, $17.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $9.50 a year, $18.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $10.00 a year, $19.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $10.50 a year, $20.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $11.00 a year, $21.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $11.50 a year, $22.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $12.00 a year, $23.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $12.50 a year, $24.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $13.00 a year, $25.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $13.50 a year, $26.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $14.00 a year, $27.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $14.50 a year, $28.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $15.00 a year, $29.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $15.50 a year, $30.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $16.00 a year, $31.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $16.50 a year, $32.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $17.00 a year, $33.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $17.50 a year, $34.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $18.00 a year, $35.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $18.50 a year, $36.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $19.00 a year, $37.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $19.50 a year, $38.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $20.00 a year, $39.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $20.50 a year, $40.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $21.00 a year, $41.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $21.50 a year, $42.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $22.00 a year, $43.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $22.50 a year, $44.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $23.00 a year, $45.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $23.50 a year, $46.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $24.00 a year, $47.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $24.50 a year, $48.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $25.00 a year, $49.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $25.50 a year, $50.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $26.00 a year, $51.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $26.50 a year, $52.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $27.00 a year, $53.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $27.50 a year, $54.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $28.00 a year, $55.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $28.50 a year, $56.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $29.00 a year, $57.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $29.50 a year, $58.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $30.00 a year, $59.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $30.50 a year, $60.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $31.00 a year, $61.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $31.50 a year, $62.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $32.00 a year, $63.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $32.50 a year, $64.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $33.00 a year, $65.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $33.50 a year, $66.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $34.00 a year, $67.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $34.50 a year, $68.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $35.00 a year, $69.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $35.50 a year, $70.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $36.00 a year, $71.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $36.50 a year, $72.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $37.00 a year, $73.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $37.50 a year, $74.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $38.00 a year, $75.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $38.50 a year, $76.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $39.00 a year, $77.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $39.50 a year, $78.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $40.00 a year, $79.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $40.50 a year, $80.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $41.00 a year, $81.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $41.50 a year, $82.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $42.00 a year, $83.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $42.50 a year, $84.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $43.00 a year, $85.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $43.50 a year, $86.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $44.00 a year, $87.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $44.50 a year, $88.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $45.00 a year, $89.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $45.50 a year, $90.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $46.00 a year, $91.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $46.50 a year, $92.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $47.00 a year, $93.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $47.50 a year, $94.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $48.00 a year, $95.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $48.50 a year, $96.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $49.00 a year, $97.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $49.50 a year, $98.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $50.00 a year, $99.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $50.50 a year, $100.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $51.00 a year, $101.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $51.50 a year, $102.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $52.00 a year, $103.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $52.50 a year, $104.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $53.00 a year, $105.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $53.50 a year, $106.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $54.00 a year, $107.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $54.50 a year, $108.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $55.00 a year, $109.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $55.50 a year, $110.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $56.00 a year, $111.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $56.50 a year, $112.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $57.00 a year, $113.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $57.50 a year, $114.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $58.00 a year, $115.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $58.50 a year, $116.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $59.00 a year, $117.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $59.50 a year, $118.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $60.00 a year, $119.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $60.50 a year, $120.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $61.00 a year, $121.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $61.50 a year, $122.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $62.00 a year, $123.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $62.50 a year, $124.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $63.00 a year, $125.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $63.50 a year, $126.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $64.00 a year, $127.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $64.50 a year, $128.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $65.00 a year, $129.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $65.50 a year, $130.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $66.00 a year, $131.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $66.50 a year, $132.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $67.00 a year, $133.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $67.50 a year, $134.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $68.00 a year, $135.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $68.50 a year, $136.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $69.00 a year, $137.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $69.50 a year, $138.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $70.00 a year, $139.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $70.50 a year, $140.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $71.00 a year, $141.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $71.50 a year, $142.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $72.00 a year, $143.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $72.50 a year, $144.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $73.00 a year, $145.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $73.50 a year, $146.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $74.00 a year, $147.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $74.50 a year, $148.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $75.00 a year, $149.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $75.50 a year, $150.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $76.00 a year, $151.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $76.50 a year, $152.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $77.00 a year, $153.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $77.50 a year, $154.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $78.00 a year, $155.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $78.50 a year, $156.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $79.00 a year, $157.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $79.50 a year, $158.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $80.00 a year, $159.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $80.50 a year, $160.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $81.00 a year, $161.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $81.50 a year, $162.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $82.00 a year, $163.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $82.50 a year, $164.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $83.00 a year, $165.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $83.50 a year, $166.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $84.00 a year, $167.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $84.50 a year, $168.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $85.00 a year, $169.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $85.50 a year, $170.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $86.00 a year, $171.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $86.50 a year, $172.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $87.00 a year, $173.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $87.50 a year, $174.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $88.00 a year, $175.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $88.50 a year, $176.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $89.00 a year, $177.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $89.50 a year, $178.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $90.00 a year, $179.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $90.50 a year, $180.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $91.00 a year, $181.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $91.50 a year, $182.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $92.00 a year, $183.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $92.50 a year, $184.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $93.00 a year, $185.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $93.50 a year, $186.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $94.00 a year, $187.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $94.50 a year, $188.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $95.00 a year, $189.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $95.50 a year, $190.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $96.00 a year, $191.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $96.50 a year, $192.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $97.00 a year, $193.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $97.50 a year, $194.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $98.00 a year, $195.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $98.50 a year, $196.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $99.00 a year, $197.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $99.50 a year, $198.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $100.00 a year, $199.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $100.50 a year, $200.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $101.00 a year, $201.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $101.50 a year, $202.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $102.00 a year, $203.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $102.50 a year, $204.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $103.00 a year, $205.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $103.50 a year, $206.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $104.00 a year, $207.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $104.50 a year, $208.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $105.00 a year, $209.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $105.50 a year, $210.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $106.00 a year, $211.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $106.50 a year, $212.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $107.00 a year, $213.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $107.50 a year, $214.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $108.00 a year, $215.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $108.50 a year, $216.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $109.00 a year, $217.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $109.50 a year, $218.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $110.00 a year, $219.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $110.50 a year, $220.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $111.00 a year, $221.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $111.50 a year, $222.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $112.00 a year, $223.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $112.50 a year, $224.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $113.00 a year, $225.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $113.50 a year, $226.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $114.00 a year, $227.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $114.50 a year, $228.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $115.00 a year, $229.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $115.50 a year, $230.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $116.00 a year, $231.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $116.50 a year, $232.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $117.00 a year, $233.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $117.50 a year, $234.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $118.00 a year, $235.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $118.50 a year, $236.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $119.00 a year, $237.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $119.50 a year, $238.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $120.00 a year, $239.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $120.50 a year, $240.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $121.00 a year, $241.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $121.50 a year, $242.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $122.00 a year, $243.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $122.50 a year, $244.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $123.00 a year, $245.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $123.50 a year, $246.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $124.00 a year, $247.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $124.50 a year, $248.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $125.00 a year, $249.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $125.50 a year, $250.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $126.00 a year, $251.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $126.50 a year, $252.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $127.00 a year, $253.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $127.50 a year, $254.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $128.00 a year, $255.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $128.50 a year, $256.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $129.00 a year, $257.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $129.50 a year, $258.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $130.00 a year, $259.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $130.50 a year, $260.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $131.00 a year, $261.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $131.50 a year, $262.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $132.00 a year, $263.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $132.50 a year, $264.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $133.00 a year, $265.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $133.50 a year, $266.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $134.00 a year, $267.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $134.50 a year, $268.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $135.00 a year, $269.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $135.50 a year, $270.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $136.00 a year, $271.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $136.50 a year, $272.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $137.00 a year, $273.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $137.50 a year, $274.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $138.00 a year, $275.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $138.50 a year, $276.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $139.00 a year, $277.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $139.50 a year, $278.00 for two years, in the United States and Possessions, $140.00

Montauk Light...Take your Bearings!"

Six hours to Fire Island
p . . . two more to Ambrose . . .
Work by daybreak. . .

NIGHT on black water, but up and the coast there is shipping as usual.
ently they move through the darkchooners, tramps and luxury liners ning on schedule—because the light-throws its faithful, friendly beam far sea.

your bearings from the light!

on the dark waters of tire-buying,
prices are almost as many and as uns the waves of the sea, where you can t in a fog of misinformation, where ay head for a bargain and find your-the rocks, you need a guiding light.
here it is!

re you buy tires, find out who them, how long they have been g tires, how many tires they have and how those tires have performed
ice. Find out what their production facilities are for making quality tires to sell at low prices.

The experience gained in making more than 300 million tires now brings you a complete line of Goodyear Tires—for every driving requirement—at low prices. For example, Goodyear's Great "G-3" All-Weather Tire, road-proved favorite of millions, is now made better—and is surprisingly low in price—in all popular sizes. And you get the same values in all Goodyear Tires.

You can't pay less than Goodyear's low prices and get the same safety and the same service—and you don't need to pay more!

*Today, as for 25 years, it is still true:
More people ride on Goodyear Tires than on any other kind. Are you one of them?
Ask your nearby Goodyear Dealer about his "90-10" Offer and his Easy-Pay Plan.*

THE GREATEST NAME IN RUBBER
GOODYEAR
"ALL-WEATHER"—T.M. THE GOODYEAR TIRE & RUBBER CO.

Goodyear's "All-Weather" Tread — Proved for Driving Safety — Under
All Conditions — By More People —
Over More Miles — Than Any Other.

GOODYEAR TIRES

Always as good as you think.
Now cost less than you imagine.

GO TO THE MAN WHO KNOWS SHOES BEST...
Your Florsheim Dealer

Shoes are more than foot coverings; they require the knowledge and skill of an expert fitter. That's why we say go to your FLORSHEIM DEALER, the man who knows shoes best. He has made a lifetime study of foot needs, and knows that FLORSHEIM SHOES are designed and built to give you perfect satisfaction. Visit your FLORSHEIM DEALER; his kind of service goes hand-in-hand with Florsheim quality.

THE NEW FALL FLORSHEIMS ARE ON DISPLAY!

Your Florsheim dealer is now showing the finest Florsheim styles in our history—new Fall browns; mellow hand-stained finishes; leathers, lasts and patterns exclusive from tip to top-lift. Whether you're a campus-bound Freshman or a class of '24—Florsheim has designed the shoe for you this season.

Most Styles

$8<sup>95</sup> and $10

The GARFIELD

The DEARBORN

THE Florsheim SHOE

The Florsheim Shoe Company, Mfrs., Chicago • Makers of Fine Shoes for Men and Women

KEEP UP WITH THE WORLD

By Freling Foster

More than 2,500 of America's 12,000 race horses are handicapped by defective vision, usually near-sightedness in varying degrees in each eye, which not only produces a tendency to run to one side but also causes undue nervousness. Often these defects can be corrected, if the animal is under a year old.—By Dr. Ernest E. Emons, Miami, Florida.

If the present production rate of copper is continued, more of this metal will be mined and smelted in the next six years than was produced in the entire history of the world before 1900.—By T. B. Jefferson, Kansas City, Missouri.

Racing shells in intercollegiate regattas cost as much as $1,200 and are rarely used by a varsity crew for more than one season. After this short service, they are passed on to other crews in the college.

The only bottles of Scotch whisky whose labels carry the age of the product are those imported into the United States. Most exporters include this information because it reduces the duty imposed on liquor thus guaranteed to be four or more years old.

By installing a new bandit-barrier system in its banking department, the Illinois state treasury in Springfield has reduced the annual cost of its holdup insurance from $10,000 to $6,000.

The world's first dental college, dental society and dental journal were founded in the United States one hundred years ago and we have since led all other nations in the quantity and quality of dental work. Yet not more than a quarter of our people visit a dentist regularly.

Expert restorers of oil paintings sometimes transfer a famous picture from its rotting canvas or boards to a new canvas. In this delicate operation, a strong paper or muslin adhesive, pasted over the front, holds the paint while the old backing is removed and the new one put in place.

When Panama seceded from Colombia in 1903 and became an independent republic, it "moved" from one continent to another. Subsequent maps showed the border between North and South America at the eastern end of Panama instead of the western, which Panama in Central America is the extreme southern part of the American continent.

Only five times in its history the United States government has formally declared war on foreign countries—on England in 1812, Mexico in 1846, Spain in 1898 and Germany and Austria in 1917.

In New York State, a man has been illegally detained in prison and may sue those responsible for his detention. Not long ago, a convict was awarded a $7,500 verdict against two former members of the parole board who kept him in prison three years after a writ of habeas corpus for his release had been signed.

The albatross, largest of the birds, sometimes attains a wingspread of seventeen feet and is so powerfully built that it often stays for days without alighting. At other times, the bird so gorges itself on food and becomes so "overweight" that it cannot lift its weight into the air.

When a bottle of wine is corked and its cork, therefore, is likely to crumble and drop into the liquid, connoisseurs and wine snobs have been known to remove the neck of the bottle, below the cork, by cutting through it with a pair of red-hot tongs.

Human skin is sometimes so sensitive that it becomes painfully inflamed upon exposure to cold. People so afflicted must remain in darkened rooms and remain there until nightfall.

Five dollars will be paid for each item or unusual fact accepted for this column. Contributions must be accompanied by a factory proof. Address Keep Up With the World, Collier's, 250 Park Avenue, New York City. This column is copyrighted by The National Weekly. None of the material may be reproduced without express permission of the publisher.

INSULATION

IS AN OLD STORY FOR SUN-BONNETS

... BUT

IT'S A NEW ONE FOR MOTOR OIL

For generations the sun-bonnet has insulated many a pretty face against the hot rays of the sun.

Today Texaco engineers have insulated Havoline Motor Oil to withstand the heat of the modern precision-built faster running engine—heat that causes ordinary oils to break down and form harmful varnish.

And there's another reason why your car needs Insulated Havoline Motor Oil. Havoline is distilled. Harmful carbon and sludge-forming impurities are removed, keeps your engine clean and running smoother.

For safety, economy and sweeter performance, change to Insulated Havoline today. No finer oil at any price. At all Texaco and other good dealers everywhere.

TEXACO DEALERS INVITE YOU TO tune in the TEXACO STAR THEATRE—Starring Kenny Baker and Frances Langford—Every Wednesday Night—Columbia Network—9:00 E.D.T., 8:00 E.S.T., 8:00 C.D.T., 7:00 C.S.T., 6:00 M.S.T., 5:00 P.S.T.

DISTILLED AND INSULATED
... AGAINST HEAT... AGAINST COLD

PHILCO

GIVES YOU A

NEW KIND OF REFRIGERATOR

that has every service you need for purity, freshness, flavor and healthful preservation of your foods

You have a separate space for frozen storage in this giant-size FROZEN FOOD COMPARTMENT . . . a huge, spacious chamber in addition to the over-size ice cube chamber. Plenty of room for packaged Frozen Foods, for ice cream, for delicious frozen desserts to delight your family and friends—for all modern frozen storage uses.

Your perishable foods, like milk, butter, bacon, berries are safe in this DRY COLD COMPARTMENT. These foods and many others must have cold of low moisture content to preserve their purity. That's why Philco gives you this separate, complete Dry Cold compartment.

You don't need covers to keep foods fresh and wholesome for long periods in this MOIST COLD COMPARTMENT. The newly-invented Philco refrigerated Freshener Shelf cools foods by direct contact, preserves the taste, color and juices of cooked and uncooked foods . . . without the bother of covers.

The foods you use most often are at your finger tips in this shelf-lined door, the CONSERVADOR. No shelves, no crowding in front, no areas in back. Keeps cold air in and air out of main compartment . . . down electric bills.

LOOK at this amazing new kind of refrigerator, created by Philco! A sensationally different refrigerator, unlike any you have ever seen. It gives you every feature you need to preserve the purity, freshness, taste and healthful condition of foods. It brings you brand-new services, conveniences and economies you have never enjoyed before . . . and cannot enjoy today in any other refrigerator.

You need a new kind of refrigerator to keep pace with your new kitchen ways. Not a refrigerator that is merely "last year's" old ideas made over to look new, but one designed from the ground up to meet modern kitchen demands.

You buy new kinds of foods today and you prepare them in more tempting, delicious ways. More and more, you save through quantity buying. Often you buy foods in new form, like packaged frozen foods. These new foods of today create new needs that only a new kind of refrigerator can fill.

That's why Philco invented this Advanced Design refrigerator that brings you new and better ways to store and preserve all kinds of foods, fresh, frozen or cooked, in all their original purity, flavor and wholesomeness . . . and in any quantities you require. And it serves you more completely than any refrigerator has ever attempted before. Remember . . . with its new ideas, new conveniences and economies new Advanced Design, a Philco Refrigerator costs you no more than one of ordinary design.

See your Philco dealer today and invest in the 14 new gleaming models. Among you'll find just the one to suit your pocket and purse.

From $119.95 to $257.50

F. O. B. FACTORY

INCLUDING FIVE-YEAR PROTECTION
YOURS ON EASIEST MONTHLY TERMS

Only the PHILCO Refrigerator HAS THE CONSERVADOR plus DRY, MOIST AND FROZEN FOOD COMPARTMENTS

"I simply cannot believe it!" she said. "It seems quite incredible that he should do such a thing"

MARIO COOPER

The Patriotic Murders

By Agatha Christie

Hercule Poirot begins investigation of a mystery that has no meaning—until a succession of murders reveals its close connection with the story of our times

MR. MORLEY was not in the best of tempers at breakfast.

He complained of the bacon; there was no need, he said, even if it was rationed, that it should be unfit to eat. He demanded acidly if it was necessary for the coffee to have the appearance of liquid mud, and added that if this was butter he'd rather eat margarine and have done with it!

Mr. Morley was a small man with a decided jaw and a pugnacious chin. His sister, who kept house for him, was a large woman rather like a female grenadier.

She eyed her brother thoughtfully and asked whether the bath water had been cold again.

Rather grudgingly, Mr. Morley said it had not.

He glanced at the paper and remarked that as usual there was no news. What we ought to have done was to have bombed Berlin right away at the very start of the war.

Miss Morley, who spent much of her life listening to one person or another laying down the law on "what we ought to have done," murmured soothingly: "I expect they know best, dear."

"Nonsense," said Mr. Morley who, like many small men, was bloodthirsty in speech and kindly in action. "We're soft, that's what it is. All these leaflets they drop. High explosive and incendiary bombs—that's what they need."

Miss Morley's parrot hereupon took occasion to remark conversationally: "That old man Hitler is a nasty man!"

"Who taught the bird that?" demanded Mr. Morley.

"Cook, I think."

"It's an understatement," said Mr. Morley.

He returned to the paper, expressed admiration of the Norwegians, sympathy for the Finns, distrust of the Russians, approval of the Turks, said that that fellow Mussolini was no good at all, and finally got down with gusto to explaining exactly just what sort of a government of supermen was needed.

Miss Morley agreed with him in a deep bass voice. As a mere woman she

Mr. Morley peered critically into his patient's mouth. "Well, I think that seems all right," he said had always found the iniquities of whatever government happened to be in power at the moment distinctly useful. It enabled male bad temper to blow off steam.

When Mr. Morley had explained exactly why everything this government did was wrong, he had a second cup of the despised coffee and unburdened himself of his true grievance.

"These girls," he said, "are all the same! Unreliable, self-centered—not to be depended on in any way."

Miss Morley said interrogatively: "Gladys?"

"I've just had the message. Her aunt's had a stroke and she's had to go down to Somerset."

"Very trying, dear, but after all, hardly the girl's fault."

Mr. Morley shook his head gloomily.

"How do I know the aunt has had a stroke? How do I know the whole thing hasn't been arranged between the girl and that very unsuitable young fellow she goes about with? That young man is a wrong un if I ever saw one! Ought to be in the army instead of loafing about! They've probably planned some outing together for today."

"OH, NO, dear, I don't think Gladys would do a thing like that. You know, you've always said she was very conscientious."

"Yes, yes, Georgina, but that was before this undesirable young man came along. She's been quite different lately—quite different—absent-minded—upset—nervous."

The grenadier produced a deep sigh. She said, "After all, Henry, girls do fall in love. It can't really be helped."

Mr. Morley snapped: "She oughtn't to let it affect her efficiency as my secretary. And today, in particular, I'm extremely busy! Several very important patients. It is most trying!"

"I'm sure it must be extremely vexing, Henry. How is this new boy shaping, by the way?"

Henry Morley said gloomily:

"He's the worst I've had yet! Can't get a single name right and has the most uncouth manners. However, if he doesn't improve I shall sack him and try again."

He glanced at his watch.

"I must be getting along. A full morning, and that Sainsbury Seale woman to fit in somewhere as she is in pain. I suggested that she should see Reilly, but she wouldn't hear of it."

"Of course not," said George Reilly loyally.

"Reilly's very able—very able indeed. First-class diplomas. Thoroughly date in his work."

"His hand shakes," said Miss Morley. "In my opinion he drinks."

Her brother laughed, his good temper restored. He said: "I'll be up at half-past one as usual."

AT THE Savoy Hotel Mr. Amberiotis was picking his teeth with a toothpick and grinning to himself.

Everything was going very nicely. Those government contracts, for instance; always some nice pickings to be had in wartime. And then that business. Fancy those few kind words of his to that idiotic hen of a woman being so richly repaid. Oh! well—your bread upon the waters. He was always been a kindhearted man. He was generous! In the future he would be even more generous. Benevolent visions floated before his eyes. Dimitri. . . . And the good Constantinopolous struggling with his little restaurant. . . . What pleasant surprises for them. . . .

The toothpick probed unguaranteed, and Mr. Amberiotis winced. Rosy visions of the future faded and gave way to apprehensions of the immediate future.

He explored tenderly with his tongue.

He took out his notebook. 12 o'clock. 58, Queen Charlotte Street.

He tried to recapture his former exultant mood. But in vain. The horizon had shrunk to six bare words:

"58, Queen Charlotte Street 12 o'clock."

AT THE Glengowrie Court Hotel, South Kensington, breakfast was over. In the lounge, Miss Sainsbury Seale was sitting talking to Mrs. Bolitho. They occupied adjacent tables in the dining room and had made friends the day after Miss Sainsbury Seale's arrival a week ago.

Miss Sainsbury Seale said:

"You know, dear, it really has stonking! Not a twinge! I think perhaps I'll ring up—"

Mrs. Bolitho interrupted her.

"Now don't be foolish, my dear. You go to the dentist and get it over."

Mrs. Bolitho was a tall, commanding female with a deep voice. Miss Sainsbury Seale was a woman of forty, with indecisively bleached hair rolled up in untidy curls.

Her clothes were shapeless and rather artistic, and her pince-nez were always dropping off.

She was a great talker.

She said now, wistfully:

"But really, you know, it doesn't hurt at all."

"Nonsense, you told me you had slept a wink last night."

"No, I didn't—no, indeed—but perhaps, now, the nerve has actually died."

"All the more reason to go to the dentist," said Mrs. Bolitho firmly. "You like to put it off, but that's just common sense. Better make up one's mind and get it over!"

Something hovered on Miss Sainsbury Seale's lips. Perhaps it was a rebellious murmur of: "Yes, but not your tooth."

All she actually said, however, was "I expect you are right. And Mr. Morley is such a careful man and never hurts one at all."

THE meeting of the board of directors was over. The position was highly satisfactory—government co-operation was assured. There should have been no discordant note. Yet to the secretary, Mr. Samuel Rotherstein there had

(Continued on page 26)

The Irish Can't Believe It

by Quentin Reynolds

FROM DUBLIN

WAS back in 1922 when the Black and Tans finally turned their hated backs upon the shores of Ireland. The last boatload of them was just when a stalwart Dubliner made a mark that has come to be part of the Emerald Isle.

"Thank the Lord they've gone," he said stily. "Now, praise be, we can have peace."

Today Ireland is very unhappy at the thought of someone infringing upon her national heritage of fighting peacefully within her own borders and with no foreigners participating. Ireland is in the position of being a likely battlefield for two foreign nations—one nation that she hates and another to which she is indifferent. Ireland, beyond declaring her neutrality and maintaining her small army as well as possible, is solving the whole problem by simply ignoring it.

"It's like this," a member of the Dáil said to me earnestly. "If either of them invades us, by the living Lord we'll kick them right out. If Germany invades us, why, we might allow them to help us kick them out. If Italy invades us, well, we've been fighting England for seven hundred years and know how to handle her."

I heard this in homes in Dublin and in Cork and in small village inns and in the temporary. I heard it in the eighteenth-century-old palace of an earl, and in the country clubs in County Wicklow, and I heard it in Galway on the west coast.

No matter what tall, anxious-looking De Valera says; no matter what the four-looking William Cosgrave, leader of the opposition, says; no matter what William Norton, leader of the Fianna party, or what gentle, scholarly President Douglas Hyde, say—the opinion of the people of Ireland is one thing on which they are completely united. Ireland is committed to neutrality and, by God, Ireland will remain neutral if it has to fight everyone else to maintain its status. I have heard this a thousand times in two weeks from the people of Ireland and I heard it whispered to me by government officials talking "off the record."

Coming to Ireland after the nightmare death of France and after the terrible and horrible feeling of dreaded annihilation in London was like emerging from a dark, dank swamp into the brilliant light of the sun. You heard far more talk in Dublin two weeks ago, I am sure, than you do today in New York. There were no black-outs and no cars on the streets. Prices were the same as they had always been and there was a heaping plate of golden butter on the breakfast table alongside a filled bowl—two things that the eyes of a correspondent had not seen for a long day.

There is a war going on but, praise be, no war of Ireland's. It is a war between England and Germany and the United States and they will take them both. That is the well-known ostrich defense used so ineffectively by Holland and Belgium, the two old twins who still don't know what hit them. If you stick your head in the sand these days the obvious thing is sure to happen. But Ireland shrugs her shoulders, looks at tomorrow's entries, and doesn't believe it.

Prepared for action it doesn't really expect is this Irish army antiaircraft unit

BRITISH COMBINE

Yesterday I visited Glendalough, which is the vale between the two lakes in Wicklow. It has been a Sunday-afternoon picnicking ground for Dubliners for two hundred years. I was looking for likely places where the German parachutists might land. Glendalough is the place where in the year 504 Saint Kevin built his seven churches and then retired to a cave overlooking the lake. One night the fair Kathleen, in love with the fire of his eloquence, came to tell him of her love but the holy Kevin pushed her away, and down into the dark blue waters of the lake she went, never to come up again. Then Kevin in remorse decreed that never again would anyone drown in the lake and to this day none has.

Don't Give It a Thought

There were probably two thousand laughing people from Dublin there, and they were telling the story of Kevin to solemn-eyed children, and they were having tea at the lovely inn on the shores of the lake, and to them the legend of 504 was far closer than the nightmare that has come to life in 1940. This is true: there in fact is the very cave and the ruins of the churches that the good saint built. Parachutists? Fifth columnists? Get on with ye, now.

For two weeks I have been looking in vain for just one man who is afraid of the potential invasion by the Germans.

To date I have not found him, and yet every military observer in London is convinced that this will be the next object of Hitler's blitzkrieg. Today I walked into the bar of the Royal Hibernian Hotel, and forty men were deep in form charts, figuring out possible winners at tomorrow's races at Phoenix Park. I ordered a Scotch and began talking to the bartender. The bartender winked at a man standing next to me and said to him, "This fellow is here for the invasion." "Never mind the invasion," the man said. "We'll take care of those blighters if they ever come here and mind that."

Tonight I was at the Elm Park Country Club just outside of Dublin. Here the fairly well off businessmen of Dublin meet each day to play golf and each night to drink and talk. The lawyers, the merchants, the newspaper editors, the automobile salesmen—it is a perfect cross section of substantial Dublin.

I know them all now, and they laugh a little bit at me but temper their laughter by taking me into their circle. Reggie Knight, prominent Dublin businessman, says, "Now what a pity we haven't a few little parachutists for you to play with tonight. But here's Michail Buckley from Cork. Men from Cork never open their mouths for fear that by mistake they'll order a round of drinks. And Jack Arigho, who played wing three-quarter on three Irish rugby teams that beat England; and Norman McBratnea and Con Foley and Paddy Duffy and Larry O'Neill, and now, lads, there'll be no closing hour tonight."

Someone asked me about the German tanks and how they operate. I told him. He laughed and said, "Some of our lads with rifles could pick their eyes out."

"But this is not a war between men, but men and machines," I said desperately. "The parachutists land with machine guns and carry hand grenades in their belts and flame throwers that shoot a flame a hundred yards."

"Come now," venerable Lawrence O'Neill said soothingly. "Have a wee spot and forget your machines. Did you know that I went to school with James Joyce?"

Enemy planes over Ireland? Ridiculous—and what if they did come over? Ireland had planes.

The Army Isn't Laughing

Holland had planes and so did Belgium and so did France. How many planes did Ireland have? Well a dozen or so and fine little things they were. Oh, but you wanted to scream at these happy, lovable, charming people and tell them to wake up, destruction might be just around the corner. But they'd slap you on the back and Jack Arigho would go to the piano and play The Minstrel Boy, and sing it in his high, sweet voice, and Pat O'Loughlin would make another speech of welcome in Gaelic which not a man in the room would understand, for only three per cent of the people of Eire know the mother tongue, more knew it until it became compulsory to learn and then, of course, none would study it any more.

If the civilian population of Eire (Continued on page 45)

Special treat for Don Magarrell's daughter Ann—grilled steaks with his own mustard sauce, picnic fashion

All Ready to Eat

By Frank J. Taylor

Add excitement to your outdoor picnic meals by eating some of the delicious pre-cooked food Don Magarrell serves travelers on the air lines

WITH a seasoned eye Mr. Magarrell watched the fire in his outdoor grill settle into a glowing bed of embers. When the last flame flickered out, he picked up a steak cut an inch and a quarter thick from sirloin butt, dipped it into a bowl of salad oil, slapped it on the grill, shook on salt and whole crushed pepper. As the meat sizzled and seared, he deftly speared it on one edge, careful not to puncture the seared part, and flipped it over. In less time than it takes to tell, the grill was blanketed with sputtering steaks. Eight minutes later, when they were broiled to a turn, he lifted his voice and yelled, "Come and get it!"

Mr. Magarrell might have saved his breath. Everybody was there with his plate in hand. Nobody in his right mind ever passed up a Magarrell steak doused with the chef's own original mustard sauce, the secret of which we'll shortly reveal because it appears that Mr. Don F. Magarrell ranks right up at the top among this country's foremost authorities on picnic cooking, which is an art unto itself.

In his more serious moods, youngish Mr. Magarrell is maître d'hôtel of the United Air Lines kitchens, ten of them scattered strategically from coast to coast, and as such he is responsible for no fewer than half a million pre-cooked picnic meals a year, served on high to travelers aboard the Mainliners.

Now you might not call these de luxe five-course meals picnics, but that's what they are. When Mr. Magarrell took them under his wing four years ago, they were plain box lunches. In those days, when hunger gnawed, an air traveler opened his box, picked over an assortment of weary sandwiches, a cup of potato salad, some cake, cheese, an apple, all of which he washed down with a slug of aging coffee. Well, Mr. Magarrell changed all that with a new culinary technique that keeps pre-cooked foods as hot and appetizing as they were when they came out of the oven. And if you ask his opinion, Mr. Magarrell will tell you that the old-fashioned basket of food most folks take to eat in a shady dell is no picnic at all. "There's no reason why picnic meals can't be served as hot and fresh as anything you ever ate at home," he says.

That kind of talk puts Mr. Magarrell outside the pale, so far as the American Association of Amateur Picnickers is concerned. He is definitely a "pro," except on holidays when, like the postman taking his Sunday walk, he glories in broiling steaks in the woods or in opening up a thermos jug of individual chicken potpies, or ham and string beans en casserole, beef tenderloin sauté, or navarin of spring lamb served steaming hot by the burbling brook. That's what four busy years on the air lines, preceded by three hundred (yep, we checked on them) previous culinary assignments with hotels, clubs, restaurants, railroad and steamship lines, have done to Don Magarrell's idea of a picnic. He's even licked the problem of keeping scrambled eggs with Canadian bacon as hot and light and fresh as they came from the stove, and he'll tell you how to do the same for breakfasts.

Just whip your eggs, he says, all on whipping with a fork after you've poured them into a hot pan already buttered. When they've thickened, add an ounce of cream for every three eggs, whip them some more. Then put them in your thermos jug or in hot casserole the latter to be wrapped heavily in paper. The scrambled eggs stay so soft and fluffy that, thanks to this technique, certain transcontinental flights. Magarrell's chefs are able to serve eggs three or four hours before breakfast is served and the customers don't think they've been freshly cooked by the stewardess on the plane.

If you happen to want link sausages with your scrambled eggs, he says, the system is to boil them two minutes, then in flour, fry them, then drop them on absorbent paper to draw out the excess grease. After that, you can put them alongside the eggs in the thermos jug or the casserole, confident that they'll hold their size and keep piping hot while you're locating the right spot.

New Cooking with New Rules

As chef in the ten kitchens that serve the air liners, Mr. Magarrell has a train of young cooks who didn't have a lot of Continental cooking lore to lean on. Pre-cooking technique is something different, he says. There are a few "don'ts" and a lot of "do's."

Take the "don'ts" first. They've got to do mostly with foods that just won't hold themselves to pre-cooking. Potatoes, for instance, which dries out. Veal is out, too, and fish is taboo on the Mainliners except Eastern lobsters, West Coast crab, or Southern shrimps for salads. Cabbage, turnips, cauliflower and any other kind of gas-producing vegetable is out. Another of Mr. Magarrell's "don'ts" has to do with paper plates which absorb the juices right out of the meat, no matter how delicious it is cooked.

"Especially for steak, you need a china plate, and you need it hot," he insists. "That's true whether you cook your steak ahead of time or broil it over a fire just before you eat it."

Maybe you're from Missouri and you have a notion of pre-cooking steaks for picnics. Well, a lot of the other customers on the Mainliners, too, until they ate some of these Magarrell filets mignon on the air liners. Some of them still insist that the first time they cooked aboard ship, up in the cockpit somewhere, but that's not so.

The angle on pre-cooking steaks, according to Mr. Magarrell, is to not cook them, but slap them in a thermos containers while they're still hot. The steaks keep on cooking in their own steam for a time, but not too much, and they're still hot and juicy an hour or two later. Douse a little Mainliner sauce over them when you serve them and you've got something to satisfy an epicure without the bother of coaxing a bed of coals in your yard.

Mainliner sauce is something that Mr. Magarrell thought up one day when a passenger asked for catsup for his hot steaks. Catsup and chili sauce smeared on good food make Mr. Magarrell's chefs nervous because he says they overwhelm the delicate flavors of carefully prepared meats. But, recognizing that pre-cooked steaks or chops do become a bit bland in the container, he hit upon the idea to zip up their flavors. It certainly did the job.

"Mix two and a half tablespoons of flour and two tablespoons of dill with enough boiling water to make a smooth paste," explained Mr. Magarrell. "Add slowly one cup of vinegar."

(Continued on page 53)

The Girl Talks

By William MacHarg

ILLUSTRATED BY HARRY L. TIMMINS

Detective O'Malley puts the bite on a killer equipped with a small gold tooth

"THERE'S a holdup killing," O'Malley said. "Three guys stuck up a night club and they killed a guest. The same three been holding up cafés and night clubs and we can't find who are. Till now they never shot no one. This time they did."

"Who was it they killed?" I asked.

"A guy named Jernel. He was at a party with a lady but she wasn't his wife."

"Have you got a description of the guy?"

"Plenty descriptions but they get us mixed up."

"Except the guy that shot Jernel has a gold front tooth, the descriptions could mean anybody. They did this stick-up the same way they did all the rest. Nobody had ever seen him in that night club but they knew his place. Two of 'em stood at the two ends and the third guy went around and cut up the dough. Then they ran out and got away in the same taxi they always escape in. This time a guy passing the street seen 'em run out and get into the cab with guns in their hands, and wrote down the taxi license number. I looked the license up. There was a license issued with those numbers."

"When you've not much to start from," I declared.

"We looked at the night club. We didn't find out anything. The manager never seen any of the three men who were the robbery. He was sure, if any of 'em had ever been there as a guest, he would have recognized them."

"Yeah. But they knew how this place was arranged," O'Malley told him.

"Yes, there's no doubt of that. From the spots where they stood they could see everybody in the place and no one could get behind them."

"What can a cop do with a case like this?" O'Malley asked me.

"We went to headquarters. They had a young woman there who had been at a party with Jernel. She was extremely pretty and said her age was eighteen."

"That she was in New York studying at a dramatic school. Her name was Mary Rynd. I could see she came of a good family and her soft voice showed she was from the South. The police were showing her pictures of known holdup men, but she hadn't recognized any of them."

"What was this Jernel doing that the police shot him?" O'Malley asked her.

"He wasn't doing anything." The girl looked shaken and hysterical. "He'd taken the man his money. We both were sitting still, and he'd told me to give the man my jewelry."

"How long you known Jernel?"

"Some friends introduced us about two months ago. I didn't see anything of him then. About a month ago he called me up and asked if I remembered him, and he wanted to see me. He said he was lonesome and he seemed unhappy, and since then we've seen each other a whole lot."

"What made him lonesome? The guy had a wife."

"He told me about that. He was getting a divorce from her."

"You think a lot of Jernel?"

She began to cry. "Yes."

"This Jernel," O'Malley explained to me, "had a lot of money. Him and his wife belonged to what they call café society. They spent a lot of time in night clubs. Cops know about that divorce. When Jernel asked for the divorce, he mentioned a guy named Sammin. This Sammin is known in night clubs too. Let's go and see Mrs. Jernel."

A neat maid let us in. It was a big, luxurious apartment. Mrs. Jernel was young and beautiful and seemed calm and collected.

"You know any reason your husband should get shot?" O'Malley asked her.

She seemed surprised. "I don't understand your question. It was a holdup."

"Yes, lady, we know. But there wasn't no reason that holdup should have shot him. How long since you seen your husband?"

"A little more than a month."

"Ever been to that night club yourself?"

"Yes; a number of times."

"With Mr. Sammin?"

"Your question is impertinent."

"A cop has to ask."

WE WENT and saw Sammin. He had a shop high up in a tall building and he was sleek and black-haired. He was a jeweler.

"You in that night club last night when Jernel got shot?" O'Malley asked.

"I wasn't."

"You been there, though, plenty of times."

"I don't know what you mean by 'plenty.' I've been there."

"With Mrs. Jernel?"

"Sometimes."

"She know you've been questioned by the police quite a few times following jewel robberies?"

"What's this idea?" Sammin shouted at us. "I've never been convicted of receiving stolen jewels. Are you trying to involve me in this killing?"

"Do you appreciate the significance of all this, O'Malley?" I asked when we had got outside.

"You tell me."

"Let's review the facts," I said, importantly. "These holdups have occurred in places where the men executing them had never been and therefore they have not been recognized, but in every case they knew the arrangement of the place perfectly. That means it had been described to them."

"Sure. They got a finger man."

(Continued on page 46)

He didn't like the report, and crumpled it up and threw it in the wastebasket. The girl and I watched while he rewrote it

A Man Takes His Vacation

By Donald Hough

ILLUSTRATED BY GILBERT DARLING

How Hubert happened to win the big bronc-bucking contest and a prize that was not on the committee's list

THE plank sidewalks of Horse Creek rumbled to the prodding of high-heeled boots; fast-moving hoofs lifted the thin, tawny dust of the town square and it hung like a pall over the crowds. Bright shirts and colorful neckerchiefs flashed beneath broad-brimmed hats, and in the doors of the bars the passers-in and passers-out turned sideways to get through.

A slight young man in a gray business suit was trying to get into one of the saloons. Each time he started in, he met a group of cowboys on the way out, eyes on distant bars, looking over his head. He was not very tall.

Invariably they pushed him out.

"Pardon me," he kept saying.

Finally, in desperation, he fell in behind several cowboys who had shoved him aside and followed them to the next bar. He went in easily, in their wake.

The bar was crowded. But he followed his interference, unnoticed at their heels, and found a place for himself beside them. "A glass of beer," he said; but there was too much noise, nobody could hear him. A harassed bartender plunked a bottle of whisky down before the group and placed some glasses on the bar. A tall cowboy poured the drinks. There was one glass too many. The big cowboy looked around, glanced down past his shoulder and saw the little fellow in the gray suit.

"Pardon me," the little fellow said. "I guess the bartender thought I was with—"

"What the hell, have a drink," the cowboy said. He slid one of the filled glasses toward the other. "From the East?" he asked.

"No; Salt Lake City."

"Come up for the rodeo?"

"Well, what's left of it. I guess today's the last day. I saw the posters in Yellowstone Park and came down. I'm on my vacation, you know. From the office. A fellow has to get away."

"Sure," the cowboy said.

The other offered his hand. "Hubert Winslow's the name. Bartles-Adams, advertising novelties. File department."

The cowboy shook the hand clumsily. "Slim Howard," he said. He turned to his companions. "Meet a friend of mine," he said.

"I'll buy a drink," Hubert said. He wigwagged to the bartender. "On me," he said loudly.

"Look who's here," Slim said. They all looked around. A tall, beautifully turned-out cowboy had entered. He was flanked by two attractive girls in Western attire. They moved up to the bar and the cowboy ordered drinks for everybody with a large gesture.

For the first time Hubert noticed that there was a difference between the cowboys he was drinking with and most of the others in the place. His friends were not dressed as well as the others: they wore faded blue denim pants and their hats were stained, the brims curled. Their blue cotton shirts were open at the throat, and they wore no neckerchiefs. The others were more like the one who had just come in.

"THAT fellow," Hubert said, in an oblique effort to penetrate the difference, "must be a—foreman. Or whatever you call them."

"What they are called," Slim said, looking at Hubert, "is dudes. That one's staying at the Bar H Bar, a dude ranch. He's a broker in New York."

"Oh," Hubert said. He was beginning to get the idea. Slim said, "Today's dude-ranch day at the rodeo. Every ranch has got one of their dudes for the dude bucking-horse contest."

"Bucking horses!" one of the cowboys said disgustedly. "The damn' bucking horses!"

"What can you expect?" Slim said. "They're just dudes."

"The tame broncs," the other said. "They been practicing all summer on the tame broncs."

"Is yours a dude ranch, too?" asked.

"Not like the others," Slim said. "Lazy K is a cow outfit, but we're to get dudes. We didn't get a year, against the big places like

Hubert at this point lost track of what was going on. The grandstand began to whirl, and so did the ground. Instantly Hubert decided to get off the horse

Maybe we'll get some next year." "We could get a dude and he could win this dude bucking contest," another cowboy said, "we'd be over. You could have advertising."

"You ought to take first prize from under your nose," Slim said. He looked at Hubert. "Can you ride a horse?" he asked suddenly.

"No," Hubert said. "I hate horses. Let's have another drink," Slim said.

"WELLS," Hubert said an hour later. "I'm not so sure about this. My knees feel kind of weak. I hate—" "Buck up," Slim said.

Hubert tried to buck up. They were standing behind the little grandstand at the rodeo grounds. Through the lattice-work of weathered timbers, through the pattern of the two-by-fours and the people sitting on the plank seats, their rears bulging, Hubert could catch glimpses of activity out front. Riders were moving back and forth; steers were bawling; a voice was calling out names. Suddenly his own name boomed from the loud-speaker.

"Come on," Slim said. He took Hubert by the arm. Hubert's underpinning began to fail him. "I'd rather—" he began; but the others were around him and he was walking under the grandstand, down a passage, and the clumsy leather chaps that Slim had made him put on were hanging loosely from his hips. These and the big spurs he was wearing just missed tripping him at each labored step.

"Come on," Slim said.

At the end of the passage they came to a cage made of heavy planks. It was just a little larger than a horse. A horse was in it. The horse and Hubert looked at each other and Hubert closed his eyes. Somebody boosted him to the top of the cage, and two others took him by the arms and lowered him, and he was sitting in a saddle; a live, restless saddle. He felt the stirrups and shoved his feet into them and somebody handed him the end of a thick rope and he took hold of it mechanically and prayerfully.

The whole side of the cage swung away, exposing the rodeo grounds. The horse bounded out into the open.

Hubert at this point lost track of what was going on. The grandstand began to whirl, and so did the ground, and he was being hit terrific blows on the seat of the pants. Instantly he decided to get off the horse. He tried to, but found, to his horror, that he could not. He glanced down and saw that the fastening in the front of the chaps had slipped over the horn of the saddle. At each lunge of the horse he was jerked violently forward and the horn hit him in the stomach repeatedly.

Hubert's world turned black. . . .

The water on his face was cold, and he heard Slim's voice and opened his eyes. "He's coming around," somebody said. Slim was kneeling there with a wet towel in his hands. When he saw that Hubert was all right, he grinned broadly. "Hubert," he said delightedly, "you won! You got first prize!"

Hubert sat up and looked around. He was in the rear of the grandstand again, and his friends were standing around him, looking down at him. He moistened his lips. "What is first prize?" he asked.

"A three-day pack trip out of the Bar H Bar," Slim said, "with the governor's party. He's staying there. Three whole days on horseback, Hubert!"

Hubert lay back on the grass and closed his eyes.

"WELL, there she is," one of the cowboys said.

Hubert looked where the cowboy was pointing. Just beyond the sagebrush flat over which they were riding, at the edge of a pine forest, beyond which great snow-capped mountains rose abruptly into the sky, was a long log structure with a porch across the entire front. It was flanked by lesser buildings.

Slim pulled up close alongside Hubert. "Whatever you do, don't go saying you got to get back to the office. Remember, Hubert, you won the dude bucking-horse contest. You got to act on your dignity, Hubert."

They went through a gate and rode across a well-kept lawn, toward the porch. On the porch Hubert could see people, people dressed in big cream-colored hats and bright shirts. When they were almost there, a tall man in immaculate regalia stepped down and came to meet them.

"Hello, Mr. Van Orton," Slim said. Mr. Van Orton nodded briefly. Slim jerked his head toward Hubert. "I guess you heard the Lazy K entry won the bucking-horse contest." The dude rancher looked at Hubert without expression and nodded again. Slim said, "Well, we brung him up for the prize."

Mr. Van Orton bowed slightly. "Come in," he said to Hubert.

"Goodby, Hubert," Slim said. "Remember what I told you."

"I will," Hubert said. He dismounted painfully, and Slim took his horse and he and the others rode away. Walking slowly, frequently glancing down to see if he really was as bowlegged as he felt, Hubert followed Mr. Van Orton around the end of the lodge. The brilliant people on the porch were watching, and Hubert summoned such dignity as he felt he possessed and looked straight ahead. His host took him to a small cabin in the rear, and they entered. The one room was just large enough for the cot, washstand and chair.

"Make yourself at home," Mr. Van Orton said distantly. "The pack trip with the governor will get under way in about an hour. His Excellency at the moment is resting." He left.

Hubert threw himself upon the cot and lay face down. He was unhappy. He did not like this; he hated the whole

(Continued on page 40)

Night Work

By Meyer Levin

WHEN Lloyd Baker, instructor at City College, sought to use the Franklin letters at the Foundation he was informed that Professor Knowles of Columbia had them out for study, and he had a fright. Knowles was probably already started on the very thing he wanted to do. Several times, in the Historical Journal, he had encountered articles by Knowles in his own field of early American letters—and more than once Lloyd had been startled at the echoing chords of their minds. Oddly, though they had mutual acquaintances, they had not yet met.

Before giving up the Franklin idea, there was only one thing to do: ask. So he wrote Professor Knowles. The reply was comradely. Knowles even hinted at a collaboration.

The evening Lloyd went out to discuss the matter, Felice, as usual, wanted to go along; his young wife sometimes seemed to have the idea she could go everywhere with him, even to his classes. This time she finally consented to be parked at a movie.

Knowles lived in one of those boxlike apartments with which Lloyd had been all too familiar in his bachelor days. University areas abounded in them. The professor was younger than he had expected, probably only a few years his own senior; they were even of the same physical type, large-boned, swingy, Knowles a shade taller; and as soon as the professor opened his mouth Lloyd recognized home. "Hoosier?" he asked.

Sure enough. Knowles was from Valparaiso, near the Baker farm.

In the apartment, Lloyd was struck even more forcibly by the sense of duplication, for Knowles, like himself in his bachelor days, had turned the dinette into a work-hutch, upholstering it with books. For an instant Lloyd felt a longing for those solitary evenings, with maybe a colleague ringing the bell, late, for a gab over a drink.

As to their work: they hit it off right away. Lloyd would study the influence of French ideas of liberty on Franklin, and Knowles would analyze the other side, the influence of Franklin on the French. Right off Knowles showed Lloyd a cute, obscure passage in a Franklin anecdote, on the object of conversation with women. Lloyd spotted it as indeed an old French saying. "Bonhomme, at the Sorbonne, used to kid all the co-eds with it."

"You study with Bonhomme?" Knowles asked.

And both had spent their Sundays at Prof. Bonhomme's place on the Seine. And both had held the Voxhaul scholarship. "We must be the same guy!" Knowles laughed.

Truly, the parallel in their lives was astonishing. Not only their background but their work. For when Lloyd mentioned that he had to pick up his wife, at the movie, Knowles remarked, "Bet you married a French girl."

"You guessed it," Lloyd responded.

"Didn't have to guess. Just followed through."

Lloyd glanced around the typical one-man apartment. "You're not married, are you?"

"Was," Knowles said. "Met her at the Sorbonne." Next thing, the fellow would say his wife's name was Felice.

Lloyd couldn't help asking—almost as from an oracle—what had become of that marriage.

"Happened? She's back home," his new colleague replied. "Swell kid, but those things just don't work out. French and us."

THE work went well. Too well. Their collaboration was so stimulating that Lloyd could scarcely put his mind on anything else.

They had already published a preliminary paper; a publisher wanted a book on the subject; Lloyd felt sure this work would bring him his full professorship; he picked out the fur coat he would buy Felice, for their anniversary, if the book could be finished swiftly enough so he'd get some money for it, in time to pay for the coat. He and Knowles worked late afternoons, and often into the night.

Once, coming home late, Lloyd found the customary pie and milk on the kitchen table; but Felice failed to slip from the bedroom, while he ate. Then he remembered something about a dinner date with the Reynoldses, who were entertaining a visiting Frenchman.

He couldn't fall asleep. The last time he looked at his watch before she got home, it was 2 A. M.

Felice was gay in the morning, humming as she had breakfast with him.

The thing happened again, and again. Naturally he couldn't blame her. The poor kid had to have some fun in life:

he was working every evening. But the fourth time, when she got in at 1:30, he couldn't help letting her know he was awake.

"But, darling, I don't like to have without you!" she protested. "If you would come with us!"

No use reminding her he was busy to finish the research.

"That Knowles! That monster! Does he know of life!" she cried. "The day enough to work?"

He had to say she might at least manage his own work, and the next she was angry with him, and the next she was out again.

The following evening, they were cussing a Franklin gem Knowles found in an old almanac. "Marriage without love soon becomes love with marriage."

"Yeah," Lloyd agreed. "It seems the French idea, all right. I ought to know."

"Trouble?" Knowles asked.

Lloyd nodded.

"Sooner or later," Knowles said, "you have to face it. That's the way it is."

"How long did yours last?"

"Four years. The last year was all Frenchman show up?"

"She went home with him."

Lloyd shuddered. And yet he was strangely grateful. Knowles would have him the pain of the last stages.

Perhaps Felice sensed something. She asked Knowles to dinner. He didn't hit it off at all, naturally. The next day, she declared to Lloyd that he was crazy in thinking he and Knowles were alike. "Just because you both come from Indiana!"

A FEW evenings later, coming home after midnight, he found her sitting up with that Frenchman. Lloyd rose to have a drink with them, and went to bed, leaving them there together.

She didn't come to breakfast the next morning.

He remembered Knowles' remark. Yet, he wanted to make one try. He went out with her. That afternoon, he went home to pick up his notes. She was out. But in the cab, looking through the notes, Lloyd saw words penciled, in handwriting, between his lines. He remembered that one about marriage without becoming love without marriage. He had written, "All work and no play makes Jack a bad husband." As a wife without a husband soon leaves a husband without a wife.—M. Knowles. Then, in a pained gasp, "Oh, darling, don't!"

Suddenly he saw himself as Knowles was, alone in a one-room box, sitting at his dinners, working all the time. He told the driver to turn around.

She was curled, a shivering ball, in a huge chair, his chair.

Later, Lloyd called his colleague. "Sorry I can't work tonight." An important engagement had come up, he explained, to take his wife dancing.

Hereafter, they'd have to work in the afternoons; slower, but they'd get through. "Oh, and Knowles—"

"Yeah?"

"Just thought you ought to know. We're not the same guy, after all."

Felice was gay in the morning humming as she had breakfast with

So they chose four of their number to go to St. Louis and bring back the Book—surely the strangest horsemen that ever rode in the West

White Dawn in Oregon

By Herbert Ravenel Sass

ILLUSTRATED BY HERBERT MORTON STOOPS

CAPTAIN GEORGE W. AYRES of Boston, cruising for sea-otter furs in the Pacific in his ship, the Mercury, put into Nootka Sound one day and took twelve Indians on board as passengers. They went with him willingly, he promised to bring them back when the cruise was over. Instead, he marooned them on a deserted island in Sir Francis Drake's Bay. It was easier to do that than sail all the way back to Nootka; and it didn't matter to Captain Ayres whether the twelve survived or starved.

That is the first link in the chain. The second is the Tonquin. She came to Nootka soon afterward—John Jacob Astor's ship, the Tonquin, sent by him from New York around Cape Horn to build a fur empire on the Oregon coast. She had stopped at the mouth of the Columbia and built a fort there (Astoria, they called it) garrisoned by a few west voyageurs under Duncan McLaughlin. Then she cruised northward along the Vancouver shore to trade for sea otter with the Nootka tribesmen.

The Tonquin dropped anchor off the Indian town and her captain, Jonathan Thorn, being a bullheaded, violent man afraid of nothing, didn't even rig safety nettings around the deck to prevent too many Indians from coming aboard. Captain Thorn had never heard of Captain Ayres or what he had done to the twelve Nootka hunters. If Thorn had known about that, he would have enjoyed it. Some weeks before, he had beaten one of his seamen half insensible, thrown him overboard and sailed away, leaving the sailor to sink or swim ashore as fate decided.

So Captain Thorn would probably have laughed if he had known of that clever trick which Captain Ayres had played. Ayres had saved time and money. What did it matter if a dozen Indian women had been widowed? . . . When the Tonquin had anchored, the Indians came out in their great sea canoes, bringing their bundles of furs, and Thorn let them come on board, as many as wanted to come. The goods were arranged on the deck and trading began.

But it didn't go well. Thorn and James Lewis, a clerk, did the bidding; but the Indians rejected most of the offers. A tall old Nootka chief, thin and hook-nosed and magnificently dressed in a beautiful sea-otter robe belted with native cloth of many colors, directed them with great dignity from a seat placed for him by his underlings. They watched him, and when he shook his head, they shook theirs also.

Captain Thorn's quick anger rose, quickly boiled over. He whirled on the chief and ordered him to leave the ship. The Indian made no move, and Thorn, in a fury, seized him by the hair, jerked him to his feet, then struck him in the face. There was a moment of utter silence, utter stillness. Only a moment. The chief turned away and went quietly down the ladder and his people followed him.

Captain Jonathan Thorn strutted the Tonquin's deck. He'd taught these damned red cattle a lesson. They'd be back in the morning and trading would be better then. Alex McKay, one of Astor's partners, who was on board, didn't think so and wanted to weigh anchor. But Captain Thorn was right.

Early in the morning they came with smiling, happy faces, with rolls of fine otter skins—as many rolls as five large canoes, each manned by twenty paddlers, could carry—and Thorn in high good humor bade them come aboard with their pelts and make themselves at home. So they swarmed up the ladders (all except the women, who stayed in the canoes) and trading was better and Captain Thorn's good humor expanded—until, suddenly, at a signal, they drew the terrible pautumaugan war clubs hidden in their rolls of otter skins and made

(Continued on page 42)

Occupation: Widow

By William C. White

ILLUSTRATED BY GEORGE HOWE

The Story Thus Far:

PAUL LESSER and his friend Rolf Blaerchen, a Nazi, start a night club in Berlin. Lesser marries a singer whom they employ: Carola Dirling; then he dies—the victim of a mysterious “automobile accident.”

Heartbroken, Carola leaves Berlin. Three years later, she is in Rome when Blaerchen—whom she suspects of somehow having caused her husband's death—sends an agent to her. The agent informs her that Blaerchen is a power in the German Foreign Office; he orders her to return to Berlin. Not daring to resist, she goes back to the German capital. There—ensconced in an attractive apartment, where a maid (Maria Kunkle) keeps a sharp eye on her—she goes to work as a Foreign Office spy, reporting to Blaerchen.

She has only one friend whom she can trust: Karl Dietrich. Just out of a concentration camp, Dietrich is deep in an anti-Nazi plot. He tells Carola that Blaerchen and Wilhelm Praut—bitter enemies and favorites of Ribbentrop—are working secretly against Goering and Himmler. . . . Senta Mainescu—once engaged to Blaerchen, now one of his enemies—calls on Carola. She makes several indiscreet remarks. They are reported back to Blaerchen. She is arrested, charged with treason—and executed!

While taking a walk, Carola is approached by a stranger who introduces himself as August von Maurer. He says that Senta had been his fiancée; he questions Carola closely, in an effort to learn who had betrayed the woman he loved. . . .

Young Signor Froschetti, of the Italian Embassy, escorts Carola to her apartment, after a party. He tells her that he has fallen in love with her. The telephone rings. Carola answers it. A man (whose voice she does not recognize) orders her to “wait ten minutes—and scream.” The man adds: “This is Herr Blaerchen's wish,” and hangs up.

Carola insists that Froschetti leave the apartment, at once. Puzzled, angry, Froschetti makes his departure. A few minutes later, three men come in. They accuse Carola of disobeying Blaerchen's orders. They say they will report the matter. They go out. . . . The following day, Carola explains the episode to Froschetti. Realizing that he has narrowly escaped a blackmail trap, Froschetti thanks her. But when they part, Carola feels certain that she will never see the young Italian again.

V

AT HOME there was still no sign of Maria. Carola was not concerned; she would turn up in time and explain her absence. More important was Blaerchen's coming. She could only repeat to him what she had told the men the night before, then watch his face to see if he believed.

At the front door someone was trying to fit a key in the lock. Carola rose and opened the door. Maria almost stumbled into the room, her clothes awry, her face red from unbroken crying.

“Look!” Her voice was hollow. “Look! Fritz, my husband!” She held out a little card. On it Carola read a cold, formal announcement of the death of Fritz Kunkle at the front. Neither place nor time nor date were given.

“I am sorry, Maria.”

“Fritz is dead,” the woman said as if to convince herself. She burst into violent weeping again. “He wasn't a soldier. He didn't want to harm anybody. He was a cook!”

Carola wished she could help. “It does no good to cry.”

“I know it.” Maria tried to dry her eyes. She looked at the card again. “Can you bury a postal card? Can you give a postal card a decent burial?”

Carola stood beside her, not knowing what to say. She put her arm around her and said weakly, “It's a dreadful shock.”

Maria got control of herself. “Herr Blaerchen promised that Fritz would not go near the front. His promises!” Bitterness in her voice matched the scorn in her voice. “He promised Fräulein Mainescu that he'd marry her and what did he do? He put her in jail because of what she said here.”

Carola stared at the woman, forgetting her weeping and her sorrow. She asked, “How do you know that?”

“He knows everything that is said in this room. There is a thing in the wall there. It was put in one day when you weren't here.”

“A microphone? Where is it?” Her questions were asked in cold anger.

Maria pointed to the wall near a framed picture of a German village scene. “In there.”

Everything the woman was saying now was being overheard! Carola shuddered. She knew she had to find some wordless way to keep the woman quiet.

Then Maria sat upright, her face gray and glassy. In sudden spilling fury she almost ran to the framed picture on the wall and stood just a few inches from it. So bitterly that Carola shivered, she screamed, “Listen, I want you to hear me. Herr Blaerchen, this is Maria!”

“Maria, what are you doing?” She was alarmed at the woman's growing hysteria.

Maria was beyond any control. “Herr Blaerchen, you lied! Fritz is dead. He was a good man. He did not deserve to die. You killed him after you promised me—! Was sagst du, Herr Blaerchen?”

“Please stop, Maria.”

She ignored Carola. “You should hear what the people in the streets are saying, Herr Blaerchen. They say, ‘Maybe the Allies would like to catch Hitler and the Nazis, but we hope we catch them first!’” She was screaming now. “That is what they are saying. I know! I hear them! Now my Fritz is dead and I don't even know where he is buried but when the people are through with you Nazis there won't even be kitchen scraps to bury.”

“You must not say those things, Maria.” Carola felt ridiculously helpless.

The woman turned away from the wall and threw herself on the floor. She was just a shivering pile, clinging softly to herself. Carola got some for her. She was afraid for Maria. The woman had to be persuaded to leave at once before anyone who heard her remarks sent police after her.

In a few minutes Maria sat up, reached for her handkerchief, and said, “I'm sorry, Fräulein.”

“I only wish I could do something for you, Maria,” Carola said desperately.

“I will be all right. It's the shock had no warning. I should have known something was wrong when Fritz didn't write from Cologne for such a long time. I should have known!” She got up and wavered slightly. “I'll get things from the kitchen and go.”

Carola felt ever so slightly relieved. At least, there were no sounds from the stairs outside. The woman had got away.

Maria went into the kitchen and Carola followed. The microphone would not pick up anything said here. “Where will you go now, Maria?”

(Continued on page 33)

“Herr Blaerchen, you lied!” she cried. “Fritz is dead. He did not deserve to die. You killed him!”

RONNY JAKUES

quel of Caracas, Vene-
an overnight sensa-now with Jersey City is a baseball scout's dream of even:

Has hacking his way through the and bush in search of talent. In oet is a sharp telegram from the emanding that he deliver—or ddenly he comes upon a clear-ne backwoods and there before a rude diamond, is playing a b that fairly bristles with first-ayers.

only that, but the players are so end love the game so much, and s far removed from the prima-alass, that they sign up for pracnothing. All they want is a chance e good, and never mind bonuses ing.

about the time our dreambound ts signing up a future DiMaggio a week, the scout lurches back nsciousness. He awakens in a hotel in Pottawatomie, gets up a unhappy wheeze and goes out splintery ball park to scout some D second baseman who couldn't cold on an igloo sleeping porch.
one scout lived this dream. He is ambria, an Italian laundryman Baltimore who is now the chief of the Washington Senators and alent-gatherer for such Washing-ms as Charlotte, North Carolina;
field, Massachusetts; Greenville, Carolina, and Orlando, Florida.

day Cambria parted the leaves of ay land and beheld tons of good ayers. Furiously, he began put-them under contract. He is still them up. He discovered a gold of baseball players that will never tself out.

it isn't likely that enough of will infiltrate into organized baseo change the complexion of the Or that the influx of Cambria's labor will knock the pins from une prevailing wage schedules in the agues.

ause Cambria's ballplayers are
ns. Cubans and, currently, one y-faced Venezuelan.

at means that their chances of get-as far in baseball as their merit warrant correspond roughly to ances of that adventuresome snow-
They may have the kind of zeal a comparison makes the bloke who for dear old Siwash look like a er. But unless they are extraordiexpert at the game, and unless are physically and spiritually con-ed to fight back against the forces
eek to ride them back to the Pearl

OESER

Last remaining representative of the foreign contingent in baseball is Pitcher René Monteagudo, who's just too good to be sent to the minors

Ivory from Cuba

By Bob Considine

Washington is the only big-league club now using Cuban ball players although the island is noted for its excellent crop of rookies. Why is such good material ignored? The answer brings up a rather delicate social problem of the Antilles on a rail, they'll never amount to much.

They get beanballs thrown at their heads by closed-shop (and closed-brained) rivals. They face pitchers who willingly will throw away their arms bearing down on them in an effort to escape the "ignominy" of yielding a hit to them. They get a measure of grasssingeing abuse from the "jockeys" on the enemy bench. From their own team they get rock-bottom pay, and from many of their own teammates they get a wintry ostracism. Those who want to befriend them are halted by the differences in languages.

Judge Landis Dissents

The Cuban players might reasonably wish for a little more substantial sponsorship than Cambria can produce. But none of them will ever be able to say that Poppa Joe, as they call him, bored them. There is only one Joe Cambria in baseball, and for this Judge Landis offers up a daily prayer of thanks. The old judge has had Cambria on that mat often enough for Joe to wear a trench in it. Landis triumphantly caught him post-dating a rookie's contract last year and fined him $1,000. The judge also made him sell his St. Augustine club when his boss, Clark Griffith, bought Orlando in the same Florida League.

By 1934, when Cambria first began to exploit Latin talent, his reputation as a shrewd, lucky and bizarre baseball gypsy was well established. He had been in baseball only four years, but he had gotten around: Hagerstown, Baltimore, Youngstown, Reading, Albany.

He made the first trip to Cuba to look for ersatz ivory in the winter of 1934-1935. His chief discovery was a squat, powerful, grinning third baseman named Roberto Estalella. Estalella was promoted to Washington as a novelty for the tag end of the 1935 season and was a sensation. Then he dropped back in slower company and did not get another chance until last season. He came back as an outfielder, and became the longest, stoutest hitter on the Washington team.

This year Estalella is back in the minors, though several American League managers will tell you that he is good enough to be in the league. He was sold outright to Minneapolis. His usefulness to Washington was impaired during the 1939 season because an alarming number of the sterling sportsmen who pitched against him repeatedly sent him sprawling into the dirt—ducking beanballs.

Some of them only wanted to break Estalella's toe hold on the plate, for Roberto was one to crowd the dish and plant his feet in the ground as deep as fireplugs. But others who "dusted" Es-talella were of that peculiar big-league mold which is almost psychopathically opposed to Roberto and his coffee-colored colleagues.

The Unfavored Foursome

The gorilla-shaped Cuban outfielder had company among the 1939 Senators.
With him all season was Alejandro Car-rasquel, of Caracas, Venezuela. During the early portion of the season the Spanish-speaking section of the Washington club also embraced the Mutt and Jeff of Cuban pitching—6 feet 4 inch Roberto Ortiz and runty, fattish René Monteagudo.

They made a curious knot in the center of the predominantly Southern ball club. On road trips the four of them would sit in facing seats, knees jammed together, jabbering in low excitement.
Their meager salaries prompted them to get to the railroad stations ahead of the other players and gulp a quick meal at
(Continued on page 24)

The boat struck with all the force of motor, current and tide behind it. Al screamed once, groped and fell

Fog on the Bay

By Harry Sylvester

ILLUSTRATED BY GEOFFREY BIGGS

IT WAS still dark when they left the house, blowing out the kerosene lamp, and walked the brief distance to the wharf where the boat was moored at bow and stern against the steady push of the wind that crossed the Potomac from Virginia. Under them the wharf creaked and swayed and once a board over a worm-eaten post almost gave under the son, but neither of them spoke. That the wharf was rotted and worm-eaten they knew, and that they couldn't do much about it right now with oysters at twenty-five cents a bushel they also knew; so there was no use in talking.

They worked silently, the son casting off the bowline and the father trying to start the old motor. The boy picked up the wide, awkward, culling board and set it against the gunwale.

"If we run into a good mess today," he said, "we'll need a third man for culling. Shouldn't've let Johnny Guy go last week."

The father was silent bending over the engine and the boy picked up the long-handled oyster tongs and the nippers for big singles, and laid them, twenty feet long and unwieldy, across the culling board and bin walls.

"Ain't no use, Joe," the father finally said, "in having a man working at this kind of work if'n he can't make two dollars a day anyways. Johnny knowed he could've stayed if he wanted."

A beam of light washed rapidly up and down over the boat and both men turned to the shore. The wind had prevented their hearing the car coming but now they saw it, moving fast over the bad dirt road that wasn't much more than two ruts in the earth. "Kind of late for any party to be coming down fishing," Joe said. "Maybe we could get a few rockfish rising, though."

There was a rending of springs as the car hit a deep hollow filled with water, and then jounced to a stop, almost on the wharf. Two men came out, leaving the doors open, and ran out on the wharf, the stockier one carrying a handbag. It was too dark to see much more about them.

"No one coming fishing'd come in that much hurry," the father said. He had grown tense without knowing it.

"YOU Foley Abell?" the man with the bag said.

"That's right," the father said.

"I went fishing with you once. How much to hire your boat?"

"It's kind of late, even for rockfishing," the father said.

"We don't want to go fishing," the man without the bag said.

"Shut up, Al," said the man with the bag.

"I could take you out, though, and maybe try for some," Foley Abell went on. "Charge you eight dollars if we didn't get any fish, ten if we did. I don't—"

"We don't want to go fishing. We want to go away from here and we want to go right now. Some place in Virginia. Give you a hundred dollars."

That much money made it a bad business, Foley Abell knew. His mouth was dry.

The boy, Joe, like many children, had an instinct to recognize evil. "I don't like this, pa," he said. "These—"

"Shut up, you," Al said. "No one asked you anything."

"I don't like you, mister," Joe said. He started to climb out on the wharf.

"Oh, yes you do," Al said. "You like me fine." In the first light, Joe saw the automatic in Al's hand.

"What I ask you, Al," the man with the bag said; "what I ask you is did you have to do it?"

"This punk," Al said. "For twenty cents I'd give it to him." Joe couldn't see Al's eyes but he could feel them looking at him and hating him beyond any reason. Joe stood there, one foot on the boat, the other on the wharf. He wasn't frightened.

They weren't killers. But they had a right to live. So they did what had to be done

"Shall I give it to him, Gerry?" Al asked. "Don't talk foolish," the other man said. "This is our last out." He turned to Foley Abell. "That's the way it is," Gerry said. "Now you know. You've got no choice now. Get in the boat." "I remember you, Mr. Ferris," Al said. "You was here with a par last July."

Gerry laughed. "That's right. You remember me as Mr. Ferris. I'm right on remembering me as Mr. Ferris and everything will be okay."

"MR. FERRIS," Al mocked, still on Joe Abell. "Mr. Ferris, listen to it. Where the hell did you get that name. Mr. Ferris. Gerry Pierson. 'Shut up!' Gerry said. 'You're enough wrong things now. Take the roads out of Washington and you'll take this one that goes into the end at Point Lookout.'"

"They had us headed off on the Post Road to Baltimore?"

"Mr. Ferris," Foley Abell said, a family. I don't want to do anything that might make me lose my boat. I won't say anything. I—"

"I'm sorry, Abell," Gerry said. "I ain't got even half an hour on the water. If we don't take your boat we got to let you stay here. Al knows more about the water. He can swim."

"Who was it was talking about going off?" Al said.

"Right, I'll take you, Mr. Ferris," Foley said.
 "Joe stay here. He's only sixteen."
 "That would be nice," Al said. "That would be
 y. Then you could tell them all about it. Get in punk!"
 He stepped into the boat.
 "Gerry said to Al. "Maybe you should hear into the water. They maybe won't catch this so quick. It's pretty deep in the creek, ain't
 e?"
 "Right now, right off the bank there's eight feet
 "Foley Abell said. He stood near the motor, and died.
 "At the gun in his pocket and went over to the smaller automatic had suddenly appeared
 's hand from a shoulder holster. He stood ot pointing it at either of the Abells. In ding light, Joe could see him clearly, a stocky, n with high cheekbones and a flat, blank face
 n, bloodless lips.
 "Started the car. It lurched out of the mudhole, rear sagging from a broken spring. Al pulled hand throttle, left the car in first, let in the pedal and jumped out. The car dove off the nk and was quickly covered by the water. It ke a person a while to notice it.
 "going," Al said, jumping into the boat.
 "motor won't start," Foley Abell said, bent
 "Don't give us that stuff," Al said, going over to "Look at it, Al," Gerry said. A shadow seemed over his face.
 "I worry, I'll look at it," Al said. He pushed
 "They out of the way and bent over the motor.
 "the hell would you be," Al said, "if I wasn't when it comes to motors. Hell, you can't even car."
 "It's right," Gerry said. "Go on. Go right nd shoot off your mouth. Tell them everyou know."
 "at they know won't ever make no difference," almost to himself. Foley heard him and the hered in Foley's belly like a stone. He looked nch near by but his eye, as though of its own caught the dull gleam of the gun in Gerry's
 "You'd give me that needle," Al said, louder, all right."
 "the last one," Gerry told him, "and you're apt it worse before we get some place you can get ne motor," Al said. "I never saw such a motor.
 tter be sure we got oars or something. They is motor on the ark. Old man Noah himself.
 ousand boats down this neck of the woods, I d you gotta pick out this one."
 "was the only place I know down here," Gerry
 "I been fishing here once. If you didn't take ad we wouldn't've had to do this."
 fear had gone from Joe Abell. Wise in knowlof the river, he was yet naïve in other ways. "I ho you ones are," he said. "You're the ones ke into the bank last night in Anacostia. The "ell, well," Al said, looking up. "Aren't you the ound feller, though!"
 "ep quiet, Joe," his father said.
 "u keep quiet, kid, or you'll get hurt," Gerry ound where Foley Abell had disconnected the r, made the connection and started the motor.
 ned to Foley: "It couldn't be that you slipped re off, could it?"
 ey didn't answer. He and Joe could look fully or the first time. They saw a slight man, dapdress, with a pale face whose features seemed e shrunk toward each other. A thin stubble of beard had begun to show. The hat was new he brim pulled down. "Some dude," Joe it.
 e pale face before them seemed to break up and convulsive movement Al reached for the gun pocket.
 on't!" Gerry called. Al paused, swaying a
 "This damn' kid, he stands there and he ain't and you'd think he was somebody."
 "ll right," Gerry said, as though resigned to hing. "You can have the needle now. Listen, you get that boat going (Continued on page 51)

ne coming fishing'd come in that much y," the father said. He had grown tense

He Serves Up America

By C. M. Black

Pare Lorentz takes our greatest river as his theme, or the dust bowl, or the fight against disease, and produces a great moving picture

PHOTOGRAPH FOR COLLIER'S BY CHARLES KERLEE

Practically a one-man producing company is Pare Lorentz, whose fine movies are as American as the broad social problems around which he weaves them

IT WAS 2 A. M. and nobody in Hollywood was more asleep than King Vidor. He had gone through a tough day at the studio and he was due to resume activities at eight the next morning. So he was sleeping fast and furious when the shrill blast of the telephone woke him. Before he was half awake he had answered the phone and before he was awake enough to bawl out the person who had called at such an hour he was listening to an avalanche of words.

"Look, King," the voice boomed, "this is Pare Lorentz. I'm talking from the DeSoto Hotel in Dalhard, Texas. . . ."

"What are you doing down there?" Vidor said sleepily.

"I'm making the damnedest picture you ever saw, King," Lorentz shouted. "It's the kind of picture you always wanted to make. It's the story of a big part of America and what has happened to it. I'm calling it The Plow that Broke the Plains. It's about the dust bowl, King, and it's important. But I'm stuck. My cameramen think I'm ruining the picture. They want to quit. I've run out of money. I have no technical sound men here. I need money and I need cameramen and I need advice. Will you help me out?"

"Well, Pare, I'd like to . . ."

"I knew you would," Lorentz shouted happily. "I'll hop a plane and be in Hollywood in twelve hours."

Lorentz went to Hollywood. He lived with Vidor and used Vidor's car and at night he'd be in Chasen's or the Beachcomber's and directors and producers would say, "Hya, Pare. Good to see you." That was swell all right, except the next day when he phoned their offices they were never in. Lorentz was making the first serious motion picture ever made by the government of the United States. But the Hollywood bigwigs thought because it was sponsored by that awful Mr. R. that it must be a propaganda picture.

Silent-Picture Technique

That Mr. R. was doing all sorts of things to their industry. Why, the man actually encouraged unions and collective bargaining and other anarchistic ideas. They wanted no part of him. So they wouldn't answer the phone. John Ford would and so would Lewis Milestone and a few others, but Lorentz wanted to get some shots of a bountiful harvest in the then destitute plain areas and they didn't have any for him.

Word finally got to Mabel Walker Willebrandt, who was lobbying for the picture industry. She put in a few phone calls to Hollywood to remind them that their tight little community, technically at least, was still in the United States and how about giving Mr. Lorentz a little co-operation. Grudgingly they did. Finally he got the harvest shots he wanted. He got a few helpers from Vidor, a few bucks here and there and then he went back to finish The Plow that Broke the Plains.

Pare Lorentz was definitely in the picturemaking business. Since then he has done two others, The River and the current The Fight for Life. There are a lot of people who think Pare Lorentz makes the best pictures in the world. Lorentz will not admit the indictment. He does admit, however, that his technique is a bit different from that of most Hollywood directors.

"I'm old-fashioned," Lorentz admits. "I like the silent-picture technique. Often actions and music can talk more effectively than mere words."

Lorentz is so old-fashioned that he is brand-new. In The Fight for Life there are three-minute sequences where not a word is spoken but the music, used not as a background but as the predominant medium to explain more clearly the pantomime on the screen, heightens suspense as no words could do.

A One-Man Campaign

In the early 1920's Lorentz was born out of Clarksburg, West Virginia. He had come to New York with only vague and unformed plans as to how he would work out his destiny. In a general way he wanted to earn a living, but it was necessary, and he wanted to get to music, which wasn't a necessity. It was just something he liked to do. He got a job running a trade magazine and then he got a job with Judge. Eventually, he became movie critic for the magazine.

In those days moving pictures were usually reviewed by office boys and reporters six months out of school. Two New York newspapers had critics who realized that pictures were more than "movies." Jack Cohen of the Sun and Dick Watts of the New York Tribune were revolutionary enough to believe that pictures were potentially a new and important artistic medium.

(Continued on page 38)

The Devil Beats His Wife

By Edwin Lanham

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN H. CROSMAN

ing money brightens outlook of a boy who shed a humble dream

THEY climbed the steep hill, the white-haired old man with his left sleeve pinned up and the small boy, Shad, was so churned up in- at he could not speak. Uncle Rob ahead toward the crest of the hill fixed squint, like a man looking far in a daylight sky, and he strangely different from the Rob who carried on long and aim- conversations with the boy as he e chores around the Wilkins where Shad's mother was the cook. Shad had learned a lot from Uncle Rob. He had learned that frost always d a tipped new moon, that you plant potatoes in the dark of the that the sun shining through rain that the devil was beating his yet he had never known before Uncle Rob went when he started with the shovel over his shoulder. Today as he left the yard Uncle Rob had glanced at the boy as he ed under a chinaberry tree and Shad, you want to come along?" Shad was excited, for as long as he remember he had seen Uncle Rob ing, but he was a little scared, anyone should be when ventur- yond the range of his perceptions e major mysteries. He trailed the old man as they came to the the hill. He saw a stunted oak and a cactus plant with its prickly purple in ripeness, and the rest was oft grass. Uncle Rob suddenly dropped the and stood looking down at the with a curious, secret smile. was a hole in the grassy soil, five feet long and three feet deep, a soft bank of turned earth on one f it. Shad looked down at the a of the hole. If he had seen a on he would not have been sur- But there was nothing. Well, Shad, let's go to work," the an said. He clambered stiffly into and looked up at Shad. He held s one hand and Shad took it. The ut his eyes and held his breath as aped, and then his bare toes spread e soft dirt at the bottom. Uncle reached for the shovel. "You and me will just team up, Shad," d. "You take and guide the shovel ll push it. You reckon you can it?" "I kin," Shad said. The boy bent over and put both hands e staff of the shovel. Uncle Rob his weight against the handle and ade sank deep, deep into the red- arth. Shad helped to lift the head e shovel and toss the dirt out of t, then he guided it back for an- shovelful. He did not feel scared ore, and it wasn't as exciting as d thought it would be, just digging e. Uncle Rob," he said. "What you n' fo?" The old man smiled. "Gold, Shad." ol?" Shad considered, and looked at the earth under his bare toes.

"Yes, sir," said Uncle Rob. "A gunny- sack full of gold. A long time ago there was a train robber by the name of Sam Bass. He took a bagful of gold double eagles off the Union Pacific and rode down here with it. But the law was after him and he took and buried it here."

Shad looked down again. "Right here, Uncle Rob?"

"Somewhere hereabouts, Shad. I al- ready dug over yonder by that scrub oak, and down there by that big rock. Right here ought to be a likely place. Yes, sir, a gunnysack full of gold, Shad, about fifty, sixty thousand dollars, I reckon."

"I guess dat's a heap er money, ain't it?" Shad asked. "I guess you could buy a double dozen supercoaster bikes wif dat."

"Anyhow a double dozen," the old man said. He paused to rub his sleeve along his forehead. "You got your heart set on a bike, Shad?"

"Honin' ain't gwan hurt me none," Shad said with the adult air with which he parroted phrases of his mother.

"I TELL you what," Uncle Rob said, with a visionary smile. "When we find that gold I'll take and buy you a bike."

Shad's eyes opened wide and his breath whistled through his teeth. His eyes searched Uncle Rob's face.

"I don't know, though," Uncle Rob said, and Shad's heart sank. "Maybe we ain't digging in the right place."

Shad's body was tense and his throat had stiffened so that he could hardly speak. "Come we fine it," he said. "You jus' jokin', Uncle Rob. You jus' jokin' 'bout dat bike. . . . Ain't you?"

"No, sir," Uncle Rob said. "I ain't joking at all, Shad."

The boy's hands tightened on the shovel. "Let's us dig some mo'."

"Well, maybe a little more," Uncle Rob agreed. "All right, Shad, you get busy and guide for me."

The old man's fingers closed on the handle of the shovel and he threw his weight against it. The blade bit deep into the earth and Shad bent to pull it clear with both hands. He grunted and said, "Uncle Rob, come we fine it, what you gwan do?"

Uncle Rob leaned on the shovel and the curious, secret smile curved his gray lips again. "Me, Shad? Well, I ain't sure. I ain't made up my mind. Maybe I'll pick up and go back to Tennessee. Maybe I'll just travel around the world, where I won't have no back yard and no cows to milk nor sewing machines to fix. No more of that. It'll just be all front lawn and somebody else to mow it."

He nodded his head and pushed on the handle of the shovel. Shad guided the blade, and as he lifted it he slipped to his knees and the red earth stuck to his overalls. Uncle Rob chuckled and said, "Say, now, I expect we've done enough work for one day."

SHAD raised his intent face, shiny in the sunlight. "I ain't tired, Uncle Rob."

"Ain't you?" The old man smiled. "But I am, Shad, and time is passing. I expect we better start on home." He tossed the shovel out on the grass and climbed out of the hole.

The Negro boy scrambled up after him. Uncle Rob picked up the shovel and swung it over his shoulder. He started down the hill toward the creek road, and Shad followed slowly.

On the white dust of the road Shad came alongside the old man, peered up at him. "Uncle Rob, befo' you goes away, you ain't gwan fogit?"

"Forget what, Shad?" "Dat supercoaster bike." Shad's eyes were anxious.

Uncle Rob paused on the steel bridge

"Here we go," Uncle Rob said, and he gave the bi- cycle a push. Shad yelled. The handle bars wobbled and shook, and then the grass came up to meet him over the creek and spat into the slug- gish water. "Shad, you got my promise on that," he said. "You're going to have the finest bike money can buy, with shiny handle bars and a leather seat and a horn that honks."

"An' red wheels?" Shad asked.

"And red wheels."

The boy capered along the bridge, picked up a stone and threw it as hard as he could at a stick in the creek that might have been a water moccasin. "A supercoaster," he shouted. "Yeah, man, wif red wheels an' a honk horn an' a head lamp. An' a head lamp, Uncle Rob?"

"You bet a head lamp, Shad."

"You know what I gwan do?" Shad's teeth shone in his black face. "I gwan take my bike and ride all de way clean to de county seat an' back, first thing, an' I gwan honk ever'body off'n de the lunch counter, instead of waiting to eat on the Pullman diner. In Washington they lived at a boardinghouse.

(Continued on page 48)

Ivory from Cuba

Continued from page 19

It was at this boardinghouse last year that several Washington rookies began to toss the bewildered Cubans around. Above the din of crashing furniture and the howls of the landlady the Cubans learned that they were being slugged because Ortiz had "forgotten his place."

Ortiz and Monteagudo departed soon after that, Ortiz to Charlotte and Monteagudo—as Cambria pronounces it—to Springfield. That left Estalella and Carrasquel. In the latter, Cambria had presented to Washington the game's first South American. And a more forbidding-looking character than Carrasquel never climbed over the rail of a Spanish galleon with a dagger in his teeth. His fierce, saddle-colored face makes him look forty, but through interpreters he has said that he is 27, 28 and 29. It depends on his mood and the interviewer.

Old Mose Grove took a piercing gander at Carrasquel one day last season, spat reflectively, and bayed:

"If that guy's a rookie, I'm Paderosky. I betcha a hat I pitched against him in an exhibition game in Cuba in 1924."

Carrasquel Shows 'Em

Cambria signed Carrasquel during the 1938-1939 winter. He had been a pitcher in the Havana Winter League for a number of years. At least, his mature technique indicated as much.

His first start was a relief role against the Yanks, and a man never broke into baseball under less auspicious conditions. The bases were filled, the game was close and Joe DiMaggio was up there at the plate.

Carrasquel fastened on DiMaggio the fishy stare of a man who has never seen or met the man confronting him. The Washington catcher, Angelo Giuliani, the team's official interpreter, walked out to the mound to warn Carrasquel about the hitter. The name DiMaggio made no impression on Carrasquel. He got ready to pitch, while the Washington infielders got ready to duck—then proceeded to make DiMaggio pop up weakly to end the Yankee rally.

A few days later he did the same thing in another relief performance, with Joe Gordon as his victim. He became a sensation.

In his first three games as a starter, Carrasquel beat the Tigers, Browns and Athletics. He gave the Tigers four hits, the Browns five and the A's four. He cooled off after that, for he had left a lot of his strength in Cuba.

If baseball's anti-Latin element thought it had scored one for its side, when Estalella, Ortiz and Monteagudo were demoted in 1939, Cambria quickly disillusioned it. The intrepid scout combed Cuba last winter with old Joe Rodriguez, an ex-Giant, as his adviser. And he brought six Cubans to Washington's training camp at Orlando. Three of them he virtually kidnaped off a Cuban gunboat. They had been selected by the Cuban Sports Commission, a Batista agency, and were scheduled to be presented to the Cincinnati Reds in Tampa, via gunboat.

These were Jorge Torres, a thick-legged little outfielder; Louis Minzal, a catlike third baseman, and Arturo Castro, a six-foot-one right-handed pitcher who was so green that Washington immediately re-routed him to Greenville. Torres has been sent to Springfield and Minzal was left in Orlando to ripen.

Ortiz has been returned once again to Charlotte, where he is undergoing the rigors of forgetting how to pitch and learning how to be an outfielder. This transformation got under way last year, after extreme wildness had nullified such early-season feats as beating Detroit's $75,000 rookie thrower, Hutchinson. Ortiz was coming along fine in the Charlotte outfield, and hitting more than .300, when his skull was fractured by a thrown ball while running out a double play.

At this writing, only one Latin remains on the Washington roster. He is Monteagudo. Early this season, Washington sent him to Jersey City as a part of the deal whereby Washington was inflicted with Zeke Bonura. But he won a couple of games there with his pinch-hitting and the Senators grabbed him back—giving up Carrasquel and Gilberto Torres. Gilberto, who is no relation to Jorge Torres, has been knocking capped by a rather widespread inability on the part of American ballplayers to differentiate between Cuban and Negro athletes. This dates back to the turn of the century when the first of the Cuban immigrants usually played here with Negro teams. The immortal Cuban Giants—popularly known as the Cuban Giants—had only one Cuban on the roster around 1900. He was John Garcia, the catcher, who dropped dead one day while chasing a foul fly during a semipro game. The remainder of the team was Negro.

Two Who Stayed

The first full Cuban team to make any impression on the American public was a semipro outfit imported in 1911 by a Long Branch, New Jersey, promoter for the amusement of the resort's summer colony. That same year Clark Griffith, then making the Cincinnati Reds, imsoutherly minors whetted Luque's native temper. He was brutally ridden by the bench "jockeys" on rival National League clubs, and they'd torment him into flinging back at them all the bizzarous profanity he had picked up while serving in the Cuban army as a youth. He found even better ways of quieting his tormentors. With a second Cincinnati team behind him in 1924, he won twenty-seven games and lost eight. With a little better support record would have been thirty-one. His earned run average for the season was a bleak 1.93.

He appeared in the only world series of his long career in 1933. Bill Terry picked him up the year before and gotten some fine relief pitching out of him. But none of it was finer than what he turned in in the tenth inning of the final game of the series against Washington. The Senators had the lead and winning runs on bases and Griffith Stadium was madly demanding that Kuhel, Washington first baseman who was at bat with two out, do something about it.

He Gave Him Numbaire Two

Terry called time and strolled over to the mound where old Adolfo was fiddling. He knew that Luque had been there pitching his heart out since the sixth inning, when he relieved Hal Schumacher. He was afraid Luque was going—so afraid, in fact, that he had Hubbell warming up in the bullpen in case Kuhel hit or was walked.

"Pops," Terry said to Luque, "if you get this guy out we win the series. You've got two strikes on him. Can you finish him?"

Luque wiped a nervous hand across his creased brown pan. "Beel, u leeson to Poppa," he wheezed. "I see you in the clawhouse (clubhouse) queeck!" Terry walked back to the base and Luque struck out Kuhel with a vicious "sinker" which Kuhel missed by a good foot.

"I feexed heem! I feexed heem!" Luque kept yelling as he ran for the clubhouse. "I geev heem Numbaire Two!"

Today Luque is a political power in Cuba and one of its two or three all-time national heroes. Gonzales, too, is a hero—an opulent one with a fine home, a chauffeur and fighting cocks. Cuban youths know their records better than any American kid knows the record of Babe Ruth.

The fame of these conquistadores is a tremendous incentive to young Latin American ballplayers. They look up to them as gods, and are either oblivious or unmindful of the fact that the road they traveled was no bed of roses. A Havana newspaper printed a story in the spring that one of the Cuban rookies with Washington had to work out without socks, because Cambria was away and the Washington club would not trust the rookie with the socks until he could raise the fifty cents. The article brought a few expressions of indignation, but Cuban youth in general was not impressed. All young Cuban players can be counted upon to cup a wild ear to the horrible pidgin-Spanish of talkative Cambria, when next he comes to the island looking for bargain counter ivory.

And "Poppa Joe," who sometimes wears a Washington baseball cap with his street clothes, has a moist fountain pen. He will get every able-bodied Cuban ballplayer in sight—cheap.

Unless Judge Landis gets him that around the minors for six years. He is a big, stringy pitcher and son of Ricardo Torres, who caught for Washington in the early '20's. He has a chance.

Monteagudo looks as if he would have been better cast as a fattish, romantic, guitar strummer. He won a certain grudging respect from the Washington regulars in the spring of 1938 when he held the Senators to two hits in nine innings of an exhibition game against the Washington farmhands. The Senators brought him up late that season and he beat the Red Sox in his first big-league start. He was one of the sensations of the Eastern League with Springfield last season.

Cuban players have been coming here for more than forty years and a surprising number of them have had the talent and the gumption to make good. But only a few have ever been paid a just salary. Among this handful would be Luque, Mike Gonzalez, Joe Rodriguez and perhaps Armando Marsans, all of them persevering individualists.

In their relations with fellow players they were (and all Cubans are) handiported the fabulous Rafael Almeida, a rich young Cuban third baseman who smoked dollar cigars, had his own chauffeur-valet and who brought along his own interpreter. The interpreter was Armando Marsans. One day the eagle-eyed Griffith saw the interpreter shagging flies in the outfield, for exercise, and immediately signed him. And Marsans lasted in the big leagues for years after Almeida was forgotten.

The mainstay batter of that Long Branch outfit of nearly thirty years ago was Luque and his willowy receiver, Miquel Angel Gonzalez, called Mike Gonzales. Gonzalez, who was one day to add a deathless phrase to the American language (he summed up a so-so rookie in a blunt telegram to John McGraw in this way: GOOD FIELD. NO HIT.) went from Long Branch to the Braves and then served the Cincinnati Reds for years. He finished his playing career with the Cardinals in 1933 and today he is a power in that organization, though his role is only that of a coach.

The abuse he suffered in the more

You'll tempt summer appetites best with RITZ
the cracker that stays so fresh and crisp!

THE HEAT at meal-time by serving a chilled jellied salad, refreshing taste . . . delicious iced tea with accent on the iced — and turn on serving with Ritz! For Ritz, you know, is the famous cracker that rightfully crisp and tempting no matter how the mercury climbs. That's completely delicious all the time because a special baking process seals in freshness and flavor! Don't miss the appetizing zest that Ritz can bring to your summertime meals and snacks! Order Ritz from your food dealer today—and enjoy this finer cracker that keeps its goodness down to the last one in the package!

COLORFUL—this clever lemonade with maraschino cherries frozen in the lemonade. Served with Ritz it will hit the spot. Ritz pleases everyone, every time
America's most popular cracker!

SUMMER FAVORITE. Shivery jellied soup with Ritz is one of the most tempting
"starters" for a meal that you can serve!
Remember, Ritz' distinctive tang adds zest to all appetizers—never be without it!

THIS FAMOUS RED SEAL
of National Biscuit Company is the buying guide for housewives who want the finest in bakery products. Look for it on the package of the biscuit you buy—and you will be assured of high quality, freshness, delicious flavor.

AMERICA'S FAVORITE CRACKER • A PRODUCT OF NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

The Patriotic Murders

Continued from page 10

something, some nuance in the chairman's manner.

There had been, once or twice, a shortness, an acerbity, in his tone—quite uncalled for by the proceedings.

Some secret worry, perhaps? But somehow Rotherstein could not connect a secret worry with Alistair Blunt. He was such an unemotional man. He was so very normal. So essentially British.

There was, of course, always liver . . . Mr. Rotherstein's liver gave him a bit of trouble from time to time. But he'd never known Alistair to complain of his liver. Alistair's health was as sound as his brain and his grasp of finance. It was not annoying heartiness—just quiet well-being.

And yet—there was something—once or twice the chairman's hand had wandered to his face. He had sat supporting his chin. Not his normal attitude. And once or twice he had seemed actually—yes, distract.

They came out of the board room and passed down the stairs.

Rotherstein said:

"News is good today. Two more German destroyers sunk. Can't give you a lift, I suppose?"

Alistair Blunt smiled and shook his head.

"My car's waiting." He glanced at his watch. "I'm not going back to the city." He paused. "As a matter of fact I've got an appointment with the dentist."

The mystery was solved! Toothache!

HERCULE POIROT descended from his taxi, paid the man and rang the bell of 58, Queen Charlotte Street.

After a little delay it was opened by a boy in page-boy's uniform with a freckled face, red hair, and an earnest manner.

Hercule Poirot said:

"Mr. Morley?"

There was in his heart a ridiculous hope that Mr. Morley might have been called away, might be indisposed, might not be seeing patients today. . . . All in vain. The page boy drew back. Hercule Poirot stepped inside, and the door closed behind him with the quiet remorselessness of unalterable doom.

The boy said:

"Name, please?"

Poirot gave it to him, a door on the right of the hall was thrown open and he stepped into the waiting room.

It was a room furnished in quiet good taste. On one of the chairs sat a military-looking gentleman with a fierce mustache and a yellow complexion. He looked at Poirot with an air of one considering some noxious insect. It was not so much his gun he looked as though he wished he had with him as his insect spray. Poirot, eying him with distaste, said to himself, "In verity, there are some Englishmen who are altogether so unpleasing and ridiculous that they should have been put out of their misery at birth."

The military gentleman, after a prolonged glare, snatched up the Times, turned his chair so as to avoid seeing Poirot, and settled down to read it.

Poirot picked up Punch.

He went through it meticulously, but failed to find any of the jokes funny.

The page boy came in and said, "Colonel Arrowbunby?"—and the military gentleman was led away.

Poirot was speculating on the probabilities of there really being such a name, when the door opened to admit a young man of about thirty.

As the young man stood by the table, restlessly flicking over the covers of magazines, Poirot looked at him sideways. An unpleasant and dangerous-looking young man, he thought, and not impossibly a murderer. At any rate he looked far more like a murderer than any of the murderers Hercule Poirot had arrested in the course of his career.

The page boy opened the door and said to mid-air:

"Mr. Peerer."

Rightly construing this as a summons to himself, Poirot rose. The boy led him to the back of the hall and around the corner to a small lift in which he took him up to the second floor. Here he led him along a passage, opened a door that led into a little anteroom, tapped at a second door and without waiting for a reply opened it and stood back for Poirot to enter.

it, for the time of year? News was fair, on the whole—

Gently, still talking, he led the way to the appointed spot—to the chair! Deftly he played with its head rest, running it up and down.

Hercule Poirot took a deep breath, stepped up, sat down and relaxed his head to Mr. Morley's professional fiddlings.

"There," said Mr. Morley with hideous cheerfulness. "That quite comfortable? Sure?"

In sepulchral tones Poirot said that it was quite comfortable.

Mr. Morley swung his little table nearer, picked up his little mirror, seized an instrument and prepared to get on with the job.

Hercule Poirot grasped the arms of Poirot thought in confused idiom: "seen the rabbit!"

"A little trouble here. Not being any pain? Hm, I'm sure. The probe went on.

Finally Mr. Morley drew back and fied. "Nothing very serious. Just a trace of decay in the upper molar. We can get it all right, this morning."

He turned on a switch and the hum. Mr. Morley unhooked the drill and fitted a needle to it with loving hands.

"Guide me," he said briefly, started the dread work.

It was not necessary for Poirot to avail himself of this permission, a hand, to wince, or even to yawn. Exactly the right moment, Mr. Morley stopped the drill, gave the bit a little "Rinse," applied a little disinfectant, selected a new needle and continued

PRESENTLY, while Mr. Morley was preparing the filling, conversation was resumed.

"Have to do this myself this morning," he explained. "Miss Neville has been called away. You remember Neville?"

Poirot untruthfully assented.

"Called away to the country by illness of a relative. Sort of thing that does happen on a busy day. I'm here already this morning. The trouble before you was late. Very vexing, that happens. It throws the whole thing out. Then I have to fit in a patient because she is in pain. I allow quarter of an hour in a morning case that happens. Still, it adds up."

Mr. Morley peered into his mirror as he ground. Then he resumed his discourse:

"I'll tell you something that I've always noticed, M. Poirot. The people—the important people—the people on time—never keep you waiting. Royalty, for instance. Most important. And these big city men are the same. Now this morning I've got an important man coming—Alistair Blunt."

Mr. Morley spoke the name in a tone of triumph.

Poirot, prohibited from speaking, several rolls of cotton wool and a tube that gurgled under his breath made an indeterminate noise.

Alistair Blunt! Those were the days that shrilled nowadays. Not diamonds, not prime ministers. Not Mr. Alistair Blunt. A man who was almost unknown to the general public—a man who only figured in occasional quiet paragraphs. Not a spectacular person.

Just a quiet, nondescript Englishman who was the head of the greatest firm in England. A man of great wealth. A man who said Yes at governments. A man who lived a quiet, unobtrusive life and never appeared on a public platform or made a speech. Yet a man in whose hands lay great power.

Mr. Morley's voice still held a different tone as he stood over Poirot, filling the home.

"Always comes to his appointments absolutely on time. Often sends away and walks back to his office quiet, unassuming fellow. Fond of his garden. You could buy up the whole country. Just like you and me."

A momentary resentment crossed Poirot at this offhand coupling of names. Mr. Morley was a good dentist, there were other good dentists

Poirot entered to a sound of running water and came around the back of the door to discover Mr. Morley washing his hands with professional gusto at a basin on the wall.

THERE are certain humiliating moments in the lives of the greatest of men. It has been said that no man is a hero to his valet. To that may be added that few men are heroes to themselves at the moment of visiting their dentist.

Hercule Poirot was morbidly conscious of this fact.

He was a man who was accustomed to have a good opinion of himself. He was Hercule Poirot, superior in most ways to other men. But in this moment he was unable to feel superior in any way whatever. His morale was down to zero. He was just that ordinary, that craven figure, a man afraid of the dentist's chair.

Mr. Morley had finished his professional ablutions. He was speaking now in his encouraging professional manner.

Hardly as warm as it should be, was the chair, shut his eyes and opened his mouth.

"Any special trouble?" Mr. Morley inquired.

Slightly indistinctly, owing to the difficulty of forming consonants while keeping the mouth open, Hercule Poirot was understood to say that there was no special trouble. This was, indeed, the twice yearly overhaul that his sense of order and neatness demanded. It was, of course, possible that there might be nothing to do. . . . Mr. Morley might, perhaps, overlook that second tooth from the back from which those twinges had come. . . . He might—but it was unlikely—for Mr. Morley was a very good dentist.

Mr. Morley passed slowly from tooth to tooth, tapping and probing, murmuring little comments as he did so.

"That filling is wearing down a little—nothing serious, though. Gums are in pretty good condition, I'm glad to see." A pause at a suspect, a twist of the probe—no, on again, false alarm. He passed to the lower side. One, two—on to three? "The dog," Hercule

Something you don't have to pay for

LIFE INSURANCE POLICY is a contract between the Company and you. The Company wishes to fulfill the terms of that contract, but perform every reasonable service that may increase your policy's value to you and your family.

Evidence of this, you will find a "Notice to Holder" printed plainly on the back of most Metropolitan policies. If you will read this notice, you will find that it is not necessary to employ any agent to collect the insurance payable under your Metropolitan policy, to obtain any information about your policy, or to secure any of the benefits that policy provides. The Company wishes to pay every proper claim without delay.

What is necessary is to get in touch with your Metropolitan agent, or with the manager of your District Office. If this is not convenient, write directly to the Home Office in New York City, or to the Pacific Coast Head Office in San Francisco.

Whenever you have a question about your policy, it is advisable to consult your Metropolitan Agent. It is his responsibility to help you solve insurance problems, and to serve you efficiently, sympathetically, and intelligently... and without additional charge of any kind.

Following are a few of the many instances in which your Agent's help is available for the asking.

Payment of Death Claims or other Benefits. For notary fees, there is no need for a beneficiary to pay a fee for preparation of claim papers or other papers necessary for other benefits. Your Metropolitan Agent will give you any assistance that may be necessary in preparing and filing such papers, and will help to arrange for prompt payment of the claim.

Analyzing or checking your insurance program.

Your Metropolitan Agent will co-operate with you in seeing that your insurance fulfills the purpose for which you bought it. If there have been any changes in your economic status, or in your family obligations, your Agent will help you work out a plan to make your insurance program cover them.

Explaining Retroactive Benefits on Liberalized Policies.

Metropolitan, in common with other companies, has made liberalizing improvements through the years, particularly in Industrial policies. Each improvement has been of advantage to the policyholder. Wherever possible, these additional benefits have been made retroactive, so that if you own an old policy, you may be entitled to certain benefits which this old policy does not contain in writing.

If you have an old policy on which you no longer pay premiums, you may wonder if it has any value. Such old policies often do have value. And, through voluntary action by the Company, many Weekly Premium policies have become eligible for cash surrender value if premiums on them were paid for at least three years, even though the policy terms require a longer premium-paying period.

Of course, nothing in this advertisement is intended to suggest that either you or your beneficiaries should refrain from consulting a trusted family advisor, or a competent and reputable attorney-at-law in case you, or your beneficiaries, feel the need of doing so.

One thing more. Even though you may have read your life insurance policy thoroughly, do so again... at once. Read it from beginning to end. Be certain that both you and your beneficiaries are familiar with its provisions. If there is anything that you, or they, do not understand, your Company's agent will be glad to explain—or, if you prefer, communicate with the Home office.

COPYRIGHT 1940—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE CO.

This is Number 28 in a series of advertisements designed to give the public a clearer understanding of how a life insurance company operates. Copies of preceding advertisements in this series will be mailed upon request.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

Frederick H. Ecker, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD

Leroy A. Lincoln, PRESIDENT

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Plan to visit the Metropolitan's exhibits at the New York World's Fair and at the Golden Gate International Exposition in San Francisco.

Just an inch and a half from a kiss!

don. There was only one Hercule Poirot.

"Rinse, please," said Mr. Morley.

"It's the answer, you know, to Hitler and his gang," went on Mr. Morley as he proceeded to tooth number two. "That's the way we do things in this country. No fuss. No bulletproof glass and secret police and storm troopers. I've no doubt the Germans are fundamentally a decent lot. They've got into the hands of a gang. Blood and thunder instead of peaceful democratic methods. Even our king and queen are democratic. Of course a Frenchman like you, accustomed to the Republican idea—" "I—ah nah, a Frahh—I ah—ha a Benyon."

"Tchut—tchut—" said Mr. Morley sadly. "We must have the cavity completely dry." He puffed hot air relentlessly on it.

THEN he went on:

"I didn't realize you were a Belgian. Very interesting. Very fine people, the Belgians, so I've always heard. I'm a great believer in the tradition of royalty myself. The training is good, you know. Look at the remarkable way they remember names and faces. All the result of training—though of course some people have a natural aptitude for that sort of thing. I, myself, for instance. I don't remember names, but it's remarkable the way I never forget a face. One of my patients the other day, for instance—I've seen that patient before. The name meant nothing to me—but I said to myself at once, 'Now where have I met you before?' I've not remembered yet—but it will come back to me—I'm sure of it. Just another rinse, please."

The rinse accomplished, Mr. Morley peered critically into his patient's mouth.

"Well, I think that seems all right. Just close—very gently. . . . Quite comfortable? You don't feel the filling at all? Open again, please. No, that seems quite all right."

The table swung back, the chair swung around.

Hercule Poirot descended, a free man.

"Well, goodbye, M. Poirot. Not detected any criminals in my house, I hope?"

Poirot said with a smile:

"Before I came up, everyone looked to me like a criminal! Now, perhaps, it will be different!"

"Ah, yes, a great deal of difference between before and after! All the same, we dentists aren't such devils now as we used to be! Shall I ring for the lift for you?"

"No, no, I shall walk down."

"As you like—the lift is just by the stairs."

Poirot went out. He heard the taps start to run as he closed the door behind him.

He walked down the two flights of stairs. As he came to the last bend, he saw the Anglo-Indian colonel being shown out. Not at all a bad-looking man, Poirot reflected mellowly. Probably a fine shot who had killed many a tiger. A useful man—a regular outpost of Empire.

He went into the waiting room to fetch his hat and stick which he had left there. The restless young man was still there, somewhat to Poirot's surprise. Another patient, a man, was reading Field.

Poirot studied the young man in his newborn spirit of kindness. He still looked very fierce—and as though he wanted to do a murder—but not really a murderer—thought Poirot kindly. Doubtless, presently, this young man would come tripping down the stairs, his ordeal over, happy and smiling and wishing no ill to anyone.

The page boy entered and said firmly and distinctly:

"Mr. Blunt."

The man at the table laid down the magazine and got up. A man height, of middle age, neither fat nor thin. Well-dressed, quiet.

He went out after the boy.

One of the richest and most powerful men in England—but he still went to the dentist just like anybody else and no doubt felt just the same body else about it!

These reflections passing through his mind, Hercule Poirot picked up his hat and stick and went to the door, glanced back as he did so, and startled thought went through his mind that that young man must have a bad toothache indeed.

In the hall Poirot paused before the mirror there to adjust his ruffled hair slightly disarranged as the result of Morley's ministrations.

He had just completed its adjustment to his satisfaction when the door came down again and the young man emerged from the back of the building, looking disconcerted. He broke off abruptly at the sight of Poirot and to open the front door for him.

A taxi had just drawn up before the house and a foot was protruding from Poirot surveyed the foot with great interest.

A neat ankle, quite a good one, wearing a stocking. Not a bad foot. But like the shoe. A brand-new leather shoe with a large buckle. He shook his head.

Not chic—very provincial!

The lady got out of the taxi, doing so she caught her other foot in the door and the buckle was wrung off. It fell tinkling onto the pavement. Poirot sprang forward and picked it up, restoring it with a bow.

Alas! Nearer fifty than forty Poirot was. Untidy yellow-gray hair, coming clothes—those depressing greens! She thanked him, dropping her pince-nez, then her handbag.

Poirot, polite if no longer surprised, picked them up for her, and he went up the steps of 58, Queen Charlotte Street.

IT WAS a quarter to three when the telephone rang.

Hercule Poirot was sitting in his chair happily digesting an excellent lunch.

He did not move when the door opened but waited for the faithful George to come and take the call.

"Eh bien?" he said, as George lowered the receiver.

"It's Chief Inspector Japp, sir."

"Aha?"

Poirot lifted the receiver to his ear.

"How goes it?" he said.

"That you, Poirot?"

"Naturally."

"I hear you went to the dentist this morning? Is that so?"

Poirot murmured:

"Scotland Yard knows everything."

"Man of the name of Morley, Queen Charlotte Street."

"Yes." Poirot's voice had a note of surprise.

"Why?"

"It was a genuine visit, was it? You didn't go to put the wind up anything of the sort?"

"Certainly not. I had the filling filled, if you want to know."

"What did he seem like to you, Morley?"

"I should say so, yes. Why?"

Japp's voice was rigidly unemotional. "Because not so very much like a murderer, did he?"

"What?"

Japp said sharply,

"That surprises you?"

"Frankly, it does."

Japp said:

"I'm not too happy about it myself. I'd like to have a talk with you to pose you wouldn't like to come."

"Where are you?"
 "On Charlotte Street."
 "What said?"
 "I'll join you immediately."

"Was a police constable who opened the door of 58. He said respectfully:
 'Poirot?'"

"I, myself."
 "The chief inspector is upstairs. Sec-for—you know it?"

"Poirot said:
 'Is there this morning.'
 'There were three men in the room.
 'I looked up as Poirot entered.
 'He said:

"I'd like to see you, Poirot. We're just going to move him. Like to see him
 now?"

"A man with a camera who had been standing near the body got up.
 'He came forward. The body was near the fireplace.

"Death Mr. Morley looked very pale as he had looked in life. There was a little blackened hole just below his temple. A small pistol lay on the floor near his outflung right hand.

"Poirot shook his head gently.
 'He said: "All right, you can move
 now."
 'He took Mr. Morley away. Japp and Poirot were left alone.

"Japp said:
 'We're through all the routine.
 'Fingerprints, etc."
 'Poirot sat down. He said:

"I'm me."
 'He pursed up his lips. He said:
 'He could have shot himself. He only did shoot himself. There are his fingerprints on the gun—but I'm quite satisfied."

"What are your objections?"
 "Well, to begin with, there doesn't seem to be any reason why he should shoot himself. . . . He was in good health, was making money, he hadn't any reason that anyone knew of. He wasn't in love with a woman—at least," Japp pressed himself cautiously, "as far as I know he wasn't. He hasn't been depressed or unlike himself.

That's partly why I was anxious to hear what you said. You saw him this morning, and I wondered if you'd noticed anything."

Poirot shook his head.

"Nothing at all. He was—what shall I say—normality itself. When did the tragedy occur?"

"Can't say exactly. Nobody seems to have heard the shot. But I don't think they would. There are two doors between here and the passage and they have baize fitted round the edges—to deaden the noise from the victims of the dental chair, I imagine."

"Very probably. Patients under gas sometimes make a lot of noise."

"Quite. And outside, in the street, there's plenty of traffic, so you wouldn't be likely to hear it out there."

"When was it discovered?"

"Round about one-thirty—by the page boy, Alfred Biggs. Not a very bright specimen, by all accounts. It seems that Morley's 12:30 patient kicked up a bit of a row at being kept waiting.
 About 1:10 the boy came up and knocked. There was no answer and apparently he didn't dare come in. He'd got in a few rows already from Morley and he was nervous of doing the wrong thing. He went down again and the patient walked out in a huff at 1:15. I don't blame her. She'd been kept waiting three quarters of an hour and she wanted her lunch."

"Who was she?"

JAPP grinned.

"According to the boy she was Miss Shirty—but from the appointment book her name was Kirby."

"What system was there for showing up patients?"

"When Morley was ready for his next patient he pressed that buzzer over there and the boy then showed the patient up."

"And Morley pressed the buzzer
 last?"

"At five minutes past twelve, and the boy showed up the patient who was waiting. Mr. Amberiotis, Savoy Hotel,

How's your "Pep Appeal"?

—by Williamson

Barbara: Who are you to say I haven't any pep appeal!

Auntie: Dear! Dear! A little job for me.

Auntie: Good morning, children. Did I hear some one mention PEP? I was just thinking how delicious a bowl of KELLOGG'S PEP would taste for breakfast. And, you know, it's rich in two important vitamins. Vitamins for pep! Let's have some!

Auntie: Yes, my dears, there would be no pep in any of us—no what you call "oomph"— without vitamins. We need them all. And that delicious cereal, KELLOGG'S PEP, is extra rich in two of the most important ones—vitamins B<sub>1</sub> and D.

Bob: Saay! This PEP tastes swell!

Barbara: Now that we've learned about vitamins and KELLOGG'S PEP, just watch me become your "pep appeal" girl.

Bob: Seems to me you have already!

Vitamins for pep! Kellogg's Pep for vitamins!

Pep contains per serving: 4/5 to 1/5 the minimum daily need of vitamin B<sub>1</sub>, according to age; 1/2 the daily need of vitamin D. For sources of other vitamins, see the Pep package.

MADE BY KELLOGG'S IN BATTLE CREEK

COPYRIGHT, 1940, BY KELLOGG COMPANY

"I'll get the tickets and take care of the luggage—you keep counting them!"

GARDNER REA

according to the appointment book."
"At what time did this Mr. Amberiotis leave?"

"The boy didn't show him out, so he doesn't know. . . . A good many patients just go down the stairs without ringing for the lift and let themselves out."

Poirot nodded.

Japp went on:

"But I rang up the Savoy Hotel. Mr. Amberiotis was quite precise. He said he looked at his watch as he closed the front door and it was then twenty-five minutes past twelve."

"He could tell you nothing of importance?"

"No, all he could say was that the dentist had seemed perfectly normal and calm in his manner."

"Eh bien," said Poirot. "Then that seems quite clear. Between twenty-five past twelve and half-past one something happened—and presumably nearer the former time."

"Quite. Because otherwise—"

"Otherwise he would have pressed the buzzer for the next patient."

"Exactly. The medical evidence agrees with that for what it's worth. The divisional surgeon examined the body—at twenty past two. He wouldn't commit himself—they never do nowadays—too many individual idiosyncrasies, they say. But Morley couldn't have been shot later than one o'clock, he says—probably considerably earlier—but he wouldn't be definite."

Poirot said thoughtfully:

"Then at twenty-five minutes past twelve our dentist is a normal dentist, cheerful, urbane, competent. And after that? Despair—misery—what you will—and he shoots himself."

"It's funny," said Japp. "You've got to admit, it's funny."

"Funny," said Poirot, "is not the word."

"I know it isn't really—but it's the sort of thing one says. It's odd, then, if you like that better."

"Was it his own pistol?"

"No, it wasn't. He didn't have a pistol. Never had had one. According to his sister there wasn't such a thing in the house. There isn't in most houses. Of course he might have bought it if he'd made up his mind to do away with himself. If so, we'll soon know about it."

Poirot asked:

"Is there anything else that worries you?"

JAPP rubbed his nose.

"Well, there was the way he was lying. I wouldn't say a man couldn't fall like that—but it wasn't quite right somehow! And there was just a trace or two on the carpet—as though something had been dragged along it."

"That, then, is decidedly suggestive."

"Yes, unless it was that dratted boy. I've a feeling that he may have tried to move Morley when he found him. He denies it, of course, but then he was scared. He's that kind of young ass. The kind that's always putting their foot in it and getting cursed, and so they come to lie about things almost automatically."

Poirot looked thoughtfully around the room.

At the washbasin on the wall behind the door, at the tall filing cabinet on the other side of the door. At the dental chair and surrounding apparatus near the window, then along to the fireplace and back to where the body lay; there was a second door in the wall near the fireplace.

Japp had followed his glance.

"Just a small office through there." He flung open the door.

It was, as he had said, a small room, with a desk, a table with a spirit lamp and tea apparatus and some chairs. There was no other door.

"This is where his secretary worked," explained Japp. "Miss Neville. It seems she's away today."

His eyes met Poirot's. The latter said:

"He told me, I remember. That again—might be a point against suicide?"

"You mean she was got out of the way?"

Japp paused. He said:

"If it wasn't suicide, he was murdered. But why? That solution seems almost as unlikely as the other. He seems to have been a quiet, inoffensive sort of chap. Who would want to murder him?"

POIROT said:

"Who could have murdered him?"

Japp said, "The answer to that is—almost anybody! His sister could have come down from their flat above and shot him, one of the servants could have come in and shot him. His partner, Reilly, could have shot him. The boy Alfred could have shot him. One of the patients could have shot him." He paused and said, "And Amberiotis could have shot him—easiest of the lot."

Poirot nodded.

"But in that case—we have to find out why?"

"Exactly. You've come around again to the original problem. Why? Amberiotis is staying at the Savoy. Why does a rich Greek want to come and shoot an inoffensive dentist?"

"That's really going to be our stumbling block. Motive! I think the first thing is to have another talk with Miss Morley. I've only had a word or two. It was a shock to her, of course, but she's the kind that doesn't break down. We'll go and see her now."

Tall and grim, Georgina Morley listened to what the two men had to say and answered their questions. She said with emphasis:

"It's incredible to me—quite incredible—that my brother should have committed suicide!"

Poirot said: "You realize the alternative, Mademoiselle?"

"You mean—murder." She paused. Then she said slowly: "It is true—that alternative seems nearly as impossible as the other."

"But not quite as impossible?"

"No—because—oh, in the first case, you see, I am speaking of something I know—that is: my brother's state of mind. I know he had nothing on his mind—I know that there was no reason—no reason at all why he should take his own life!"

"You saw him this morning—before he started work?"

"At breakfast—yes."

"And he was quite as usual—not upset in any way?"

"He was upset—but not in the way you mean. He was just annoyed!"

"Why was that?"

"He had a busy morning in front of him, and his secretary and assistant had been called away."

"That is Miss Neville?"

"Yes."

"What used she to do for him?"

"She did all his correspondence, of course, and kept the appointment book, and filed all the charts. She also saw to the sterilizing of the instruments and ground up his fillings and handed them to him when he was working."

"Had she been with him long?"

"Three years. She is a very reliable girl and we are—were both very fond of her."

Poirot said: "She was called away owing to the illness of a relative, so your brother told me."

"Yes, she got a telegram to say her aunt had had a stroke. She went off to Somerset by an early train."

"And that was what annoyed your brother so much?"

"Ye-es." There was a faint hesitation in Miss Morley's answer. She went on rather hurriedly. "You—you mustn't think my brother unfeeling. It was Henry advised the girl against you, Carter, certainly; but she didn't take his advice—she is foolishly devoted to Frank."

"Is there anyone else you can think of who had a grudge against your brother?"

Miss Morley shook her head.

"Did he get on well with his partner, Mr. Reilly?"

Miss Morley replied acidly:

"As well as you can ever hope to get on with an Irishman!"

"What do you mean by that, Miss Morley?"

"WELL, Irishmen have hot tempers and they thoroughly enjoy a row of any kind. Mr. Reilly liked arguing about politics."

"That was all?"

"That was all. Mr. Reilly is unsentimental in many ways, but he was skilled in his profession—or so my brother said."

Japp persisted: "How is he unsentimental?"

Miss Morley hesitated, then said acidly: "He drinks too much—please don't let that go any further."

"Was there any trouble between him and your brother on that subject?"

"Henry gave him one or two lessons in dentistry," continued Miss Morley didactically, "a steady hand is needed."

Japp bowed his head in agreement. Then he said: "Can you tell us anything of your brother's financial position?"

"Henry was making a good income and he had a certain amount put away. We each had a small private income of our own left to us by our father."

Japp murmured with a slight smile: "You don't know, I suppose, if your brother left a will?"

"He did—and I can tell you its contents. He left a hundred pounds. Gladys Nevill, otherwise every cent comes to me."

"I see. Now—"

There was a fierce thump on the door. Alfred's face then appeared around the door. His goggling eyes took in each of the two visitors as he ejaculated:

"It's Miss Nevill. She wants to see if she may come in."

Japp nodded and Miss Morley said: "Tell her to come here, Alfred."

GLADYS NEVILL was a tall, somewhat anemic girl of twenty-eight. Though obviously upset, she at once showed that she was capable and intelligent.

Under the pretext of looking through Mr. Morley's papers, Poirot and Japp got her away from Miss Morley to the little office next door to the surgery.

She repeated more than once:

"I simply cannot believe it! It is quite incredible that Mr. Morley should do such a thing!"

She was emphatic that he had seemed troubled or worried in any way.

Then Japp began: "You were away today, Miss Nevill—"

She interrupted him.

"Yes, and the whole thing is a wicked practical joke! I do think it awful of people to do things like that really do."

"What do you mean, Miss Nevill?"

"Why, there wasn't anything the matter with Aunt at all. She'd been better. She couldn't understand when I suddenly turned up. Of course I was ever so glad—but it did make me mad. Sending a telegram like that upsetting me and everything."

"Have you got that telegram, Miss Nevill?"

"I threw it away, I think, at the time. It just said: Your aunt had last night stop Please come at once (To be continued next week)

Bubbles that never break!

BUBBLES this little girl has blown will never first—for they have been perpetuated in a beautiful picture. Make your pictures of these fleeting moments of loveliness as rich as possible by using a really film—Agfa Film!

For outdoor use, we suggest Agfa Plenachrome. But Agfa's complete line of films you will discover exactly the film you need for every type of photography.

Agfa Films bring you that famous "extra margin of quality" which helps you get best results under ordinary conditions, and surprisingly good results even when conditions are far from favorable.

Agfa Film helps you get clear, sparkling pictures, with sharp detail and attractive lights and shadows.

Get Agfa Film today... and see what a difference it makes! Every roll of Agfa Film is guaranteed: "Pictures that satisfy or a new roll free!" Agfa Ansco, Binghamton, New York. Made in U. S. A.

Agfa Film

The only film that guarantees
"Pictures that satisfy or a new roll free!"

From Barn to Boudoir, or the Rise of Elsie the Cow

ELSIE, THE BORDEN COW, was toying with a hairbrush in her wonderful new boudoir at the New York World's Fair.

She was terribly excited about the room, but trying hard to look nonchalant.

Elmer, the Bull, cleared his throat and said, "Some place, eh? Even better than we had last year."

"Why shouldn't it be?" Elsie replied. "I was the hit of the Fair last year. I expect a couple of million more people will want to shake hoofs with me this summer. To think that I owe all this to my milk!"

"And to The Borden Company," Elmer grunted. "After all, Elsie, they really brought you here just to give visitors a fancy-dress version of how well you live back home."

"Also to show how many important products are made from my milk," Elsie added. "Like ice cream."

"I've never tasted ice cream," murmured Elmer. "Is it as good as clover?"

"Better!" exclaimed Elsie. "Borden's Ice Cream is about a million times better... rich... smooth... unbelievably pure. Ask the young veterinarian who checks my health. Ask the scientists in the lab. Ask all those other folks who account for Borden's 'Quality Control'.

They know that Borden's Ice Cream and the other Borden products are as good and pure as can be made."

"What are the other products, Elsie? The last you told me, I was reading the funnies."

"Well," said Elsie, "for one thing, there's Borden's Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk. Cooks and bakers use it for cake frostings and cookies and candies that would make even the Trylon's mouth water."

"And," she went on excitedly, "there's Borden's Irradiated Evaporated Milk, too. It's used by housewives in mashed potatoes and casserole dishes. Doctors also approve it for babies. It's rich in the sunshine vitamin, Vitamin D."

"Come down off the soap box, Elsie," smiled Elmer. "You'll get so excited you'll curdle your milk."

"Humph," declared Elsie, "some of my milk has been liberally curdled by experts... that's what happens to all milk that is made into cheese. One of the delicious cheese foods is Borden's Chateau, made from an old Canadian recipe that lots of people have tried to imitate, but can't. Mmmm, but it's good!"

"Gee, Elsie," said Elmer, "there is a lot more to milk than I thought. I can see why Borden's show you off in their boudoir. But, even if you are a big shot, how about a tour of the Fair this noon?"

"Gladly," Elsie smiled. "But you'll have to promise to buy me a glass of Borden's Malted Milk. Now, I'm a celebrity, I have to watch my school-girl image. So I've taken up the habit of the Hollywood stars. I drink Borden's Malted Milk daily as the mainstay of my light lunch... it's so nourishing and satisfying. What's more, it's the malted milk the Quints drink."

"I'll have one, too," Elmer said, "provided it's good." "Good?" exclaimed Elsie. "If it's Borden's, it's GOT to be good!"

Be sure to see Elsie in her Boudoir at the Borden Building, New York World's Fair.

Continued from page 18

There was no sound outside of any arriving. She rubbed her hand over the wall. One of Blaerchen's, at least, was clear! Here was a place where people might hear Carola could be a gracious where people could talk trust- and be overheard.

It nauseated. No matter what she might do, she would not con- work for him!

Some fifteen minutes later. There was nothing relaxed or genial in his now. "You look upset, Carola," he coldly. "What's the matter?"

She might not yet have received any about Maria and the microphone. She just left here. She had news that her husband was killed at the front.

"It's too bad!" He might have been shocked to the news of the death of a family dog.

"I felt particularly upset," Carola replied, "because you had promised that Fritz would not be sent to the front."

"Do you think I have nothing more to look out for the whereabouts of my husband? She should be proud of me. Other women have lost hus-

I sent him home partly because I was upset by the call. After all, I had no proof that it was genuine. If it had his suspicions. It was still a game in

"I am conceited enough to think that

LAURENCE REYNOLDS

no proof that it was genuine. If it had his suspicions. It was still a game in

"Perspiration Odor is a Handicap to any man's success!"

"And the tragedy is that a man may offend and never know it. I take no chances—and always use Mum!" says Mr. John David Sweeney, Jr., a crack salesman for Stewart-Warner Refrigerators.

"WITH business hard to get... with competition keen and active... no man can afford to offend! For perspiration odor is one fault that no one ever forgives—or forgets! That's why I always play safe... with Mum!"

Why ever take this risk yourself? Why let perspiration odor handicap your business success, your social popularity? It is so easy to be safe... if only you use Mum every single day!

How Mum Acts to "Kill" Underarm Odor

Right after every shower, dab a little Mum under each arm. It takes but 30 seconds... yet you definitely end perspiration odor all day long. Remember—a shower merely cares for past perspiration, but Mum vetoes risk of underarm odor to come.

Mum is a pleasant, bland cream deodorant, easy to use, effective in results. It won't irritate your skin. It can't harm your shirts. And Mum does not stop perspiration.

Ask the ladies, they know! Your wife, sister or mother uses a deodorant—probably Mum. But shy away from daily arguments and don't try to "borrow" theirs. Get a jar of Mum from your druggist today. And whether you are starting a business day, or a social evening, make sure you will never offend... with MUM!

MUM

takes the Odor out of Perspiration

Socially or in business—Play safe with Mum!

Your morning shower takes care of yesterday's perspiration, but Mum prevents underarm odor to come—carries on where your bath leaves off.

The people you meet in business—and your family and friends—like you better when you avoid risk of underarm odor with Mum.

"Well, if it's going to take us two years to prepare, I don't see what we have to worry about now" you will be, some day." Pointedly he added: "If I weren't, I shouldn't believe a word of your explanation about Froschetti last night."

It was not comforting to think what he might do if ever he found out that he was mistaken.

"I must go now," he said as if he regretted it. "Is there anything I can do for you?"

"Nothing, thank you. By the way, I'm going to find a new apartment."

"What's the matter with this?" Blaerchen looked surprised.

"I don't like the furnishings," Carola said pointedly.

He laughed. "Let me know your new address at once."

When he was gone Carola could scarcely wait to get to the telephone. She was trembling and she had to hold the receiver tightly as if it were a means of escape.

"Herr Wagner is not in," a voice answered her. "He will be in his office tomorrow morning."

She sank in an armchair, exhausted.

SHE was alone now, as she had been alone in her decision to leave Blaerchen's employ. That loneliness was intolerable now, colored by the deepening fear that she had acted unwisely. To send a telegram to Karl asking him to meet her would take several hours. She considered going to him without any announcement; that could be dangerous and Karl had warned against it. Still, she could be very careful. It was unbearable to sit here, asking herself for advice and getting only familiar answers. After this Froschetti incident she could never be sure that her house was not watched, that every step she took was not reported. No one must know that she was trying to see Karl.

She left the house and moved along leisurely as if out for a walk. As far as she could tell no one followed her. At Kurfürstendamm she boarded a bus, rode a short distance, then got off and strolled around the block. No one followed her, on foot or by car.

Then she took a bus to Alexanderplatz and walked to Karl's apartment.

Its dinginess made no impression. She saw it only as a place where she could find help and advice. She had no certainly that Karl would be at home but at least she would feel better trying to see him. She knocked.

Karl opened the door. When Carola his face showed surprise rather than pleasure. In the room behind stood a large, red-faced man, and before Karl could say anything the man grinned and called out, "Come in, Liebchen, come in."

Karl looked embarrassed. "Herr Kreitz, the house warden."

"I didn't know you expected a visitor," Kreitz said pleasantly. He was obviously drunk. "We were just weren't we, Herr Dietrich? What I saying? Oh, yes; here am I, a Nazi, a member of the party since 1933 with a lower party number than most men in Berlin, and what do I do for a job as house warden, and no money enough to buy cigarettes, no money enough to buy a drink once in a while."

Carola was sorry she had come because Karl looked embarrassed and concerned.

Kreitz continued: "Six years ago leaders told us they were going to nationalize all the stores and all the factories, nicht wahr? Ja wohl, store! I thought I might at least be manager of a store. I didn't know Wertheims, I just wanted a little Did I get it? Nein! Here I am in an old apartment house and no money paid. Mein Herr, you will be sure how miserable!"

"I'm sorry to hear it."

Something in Karl's voice brought Kreitz's voice up sharply. He was genial; now he was suspicious. Carola standing uncertain what to do and Karl uncertain what to say seemed to remember his official position. "Who is this woman?"

Karl had to say something jumped at an explanation that least arouse Kreitz. "This is Friedrich Schmidt," he said, winking at Carola. "She is just a little Maedchen. I opened to meet her on Friedrich Street. She said she was lonely and cheering up."

"Ho! Ho! We'll cheer her up if she came closer to Carola. 'You married, with a husband off front?'"

"No," Carola said quietly.

tz came closer to Carola and d at her. He saw Carola step
"See here, Dietrich, she doesn't ke a street woman to me. Let me our identification papers, Fräu-hmidt."

haven't them with me," Carola quickly.
a serious offense to be out with-em. How do I know you are in Schmidt?" He looked more ous than ever. "Which Fräulein
it?"

ola was watching him closely, apg more and more uneasy. She relessly, "Why should you bother papers at this time of the night, Kreitz? Come on, let's all go to pe and get a drink."

e." Krietz grinned. Then he at Carola again and frowned.
go in a minute. I'm an expert on women, and this one looks differhe has no papers. I'm going to e police!"

it a minute," Karl said desper-
"Why should you be so worried her if she's what you say she is?"
tz staggered to the door. "I'm go-telephone the police." He started he stairs.

ouldn't have come, Karl, I know Carola began, "but I had to."
m glad you did." They could reitz banging on the staircase one a time.

at shall we do?"
it! There is no way out except staircase."

ere is the telephone?"
on't know. It might be on the oor and they can stop us if we go out."

banging on the stairway below ess loud. Kreitz had only one ight to go to the bottom.

"I'll wait a minute," Karl said gothe door, "then make a dash for we are separated and I get into e, remember this telephone num-
He gave her Klauss' number.
o the person who answers, 'Courl is not well.'" He walked to the nd listened. "Maybe we can make k for it now. I'll tell the police ow that you were frightened and ay. They won't be able to prove ng."

opened the door. Far below he steps again, of a man mounting airs.

ten," Carola said tensely, "he's back!"

two people fright-frozen, Karl Carola waited motionless in the oom, while the noise on the stairs ouder. Karl held tightly to her.
n't worry," he whispered.

tz came in without knocking.
here," he said, panting for breath, thinking—"There was clumsy ng in his smile. "Maybe she is in Schmidt! Maybe not! Why
I worry? Will the police give me ink of schnapps for all my trou-Vein! Got any money?"

looked relieved. He smiled at to reassure her.

me fifty marks and she can be the Kaiserin for all I care!" Kreitz laughed.

"I only have ten marks."

"Give it to me." He took it and laughed louder. The money went into a coat pocket. "That's better! No trouble for anybody, nicht wahr? If she is a street woman, the police would raise the devil for getting them out on such a cold night."

Noisier than ever, he went down the stairs.

"We'll wait a minute," Karl said tensely. Carola's face was pale and her weight was heavily against him. "Are you all right?"

"I'm all right," she said weakly.

"We'll get out of here at once."

Fifteen minutes later they entered a little barroom in the basement of an old building off Alexanderplatz. They sat silently at a rear table, as if nothing could be said until the memory of recent terrifying shock was less vivid.

"I'm sorry I was impulsive tonight," Carola said slowly, "but I had to see
you."

"It's enough to know that you felt that." He reached for Carola's hand.
There was tangible proof that they were together, for these few minutes at least.

THEN Carola told why she had come and Karl's hand tightened on her own while she talked of Blaerchen's call. "I shall get in touch with Franz Wagner in the morning," she said firmly. Then, after a pause: "I don't understand why Blaerchen was so willing to have me return to singing."

Karl frowned. "He's probably caught between wanting you and mistrusting you. Of course he'll let you do what you want—he's in love with you. Letting you do as you wish may give him a chance to see if his suspicions have any foundation." He felt her shiver and not because the barroom was unheated.

"Why do you tremble?"

"At the words 'love' and 'Blaerchen.'"
Then she smiled as if no shadow threatened them. "We'll not talk about it.
Are we safe here?"

"As safe as we can be anywhere."

She moved a little closer. Her soft hair was near his cheek, its perfume fresh and sweet. "When we were in your room, waiting for Kreitz to return,
I felt as if we were the only two people in the world." Happy that she could feel so deeply, she said, "I wish we were."

"So do I." Karl saw a new warmth in her face. Here was Carola close to him at last, needing him. He wanted to tell her a hundred things, to say, "I love you, Carola," to stand between her and any worry forever after.

"If we were the only two people in the world—" Carola continued.

Up front a middle-aged barmaid was listening to a radio that blared soldier's songs. Even in a little barroom they were very much in a world that was crowded and hostile.

"What are you thinking?" Carola asked expectantly.

"That we aren't the only two people in the world."

She nodded. "Blaerchen."

She did know and there was no need

Cars, too, Sunburn

SIMONIZ NEEDED TO PROTECT FINISH!

Why let your car's beauty smolder away in the hot sun? You can easily save the finish with Simoniz. It not only keeps the sun's rays but also weather and dirt from bleaching, dulling, and destroying the lacquer or enamel. All the wear is on the Simoniz so the finish underneath, always safe, stays beautiful. If your car is dull, first use the wonderful Simoniz Kleener. It thoroughly cleans the finish, restoring the lustre and color. Then, each application of Simoniz builds up more beauty... and makes the finish last longer. Play safe and Simoniz now!

THE SIMONIZ COMPANY, CHICAGO, U. S. A.

MOTORISTS WISE
SIMONIZ
MAKES CARS STAY BEAUTIFUL

Always insist on these famous products for your car. Sold at hardware, drug, grocery, and auto supply stores, filling stations and garages everywhere.

Try New Way to Simoniz!

Dirt Road

CROCKETT JOHNSON

to say anything more. Each of the knew that even a casual mention of that name lit like a flare the empty space that separated them, never to be crossed, never, so long as Blaerchen was in power.

In the front of the room the radio was now blurring news of the triumphs of Nazi troops. . . .

The barmaid, stout and fifty, came up to them. "I must close, Meine Dame, Mein Herr! It's too cold to stand around or sit around any longer, nicht wahr? Ach, why can't our scientists discover ersatz heat?" She laughed. "Home, meine Kinder, home! It's warmer in bed!"

Karl smiled at the woman's misinterpretation.

"We have had so little time together," Carola said as they left. "I don't want a day to pass, Karl, without our meeting, even if only for a moment. We can't have much but we must have that."

"But at my apartment, at yours—!"

"I know, those places are impossible. If I can just see you, talk with you, where no one pays attention to us!"

"If we meet in Wagner's office, even legitimately, people might be suspicious."

"That wouldn't be the same, anyway," she smiled. "But somewhere else—!"

Her insistence thrilled him. "Can't we meet each evening at seven at the Potsdamerplatz subway station? We shan't attract attention." That was a meager substitute for what they could have had in a blander world.

She said gladly, "I shall wait each day for seven o'clock!"

He took her home. On the way she asked, "Who is the man Klauss to whom you told me to telephone in trouble?"

"An old and wise friend of mine," he said. The thought of Underground work was one final reminder, if one was needed, for submerging the swelling desire to speak of love and marriage.

He went back to his room, too tired to sort out his mixed emotions. But the darkness and the cold did seem less unfriendly.

WHEN Karl walked to Wagner's office the next morning there was snow on the city streets. Yet the cold of the streets was better than the still cold of indoors. These were bad mornings; men ate in overcoats, worked in overcoats, slept in overcoats. They got little solid rest. Any casual passer-by was liable to be querulous and quarrelsome. This morning Karl paid little attention to anyone, remembering every word Carola had said the night before, recalling every gesture, every look.

He was pasting clippings in a huge scrapbook when the telephone in Wagner's inner office rang. In a few minutes Wagner burst out. "She's going to sing for me!" he shouted, laughing and trying to talk at the same time. "Carola Dirling's coming back!" Here was one happy man in Berlin! "I'm going to put her in the Sans Souci at the opening!" In his enthusiasm he began to make plans. "Order billboard ads at once! Get a costumer! Get an accompanist! Hurry!"

He went on, about new drapes, new lights, new decorating. Then he sat down, exhausted, but smiling happily.

"What shall I do first?" Karl asked. He could be happy, too; indirectly, he was working for Carola.

"I'll decide in a moment," Wagner was suddenly serious. "Why should she change her mind so abruptly? I don't understand that! It doesn't matter!" He stood up and took Karl by the arm. "Come into my office. We'll start detailed plans. We have little more than two weeks!"

Because of his experience at the Krokodil, Karl suddenly became important. He ran no more errands, delivered no more handbills, pasted no more clippings. Wagner consulted with him and went over every detail of Carola's opening. He thought of having her do something new, then decided against it. "Berlin is hungry for the good old days," he said emphatically.

"When were they?"

"Any day sufficiently remote from the present," Wagner answered. "And you can coach her in doing everything just as she used to do it."

Karl did not answer.

"What's the matter? Every time I mention Carola's name the strangest look goes over your face."

Karl did not want to reveal anything to him. "I think that as an ex-political

"Do wait a minute. I have some news about Blaerchen."

Karl waited.

"There has been much gossip in the Foreign Office about him and Praut, another of Ribbentrop's favorites. They had a terrible fight."

Carola had mentioned Praut and Karl recognized the name. "What did they fight about?"

"No one knows for a fact," the little man said meticulously, "but people assume it was about money. That's what the men in the Ribbentrop Bureau always fight about! Of course, it may be over Praut's getting a job that Blaerchen wanted." Even more confidentially he added: "There have been so many scandals! You should have heard about the rows among those worthies over the distribution of Polish, Czech, and Aus-around his face, approached, asking to speak to him. For a second he wanted to run. Then he recognized the man. It was Klauss.

"Herr Dietrich!"

Klauss looked much older than Karl had seen him before, old by sleeplessness.

"I'm glad to see you," Klauss said. "My son-in-law couldn't come. Let's walk for a short distance."

They went to the street. Klauss to his arm.

Then Klauss asked abruptly, "my son-in-law been around you?"

"No," Karl said, sensing the in the man's question.

"He's been so restless and of wanting to talk with you. I understand the need for going in anti-Nazi work. He won't understand that violence and terror do no good. Underground must gain strength—our enemies are still too strong."

"I haven't seen him." He felt that anything should trouble a Klauss.

I HAVE known him since he was a small boy. He married my daughter who died a year ago. He is like a man who has been through hell. Then, almost pleadingly: "If you try to make him see the necessity of being rash. You've had of concentration camp. He has."

There was something else that he said, did not mention. He moved by Ranke and the police descend on every friend that he had, and destroy all the work Klauss had done.

"If I see him I'll do what I can," said as they separated.

He went along the street wondering to be free of worry until he crossed the damerstrasse and came to the square. All around were men hurrying, wives, their homes, to some life of intimate comfort, but small it might be. But none of them a lovelier waiting smile than on the face of Carola.

Arm in arm, together for a little while they walked away.

This, then, was their love-making week of secret meetings in subway stations, on busses, on streetcars, everywhere that the meeting of a man and woman would not attract untoward attention. Each meeting was as strained as a happy, and each word between them was spoken to an obligato of worry, punctured by furtive glances behind, to see that no one had noticed that no one was watching, listening unduly interested in them. In the bars and little bars on back streets they could talk freely of the present, of songs Carola would sing, of the opening. Karl never mentioned his Underground work and Carola asked if he was worried about anything and keeping something from her. He turned the question with a smile.

They could talk of their past days when Karl rehearsed to the farces each week for the Krokodil, the song Carola sang one night was a song of the city the next day.

When they tried to speak of their own tomorrow and the day after that, they had to leave the subject. They had to speak for them, speak loudly to them what they both knew: as long as they stayed in Germany, as Blaerchen was in power, they had hope for nothing more than to put hopes into words waiting but too painful, so they sat on the side, in a dark corner of a badly lit cellar room, glad to be together for a little while, saying nothing, preferring to let silence speak for them.

(To be continued next week)

"Senator or no senator—we've got to run this railroad on time!"

THURSTON GENTRY

prisoner, I had better stay far away from having anything to do with the cabaret. Carola can do well without me."

"As you wish," Wagner said carelessly. "Now, about painting the Sans Souci—!"

IN THE late afternoon Karl got away to his biweekly appointment with Schebeler. He went without any particular nervousness, his mind set rather on the thought of seven o'clock.

"Did you have any trouble last time?" Karl asked, remembering Schebeler's fight.

The little man shook his head. "No, Gott sei dank! No one bothered me!" He lowered his voice. "I have a small packet of news for you. It concerns some conversations held with certain Swedes."

"They may be useful." Karl took the envelope and wanted to leave at once.

"Don't go yet!" Schebeler looked like a little round-shouldered mouse, pleased at being out of his hole for a few minutes. "Have a glass of beer!"

"I really—!"

trian estates! Each Nazi was sure some rival had gotten a better one. But none of them ever do as well as their boss! Ribbentrop got the best of all—an Austrian estate that used to belong to Fritz Thyssen's son-in-law. And they're all jealous of what Goering's men got."

Karl nodded absently. That threw little light on Blaerchen. As soon as he could he left, to deliver the envelope to Ranke. Then, in an hour, he would be with Carola.

He was at the accustomed place at the Friedrichstrasse station on time but Ranke did not appear. Even as slight a hitch as five minutes lateness might be a sign of something wrong. When fifteen minutes passed Karl was desperately anxious. All around people were hurrying to trains, paying no attention to him as he pretended to read a newspaper. Yet, if anything had happened to Ranke, someone among these passers-by might be watching. Nervously, he put his hand in his pocket and felt the envelope.

An old man, his coat collar close

Happy Holidays—Self-planned Style

"COME ON, DAD," they call and off you'll all go on a journey of fun, your annual vacation.

Great occasions in life, these vacations—with new experiences, new pleasures, sometimes better, even, than you dreamed of. That's the American way—happy futures—self-planned, self-earned, self-saved-for.

Would you like to think right now about the vacations that lie far ahead, in the future, while this one is fresh in your mind? If you would, welcome the representative of The Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York who may call.

Learn from this representative how, through a Mutual Life Endowment or Endowment Annuity, you can make sure of just the yearly vacation or retirement fund you would like to have from 55 on and insure adequate protection in the meantime for your household.

Our booklet, "PLANNING FOR INCOME AT 55, 60 OR 65," tells of more than 75 interesting ways to enjoy your "vacation years" when they arrive. Ask a Mutual Life representative for a copy or receive it from one of them by writing to the address below.

The Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York

34 Nassau Street, New York

FIRST POLICY ISSUED

FEBRUARY 1, 1843

He Serves Up America

Continued from page 22

SALE

75¢ value

ALL 3 FOR 49¢

LISTERINE TOOTH PASTE

BECOME AN EXPERT ACCOUNTANT

Executive Accountants and C. P. A.'s earn $2,000 to $10,000 a year. Thousands of firms need them. About 20,000 Certified Public Accountants in the U. S. We train you thoroughly at home in spare time for C. P. A. examinations or executive accounting positions. Previous experience unnecessary. Personal training under supervision of staff of C. P. A.'s, including members of the American Institute of Accountants. Write for free book, "Accountancy, the Profession That Pays." LaSalle Extension University, Dept. 840-H, Chicago. A Correspondence Institution

Are YOU A BEACH Bystander

BECAUSE OF

PSORIASIS

Are you barred from summer sports because ugly psoriasis lesions would make you unfavorably conspicuous in a bathing suit? Then try SIROIL.

SIROIL FOR SALE AT ALL DRUG STORES

tends to remove the crusts and scales of psoriasis which are external in character and located on outer layer of skin. If, or when, your psoriasis lesions recur, light applications of SIROIL will help keep them under control. SIROIL is applied externally. It does not stain clothing or bed linen nor does it interfere in any way with your daily routine. Offered to you on a two-weeks' satisfaction-or-money-back basis.

SIROIL SHAMPOO
THE CHOICE OF PARTICULAR WOMEN
SIROIL Liquid Shampoo is made of pure olive and coconut oils blended in a neutral, non-caustic base. Cannot injure or irritate the most sensitive scalp or hair. No vinegar rinse needed. SIROIL Liquid Shampoo Soap removes grease film from hair and scalp in an amazing manner and gives a woman's hair every opportunity to look its best. This product bears the Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval.
SIROIL LABORATORIES, INC., DETROIT, MICH.
SIROIL LABORATORIES OF CANADA, LTD., BOX 488, WINDSOR, ONTARIO

Lorentz, who knew nothing and cared less about pictures, listened to Cohen and Watts and he, too, began to realize the importance of pictures. Hollywood was still wearing its intellectual swaddling clothes but directors like Murnau and Lubitsch in Europe were doing amazing things, and actors like Jannings were giving startling performances.

Lorentz took his job seriously. He was allowed considerable editorial latitude so he began a one-man campaign against Hollywood, the burden of his prayer being, "Why not make pictures about America?" If you will recall the 1920's you'll remember that gangster pictures and elaborate costume pictures and ducky little numbers like The Sheik were all the vogue. Sex, sin and six-shooters were the dishes served to the picture public. In no way were they a reflection of America on the problems of America.

The President Approves

The better Hollywood directors read the Lorentz criticisms and when they'd come to New York they'd look him up. Vidor, Milestone, John Ford—they, too, believed that pictures could be more than fantastic make-believe.

Lorentz moved to the late Vanity Fair to do film criticism but he didn't last long. He panned Little Women unmercifully, and the owners of Vanity Fair noticed that Little Women was breaking house records all over the country. Obviously Lorentz was a bad critic. So he was fired from the job.

He worked for Mr. Hearst for a while, first as movie critic (he panned the wrong picture and was shifted) and then as Washington correspondent. In Washington he came into contact with Henry A. Wallace, and when he wrote a eulogistic column about the Secretary of Agriculture he was fired again. Mr. Hearst at the moment didn't like Wallace.

"I've been fired from more damn jobs," Lorentz says thoughtfully.

About this time Rex Tugwell organized the Resettlement Administration. In a desultory way government departments had been making educational pictures that had about as much animation as a still-life picture of a dead cow. The drought had settled in the Southwest by now and the land was dying. But nobody cared much. Dust storms and droughts were only nice newsreel shots to people in the large cities. The plight of the farmers had to be brought home to the rest of the country—but how?

Lorentz suggested a picture. Tugwell thought it a good idea but they didn't have a writer available to do a story. Lorentz did the story.

Tugwell was delighted with it. But he had no director to handle it. He elected Lorentz. Lorentz protested in vain that he had never been to Hollywood, didn't know how to direct, but Tugwell brushed this aside. So Lorentz again was elected. He was given a camera crew and $10,000. Which brings us to where we started. He learned about making pictures by making them. When he finished The Plow That Broke the Plains he had to cut the film himself, a highly technical, specialized job. Then there was the problem of music. This he knew something about. He managed to get a fine composer, Virgil Thompson, to help him.

"The music will be a collaboration," Lorentz explained. "Not a background. Some places the music will dominate; other places the film itself will tell the story. But we need a good orchestra."

He got one. Lorentz communicated his enthusiasm to Alex Smallens, conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Smallens thought it all "an exciting idea." And finally the picture was finished.

Even Lorentz didn't know whether or not it was good. Oh, it was honest and sincere and it showed the dust and the drought strangling the good dark earth of the plains but how would outsiders react to it. Lorentz thought he'd start at the top. He'd show it to the President. A date was arranged and Lorentz sat miserably uncomfortable in the White House projection room alongside the silent President, who never made a comment, but just smoked one cigarette after another.

Then, "That's a fine picture, Lorentz," the Head Man said when it was over. "Very interesting your idea of letting the music take the play away from the action." He even suggested that it was good enough to be commercial, i.e., to put into chain theaters as part of a general program.

Lorentz had another idea. He wanted to sell his picture to Hollywood. He took it out and invited every director and producer in town to see it. Most of them balked. They still didn't like Mr. R. and they figured that any picture produced by the government must be a politically inspired film. But Lorentz, with the help of his friends Milestone, Ford and Vidor, persuaded them to take a look. They took a look, blinked a bit and said, "Terrific." There was no propaganda in it. It was just an honest picture.

After that Lorentz made The River, the story of the Mississippi. That was another struggle but the picture got accolades from critics all over the country. It was a chunk of America most people didn't know about except those who lived and died near the banks of The River and whose lives were ruled by The River.

As Honest as Life Itself

A Dutchman named Paul de Kruif saw the picture. De Kruif is an exciting man. Sinclair Lewis wrote Arrowsmith, the Microbe Hunters, Yellow Jack and The Fight For Life in collaboration with him. De Kruif is volatile, effervescent. He loved the picture and, hurrying to a telegraph office, wired Lorentz, whom he had never met, "You and I are going to do a picture. Where can I meet you?"

They met weeks later in New York. De Kruif had a great idea for Lorentz. "Make a picture about death and how we can help prevent death. You can do a lot of good. Take my book Fight for Life. Do what you want with it."

The result was The Fight for Life. In many ways it is the most remarkable picture ever made. Superficially is the story of a young doctor who loses a patient in the first five minutes of the picture. Realizing his incompetence, goes to the Chicago Maternity Center the slums to learn his trade. The picture shows his progress and his triumph; his skill and experience come to death. It is as exciting as Scarface as honest as life itself. Only eight professional actors were used by Lorentz. The cast is composed chiefly of who came to the Maternity Center for treatment.

Matching the Doctor's Mood

No one has ever married music on the screen as Lorentz has done. Gruenberg did the music except for a sequence. After the young doctor, his patient, he walks disconsolately along the streets of Chicago, thinking of what happened; questioning whether the woman's death was inevitable, part of a plan; questioning whether or not his own lack of skill contributed toward the death. On a rainy night. He walks along and he is concerned that a woman has died.

He walks through the street lined with cabarets. Here Lorentz uses real low-down music of the type called "blues"; mad, primitive, vaudeville music. Gruenberg told him that Negroes improvising could produce a kind of music.

A place called Café Society had a group of fine Negro musicians who would hold jam sessions. Lorentz got one of them one night, set up his solo paratus and said, "Give out." They sweated happily for an hour. For then another would grab the saxophone. A sax would wail to a background of brass and winds. Then a trumpet would get an idea. He'd go to town and the others would ad lib. along with him. It was music that couldn't be written more than the diversified sound of a busy street can be captured on a picture. Gruenberg and Lorentz loved it. It was the mood of the young doctor.

To Lorentz the business of making pictures is the most serious business in the world. It is so serious that it demands the best writing, the best acting and the best technical equipment available. But above all it demands serious purpose.

"Men like John Renoir in Hollywood make great pictures," Lorentz says, "because they aren't satisfied with mediocrity and they don't have the financial pressure on them that Hollywood has. Their pictures cost comparatively little. They don't have to gross millions of dollars to break even. The Illusion, I think, is the greatest picture I ever saw, but it cost about what a short would cost in Hollywood. Marcel Pagnol, who made The Wife. He and his family live in a studio where they make pictures. All work together twenty-four hours a day living the picture they are making. They don't have producers to answer to. They don't have to submit rushes night to executives. The picture is Pagnol's from beginning to end. It is a job made by a large group of specialists each working independently."

Now Lorentz is working on a picture about one unemployed man. But he reveals the general story of seven men by telling the specific story of one man.

"It ought to be interesting," Lorentz says thoughtfully.

It ought to be indeed.

NEW YORK STATE

Says

"WELCOME World's Fair Visitors"

Choose one of New York State's convenient routes to the World's Fair of 1940 and know the thrills and joys that await you throughout this vast empire of natural wonderlands, historical landmarks and zestful recreational attractions.

Make your trip an occasion to enjoy to the full the 50,000 square miles of romance, history and beauty that this great state spreads so generously before you. Experience the zestful contrasts of busy cities, mountain wildernesses, sparkling lakes, ancient forts, winding rivers, country landscapes, placid villages, and legend-crowned old houses.

Stand in awe before Niagara Falls . . . let your eyes rest on the peaceful rural scenes of the Genesee country . . . surrender to the romantic mood of the Finger Lakes . . . Step back into the historic past in the storied Mohawk Valley . . . turn northward for fun and beauty to the refreshing loveliness of the Thousand Islands . . . climb to the skies in the far-flung Adirondacks and follow the fortunes of the Revolutionary War up and down Lake Champlain. Join the smart throngs in Saratoga Springs, visit the scores of memorable attractions that abound in the capital district surrounding Albany, relax in the popular mountain playgrounds of the Catskills, follow the glorious Hudson to the sea, drive on Long Island's inviting motor parkways to picturesque old towns and refreshing surf-fringed beaches.

NEW YORK STATE

THE STATE THAT  HAS EVERYTHING

For free 68-page 1940 guide, giving full details of New York State's fascinating attractions and Special World's Fair Route Folder, including Loop Tour of Beautiful Long Island, mail this coupon or a post card.

BUREAU OF STATE PUBLICITY, ALBANY, N. Y.
Conservation Department, Lithgow Osborne, Commissioner

Kindly send me free copies of "A Fair Bargain—NEW YORK STATE This Year!" and "World's Fair Route Folder, with Loop Tour of Beautiful Long Island". (C)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State .....

A Man Takes His Vacation

Continued from page 15

...then get busy at once—your dog may be in danger of tapeworms or sarcoptic mange

FOR AUTHORITY for that warning, read the U. S. Dept. of Agriculture Circular No. 338 which states that fleas and lice can transmit tapeworms and sarcoptic mange to dogs.

So, if your dog is scratching, act! It's far safer for you to take it for granted that he has fleas than to take chances.

Insure his complete riddance of those dangerous pests! Use a powder, preferably Pulvex, the powder that kills fleas with incredible speed. None ever revive to reinfest. Pulvex also kills any lice, ticks, sticktites your dog may have. Kills fleas, too, when put on one spot. Amazing—unbelievable—but true!

As Pulvex is borated, it makes a flea-bitten dog more comfortable by helping allay itching from scratching.

Use Pulvex according to the new "minute-a-week" control method and you absolutely protect your dog against flea infestation. Read about it in folder on can. If your dog is scratching, get a can of Pulvex Flea Powder now. At drug, pet and department stores, 50c.

PULVEX
FLEA POWDER

ASK DEALER
TO SHOW YOU
THIS FOLDER

PULVEX FLEA SOAP oils and grooms the coat, deodorizes, cleans and destroys the fleas, only 25c!

Rheumatism Relieve Pain In Few Minutes

To relieve the torturing pain of Neuritis, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, or Lumbago in few minutes, get NURITO, the fine formula, used by thousands. No opiates. Does the work quickly—must relieve cruel pain to your satisfaction in a few minutes or your money back. Don't suffer. Ask your druggist today for trustworthy NURITO on this guarantee.

HAY FEVER
MINIATURE RESPIRATOR

New DUPOR No. 1 keeps irritating POLLENS and NUISANCE DUSTS out of nose. Convenient—does not interfere with eating, sleeping, smoking, talking—all you need do is breathe through nose as nature intended. Wear while sweeping, dusting, cleaning. Farmers use for grain-dusts. Industries use for nuisance dusts, lint, etc. Weight 1 ounce. Literature FREE.

H. S. COVER Dept. C South Bend, Ind.
PIONEER RESPIRATOR DESIGNER SINCE 1894

CAR owners are using this new ZECOL WAX because it is so amazingly Quick and Easy to apply, results in such a deep, lasting lustre—protects the finish. Just rub on—let dry a minute—wipe off. That's all. Used on all types and colors of lacquers and enamels.

For cars heavily oxidized (faded), or having a heavy road film, clean the surface with ZECOL SCUM REMOVER before applying ZECOL WAX.

Sold at all filling stations and garages.

Mfd. by ZECOL Inc.
Milwaukee,
Wis.

The 60
Minute Way To Automobile
Beauty

thing. These were not the kind of people he was used to, and his gray suit was dusty, unpressed, and badly stained. He thought nostalgically of the comfortable office back in Salt Lake City: the familiar, friendly faces, the pleasant routine. . . .

Presently he heard a horse whinny, and there came the voices of cowboys, swearing. He got up and looked out the window. There were two cowboys and a large gray horse in a near-by corral. The cowboys had ropes and a saddle and were trying to corner the horse. Hubert stepped outside to watch.

"I see they're saddling your horse." Hubert looked around. There stood a beautiful girl. She was smiling at Hubert and she had white teeth. She was dressed in blue slacks, such as the cowboys wore, and a flannel shirt. And she was—well, beautiful.

HUBERT took a deep breath. "I guess they are," he said huskily.

The girl stood beside him. "Mr. Winslow," she said in a low voice, "they're going to job you. That's a bad horse. They think it was just an accident that you won the contest, they wanted one of the guests here to win it, so on the pack trip they're going to—have some fun with you."

"I see," Hubert said miserably. He passed a hand across his forehead. "I didn't want to come in the first place. I wanted to go home. But Slim made me come up. He said I'd be insulting the governor if I didn't." He looked at her. "I wouldn't want to do that."

"Of course not." Hubert closed his eyes. "I hate horses," he said feelingly.

"So do I." The girl glanced down at the thick-soled shoes she was wearing. "That's why I'd rather hike. Not," she added quickly, "that I could ride with the others even if I wanted to. You see, I'm not a guest here. I'm one of the waitresses."

"Where do you hike?" "Back here in the hills; any place I feel like."

"Are you going now?"

"Yes." She placed a hand on his arm. "Listen, Mr. Winslow, if we took a hike, they'd be gone when we got back. After all, if you'd rather hike, I should think it would be all right. You won the prize."

Hubert hesitated. The horse in the corral reared and snorted as one of the cowboys roped him. Hubert looked at the girl. "You're right," he said firmly. "I rode the bucking horse. I think I've done—enough."

They turned from the ranch and took a trail that led back into the hills. Eleanor Temple, she said her name was. Hubert said his first name was Hubert. As they left the ranch behind, climbing slowly, following twisting game trails in the woods and crossing open parks, Hubert's spirits rose.

After they had walked for an hour or more they sat down on a fallen tree trunk and looked back over the valley. Hubert took a deep breath. "Eleanor," he said, "I think this is the happiest—" He was interrupted by a sharp peal of thunder. He looked around at the clear sky. "What was that?" he asked, puzzled.

"A storm is forming back in the mountains," Eleanor said. "They come down awfully fast when they get started. I think we ought to start back."

"Damn it!" Hubert grumbled. Eleanor laughed. "They'll be gone," she said.

"But we were having such a nice walk Eleanor."

"I know." They got up and she took his arm and they started back in the general direction from which they had come. Rain began to fall, gently at first, then in a steady downpour. They took refuge beneath a large pine.

When the rain seemed to let up a bit they stepped out from beneath the tree. Eleanor started toward her left. "Wait a minute," Hubert said. "We didn't come that way."

"I think we did," she said uncertainly.

They stood there and looked around. Mist had descended on the woods around them. The whole world was a uniform gray.

"But this way is downhill," Eleanor said. "We've got to keep going downhill." Reluctantly Hubert followed her.

Rain began to fall again. They stopped.

"We're going wrong," Hubert said. "It seems to be more downhill over to our left farther." They moved in that direction, threading their way among huge boulders. Presently Hubert saw an overhanging ledge of rock, beneath which there was a cavelike depression. He steered Eleanor toward it. "Let's get out of the rain for a minute," he said.

It was dry beneath the ledge, and there was a dry boulder to sit upon. "I think the best thing to do," Hubert said, "is to sit here a few minutes and you can see if you can get your bearings. Do you recognize this canyon?"

Eleanor looked at him appealingly, and her lips trembled. "Hubert, I'll have to tell you, I guess. I've never been back here in the hills before."

Hubert looked at her incredulously. "But your hikes—"

"I made that part of it up."

Hubert frowned. "But I don't understand why—"

"Please let me tell you how it happened, Hubert. When I was waiting on table last night I heard them talking about you, and laughing about giving you this mean horse to ride. Then you came up today, and you looked—nice. So we arranged for me to—do what I did. I'm going home tomorrow anyway, so they can't fire me. I'm so sorry—"

"You mean you don't live here?"

"No." Eleanor hesitated. "I live in Salt Lake City, too, Hubert. I'm on my vacation, the same as you are. I always wanted at least to see a dude ranch, a nice one, and the only way I could afford it was to get a job at one. I wrote for a job waiting on table for a while, and they gave it to me."

Hubert seemed to have forgotten the cold and the rain. "Who are you down there?" he asked eagerly. "Salt Lake, I mean."

"The Kellier Paper Company, secretary to Mr. Bronson, the auditor."

"Well I'll be damned," Hubert said slowly. "And I'm with Bartlett in the filing department." He laughed. "Eleanor, I call up your account department often. I bet I've even talked to you on the phone." He looked into the rain. "All I've got to say is certainly a mighty small world."

"I wish it were a little smaller," Hubert said, "right now."

Hubert stood up. "That's right, got to do something." He stepped out of their shelter and looked around thoughtfully. "It's beginning to get dark," he said. He came over to the side and looked at his watch. "Six. Now, Eleanor, there's only one thing to be done. Make a fire and stay here all night."

"Oh, dear!" Eleanor seemed to cry.

"PLEASE don't worry," Hubert said. "I'll handle everything." He stepped out into the rain and disappeared. A few minutes he returned, his coat dripping with bits of tree branches and a partly decayed stump. He threw down breathlessly. "There'll be no fire in this pine," he said. He tore splinters from the inside of the stump and broke up some of the branches and placed the splinters against a rock and lit them. "Put the branches on as it gets going," he said, and went into the rain again.

It was dark when Hubert was bringing in wood for the fire and lighting it in the protection of the cave. The fire was burning brightly, filling the cave with heat and occasional swirls of smoke. He sat down beside Eleanor and pulled his coat out near the fire. "He's dry," he said, "you can put your shoulders. Then when you "Fast? He just won this race and now he's watching the battle for second place!"

Eleanor, just lean against me."

Hubert. Daylight!"

Hubert lifted his heavy head, forced open. At first he saw only coals of the fire, a fire that replenished many times during the night but looking beyond he saw a silver.

"I think so too," Eleanor said. "I'll have to go."

Eleanor did not reply. They walked toward the ranch.

"I'm sorry our little plan didn't work."

Hubert said. "I'm terribly sorry, Eleanor. It would have been—perfect."

"I think so too."

They came to the first of the buildings. Eleanor paused. "I don't want to go over there with you, where they all are," she said. "I'll go right to my room. It's over this way."

Hubert stood there, looking at her. "Goodbye," she said. "Maybe I'll see you in Salt Lake, Hubert."

"Of course," Hubert said mechanically. She turned away and walked toward the lodge. "Eleanor!" he called. She stopped and looked back. "I'll—"

Hubert hesitated. "I'll see you in Salt Lake, then."

"Some day," Eleanor said. She went on.

Hubert walked toward the corral, where the riders were. He saw Mr. Van Orton and the tall dude he had seen in the bar, with the two girls he had seen there with him, standing near some saddled horses. He walked up to them. "Good morning, Mr. Van Orton," he said.

They looked at him.

"Well," he said, "we got back all right."

Mr. Van Orton looked puzzled. "Have you been away?" he asked.

"Yes. Eleanor and I. She's one of the waitresses. We went for a walk yesterday and got lost. Didn't you miss us?"

"I'm afraid not," Mr. Van Orton said. The others laughed.

"Anyway," Hubert said, "we got lost and had to stay out all night. I took charge of things and pulled us through all right. And now, Mr. Van Orton, I think I'll just take charge of things again. I rode the horse for Slim because he wanted me to, but that's all I'm going to do. I'm not going on any pack trip. I'm not afraid of the horse you picked out for me"—he glanced at the big dude—"because I can ride any horse you've got, with one hand tied behind me. I can ride any horse in Wyoming, you don't have to worry about that. I'm not going just because I don't want to."

"But, Mr. Winslow, the governor—"

"The hell with the governor. Tell him I got to get back to the office." Hubert hesitated. "Another thing, I got a date. Tell the governor I got a date with the most beautiful girl he ever saw in his life. I got a date to marry her. She doesn't know it yet, but she will in a minute."

Hubert bowed to Mr. Van Orton and walked away, in the direction Eleanor had taken.

Hubert stopped suddenly. "Oh," he said. She was looking at the which now was just ahead of Hubert looked too. There, near the rear of the lodge, were people on horses, their colored neckerchiefs, their big hats, lit by the early sun. Some were moving pack horses into

Hubert said miserably. "I didn't go yesterday," Eleanor

they stood there, a cowboy de-himself from the group and rode them.

looking all over for you," he

en he came up. He grinned.

ust've got up early to take a

Hubert said.

"Couldn't even find you around yesterday," the cowboy said, "to tell you the start was put off till this morning on account of the storm. I got your horse saddled for you, and soon's the governor finishes his breakfast we're all set to go. I'll tell Mr. Van Orton you're here." He wheeled and rode back.

Hubert looked at Eleanor tragically. "I'll have to go."

Eleanor did not reply. They walked toward the ranch.

"I'm sorry our little plan didn't work."

Hubert said. "I'm terribly sorry, Eleanor. It would have been—perfect."

"I think so too."

They came to the first of the buildings. Eleanor paused. "I don't want to go over there with you, where they all are," she said. "I'll go right to my room. It's over this way."

Hubert stood there, looking at her. "Goodbye," she said. "Maybe I'll see you in Salt Lake, Hubert."

"Of course," Hubert said mechanically. She turned away and walked toward the lodge. "Eleanor!" he called. She stopped and looked back. "I'll—"

Hubert hesitated. "I'll see you in Salt Lake, then."

"Some day," Eleanor said. She went on.

Hubert walked toward the corral, where the riders were. He saw Mr. Van Orton and the tall dude he had seen in the bar, with the two girls he had seen there with him, standing near some saddled horses. He walked up to them. "Good morning, Mr. Van Orton," he said.

They looked at him.

"Well," he said, "we got back all right."

Mr. Van Orton looked puzzled. "Have you been away?" he asked.

"Yes. Eleanor and I. She's one of the waitresses. We went for a walk yesterday and got lost. Didn't you miss us?"

"I'm afraid not," Mr. Van Orton said. The others laughed.

"Anyway," Hubert said, "we got lost and had to stay out all night. I took charge of things and pulled us through all right. And now, Mr. Van Orton, I think I'll just take charge of things again. I rode the horse for Slim because he wanted me to, but that's all I'm going to do. I'm not going on any pack trip. I'm not afraid of the horse you picked out for me"—he glanced at the big dude—"because I can ride any horse you've got, with one hand tied behind me. I can ride any horse in Wyoming, you don't have to worry about that. I'm not going just because I don't want to."

"But, Mr. Winslow, the governor—"

"The hell with the governor. Tell him I got to get back to the office." Hubert hesitated. "Another thing, I got a date. Tell the governor I got a date with the most beautiful girl he ever saw in his life. I got a date to marry her. She doesn't know it yet, but she will in a minute."

Hubert bowed to Mr. Van Orton and walked away, in the direction Eleanor had taken.

Hubert stopped suddenly. "Oh," he said. She was looking at the which now was just ahead of Hubert looked too. There, near the rear of the lodge, were people on horses, their colored neckerchiefs, their big hats, lit by the early sun. Some were moving pack horses into

Hubert said miserably. "I didn't go yesterday," Eleanor

they stood there, a cowboy de-

himself from the group and rode

them.

looking all over for you," he

en he came up. He grinned.

ust've got up early to take a

Hubert said.

Dog Saves Baby!

A RED HEART TRUE LIFE STORY

"Skippy, our darling baby's devoted fox terrier, is certainly full of vim, vigor—and intelligence—thanks to Red Heart Dog Food," writes Mrs. Harold Garland of Ottawa, Ill. "One day when the baby was only seven months old . . .

"I was in the yard hanging up the wash. Suddenly Skippy appeared at the window. She barked like I had never heard her before. I rushed into the house. Skippy caught my dress and dragged me to the baby's room. One look told me what was wrong.

"The baby had become tangled in her bedclothes and was almost smothered. Another minute and I would have been too late. Now there is nothing too good for Skippy. She loves Red Heart's 3 flavors. In fact, Red Heart is the only dog food she eats."

Thousands of Dogs Thrive on Red Heart Dog Food

Thousands of letters like Mrs. Garland's prove that dogs of all kinds like the stimulating taste variety of Red Heart's 3 delicious flavors—beef, fish, and cheese. Its tempting appetite appeal is one reason why more dogs eat Red Heart than any other dog food.*

This well-balanced, top-quality dog food is made in federally inspected plants from clean, wholesome meat and meat by-products, vegetable and bone meals, cereals, cod-liver oil, and Fleischmann's High-Vitamin Irradiated Yeast . . . providing abundant supplies of Anti-infective Vitamin A, Anti-neuritic Vitamin B<sub>1</sub>, Sunshine Vitamin D, and Growth Vitamin G. Laboratory-tested and kennel-proved.

*According to independent, nationwide surveys

FREE! "LOST AND FOUND" DOG LOCKET

Limited Offer! Inside this new, improved Red Heart dog locket is space for your name, address, phone, dog's name, etc. And with this locket, get the Official Obedience Rules taught to dogs at famous Von Motzck Training Kennels, Chicago. Just send 3 Red Heart labels —Diets A, B, and C—to John Morrell & Co., Dept. 38, Ottumwa, Ia.

THE 3-FLAVOR
DOG FOOD FEED IN ROTATION

White Dawn in Oregon

Continued from page 17

the Tonquin's deck a bloody butcher pen from stern to stern.

Below, in the canoes the Nootka women waited; probably the twelve who had special cause to remember Captain Ayres' clever trick were there. Above, in the Tonquin's rigging, five seamen, sent aloft just before the blow fell, looked down upon the shambles. The deck was a swirling, milling bedlam over which the war clubs tossed and waved.

They saw an Indian drive a knife into James Lewis, saw McKay felled with a war club and pitched overboard. Captain Thorn, horrible with blood, was fighting his way toward the cabin where there were muskets, but he did not reach that haven; a war club smashed in his head. Only one man escaped death—a Chehalis Indian taken on board at Gray Harbor as an interpreter. He rushed to the rail, shouted to a woman in one of the canoes that he surrendered himself her slave, jumped overboard and was pulled into the canoe by his new owner.

The five seamen aloft in the rigging had been thinking fast. There was one chance and one only. They came down the ratlines like monkeys and had nearly reached the deck before they were seen. One was killed; the others plunged into the steerage hatchway, passed below deck to the cabin and from that stronghold opened fire with muskets. In a few minutes the canoes were racing back toward the shore.

Captain Ayres' Vengeance

But four men couldn't hold the Tonquin long or take her out against the headwind to the open sea. Early next morning the Indians, watching the ship, saw the four survivors lower a boat and pull away toward the ocean in a desperate attempt to reach Astoria, 300 miles down the coast. Canoes were sent in pursuit. Other canoes paddled out toward the Tonquin.

Silent and empty and helpless she lay, while men and women in scores and hundreds clambered over her bulwarks. Still a tiny sound in the very bowels of her was unheard; the almost inaudible hissing and spitting of a long, slim thing like a snake with a fiery head creeping onward through the darkness under the deck. Inching along through the darkness under that crowded deck, the bright head of it was now within a foot of the ship's magazine.

It didn't stop there. It was a slow train of gunpowder laid during the night by the four survivors of the Tonquin's crew and lighted just before they left the ship.

Five hundred men, women and probably children were massed on the Tonquin's deck and in the sea canoes against her sides. In an instant the air was full of the fragments of them, the water strewn with their burned and broken bodies. Two hundred were killed; how many were maimed and blinded for life no one knows. For days the sea cast up the ghastly remnants of what had once been human beings. For many nights the death fires blazed along the shore. For weeks the great cedar houses of the stricken Nootka folk were pitiful with wailing.

It all links up—all the drama and the pathos and triumph of this tale of the Four Horsemen which, you might say, is really the tale of Oregon itself. We haven't come to the Four Horsemen yet; but the clever Captain Ayres is part of their story, and from Captain Ayres and the trick he played on the twelve Indian hunters comes the thunderous tragedy of the Tonquin. The Tonquin, too, is a link in the continuing chain. Looking back at this dramatic sequence, one has an impression of a sardonic fate seated, cloud-wrapped, on one of the Pacific peaks, pointing his finger now here, now there; and wherever the finger points a drama is enacted, a drama which is another link in the chain.

So now the finger points to Astoria, the little fort at the mouth of the Columbia River which the Tonquin had established before her fatal cruise northward to Nootka Sound. And the next link in the chain is a small glass bottle on a table in Duncan McDougall's office at Fort Astoria.

Astoria boasts today of being the oldest city west of the Rocky Mountains. Then it was only a few months old and death, sudden and violent, stared it in the face. Duncan McDougall, in command of the little log post, kept a stiff upper lip but was badly worried. More vehemently than ever he wished that he had made swifter progress with Comcomly's dreamy-eyed daughter.

"But how could we meet you at the station?
You took the car with you this morning!"

Comcomly held Astoria in the hollow of his hand; and the hand was about to close. He was head chief of the Chinook tribe which controlled the lower Columbia region and he was so great a man that 300 slaves preceded him to spread his path with otter-skin rugs when he walked abroad. Among his daughters was one who seemed to Duncan McDougall the most alluring woman he had ever seen. Most of his life McDougall had lived in the woods; to him, as to many voyageurs, a slim daughter of the forest need be no less enchanting than a pale charmer of the cities. He was mad about this tawny princess who dwelt in barbaric affluence in her father's great cedar lodge, waited on by his slaves.

But McDougall hadn't won the girl yet; and now, he reflected grimly, he would never win her because it was unlikely that he would live another day.

For twenty-four hours McDougall had been painfully aware of what was brewing. Comcomly had said nothing, but one of his underlings had betrayed what was in the old chief's mind. Comcomly, until now a friend of the white men who for thirty years had been coming in their ships to the Oregon coast to trade for furs, had had enough of white men at last. They had brought with them many evils—diseases never known among the Indians before and, worst of all, the smallpox which a few years previously had wrought such fearful havoc that the red men dreaded it more than God or devil.

And now, in the neighboring country of the Nootkas, had occurred this mystifying Tonquin disaster in which two hundred Indians who had dared to avenge their wrongs had been blown incomprehensively to fragments by the white man's evil magic.

McDougall's Inspiration

Yes, it was time to kill the white monster that threatened to swallow them all—to kill it now when the killing would be easy. Comcomly rather regretted this necessity, for he was not a bloodthirsty man and he had conceived a strong liking for McDougall. But the mysterious Tonquin catastrophe, as sinister as the smallpox and more sudden, ade gate was opened and Francis, another woodsman walked, across the clearing and into the forest. Presently they returned. The Comcomly to come that afternoon his warriors to hear a talk McDougall chief would make in the enclosure of the fort. Comcomly had accepted the invitation.

The afternoon came; and one moment that afternoon McDougall's heart stood still.

He was sitting alone, cross-legged on the ground in the center of the enclosure. Facing him sat Comcomly and these two the whole space of the stockade was packed with Chinook warriors. There was no doubt about their purpose. They had come with faces painted, wearing their warlets of hard elk hide and each with his great pautumaugan war bludgeon, half saber. For ten minutes of solemn silence McDougall had comcomly had smoked; and now McDougall knew, and the other white men from the log house knew, that the killing was nearly over and the moment that would bring them life was at hand.

McDougall sprang to his feet, flung his right hand above his head, and he held the small glass bottle that had taken from the table in his hand.

"Look!" he cried. "Look at this in my hand—this bottle. It is a little thing. But death is in it for you all. Even if you kill me, I will kill you with this bottle, as surely as I have killed the dead white men on the Tonquin. 200 of the Nootka tribe."

Powerful Peacemaker

He stopped to let that sink in, his blazing, head thrown back, his square broad shoulders, the hand in which he held the corked bottle quivering with what might be pent-up rage, he was a magnificent figure.

"Listen!" he shouted. "You know how it is with your people by the hundreds, how they could not escape from me no matter where they hid. I am the smallpox chief! I have it here shut in this bottle. All I need do is open it and send the smallpox out among you and you are dead. That I will do I swear that you will live at peace with me now and forever."

A half-hour later Duncan McDougall was in the little room that he used as an office, filled a tall tumbler with the best rum that he could find and added a dash of it to the dregs. And still later, on a sunny July day of the year 1811, he married his tawny princess and became a happy son-in-law of Chief Comcomly.

First Captain Ayres, then McDougall, then Duncan McDougall, each is a link in the chain. Now we come to the Four Horsemen, the most important link of all.

The four were warriors of the Percé nation, which inhabited mountain-walled valleys of Idaho. Some lone trapper, coming through their forests, told them one of the white man's God and the white man's heaven and a wonderful story would show them the trail to the white man's land. They began to think about the white man's land.

They were a strange people, the Percés. Physically and mentally the best of their race, through the story a vein of mysticism and yearning runs. There was something had decided him. He had 800 warriors ready. When he gave the word, the handful of white men in Fort Astoria wouldn't last half an hour.

Haggard and drawn, yet a gay figure in his fantastic voyageur costume, McDougall turned slowly away from his window. On a homemade table against the wall stood a row of glass bottles of various shapes and sizes—the fort's supply of medicines. McDougall had seen them there a hundred times. Yet, as his eyes fell on them now, his head jerked suddenly upward.

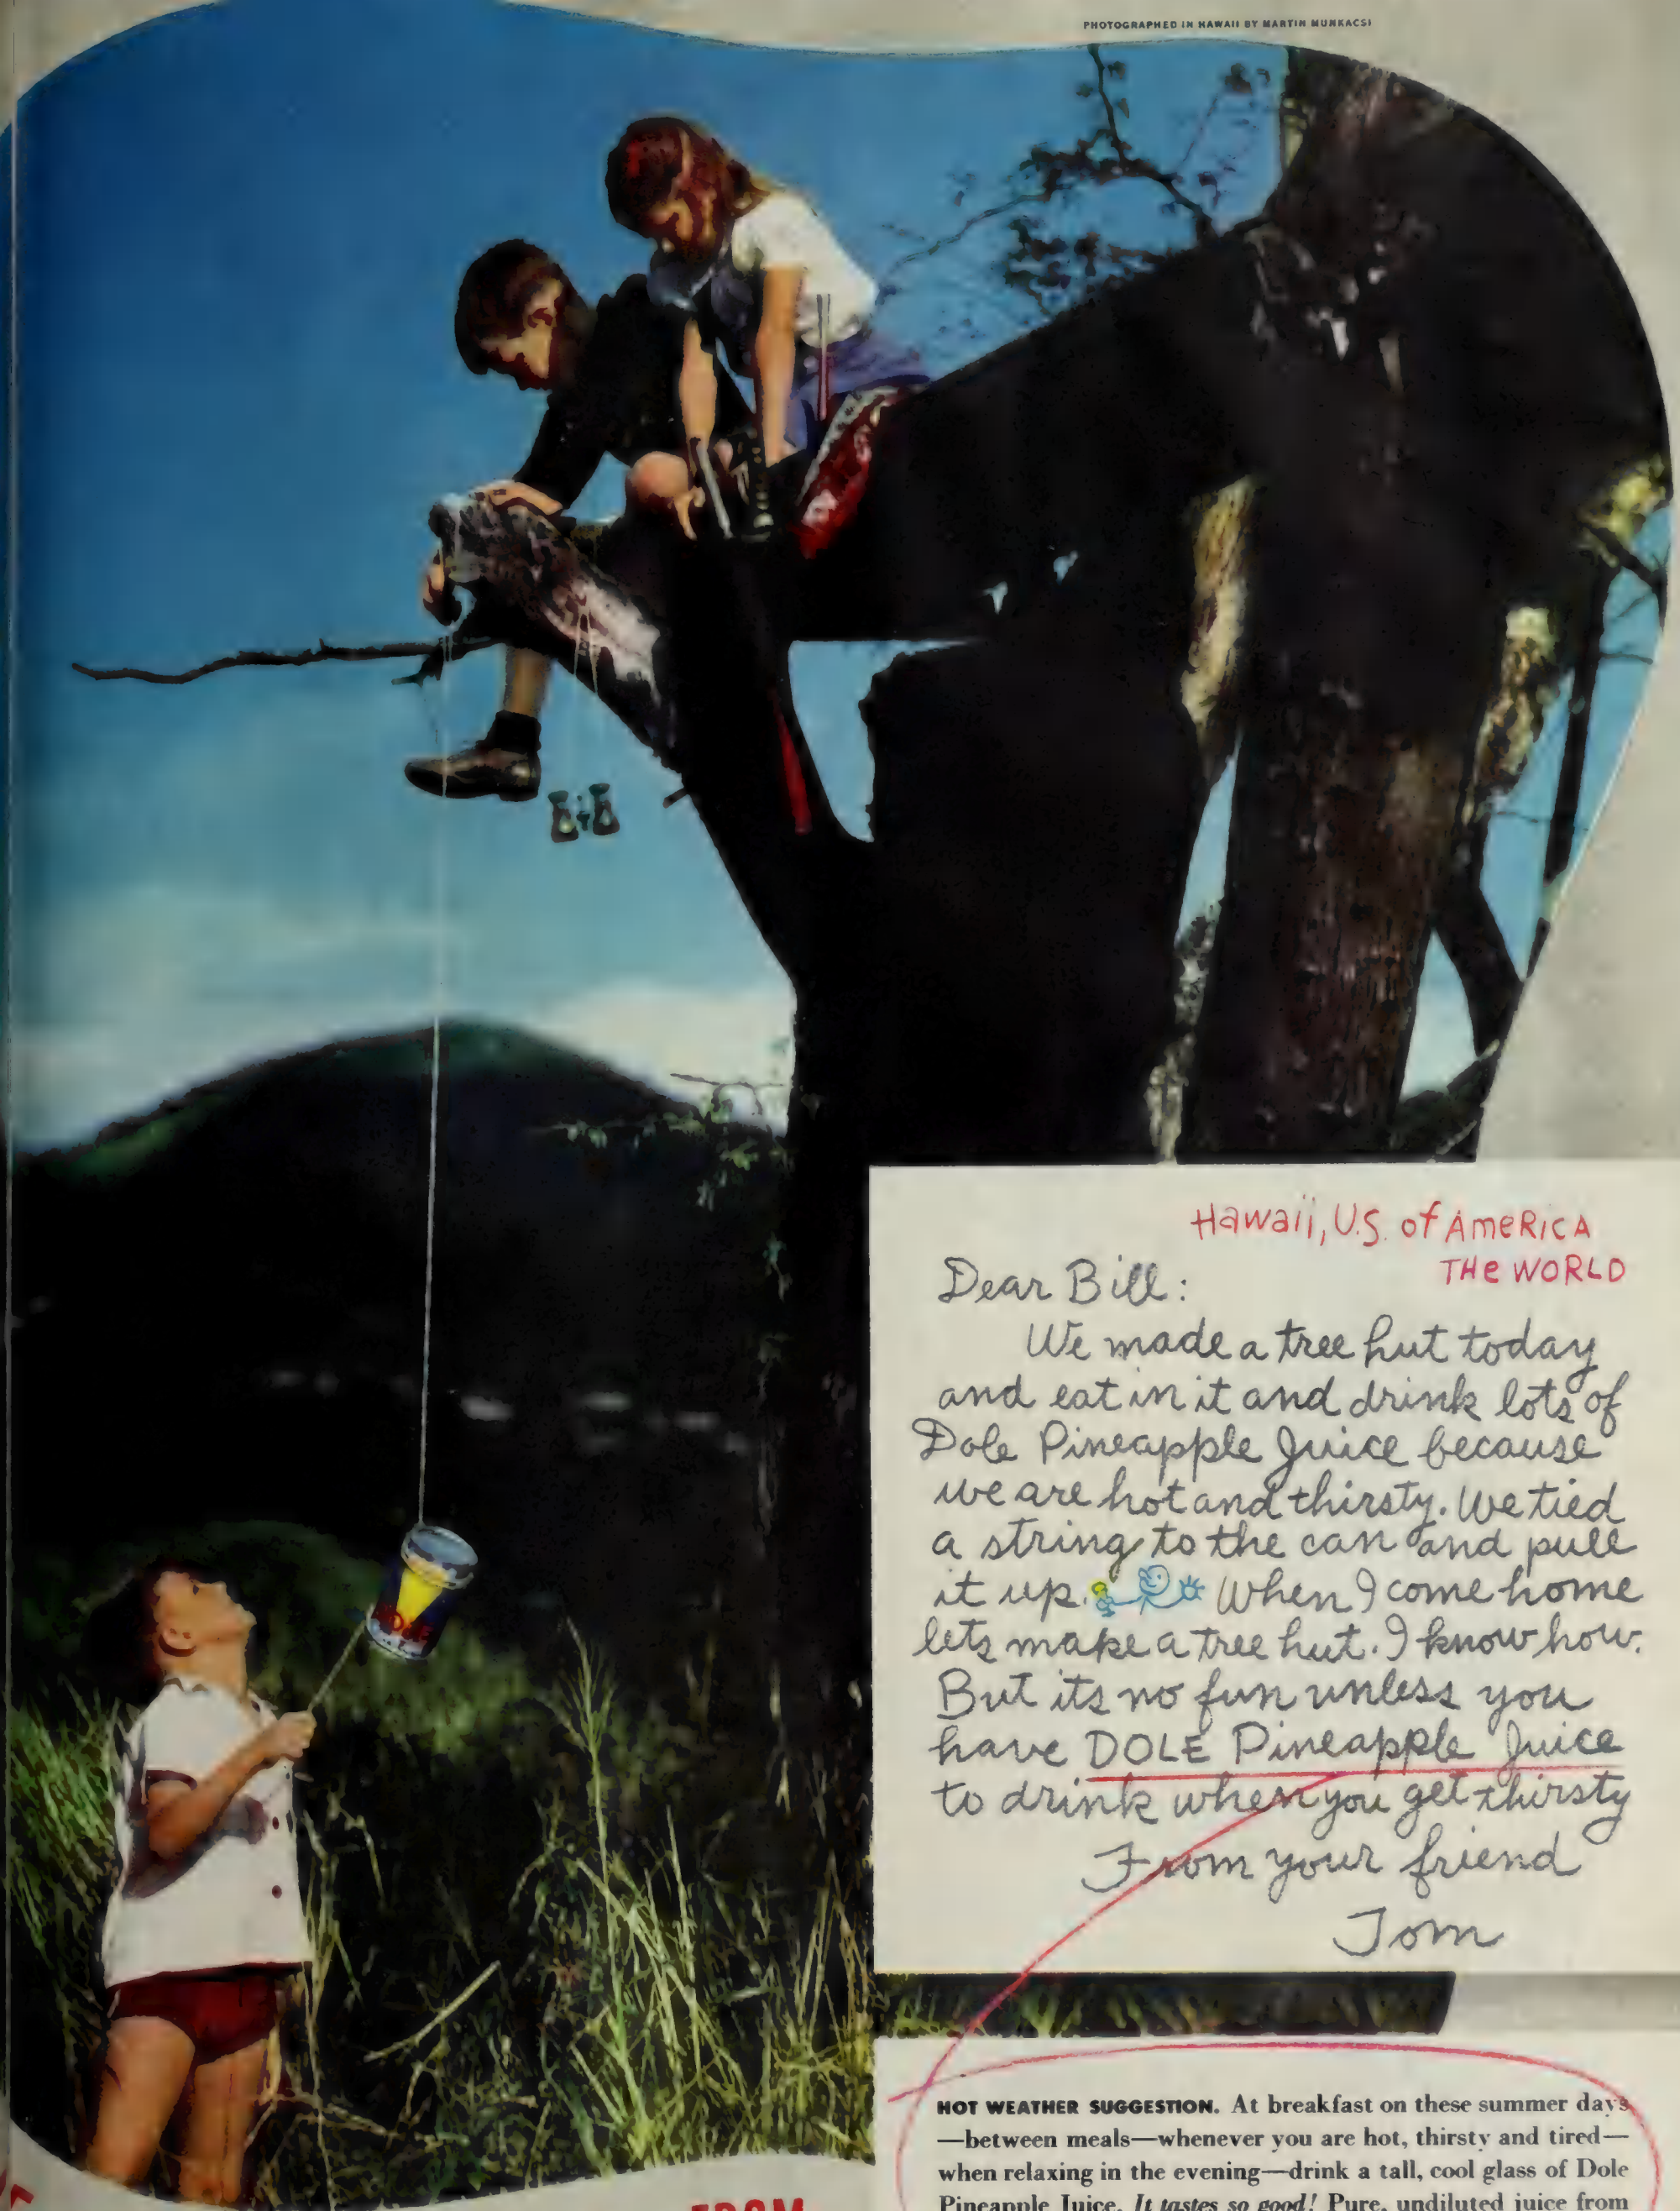

Crossing the room with quick steps, he picked up one of the smallest bottles, drew the cork, poured the colorless liquid on the floor and put the cork back in place. Then, with the empty bottle in his hands, he ran to the door.

"Stuart! . . . Franchere!" . . . he called excitedly.

When he told them his plan, they thought him crazy. It would be madness, they all said, to let the Indians into the stockade. McDougall admitted this cheerfully and pointed out what every man of them already knew—that if the attack came, they couldn't keep the Indians out. Would they try his plan?

He had his way in the end. The stock-

Hawaii, U.S. of America
THE WORLD

Dear Bill:

We made a tree hut today and eat in it and drink lots of Dole Pineapple Juice because we are hot and thirsty. We tied a string to the can and pull it up. When I come home lets make a tree hut. I know how.
But its no fun unless you have DOLE Pineapple Juice to drink when you get thirsty

From your friend
Tom

HOT WEATHER SUGGESTION. At breakfast on these summer days—between meals—whenever you are hot, thirsty and tired—when relaxing in the evening—drink a tall, cool glass of Dole Pineapple Juice. It tastes so good! Pure, undiluted juice from sun-ripened pineapples! A good source of vitamins B and C and contains vitamin A. High in quickly-available food energy.

PINEAPPLE JUICE FROM HAWAII

RAZOR BLADES SOMETIMES CUT THE CUTTER. WHEN THEY DO AND CUTS NEED BANDAGING...

USE A READY-MADE BAND-AID (AFTER TREATING THE CUT PROPERLY). NO FUSSING WITH AWKWARD, HOME-MADE BANDAGES.

BAND-AID IS NEAT AND CONVENIENT. JUST STICK ONE ON—IT STAYS ON—EVEN ON HARD-TO-BANDAGE PLACES. KEEP A BOX HANDY FOR MINOR CUTS, BURNS AND BLISTERS. 19¢ FOR 36 ASSORTED SIZES.

Johnson & Johnson
BAND-AID
Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.
ADHESIVE BANDAGES

THIS modern 16" airplane type case is fitted with mirror, lotion bottles and comb. Strong construction and neatly lined!

GET This Beautiful Week-end Case!

WITHOUT a penny of expense, you can earn this attractive and useful week-end case! It's yours for selling only two 1-year COLLIER'S subscriptions at $2.00 each to persons living outside your home. These may be either new or renewal subscriptions.

Offer good in U. S. A. only. Take this opportunity to get a good-looking case which you can use for overnight trips, week-ends or as an extra bag on vacation. Simply send subscribers' names and addresses to us together with your request for the week-end case and check or money order for $4.00. Write to—

Independent Agency Division, Desk C-30
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company
Springfield, Ohio

LAVORIS

A Healthful Habit

Help guard health by using Lavoris night and morning

them, it seems, forever groping toward the light—some vague discontent with their own gods that made them eager to know more of the God in whom the white man believed. The thought of "the Book" possessed them. The trapper had told them of St. Louis on the distant Missouri, the great village where six thousand white men lived. It would be a journey such as none of them had ever attempted or dreamed of, a journey dark with peril. But at St. Louis surely the Book could be found.

So they chose four of their number to go to St. Louis and bring back the Book; and these are the Four Horsemen of this narration, surely the strangest horsemen that ever rode in the West.

They reached St. Louis after many adventures. But they found there no book that they could take back with them—there was no translation of the Bible in the Indian tongue. General Clark, in charge of Indian affairs, received them kindly but could not, or did not, help them; and sadly, in a speech of remarkable eloquence and pathos, their spokesman told Clark that they must now return and report the failure of their quest. Before they could start, two of the four fell ill and died, while a third perished on the homeward journey. Only one lived to return to his people in the far-off Oregon mountains and tell them that the Book could not be found.

Oregon's First Martyr

Yet, unknown to them or to anyone, Fate had been riding with them—the destiny of Oregon and all the Great Northwest. From St. Louis word of their extraordinary mission found its way to the cities of the East and the heart of Christian America was touched. For the first time the American Christian churches looked toward the almost unknown region beyond the Rockies. Soon the first missionaries were on their way across the plains, and, following them, the great American emigration to Oregon began. But for the journey of those four Indian horsemen, Oregon would have remained years longer a wild, unsettled region claimed by both America and England; and but for the American influx which they started, most of our Pacific slope today might be under the British flag.

But the chain? The chain of tragic incident and resultant drama which began with Captain Ayres and his cruel trick and led on through the massacre of the Tonquin and her awful vengeance and through Duncan McDougall and his smallpox bottle? What have the Four Horsemen to do with the chain?

Greatest of all the missionaries who answered the call of the Nez Percés for light was Marcus Whitman. He is honored and cherished in the West today and many believe that he guided the first great wagon train of 900 emigrants across the Rockies more than any other white man in Oregon for the Union. Be that as it may, he labored nobly for years as a missionary among the Indians—Nez Percés, as it happened, neighboring Cayuse country and the Columbia.

Then one day disease appeared among the Cayuse tribe. Whether it was a virulent form of measles or a fearful swift death with fearful swiftness. While his helpers did what they could, in most cases their efforts were in vain. Having but slight resistance to the germs brought into the country by the white settlers, the Indians died in tens and scores.

Fate, sitting cloud-wrapped on the Oregon peak, smiles grimly at the germs again. It points to the death of Tilokait, the Cayuse chief.

All round him Tilokait saw death. He saw them struck down by the disease, seemed an invisible poison, dying so fast that in many places the dead lay side by side with the living.

Whitman, Tilokait was persuaded, had done what he had threatened—he had uncovered the disease bottle. Pretending to help with his medicine, he was poisoning the air that the red men breathed, killing them—men, women and children—so that the white man he had brought with him from the East might possess the Indians' land.

Tilokait secretly gathered his warriors, those that were left. He wanted to save his stricken people. They looked to him and he failed them. He must strike before the disease bottle could be uncovered.

The white men hanged Tilokait. Four of his principal warriors were killed on June 3, 1850, for the murder of Marcus Whitman, his wife and others at the Whitman Mission. The Cayuse made war on the white men, drove them from their lands. They had virtually destroyed the Cayuse with rum and disease, the people of the Cayuse. Comcomly, who had let McDougall kill him when he could have killed the white men at a blow. Before the war took also the lands of the Nez Percés who had sent the Four Horsemen on their long journey to find the Book and bring the Book to Oregon.

So the chain ended—the chain of drama was over. The red man was killed and the white man possessed the land. Fate, on his mountain, looked down at his hands and grinned.

"Now you can practice your tuba in the house and we won't hear it!"

The Irish Can't Believe It

Continued from page 11

the thought of invasion the does not. In many ways the terreland will be an ally if the comes. There are only two real Ireland. It is true that the feath and Kildare and of Tip-ould provide ideal landing enemy planes, but it is equally these meadows and moors are surrounded by high hills.
e coast is rocky, but there are ide benches not unlike the h which the parachutists and ying planes landed in Holre is Portmarnock, near Dub-gleams whitely with what looks hard sand. Kingsford-Smith off from here on a flight to So did Jim Mollison. But authorities who, incidentally, quoted by name, say that the ft in spots and that even the Reed's Nautical Almanac can-how high the unpredictable come and how much sand will any given date. Incidentally, is have been taken to protect land's beaches.

has a few potential naval worth the attention of any Any belligerent country would ld Cobh and Berehaven on the est; Lough Swilly on the north-out and Killybegs, which is
y. Also Bantry Bay in Cork laoghaire in County Dublin.
ld give her a Gibraltar to keep
ed England in order.

't until the third week in July ports were mined against in-hen Sean Lemass, minister of speaking for the government, the coast was being mined and government was gravely con-out the possibility of invasion.
ly yawned.

Compact Army Units

except military authorities, t tell, know just how large the ay is. A month ago it was 20,000 men. Today, augmented al defense force, it probably 80,000 men, but the latter are ed soldiers. Under the com-Major General McKenna, it is d to fight the kind of defensive may develop. Colonel Cos-Major General Hugo McNeill, ned his soldiering at the mili-pool at Fort Leavenworth, have d the army into brigades, not A brigade—perhaps a thou-n—will have everything that a has except man strength. It light artillery, heavy artillery here is of it—tanks—what there em—and, of course, infantry. It compact, fast-moving unit which ell the terrain where it is sta-brigades are strategically ach one being responsible for a amount of territory. If any bel-forces land, the brigades will ally be on the spot within a rt space of time. The important ave been mined and there is no at the Irish army will put up a and wholehearted defense.

y come by air, using planes as attacking unit, the brigades t be quite so effective. But strategists still insist that no n win a war from the air. They rmany conquer France through es, which were undoubtedly the g factor, but they still don't be-Military experts still insist that e won by infantry, ignoring the evidence that might be given by Poland, Norway, Holland, Belgium and France.

Once a group of bombers and dive bombers thoroughly strafe a section of country there is little opposition left.
Then the parachutists by the hundred can descend in peace and quiet. This is not a military theory out of an antiquated army textbook, this is something I have seen happen myself. This is warfare of 1940.

If Germany decides to invade Ireland, she will probably do it by air. First her attacking planes would clear the ground;
then a thousand parachutists would land; then the troop planes, each carrying forty men, would come down. Within an hour Germany could land three thousand well-equipped soldiers on any Irish airport. She will drop baby tanks from planes as the Russians did when they went into Rumania not long ago.

Locale of Hostilities and Defense

There are six small counties in the northeast of Ireland. This is the part of Ireland that still serves and belongs to England. There are English troops in Ulster. If the Germans strike and the Irish fight back, which, of course, they will, these English troops will automatically become allies of Eire. Ireland, without losing face and without taking one step backward from her announced policy of neutrality, will then allow England to come in to help repel the invaders. These are good soldiers, many of them veterans of Dunkerque.
They are well-equipped with light tanks and armored trucks which could bring them along Ireland's fine roads to Dublin within two hours. They have planes there to protect the roads against the dive bombers and there are other planes waiting at Liverpool, only eighteen minutes away by air from Dublin. If Dev, as all of Ireland calls the unassum-ing, troubled prime minister, in the name of the people gives them the word, they won't linger. And it is possible that one of the major engagements of the war will then be fought on Irish soil.

The man in the pub doesn't see the picture that way at all. Neither does the man at the races or the squire getting ready for the next horse show. The 1940 war is very far away to him.
Rather would he talk of the time in 1014
when the Dalcassians of County Clare drove the Danes out of Ireland. Rather would he talk of Michael Collins and of how back in 1920 when there was a price of 40,000 pounds on his head he would walk gaily along O'Connell Street every day, rubbing elbows with the Black and Tans.

These things are real to him.

To understand the Irish one must study them at long range. You cannot get to know them by living with them.
You will get to know that they are lovable and honest and gay and very brave, but this is not understanding. They profess no love for the English but the huge, gilded statue of Queen Victoria, which is in front of Parliament, is still one of the show sights of Dublin. Eire is almost wholly Catholic, but today Douglas Hyde, the president of Ireland, is a Protestant. Ireland is intensely democratic but is very proud of its fine Royal Hibernian Hotel in Dublin. Ireland says, "We want nothing to do with England," and yet 95 per cent of her exports go to England. Ask an Irishman as I did to explain these paradoxes and he'll shake his head and smile. "Don't try to understand us," he'll say. "Hell, we don't even understand ourselves."

FALSE TEETH WEARERS

often worst breath offenders

Don't let Denture Breath and stains shout "False Teeth"
KEEP PLATES LIKE NEW WITH POLIDENT

Plates and bridges soak up odors and impurities like a sponge! A hard, dark film collects on them. This film holds germs and decay bacteria. It is so tough that ordinary brushing seldom removes it.
And it gets into every tiny crevice where brushing can't even reach.

Almost always the result is "den-ture breath"—one of the most offensive of all breath odors. You won't know if you have it—but others will.

Yet there's a perfect way to clean and purify false teeth without brushing, acid or danger. It is Polident, a powder that dissolves away

all film, stains, tarnish and odor.
Makes breath sweeter—and plates or bridges look better and feel better.

GRATEFUL USERS PRAISE IT

Tens of thousands call Polident a blessing for convenience and hygiene. Long-lasting can costs only 30¢ at any drug store, and your money back if not delighted. Approved by Good Housekeeping Bureau and thousands of leading dentists everywhere. Hudson Products Inc., New York, N. Y.

Cleans and Purifies Without Brushing

Do this daily: Add a little Polident powder to half a glass of water. Stir. Then put in plate or bridge for 10 to 15 minutes. Rinse—and it's ready to use.

POLIDENT

Independence

TO DIG down in your purse and pull out a roll of bills—that's Independence! And that's what just about every woman of today wants. Money for trips, and the movies, and pretty clothes.
Money to spend that doesn't have to come out of your budget. Just—pin money!

"The Club has helped me to keep my independence," writes a California member. "As I pocket each dollar I earn in the Club a new light enters my eyes—shoulders straighten and I could hug the world. It's a wonderful feeling and I hope the Club will always be there to help someone who needs it."

A New York member also wrote this pleasant letter:

"I never dreamed I could make so much money. Each day since I joined the Club
I am happier. In such a little while I earned $13.70 and it helped so much."

"A Boon to Mothers"

"When mother's job reaches out beyond her home to keep pace with education for her children then what a boon to her is the
P. M. C. She can be her own timekeeper.
She sets her goal according to her requirements. With taxes and life insurance both due you can imagine how little there would be for extras without the Club's aid," writes a Utah Club member.

YOUR place is here in the Pin Money Club, and you'll enjoy claiming membership—also pocketing the extra dollars that will be yours for giving just a portion of your spare time to our pleasant and easy work.

Send for our free booklet, "An Adventure in Dollars and Cents." Don't delay.
Write a letter or send a card today to

Margaret Clarke

Secretary, Pin Money Club
Collier's, The National Weekly
Department 116
250 Park Avenue New York City

The Girl Talks

Continued from page 13

"Exactly. And the fingerman may very well be Sammin," I declared. "He's a well-known frequenter of night clubs and cafés. He's been suspected more than once of receiving stolen jewelry, and it's a short step from that to an alliance with those who steal it."

"You're good."

"You think I'm right, don't you?"

"No; I think you ain't."

Next day I read that Sammin was being held by the police for questioning. The newspapers did not accuse him or Mrs. Jernel of having engineered the murder, but the implication was plain.

"Well, O'Malley," I said when I met him again, "what have you found?"

He appeared discouraged. "Not a thing," he admitted. "It looks like we can't find who those stick-up guys are unless I can trace the taxicab, and I can't trace the cab. Jernel and Mrs. Jernel was both well known in night clubs and nobody took particular notice when they was in one. Sammin the same. Them night cafés are this way: A guy at one table is a millionaire and at the next table there is a mobster and the mobster's money is just as good. Or a guy with a lady gets talking to some stranger at the bar and takes him back to his table with him, and the guy's a jewel thief. Too many things can happen in them places, and I keep coming out the same hole where I went in."

HE HAD a map on which he had marked the location of the different holdups and the direction in which the taxicab had gone in escaping.

"We got witnesses that seen the cab after several of these stick-ups," he explained. "Whatever way the cab escaped to, it probably turned west. I figure that means the mob has a hideaway on the West Side. When it gets where it's going, the cab license gets changed; then we don't recognize it. We got other witnesses that seen these stick-ups. If they pick out some guy from a picture we show 'em, it turns out he can't be one of 'em; and if we show 'em pictures of crooks with a gold tooth they say he ain't the right one."

"Your trouble," I insisted, "is that you refuse to recognize that the fingering was done by Sammin."

I didn't see O'Malley for several days. Then I met him hurrying to headquarters. He appeared excited.

"You've got something?" I asked.

"I got a line on a guy that might be one of 'em. I phoned Miss Rynd. She's coming to look at his picture."

We met Miss Rynd. I waited with her in a small room at headquarters until O'Malley brought in several photographs. She looked at them but didn't recognize any of them.

"No soap," O'Malley said, disappointed. "Well, I got to make out my report."

He sat down and wrote out his report, didn't like it, crumpled it up and threw it in the wastebasket. The girl and I watched him while he rewrote it. We left her there while I went with him to turn in the report, and we didn't go back to her, but went to the detectives' room. We didn't do anything; we just sat and talked. I thought I'd leave; then I thought I wouldn't. We'd been there, doing nothing, for a couple of hours. Then a cop came in.

"You're wanted—quick," he told O'Malley.

We ran out and got in a police car. A couple of plain-clothes cops were already in it. We drove north on the West Side and O'Malley went into a drugstore and telephoned headquarters, and we drove some more. We stopped several times while he telephoned. Then we came to a fine apartment building where an owner-driven cab was standing, but it didn't have the right license number. We passed by and parked around the corner, and police cars were arriving and parking near us, and a plain-clothes cop came out of a building on the corner.

"What apartment?" O'Malley asked him.

"We don't know that."

"You got the phone number?"

"We might have."

"Well, phone it, then."

We went into the building where the cab was parked, and plain-clothes cops came in at intervals, one or two at a time, and stood in the halls with their guns in their hands, and they brought the building superintendent. In one of the apartments a phone rang and cops gathered outside in the hallway and they made the superintendent knock on the

at the station house, "is to confront these fellows with Sammin."

"Why him? He didn't have nothing to do with it."

"Nor Mrs. Jernel?" I asked.

"No, nor her. But we got a lady coming here."

THEN a couple of cops brought in Miss Rynd, and a tall man was with her, who turned out to be her father. So many cops were around the place it looked like a roll call, and questioning was going on in several rooms. I got hold of O'Malley.

"We're getting it," he said. "She's talking and it works out this way: Miss Rynd's a swell-looking kid and men liked to go out with her, and she got to going to cafés and night clubs with 'em a lot. A few months ago, in one of them night clubs, somebody introduced her to Arenton. He's a handsome guy and she began going around with him. She didn't know nothing about what his business was. He told her he was a bond salesman. Of course she was going with About then Jernel called her split with his wife and was and he remembered Miss Rynd and her went around together girl got in love with him. So told her, if she didn't quit go Jernel, he'd knock her off."

"But he didn't," I said.

"No; he killed Jernel. That makes it look like Arenton was with the girl. Miss Rynd had that night club to him some time and he knew, when him and went in there, that Jernel and there. He knocked off Jernel to be a lesson to her."

"Did you suspect her?" I asked.

"Why, finally. Of course, right start cops checked up on her been in the places that got her always with reputable guys, and a student and we had nothing. When I couldn't find nobody come to me to find out who she was in places that hadn't been. So I took a picture of her around some places they recognized she'd been with Arenton."

"We couldn't find out nothing him; it turns out he come here Coast and has no New York record could look for the guy and maybe body that had been held up would nize him—maybe not; the holdup that might have been him had tooth and Arenton didn't have it if you can't find out nothing about guy that itself is suspicious. We wouldn't get anything out of him by questioning her."

"SO WHAT?"

"You seen it. I got her to look at pictures and in front of her I wrote a phony report and chucked it in the wastebasket. I said in the report her pegged as boss of the mob, picked out the places and engineered holdups. I and you left her alone and went and turned in my report because I knew she would grab it. I had wrote out of the wastebasket she was guilty, I figured she would get in touch with some of them to tell 'em the trouble she was in and had to do something. She did. Cops followed her. Arenton had the hotel and they hadn't never seen where the mob hide-out was. I knew where to find the taxi driver. I went to a stand and took a picture of a driven cab and the cab took her home."

"It wasn't the right license," I objected.

"What of it? These guys took stolen licenses and cut 'em up and had the pieces welded together. Cops followed the cab after it left the house. First the driver stopped at a cigar store and phoned, and I watched through the phone booth what numbers he dialed and wrote 'em down. Then the cab went to the hotel. On the way, cops that were following it kept phoning headquarters. We could follow it too, and when there a cop called the number in the cigar store, so the phone would tell us what apartment it was. What will they do to the girl?" I asked anxiously.

"You worrying? She'll have evidence against these guys, and I idea they'll let her pa take her home."

"It was swell police work," I declared.

"It won't get me nothing. I'm funny about Miss Rynd. She wants to study drama. Do you figure she think now she's had enough of

"And the fingers are anti-aircraft guns"

door and say who he was, but the door didn't open.

"We got to do it the hard way," O'Malley announced. "They're onto us."

There wasn't much shooting. The cops fired a few times and somebody inside fired a few shots and nobody was hit. Then the door opened. Four men were inside. One was a taxi driver; the three others were young and good-looking, the kind of men that you might meet anywhere.

"Where's the man who shot Jernel, O'Malley?" I demanded. "None of these fellows has a gold tooth."

"We'll find him."

We were putting them in a car to take them to the station house when O'Malley turned back suddenly.

"Wait a minute," he said. "One of these guys dropped something."

He picked up something out of the gutter. It was a thin gold shell shaped like a tooth. O'Malley slipped it onto one of his teeth and grinned at me. The taxi driver was named Gennie, and two others were named Veroni and Sabbatio, and the man who had dropped the fake tooth was named Arenton.

"The next thing," I said to O'Malley other fellows too. After she'd been out in the evening with some guy, Arenton would get her to describe to him some place where they'd been. He'd make a little picture of it and mark all the doors. He made it seem like kind of a game they was playing just for fun, and at first Miss Rynd didn't guess different. She didn't notice, after she'd described one of them places to him, it got held up."

"She was 'casing' the places for him!" I exclaimed.

"Sure. But she didn't know it. I guess she liked Arenton pretty well. Then she begin to suspect something, and she decided to break with him."

"If she could," I remarked.

"You said something! Once you get in with one of them mobs you can't get out. Arenton come out in the open with her. It looks like, while he was using the girl, he'd got in love with her. He told her she was in on them holdups as much as him. If she told anybody or went to the police, he couldn't keep some of his mob from knocking her off. She was afraid of him, and of his mob, and afraid she'd get killed."

"She was in a spot."

"Yeah, and she got in a worse one."

"But surely a tire isn't any better, Mr. Goodrich, just because it's advertised?"

MRS. EDWARD WHITE of New Haven, Conn., asks this question of MR. DAVID GOODRICH, Chairman of The B. F. Goodrich Company, because, like many consumers all over the country she is interested in advertising, and eager for facts instead of hearsay. The following interview took place in the Goodrich Building at the World's Fair, in front of the tire-testing "guillotine."

Goodrich: "Let's get at that question this Mrs. White; do you remember how many tires are in your town?"

White: "Why, let me see . . . two or three. But . . ."

Goodrich: "Well, let's pretend you own one hotel and let's say things are going along nicely, and only one of your competitors completely redecorates his hotel. Redecorates it from lobby to lobby, comfortable new beds and furnishings, hot and cold minute baths. Tells everybody about it. Gets the crowds. Now what do you do?"

White: "I certainly wouldn't be redecorating. I'd go him one better."

Goodrich: "Yes, and pretty soon the third hotel would have to spruce up, too. So the whole town would be raised, wouldn't it, Mrs. White? Most of every hotel in town would get more money. Now, that's my point exactly. Competition makes products better. And it doesn't make any difference whether you're in the hotel business or the bread business or the tire business

. . . you've got the same rivalry, the same healthy determination to go the other fellow one better in quality and value."

Mrs. White: "But just where does advertising come in?"

Mr. Goodrich: "Why, advertising is the main-spring of it all. When we advertise, we turn the spotlight on Goodrich tires . . . we invite comparison with other brands. And two things happen. The first is that we work like nailers to have constant improvement to report. The second is that when we do announce the results of our research we stimulate the entire industry. Advertising, you see, makes competition keener—and progress swifter."

Mrs. White: "Can you give me a specific example?"

Mr. Goodrich: "Well, years ago, when automobile tires were made of solid rubber, Goodrich developed the pneumatic tire. And we advertised it. You can imagine what news that was . . . and how quickly all tires became pneumatic. Same thing when we advertised the first cord tire, and later the first real non-skid tread. Recently, our Golden Ply and Life Saver Tread started something, too."

Mrs. White: "So, in that sense, advertising really does make tires better . . ."

Mr. Goodrich: "To say nothing of its power to save human lives. When we . . . or any other tire company . . . develop a safer tire, isn't it vital for the whole nation to know about it at once? And isn't it a good thing if tire advertising can make people think about skids and blow-outs . . . and get them to replace their worn-out, unsafe tires? I think it is. If advertising can prevent one accident, save one life in this age of speed, it is performing an invaluable public service."

To give you the truth about advertising and its influence on the welfare and prosperity of the American people, we have gone to those who are in the best position to know the facts. Interviews with these business leaders, about advertising's social and economic benefits to you, are appearing in Collier's, Woman's Home Companion, and The American Magazine — published by The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company.

CLOWN SAYS, "Fingernail Test no joke!"

IT'S S'POSED TO BE FUNNY when a girl jilts a clown for a lion tamer. But my pal the Strong Man don't laugh. "It ain't love," he claims, "it's that loose dandruff!" I tried the Fingernail Test. My scalp was gummy as circus mud!

HE HANDS ME A BOTTLE of Wildroot-with-Oil. "The old Wildroot formula," he says, "that's been chasing dandruff scales for 30 years, plus pure vegetable oil that grooms hair without greasing the scalp. Try it. It feels swell!"

WHAT DO YOU KNOW! This Wildroot-with-Oil is the goods! Its safe, powerful "3-Action" cleans as it grooms. Keeps my hair neatly dressed, and so clean Estelle can run her fingers through it an-y time she wants to!

IMPORTANT — Wildroot Regular Formula, used by millions who prefer a non-oily tonic, also on sale everywhere! Wildroot Co., Buffalo, N. Y. and Fort Erie, Ont., Canada.

road." He began a zigzag trot, with his hands held out before him to steer an imaginary bicycle.

Vespers chimes had begun, a soft, deep sound that spread across the shallow valley. Uncle Rob followed the boy in silence, listening to the nostalgic sound that brought unrest instead of peace to his heart. The last chime was struck and there was an aftertoll, a hesitant overtone of sound that died unfinished into silence. Uncle Rob cocked his head on one side.

"Somebody's going to die," he said. "Yes, sir, Shad, when you hear the aftertoll of a church bell you know somebody's going to get out of his back yard for good and all."

He nodded his head thoughtfully and his brittle fingers tightened on the handle of the shovel as he walked more briskly toward the town. They passed a few scattered cottages and then turned onto a dirt road that led to the first paved street of the town. The Wilkins house faced on the paved street and sided on the dirt road. The back yard was enclosed by a high picket fence, and behind the barn was a large lot in which the two milch cows were kept.

As they turned through a gate in the picket fence Shad saw Mr. Wilkins standing on the back porch, and instinctively he slipped behind Uncle Rob. Mr. Wilkins came down the steps, calling, "Rob, I've been looking for you."

He was a terrifying figure to Shad, a man with a large torso and short legs, with a bristly black mustache through which his voice rumbled like a strong wind in a thicket. He hardly ever noticed Shad. Now he stared at the shovel. "Been digging again Rob? That's a fool waste of time. But I suppose if you want to do it . . ." He shrugged his shoulders, and his voice crisped. "Look here, Rob, we went for a drive and had a flat. I want to have it fixed when you get the time."

Uncle Rob nodded and started toward the barn, with the shovel slanting over his shoulder. Mr. Wilkins turned back into the house, and Shad waited a few moments before he followed him up the steps and went into the kitchen, where his mother was cooking dinner.

"You, Shadrach!" Ina said sharply. "What's dat on yo' overalls?"

Shad looked down at his knees. "Dirt, Maw. I went diggin' wif Uncle Rob, Maw."

Ina's ample body came to rest. She gazed out the window toward the barn. "Po' ole man, I hope he fine dat gol' some day. I sho do." She turned to the stove and said over her shoulder, "Year foller year he been diggin'. I remember when he come here an' it wa'n't no time befo' he out yonder wif his shovel."

"MAW," Shad said. "Ain't Uncle Rob allus been here?"

"No, sonny," Ina smiled. "He come here befo' you's born. I spec about fifteen year. He Miz Wilkums' uncle and a long time ago when she jus' a lil girl back in Tennesee Uncle Rob done save her life." She straightened up and looked at Shad. "You know how come? Dey was a shotgun lean up agin de wall on de front porch an' Miz Wilkums she drap a pencil down de mouf er dat gun an' she try to git him out. Uncle Rob see what she do an' he snatch dat gun away an' off she go—boom—an' blow his lef' arm off. Dat's how come he jus' got him one arm, Shadrach."

"Naw," Shad said.

"Dat's de truf. An' Miz Wilkums she allus feel beholden, so when she got married to Mr. Wilkums she brung

The Devil Beats His Wife

Continued from page 23

Uncle Rob down here. I remember de time when he come. He sho did feel hisself po' relation. He didn't want to be a burden to nobody and when he got hisself settled in his lil room up in de attic he done tole me he keep it clean hisself, an' dat's what he done. I ain't never been up in his room, an' I don't b'lieve anybody else been in it but Uncle Rob hisself."

"I been in it," Shad said.

"You is?" Ina frowned. "Shadrach, you got no business in de house. You got no business past de kitchen."

"Uncle Rob done tuk me up," Shad said. "He show me his guns. He got a big fo'ty-five an' a shotgun, Maw, an' he got a sword wif a lot of goldy braid on him."

"Has he now?" Ina said. "Was he in de wah?"

"I reckon he was," Shad nodded decisively. "I reckon he was a gen'l."

"Well, he ain't never been but a privut 'roun' here," Ina said. "It's allus, take a look at de furnace, Rob, er fix up de sewin' machine, Rob, er ain't de cows been milked yet, Rob? But I guess he jus' ast fo' it."

"What he ast fo', Maw?"

"Well, Shad, he start right out to make hisself useful. He didn't do nuffin' but wuk, and now he jus' de same as a hired man."

Uncle Rob had always taken his meals with Mr. and Mrs. Wilkins, but he usually sat silent, never speaking unless he was spoken to. But after he had vulcanized a patch on the inner tube and pumped up the tire with the hand pump, after he had milked the cows and placed the pails of milk on the back porch for Ina to skim, he went in to dinner and almost immediately opened a conversation.

"Thomas," he said. "I heard the after-toll of the church bell this evn'g means somebody is going to die."

"Superstitions!" Mr. Wilkins said. Ina lingered as she served the tress. Mrs. Wilkins was a poor woman, with a sad face and no wish to be more obtrusive home than a magnolia blossom tree outside. Only on rare occasions she interpose a word counter to the band.

Tonight she said, "Uncle Rob, you feel well?"

"JUST low in spirit," Uncle Rob said. "I feel low in spirit, Bey," he looked at her so eagerly that she turned her eyes aside. "I've been thinking that I'd like to take a trip back to Tennessee. I got some kinfolks I like to see once more. I want to see old farmstead before that beln' man for me."

"Back to Tennessee?" Mr. Wilkins said. "Rob, what's this?"

"Just for a visit," Uncle Rob explained. "Maybe a week."

"I think it would do Uncle Rob good," Mrs. Wilkins said, in a tone of approval.

"So," her husband said. "Well . . . we'll see about it, Fanny. I'll talk it over some other time."

For three days Uncle Rob had been digging. When he was not digging around the house he sat in his rocking chair on the back porch, looking at the piece of patchwork quilt. On the day he left the house in the morning while Shad was taking a nap, he was bitterly disappointed to find that Mrs. Wilkins had awakened and Ina told him that Uncle Rob had gone off without him.

"Next time maybe he take you," Ina said.

But Shad had a feeling that "This was my first timid attempt at sculpture. Pathetic, isn't it?"

ing with Uncle Rob again.
oo good to be true, and ure that he would never coaster bike.

came home a little bene to milk the cows, and at he did not have the
m. He went to meet the
he could not help asking,
ou dig anything up today?"
gave Shad an astonishing
ow, Shad, I believe I did.
at I dug up?"

his head.
ga supercoaster bike," the
"With red wheels and a at's what I dug up, Shad."
de hill?" Shad was losing Rob and his face showed okin'."

joking, boy. I dug it up, its a funny thing but it
t all. Not a speck. It's You watch and see." He ise look and went into the like crying. He never Rob would make a mean

Just a low-down, mean
d to smile, and then he is old rusty air rifle that
t. Right away he had the nd the track of a whopper
he forgot about the bike.
e bear all the way to the st as he reached the gate d open and a man stood at Shad.

here?" he asked.
had said. "I don't know
de Wilkums house."
another man behind the livery wagon at the curb.
ast the fence was a big,

omething here for Shad
st man said.
r head out the window.
nt, Shad?"

w," Shad yelled. "Shad
you," Ina said.
th opened and he stared as she came out of the g, "What's you-all got arried in the crate and one id, "This here is for Shad ant to sign for it?"

n," Ina said. "What's in
"

ost his voice altogether.
Ina said, with a puzzled
s somepun wrong here."

ed. He knew there was rong, too, but just then ame out of the house and why don't you open her here's your supercoaster, d red wheels and all. You hammer."

to the barn, snatched a
the toolbox, and was back ut of breath. He heard his Uncle Rob, is you crazy?"
ne thing the boy wanted," said. "It makes me happy
him."

dugum up," Shad shouted.
p, Maw. Here de hammer,
You gwan open her up?"
up and down. "Come on,
you open her up."

boards of the crate came wonderful cracking sound
w slender spokes, painted Uncle Rob lifted the bicycle te. "Well, Shad, there she you ride her."

b, you is plain crazy," Ina grin as ecstatic as Shad's.
you ride a bike?" Uncle uddenly frozen. Slowly he ad.

"It's easy," Uncle Bob said. "Now don't be scared. Come get on her, Shad.
Put your hand up there. That's right.
Take hold of the handle bar and put your foot on the pedal. That's it. Now swing aboard her."

Shad found himself on the seat of the bicycle, and he seemed to be a mile above the grass. His hands were numb on the handle bars and his legs felt as if they had no strength to push the pedals.

"Here we go," Uncle Rob said, and he gave the bicycle a push.

SHAD yelled. The handle bars wobbled and shook, and then the grass came up to meet him and he fell on his side and saw the red wheels spinning.

"There," said Uncle Rob. "It didn't hurt, did it?"

"Naw," Shad cried, jumping to his feet. "She didn't hurt. Let's try her agin, Uncle Rob."

Shad tried it again, and again. On the third attempt he got the pedals working and kept in balance for twenty feet. The next time he was going fine until he jammed on the brakes by mistake and took a header over the handle bars. By dusk he had the confidence to take the bicycle out to the street. He pedaled along the dirt road with a tremendous sense of achievement and was considering with some uneasiness the imminent problem of turning onto the paved street when a terrible voice called his name. He fell off into the dirt.

"Boy," the voice said, "where did you get that wheel?"

Shad slowly raised his eyes and saw
Mr. Wilkins standing on the front porch.
His deep, whistling voice said, "Come here, boy."

Shad picked up the bicycle and wheeled it across the lawn to the porch.
He stared at the blunt toes of Mr. Wilkins' shoes; he could not raise his eyes to the judgment-day face of the man.

"Did you steal that wheel, boy?"

"Nossuh, Mr. Wilkums, I didn't steal him." Shad swallowed, and explained to the blunt-toed shoes, "Uncle Rob givum to me."

"Uncle Rob!" The words rumbled.

"He dugum up," Shad explained.

"What did you say?" The shoes came down the steps and Mr. Wilkins caught Shad's arm. "Did you say he dug it up?"

Shad nodded. There was a moment of silence.

"Listen," Mr. Wilkins said in a lower tone, "you went up there with Uncle Rob, didn't you? Did you ever find anything when you were up there digging?"

"Nossuh, we never fine nuffin'."

Mr. Wilkins put his face close to Shad's; the bristles of his mustache were like a porcupine's quills. "When did you go digging last, boy?"

"Sunday. Uncle Rob he po'ly an' he ain' dug since den, cep'n today."

Wilkins released Shad's arm. "Get that bike off the lawn and don't ever let me catch you riding it on the grass."

"Yassuh." Shad caught the bicycle by the seat and the handle bars and ran with it around the side of the house. He was so scared that as soon as he was in the back yard he dropped the bicycle and ran on to the servants' house. He threw himself down on his cot by the window and shut his eyes hard.

Shad did not go to the kitchen at supper time, and it was long after dark when his mother went to look for him.
"Shad, what's de matter wif you? You done lef' yo' new bike out in de ya'd.
You want he git all rusty?"

"No, Maw," Shad whispered.

"Den what's de matter wif you?" She came nearer him, and put one hand on his forehead. "You ain't feberish. I declare, it's jus' too much goin's-on. Yo' haid jus' spinnin' wif it, lak dem bike wheels. Dat's de trouble." She bent over him. "Shad, I got some news fo'

Take a tip from the Tropics TO COMPLETE YOUR SUMMER SCENE

Search from sizzling Sudan to boiling Borneo... and back to the Bengal tiger land. You'll find that men who beat the tropic heat call on the same warm friend for cool moments... Johnnie Walker, iced with soda.

When the mercury mounts, remember the tropics' customary cool drink... a tall glass of Johnnie Walker and soda, well iced. There's no finer whisky than Scotch, and Johnnie Walker is Scotch at its smooth, mellow best.

Black Label 12 Years Old
Red Label 8 Years Old
Both 86.8 proof

IT'S SENSIBLE TO STICK WITH
JOHNNIE WALKER

BLENDED SCOTCH WHISKY

Canada Dry Ginger Ale, Inc., New York, N. Y., Sole Importer

EVERYBODY NEEDS VITAMINS IN THE SUMMER

DON'T DEPEND ON THE SUN

It provides only Vitamin D. Your system needs all the vitamins all year 'round. So take VITAMINS Plus—to be sure.

WHEN YOU eat less in summer, your vitamin intake is generally lowered. But because you exercise more, you need additional vitamins. It's a fact that you can't have a super-summer if you're lacking important life-giving vitamins. Vitality, nerves, appetite, hair, skin and eyes, are all affected by them. Yet millions of people who can afford the best in food still lack vitamins. So take no chances. Supplement your diet daily with VITAMINS Plus—to be sure.

Contains High Unitage Vitamin B

VITAMINS Plus contains Vitamins A, B, C, D and G—plus liver concentrate and iron. So easy to take . . . only 5 seconds a day. At fine drug and department stores.

72 capsules $2.75

36 capsules $1.50

144 capsules $5.00

VITAMINS PLUS
—to be sure
370 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK CITY

FALSE TEETH

KLUTCH holds them tighter

KLUTCH forms a comfort cushion; holds dental plates so much firmer and snuggler that one can eat and talk with greater comfort and security; in many cases almost as well as with natural teeth. Klutch lessens the constant fear of a dropping, rocking, chafing plate. 25c and 50c at druggists. . . If your druggist hasn't it, don't waste money on substitutes, but send us 10c and we will mail you a generous trial box.

KLUTCH CO., Box 2707-H, ELMIRA, N. Y.

FEET HURT, BURN?

For tired, tender, sensitive feet, muscular soreness or burning sensations caused by exertion or fatigue, use this quick relief (vanishing liquid or ointment). Cost but a trifle. For Dr. Scholl's FREE FOOT BOOK, write Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Chicago, Ill.

Dr. Scholl's FOOT BALM

Aids in the Relief of
HAY FEVER
Dr. Weaver's
Original
NASAL FILTER
Nothing else "Just as good"
COMFORTABLE — SCARCELY VISIBLE
How It Works
FILTER the AIR YOU Breathe!
More Than 30,000
in Use
Fitted by leading Physicians'
Supply Houses in 600 cities.
Ask for demonstration or write
The Nasal Filter Co., Dept. C, Columbus, O.

you. You know what? Uncle Rob he gwan away."

"Gwan away?" Shad sat upright.

"He gwan back to Tennessee," Ina said. "I hear 'em talk at supper an' Mr. Wilkums say if Uncle Rob honin' to go to Tennessee to visit wif his kin-folks he kin go. He say he put Uncle Rob on de train in de mawnin'. Now what you say to dat?"

Shad clutched his mother's hand. "Maw, he wouldn't take de bike wif him? Uncle Rob he wouldn't do dat?"

"Cose not, Shad. He done made you a present er dat bike. Now you rest easy son. I bring you some vittles an' I gwan put yo' bike away."

The next day Uncle Rob went to the back yard to say goodbye to Shad. "Boy," he said. "You take good care of your bike, and I want to see you ride her like a champ when I come back next week."

"I sho try, Uncle Rob," Shad said.

"Sure you will," the old man said.

"And look here, Shad, I want you to do me a favor. I want you to go up to my room every now and then and dust it off for me. Will you do that?"

"I sho will, Uncle Rob," Shad said. "I gwan up dere ever' fi' minutes. Ever' speck er dust come in de winder I gwan meet him wif a mop and shoo him out."

Mr. Wilkins called impatiently to Uncle Rob then. He was at the side gate with the car and the old man's luggage was in the back seat. Uncle Rob reached out and patted the top of Shad's head, then he walked over to the gate and got in the car. He waved to Shad as they drove away.

Shad started in right away to learn to ride his bicycle like a champion.

AT THE other end of the attic a small room had been partitioned off with unpainted boards.

As Shad went toward it he heard a sound inside the room.

For a moment Shad started to run away, but he felt a sort of responsibility about Uncle Rob's room, and he had promised to keep it clean. He crept nearer the partition wall and peered through a crack in the boards.

It was Mr. Wilkins inside. Shad's breath came fast. It was Mr. Wilkins, bending over an old steamer trunk, running his hands through the clothing in it, opening the drawers of the chipped pine dresser, poking around. Poking in the trunk, poking in the dresser, poking under the bed, just poking around.

Shad's heart hammered and his hands felt cold. He turned and went on tiptoes back to the staircase. His bare feet made no sound.

Uncle Rob was gone for a month, and several days passed before Shad had the courage to return to the garret room. But every day after that he climbed to the attic and once he took a pail and mop and scrubbed the floor and the walls.

Then Uncle Rob came back. Mr. Wilkins met him at the station in the car and brought him home just before noon, and Shad waited in the kitchen while the family was having lunch. He had the bicycle ready in the back yard to show Uncle Rob that he had learned to ride without holding to the handle bars.

In the afternoon Uncle Rob came out to watch Shad ride the bicycle. His face seemed thinner and the lines were deeper around his eyes. But they were smiling lines, and his eyes were bright.

Shad rode his bicycle in and out of the back yard, doing tricks, and after a while he climbed the steps to the back porch and asked, "Uncle Rob, you gwan dig in de mawnin'?"

"No, Shad." The old man looked off to the distant hill. "I'm through digging."

The boy looked at Uncle Rob's hand, resting on the arm of the rocking chair.

The skin was like paper with thick lines drawn on it by blue crayon. He was disturbed and said, "Uncle Rob, you po'ly?"

"I'm fine, Shad," Uncle Rob said, smiling. "I'm just fine. Don't you fret about me." He closed his eyes and the smile lingered on his face.

But Shad knew that something was wrong. For a week Uncle Rob sat the whole day through on the back porch, and he was very slow about doing his chores. On his way to the barn one night he stumbled once and Ina said to Shad, "Dat ole man, he jus' too ole to wuk. He done lef' his witals back in Tennessee."

And after that Ina watched over Uncle Rob as carefully as she watched over Shad. She served him hot tea on the porch in the afternoon, she sent Shad to help him carry in the buckets of milk at night. And even Shad could see that peace had settled on the old man's face like dust in a corner of the attic.

TOWARD the end of the week Ina called Shad into the kitchen. From the way she told him to sit down and listen Shad knew that it was important.

"Shad, Uncle Rob all de time talk about gwan away," Ina said. "He done went away now."

"Naw," Shad said. "Wifout he eben say goodbye?"

"Wifout he say goodbye," Ina said. "Jus' quiet-lak, in de nighttime."

"Say now," Shad said. "I sho thought he say goodbye."

"Son," Ina said solemnly. "He daid." "Daid?" Shad's lips trembled with the word.

"Daid—gone away. It ain't no dif-funce," Ina said. "He honin' to go an' now he gone. De undertaker man done come and went."

"Maw, I won't see Uncle Rob no mo'," Shad said. "Won't I see him no mo', Maw?"

He looked at his mother's face, and then he slipped off the chair and went out into the yard. He sat under the chinaberry tree and looked up at Uncle Rob's tiny attic window, from which the old man had often called down to him. He remembered how Uncle Rob had always said he wanted to go away, he wanted to go off where there were no back yards, just a great big front lawn and somebody else to mow it. He remembered when Uncle Rob went away to Tennessee and called to him and said, "Shad, I want you to do me a favor. I want you to go up to my room every now and then and dust it off for me."

Shad gazed at the attic window, and suddenly he got up and went into the house. He tiptoed through the dining room and up the stairs. The door leading to the attic stairs was ajar. Shad pulled it fully open and climbed the steps. Sunlight came through a window and dust particles stretched across the attic like bars of gold.

The boy went toward Uncle Rob's room, and just before he reached it he heard Mr. Wilkins' deep, whistling voice. He caught his breath and pressed flat against the partition wall. There was a crack right where his eye was.

He was not too scared.

Mrs. Wilkins was in Uncle Rob's room, too. They were both poking around. They were both poking around. Mrs. Wilkins was going through the drawers of the dresser drawer under the bed. He was swearing in an undertone.

Shad blew out his breath. He was just tearing Uncle Rob's room apart, just tearing it up. He heard Mrs. Wilkins' faded voice say, "Hush, Thomas."

She held up a tin strongbox, eight inches square. He snatched it and opened it. He found money here, all right. Yes, he found money here. He put the box down on the floor. Shad saw a roll of bills in his hand. He began to count the money, his voice had a strange, quality. "One hundred, two hundred, three hundred, four hundred, five hundred, six hundred, seven hundred, eight hundred, nine hundred, ten hundred, eleven hundred, twelve hundred, thirteen hundred, fourteen hundred, fifteen hundred, sixteen hundred, seventeen hundred, eighteen hundred, nineteen hundred, twenty hundred, twenty-one hundred, twenty-two hundred, twenty-three hundred, twenty-four hundred, twenty-five hundred, twenty-six hundred, twenty-seven hundred, twenty-eight hundred, twenty-nine hundred, thirty hundred, thirty-one hundred, thirty-two hundred, thirty-three hundred, thirty-four hundred, thirty-five hundred, thirty-six hundred, thirty-seven hundred, thirty-eight hundred, thirty-nine hundred, forty hundred, forty-one hundred, forty-two hundred, forty-three hundred, forty-four hundred, forty-five hundred, forty-six hundred, forty-seven hundred, forty-eight hundred, forty-nine hundred, fifty hundred, fifty-one hundred, fifty-two hundred, fifty-three hundred, fifty-four hundred, fifty-five hundred, fifty-six hundred, fifty-seven hundred, fifty-eight hundred, fifty-nine hundred, sixty hundred, sixty-one hundred, sixty-two hundred, sixty-three hundred, sixty-four hundred, sixty-five hundred, sixty-six hundred, sixty-seven hundred, sixty-eight hundred, sixty-nine hundred, seventy hundred, seventy-one hundred, seventy-two hundred, seventy-three hundred, seventy-four hundred, seventy-five hundred, seventy-six hundred, seventy-seven hundred, seventy-eight hundred, seventy-nine hundred, eighty hundred, eighty-one hundred, eighty-two hundred, eighty-three hundred, eighty-four hundred, eighty-five hundred, eighty-six hundred, eighty-seven hundred, eighty-eight hundred, eighty-nine hundred, ninety hundred, ninety-one hundred, ninety-two hundred, ninety-three hundred, ninety-four hundred, ninety-five hundred, ninety-six hundred, ninety-seven hundred, ninety-eight hundred, ninety-nine hundred, one hundred, one hundred and one, one hundred and two, one hundred and three, one hundred and four, one hundred and five, one hundred and six, one hundred and seven, one hundred and eight, one hundred and nine, two hundred, two hundred and one, two hundred and two, two hundred and three, two hundred and four, two hundred and five, two hundred and six, two hundred and seven, two hundred and eight, two hundred and nine, three hundred, three hundred and one, three hundred and two, three hundred and three, three hundred and four, three hundred and five, three hundred and six, three hundred and seven, three hundred and eight, three hundred and nine, four hundred, four hundred and one, four hundred and two, four hundred and three, four hundred and four, four hundred and five, four hundred and six, four hundred and seven, four hundred and eight, four hundred and nine, five hundred, five hundred and one, five hundred and two, five hundred and three, five hundred and four, five hundred and five, five hundred and six, five hundred and seven, five hundred and eight, five hundred and nine, six hundred, six hundred and one, six hundred and two, six hundred and three, six hundred and four, six hundred and five, six hundred and six, six hundred and seven, six hundred and eight, six hundred and nine, seven hundred, seven hundred and one, seven hundred and two, seven hundred and three, seven hundred and four, seven hundred and five, seven hundred and six, seven hundred and seven, seven hundred and eight, seven hundred and nine, eight hundred, eight hundred and one, eight hundred and two, eight hundred and three, eight hundred and four, eight hundred and five, eight hundred and six, eight hundred and seven, eight hundred and eight, eight hundred and nine, nine hundred, nine hundred and one, nine hundred and two, nine hundred and three, nine hundred and four, nine hundred and five, nine hundred and six, nine hundred and seven, nine hundred and eight, nine hundred and nine, one thousand, one thousand and one, one thousand and two, one thousand and three, one thousand and four, one thousand and five, one thousand and six, one thousand and seven, one thousand and eight, one thousand and nine, two thousand, two thousand and one, two thousand and two, two thousand and three, two thousand and four, two thousand and five, two thousand and six, two thousand and seven, two thousand and eight, two thousand and nine, three thousand, three thousand and one, three thousand and two, three thousand and three, three thousand and four, three thousand and five, three thousand and six, three thousand and seven, three thousand and eight, three thousand and nine, four thousand, four thousand and one, four thousand and two, four thousand and three, four thousand and four, four thousand and five, four thousand and six, four thousand and seven, four thousand and eight, four thousand and nine, five thousand, five thousand and one, five thousand and two, five thousand and three, five thousand and four, five thousand and five, five thousand and six, five thousand and seven, five thousand and eight, five thousand and nine, six thousand, six thousand and one, six thousand and two, six thousand and three, six thousand and four, six thousand and five, six thousand and six, six thousand and seven, six thousand and eight, six thousand and nine, seven thousand, seven thousand and one, seven thousand and two, seven thousand and three, seven thousand and four, seven thousand and five, seven thousand and six, seven thousand and seven, seven thousand and eight, seven thousand and nine, eight thousand, eight thousand and one, eight thousand and two, eight thousand and three, eight thousand and four, eight thousand and five, eight thousand and six, eight thousand and seven, eight thousand and eight, eight thousand and nine, nine thousand, nine thousand and one, nine thousand and two, nine thousand and three, nine thousand and four, nine thousand and five, nine thousand and six, nine thousand and seven, nine thousand and eight, nine thousand and nine, ten thousand, ten thousand and one, ten thousand and two, ten thousand and three, ten thousand and four, ten thousand and five, ten thousand and six, ten thousand and seven, ten thousand and eight, ten thousand and nine, eleven thousand, eleven thousand and one, eleven thousand and two, eleven thousand and three, eleven thousand and four, eleven thousand and five, eleven thousand and six, eleven thousand and seven, eleven thousand and eight, eleven thousand and nine, twelve thousand, twelve thousand and one, twelve thousand and two, twelve thousand and three, twelve thousand and four, twelve thousand and five, twelve thousand and six, twelve thousand and seven, twelve thousand and eight, twelve thousand and nine, thirteen thousand, thirteen thousand and one, thirteen thousand and two, thirteen thousand and three, thirteen thousand and four, thirteen thousand and five, thirteen thousand and six, thirteen thousand and seven, thirteen thousand and eight, thirteen thousand and nine, fourteen thousand, fourteen thousand and one, fourteen thousand and two, fourteen thousand and three, fourteen thousand and four, fourteen thousand and five, fourteen thousand and six, fourteen thousand and seven, fourteen thousand and eight, fourteen thousand and nine, fifteen thousand, fifteen thousand and one, fifteen thousand and two, fifteen thousand and three, fifteen thousand and four, fifteen thousand and five, fifteen thousand and six, fifteen thousand and seven, fifteen thousand and eight, fifteen thousand and nine, sixteen thousand, sixteen thousand and one, sixteen thousand and two, sixteen thousand and three, sixteen thousand and four, sixteen thousand and five, sixteen thousand and six, sixteen thousand and seven, sixteen thousand and eight, sixteen thousand and nine, seventeen thousand, seventeen thousand and one, seventeen thousand and two, seventeen thousand and three, seventeen thousand and four, seventeen thousand and five, seventeen thousand and six, seventeen thousand and seven, seventeen thousand and eight, seventeen thousand and nine, eighteen thousand, eighteen thousand and one, eighteen thousand and two, eighteen thousand and three, eighteen thousand and four, eighteen thousand and five, eighteen thousand and six, eighteen thousand and seven, eighteen thousand and eight, eighteen thousand and nine, nineteen thousand, nineteen thousand and one, nineteen thousand and two, nineteen thousand and three, nineteen thousand and four, nineteen thousand and five, nineteen thousand and six, nineteen thousand and seven, nineteen thousand and eight, nineteen thousand and nine, twenty thousand, twenty thousand and one, twenty thousand and two, twenty thousand and three, twenty thousand and four, twenty thousand and five, twenty thousand and six, twenty thousand and seven, twenty thousand and eight, twenty thousand and nine, twenty-one thousand, twenty-one thousand and one, twenty-one thousand and two, twenty-one thousand and three, twenty-one thousand and four, twenty-one thousand and five, twenty-one thousand and six, twenty-one thousand and seven, twenty-one thousand and eight, twenty-one thousand and nine, twenty-two thousand, twenty-two thousand and one, twenty-two thousand and two, twenty-two thousand and three, twenty-two thousand and four, twenty-two thousand and five, twenty-two thousand and six, twenty-two thousand and seven, twenty-two thousand and eight, twenty-two thousand and nine, twenty-three thousand, twenty-three thousand and one, twenty-three thousand and two, twenty-three thousand and three, twenty-three thousand and four, twenty-three thousand and five, twenty-three thousand and six, twenty-three thousand and seven, twenty-three thousand and eight, twenty-three thousand and nine, twenty-four thousand, twenty-four thousand and one, twenty-four thousand and two, twenty-four thousand and three, twenty-four thousand and four, twenty-four thousand and five, twenty-four thousand and six, twenty-four thousand and seven, twenty-four thousand and eight, twenty-four thousand and nine, twenty-five thousand, twenty-five thousand and one, twenty-five thousand and two, twenty-five thousand and three, twenty-five thousand and four, twenty-five thousand and five, twenty-five thousand and six, twenty-five thousand and seven, twenty-five thousand and eight, twenty-five thousand and nine, twenty-six thousand, twenty-six thousand and one, twenty-six thousand and two, twenty-six thousand and three, twenty-six thousand and four, twenty-six thousand and five, twenty-six thousand and six, twenty-six thousand and seven, twenty-six thousand and eight, twenty-six thousand and nine, twenty-seven thousand, twenty-seven thousand and one, twenty-seven thousand and two, twenty-seven thousand and three, twenty-seven thousand and four, twenty-seven thousand and five, twenty-seven thousand and six, twenty-seven thousand and seven, twenty-seven thousand and eight, twenty-seven thousand and nine, twenty-eight thousand, twenty-eight thousand and one, twenty-eight thousand and two, twenty-eight thousand and three, twenty-eight thousand and four, twenty-eight thousand and five, twenty-eight thousand and six, twenty-eight thousand and seven, twenty-eight thousand and eight, twenty-eight thousand and nine, twenty-nine thousand, twenty-nine thousand and one, twenty-nine thousand and two, twenty-nine thousand and three, twenty-nine thousand and four, twenty-nine thousand and five, twenty-nine thousand and six, twenty-nine thousand and seven, twenty-nine thousand and eight, twenty-nine thousand and nine, thirty thousand, thirty thousand and one, thirty thousand and two, thirty thousand and three, thirty thousand and four, thirty thousand and five, thirty thousand and six, thirty thousand and seven, thirty thousand and eight, thirty thousand and nine, thirty-one thousand, thirty-one thousand and one, thirty-one thousand and two, thirty-one thousand and three, thirty-one thousand and four, thirty-one thousand and five, thirty-one thousand and six, thirty-one thousand and seven, thirty-one thousand and eight, thirty-one thousand and nine, thirty-two thousand, thirty-two thousand and one, thirty-two thousand and two, thirty-two thousand and three, thirty-two thousand and four, thirty-two thousand and five, thirty-two thousand and six, thirty-two thousand and seven, thirty-two thousand and eight, thirty-two thousand and nine, thirty-three thousand, thirty-three thousand and one, thirty-three thousand and two, thirty-three thousand and three, thirty-three thousand and four, thirty-three thousand and five, thirty-three thousand and six, thirty-three thousand and seven, thirty-three thousand and eight, thirty-three thousand and nine, thirty-four thousand, thirty-four thousand and one, thirty-four thousand and two, thirty-four thousand and three, thirty-four thousand and four, thirty-four thousand and five, thirty-four thousand and six, thirty-four thousand and seven, thirty-four thousand and eight, thirty-four thousand and nine, thirty-five thousand, thirty-five thousand and one, thirty-five thousand and two, thirty-five thousand and three, thirty-five thousand and four, thirty-five thousand and five, thirty-five thousand and six, thirty-five thousand and seven, thirty-five thousand and eight, thirty-five thousand and nine, thirty-six thousand, thirty-six thousand and one, thirty-six thousand and two, thirty-six thousand and three, thirty-six thousand and four, thirty-six thousand and five, thirty-six thousand and six, thirty-six thousand and seven, thirty-six thousand and eight, thirty-six thousand and nine, thirty-seven thousand, thirty-seven thousand and one, thirty-seven thousand and two, thirty-seven thousand and three, thirty-seven thousand and four, thirty-seven thousand and five, thirty-seven thousand and six, thirty-seven thousand and seven, thirty-seven thousand and eight, thirty-seven thousand and nine, thirty-eight thousand, thirty-eight thousand and one, thirty-eight thousand and two, thirty-eight thousand and three, thirty-eight thousand and four, thirty-eight thousand and five, thirty-eight thousand and six, thirty-eight thousand and seven, thirty-eight thousand and eight, thirty-eight thousand and nine, thirty-nine thousand, thirty-nine thousand and one, thirty-nine thousand and two, thirty-nine thousand and three, thirty-nine thousand and four, thirty-nine thousand and five, thirty-nine thousand and six, thirty-nine thousand and seven, thirty-nine thousand and eight, thirty-nine thousand and nine, forty thousand, forty thousand and one, forty thousand and two, forty thousand and three, forty thousand and four, forty thousand and five, forty thousand and six, forty thousand and seven, forty thousand and eight, forty thousand and nine, forty-one thousand, forty-one thousand and one, forty-one thousand and two, forty-one thousand and three, forty-one thousand and four, forty-one thousand and five, forty-one thousand and six, forty-one thousand and seven, forty-one thousand and eight, forty-one thousand and nine, forty-two thousand, forty-two thousand and one, forty-two thousand and two, forty-two thousand and three, forty-two thousand and four, forty-two thousand and five, forty-two thousand and six, forty-two thousand and seven, forty-two thousand and eight, forty-two thousand and nine, forty-three thousand, forty-three thousand and one, forty-three thousand and two, forty-three thousand and three, forty-three thousand and four, forty-three thousand and five, forty-three thousand and six, forty-three thousand and seven, forty-three thousand and eight, forty-three thousand and nine, forty-four thousand, forty-four thousand and one, forty-four thousand and two, forty-four thousand and three, forty-four thousand and four, forty-four thousand and five, forty-four thousand and six, forty-four thousand and seven, forty-four thousand and eight, forty-four thousand and nine, forty-five thousand, forty-five thousand and one, forty-five thousand and two, forty-five thousand and three, forty-five thousand and four, forty-five thousand and five, forty-five thousand and six, forty-five thousand and seven, forty-five thousand and eight, forty-five thousand and nine, forty-six thousand, forty-six thousand and one, forty-six thousand and two, forty-six thousand and three, forty-six thousand and four, forty-six thousand and five, forty-six thousand and six, forty-six thousand and seven, forty-six thousand and eight, forty-six thousand and nine, forty-seven thousand, forty-seven thousand and one, forty-seven thousand and two, forty-seven thousand and three, forty-seven thousand and four, forty-seven thousand and five, forty-seven thousand and six, forty-seven thousand and seven, forty-seven thousand and eight, forty-seven thousand and nine, forty-eight thousand, forty-eight thousand and one, forty-eight thousand and two, forty-eight thousand and three, forty-eight thousand and four, forty-eight thousand and five, forty-eight thousand and six, forty-eight thousand and seven, forty-eight thousand and eight, forty-eight thousand and nine, forty-nine thousand, forty-nine thousand and one, forty-nine thousand and two, forty-nine thousand and three, forty-nine thousand and four, forty-nine thousand and five, forty-nine thousand and six, forty-nine thousand and seven, forty-nine thousand and eight, forty-nine thousand and nine, fifty thousand, fifty thousand and one, fifty thousand and two, fifty thousand and three, fifty thousand and four, fifty thousand and five, fifty thousand and six, fifty thousand and seven, fifty thousand and eight, fifty thousand and nine, fifty-one thousand, fifty-one thousand and one, fifty-one thousand and two, fifty-one thousand and three, fifty-one thousand and four, fifty-one thousand and five, fifty-one thousand and six, fifty-one thousand and seven, fifty-one thousand and eight, fifty-one thousand and nine, fifty-two thousand, fifty-two thousand and one, fifty-two thousand and two, fifty-two thousand and three, fifty-two thousand and four, fifty-two thousand and five, fifty-two thousand and six, fifty-two thousand and seven, fifty-two thousand and eight, fifty-two thousand and nine, fifty-three thousand, fifty-three thousand and one, fifty-three thousand and two, fifty-three thousand and three, fifty-three thousand and four, fifty-three thousand and five, fifty-three thousand and six, fifty-three thousand and seven, fifty-three thousand and eight, fifty-three thousand and nine, fifty-four thousand, fifty-four thousand and one, fifty-four thousand and two, fifty-four thousand and three, fifty-four thousand and four, fifty-four thousand and five, fifty-four thousand and six, fifty-four thousand and seven, fifty-four thousand and eight, fifty-four thousand and nine, fifty-five thousand, fifty-five thousand and one, fifty-five thousand and two, fifty-five thousand and three, fifty-five thousand and four, fifty-five thousand and five, fifty-five thousand and six, fifty-five thousand and seven, fifty-five thousand and eight, fifty-five thousand and nine, fifty-six thousand, fifty-six thousand and one, fifty-six thousand and two, fifty-six thousand and three, fifty-six thousand and four, fifty-six thousand and five, fifty-six thousand and six, fifty-six thousand and seven, fifty-six thousand and eight, fifty-six thousand and nine, fifty-seven thousand, fifty-seven thousand and one, fifty-seven thousand and two, fifty-seven thousand and three, fifty-seven thousand and four, fifty-seven thousand and five, fifty-seven thousand and six, fifty-seven thousand and seven, fifty-seven thousand and eight, fifty-seven thousand and nine, fifty-eight thousand, fifty-eight thousand and one, fifty-eight thousand and two, fifty-eight thousand and three, fifty-eight thousand and four, fifty-eight thousand and five, fifty-eight thousand and six, fifty-eight thousand and seven, fifty-eight thousand and eight, fifty-eight thousand and nine, fifty-nine thousand, fifty-nine thousand and one, fifty-nine thousand and two, fifty-nine thousand and three, fifty-nine thousand and four, fifty-nine thousand and five, fifty-nine thousand and six, fifty-nine thousand and seven, fifty-nine thousand and eight, fifty-nine thousand and nine, sixty thousand, sixty thousand and one, sixty thousand and two, sixty thousand and three, sixty thousand and four, sixty thousand and five, sixty thousand and six, sixty thousand and seven, sixty thousand and eight, sixty thousand and nine, sixty-one thousand, sixty-one thousand and one, sixty-one thousand and two, sixty-one thousand and three, sixty-one thousand and four, sixty-one thousand and five, sixty-one thousand and six, sixty-one thousand and seven, sixty-one thousand and eight, sixty-one thousand and nine, sixty-two thousand, sixty-two thousand and one, sixty-two thousand and two, sixty-two thousand and three, sixty-two thousand and four, sixty-two thousand and five, sixty-two thousand and six, sixty-two thousand and seven, sixty-two thousand and eight, sixty-two thousand and nine, sixty-three thousand, sixty-three thousand and one, sixty-three thousand and two, sixty-three thousand and three, sixty-three thousand and four, sixty-three thousand and five, sixty-three thousand and six, sixty-three thousand and seven, sixty-three thousand and eight, sixty-three thousand and nine, sixty-four thousand, sixty-four thousand and one, sixty-four thousand and two, sixty-four thousand and three, sixty-four thousand and four, sixty-four thousand and five, sixty-four thousand and six, sixty-four thousand and seven, sixty-four thousand and eight, sixty-four thousand and nine, sixty-five thousand, sixty-five thousand and one, sixty-five thousand and two, sixty-five thousand and three, sixty-five thousand and four, sixty-five thousand and five, sixty-five thousand and six, sixty-five thousand and seven, sixty-five thousand and eight, sixty-five thousand and nine, sixty-six thousand, sixty-six thousand and one, sixty-six thousand and two, sixty-six thousand and three, sixty-six thousand and four, sixty-six thousand and five, sixty-six thousand and six, sixty-six thousand and seven, sixty-six thousand and eight, sixty-six thousand and nine, sixty-seven thousand, sixty-seven thousand and one, sixty-seven thousand and two, sixty-seven thousand and three, sixty-seven thousand and four, sixty-seven thousand and five, sixty-seven thousand and six, sixty-seven thousand and seven, sixty-seven thousand and eight, sixty-seven thousand and nine, sixty-eight thousand, sixty-eight thousand and one, sixty-eight thousand and two, sixty-eight thousand and three, sixty-eight thousand and four, sixty-eight thousand and five, sixty-eight thousand and six, sixty-eight thousand and seven, sixty-eight thousand and eight, sixty-eight thousand and nine, sixty-nine thousand, sixty-nine thousand and one, sixty-nine thousand and two, sixty-nine thousand and three, sixty-nine thousand and four, sixty-nine thousand and five, sixty-nine thousand and six, sixty-nine thousand and seven, sixty-nine thousand and eight, sixty-nine thousand and nine, seventy thousand, seventy thousand and one, seventy thousand and two, seventy thousand and three, seventy thousand and four, seventy thousand and five, seventy thousand and six, seventy thousand and seven, seventy thousand and eight, seventy thousand and nine, seventy-one thousand, seventy-one thousand and one, seventy-one thousand and two, seventy-one thousand and three, seventy-one thousand and four, seventy-one thousand and five, seventy-one thousand and six, seventy-one thousand and seven, seventy-one thousand and eight, seventy-one thousand and nine, seventy-two thousand, seventy-two thousand and one, seventy-two thousand and two, seventy-two thousand and three, seventy-two thousand and four, seventy-two thousand and five, seventy-two thousand and six, seventy-two thousand and seven, seventy-two thousand and eight, seventy-two thousand and nine, seventy-three thousand, seventy-three thousand and one, seventy-three thousand and two, seventy-three thousand and three, seventy-three thousand and four, seventy-three thousand and five, seventy-three thousand and six, seventy-three thousand and seven, seventy-three thousand and eight, seventy-three thousand and nine, seventy-four thousand, seventy-four thousand and one, seventy-four thousand and two, seventy-four thousand and three, seventy-four thousand and four, seventy-four thousand and five, seventy-four thousand and six, seventy-four thousand and seven, seventy-four thousand and eight, seventy-four thousand and nine, seventy-five thousand, seventy-five thousand and one, seventy-five thousand and two, seventy-five thousand and three, seventy-five thousand and four, seventy-five thousand and five, seventy-five thousand and six, seventy-five thousand and seven, seventy-five thousand and eight, seventy-five thousand and nine, seventy-six thousand, seventy-six thousand and one, seventy-six thousand and two, seventy-six thousand and three, seventy-six thousand and four, seventy-six thousand and five, seventy-six thousand and six, seventy-six thousand and seven, seventy-six thousand and eight, seventy-six thousand and nine, seventy-seven thousand, seventy-seven thousand and one, seventy-seven thousand and two, seventy-seven thousand and three, seventy-seven thousand and four, seventy-seven thousand and five, seventy-seven thousand and six, seventy-seven thousand and seven, seventy-seven thousand and eight, seventy-seven thousand and nine, seventy-eight thousand, seventy-eight thousand and one, seventy-eight thousand and two, seventy-eight thousand and three, seventy-eight thousand and four, seventy-eight thousand and five, seventy-eight thousand and six, seventy-eight thousand and seven, seventy-eight thousand and eight, seventy-eight thousand and nine, seventy-nine thousand, seventy-nine thousand and one, seventy-nine thousand and two, seventy-nine thousand and three, seventy-nine thousand and four, seventy-nine thousand and five, seventy-nine thousand and six, seventy-nine thousand and seven, seventy-nine thousand and eight, seventy-nine thousand and nine, eighty thousand, eighty thousand and one, eighty thousand and two, eighty thousand and three, eighty thousand and four, eighty thousand and five, eighty thousand and six, eighty thousand and seven, eighty thousand and eight, eighty thousand and nine, eighty-one thousand, eighty-one thousand and one, eighty-one thousand and two, eighty-one thousand and three, eighty-one thousand and four, eighty-one thousand and five, eighty-one thousand and six, eighty-one thousand and seven, eighty-one thousand and eight, eighty-one thousand and nine, eighty-two thousand, eighty-two thousand and one, eighty-two thousand and two, eighty-two thousand and three, eighty-two thousand and four, eighty-two thousand and five, eighty-two thousand and six, eighty-two thousand and seven, eighty-two thousand and eight, eighty-two thousand and nine, eighty-three thousand, eighty-three thousand and one, eighty-three thousand and two, eighty-three thousand and three, eighty-three thousand and four, eighty-three thousand and five, eighty-three thousand and six, eighty-three thousand and seven, eighty-three thousand and eight, eighty-three thousand and nine, eighty-four thousand, eighty-four thousand and one, eighty-four thousand and two, eighty-four thousand and three, eighty-four thousand and four, eighty-four thousand and five, eighty-four thousand and six, eighty-four thousand and seven, eighty-four thousand and eight, eighty-four thousand and nine, eighty-five thousand, eighty-five thousand and one, eighty-five thousand and two, eighty-five thousand and three, eighty-five thousand and four, eighty-five thousand and five, eighty-five thousand and six, eighty-five thousand and seven, eighty-five thousand and eight, eighty-five thousand and nine, eighty-six thousand, eighty-six thousand and one, eighty-six thousand and two, eighty-six thousand and three, eighty-six thousand and four, eighty-six thousand and five, eighty-six thousand and six, eighty-six thousand and seven, eighty-six thousand and eight, eighty-six thousand and nine, eighty-seven thousand, eighty-seven thousand and one, eighty-seven thousand and two, eighty-seven thousand and three, eighty-seven thousand and four, eighty-seven thousand and five, eighty-seven thousand and six, eighty-seven thousand and seven, eighty-seven thousand and eight, eighty-seven thousand and nine, eighty-eight thousand, eighty-eight thousand and one, eighty-eight thousand and two, eighty-eight thousand and three, eighty-eight thousand and four, eighty-eight thousand and five, eighty-eight thousand and six, eighty-eight thousand and seven, eighty-eight thousand and eight, eighty-eight thousand and nine, eighty-nine thousand, eighty-nine thousand and one, eighty-nine thousand and two, eighty-nine thousand and three, eighty-nine thousand and four, eighty-nine thousand and five, eighty-nine thousand and six, eighty-nine thousand and seven, eighty-nine thousand and eight, eighty-nine thousand and nine, ninety thousand, ninety thousand and one, ninety thousand and two, ninety thousand and three, ninety thousand and four, ninety thousand and five, ninety thousand and six, ninety thousand and seven, ninety thousand and eight, ninety thousand and nine, ninety-one thousand, ninety-one thousand and one, ninety-one thousand and two, ninety-one thousand and three, ninety-one thousand and four, ninety-one thousand and five, ninety-one thousand and six, ninety-one thousand and seven, ninety-one thousand and eight, ninety-one thousand and nine, ninety-two thousand, ninety-two thousand and one, ninety-two thousand and two, ninety-two thousand and three, ninety-two thousand and four, ninety-two thousand and five, ninety-two thousand and six, ninety-two thousand and seven, ninety-two thousand and eight, ninety-two thousand and nine, ninety-three thousand, ninety-three thousand and one, ninety-three thousand and two, ninety-three thousand and three, ninety-three thousand and four, ninety-three thousand and five, ninety-three thousand and six, ninety-three thousand and seven, ninety-three thousand and eight, ninety-three thousand and nine, ninety-four thousand, ninety-four thousand and one, ninety-four thousand and two, ninety-four thousand and three, ninety-four thousand and four, ninety-four thousand and five, ninety-four thousand and six, ninety-four thousand and seven, ninety-four thousand and eight, ninety-four thousand and nine, ninety-five thousand, ninety-five thousand and one, ninety-five thousand and two, ninety-five thousand and three, ninety-five thousand and four, ninety-five thousand and five, ninety-five thousand and six, ninety-five thousand and seven, ninety-five thousand and eight, ninety-five thousand and nine, ninety-six thousand, ninety-six thousand and one, ninety-six thousand and two, ninety-six thousand and three, ninety-six thousand and four, ninety-six thousand and five, ninety-six thousand and six, ninety-six thousand and seven, ninety-six thousand and eight, ninety-six thousand and nine, ninety-seven thousand, ninety-seven thousand and one, ninety-seven thousand and two, ninety-seven thousand and three, ninety-seven thousand and four, ninety-seven thousand and five, ninety-seven thousand and six, ninety-seven thousand and seven, ninety-seven thousand and eight, ninety-seven thousand and nine, ninety-eight thousand, ninety-eight thousand and one, ninety-eight thousand and two, ninety-eight thousand and three, ninety-eight thousand and four, ninety-eight thousand and five, ninety-eight thousand and six, ninety-eight thousand and seven, ninety-eight thousand and eight, ninety-eight thousand and nine, ninety-nine thousand, ninety-nine thousand and one, ninety-nine thousand and two, ninety-nine thousand and three, ninety-nine thousand and four, ninety-nine thousand and five, ninety-nine thousand and six, ninety-nine thousand and seven, ninety-nine thousand and eight, ninety-nine thousand and nine, one hundred thousand, one hundred thousand and one, one hundred thousand and two, one hundred thousand and three, one hundred thousand and four, one hundred thousand and five, one hundred thousand and six, one hundred thousand and seven, one hundred thousand and eight, one hundred thousand and nine, one hundred and one thousand, one hundred and one thousand and one, one hundred and one thousand and two, one hundred and one thousand and three, one hundred and one thousand and four, one hundred and one thousand and five, one hundred and one thousand and six, one hundred and one thousand and seven, one hundred and one thousand and eight, one hundred and one thousand and nine, one hundred and two thousand, one hundred and two thousand and one, one hundred and two thousand and two, one hundred and two thousand and three, one hundred and two thousand and four, one hundred and two thousand and five, one hundred and two thousand and six, one hundred and two thousand and seven, one hundred and two thousand and eight, one hundred and two thousand and nine, one hundred and three thousand, one hundred and three thousand and one, one hundred and three thousand and two, one hundred and three thousand and three, one hundred and three thousand and four, one hundred and three thousand and five, one hundred and three thousand and six, one hundred and three thousand and seven, one hundred and three thousand and eight, one hundred and three thousand and nine, one hundred and four thousand, one hundred and four thousand and one, one hundred and four thousand and two, one hundred and four thousand and three, one hundred and four thousand and four, one hundred and four thousand and five, one hundred and four thousand and six, one hundred and four thousand and seven, one hundred and four thousand and eight, one hundred and four thousand and nine, one hundred and five thousand, one hundred and five thousand and one, one hundred and five thousand and two, one hundred and five thousand and three, one hundred and five thousand and four, one hundred and five thousand and five, one hundred and five thousand and six, one hundred and five thousand and seven, one hundred and five thousand and eight, one hundred and five thousand and nine, one hundred and six thousand, one hundred and six thousand and one, one hundred and six thousand and two, one hundred and six thousand and three, one hundred and six thousand and four, one hundred and six thousand and five, one hundred and six thousand and six, one hundred and six thousand and seven, one hundred and six thousand and eight, one hundred and six thousand and nine, one hundred and seven thousand, one hundred and seven thousand and one, one hundred and seven thousand and two, one hundred and seven thousand and three, one hundred and seven thousand and four, one hundred and seven thousand and five, one hundred and seven thousand and six, one hundred and seven thousand and seven, one hundred and seven thousand and eight, one hundred and seven thousand and nine, one hundred and eight thousand, one hundred and eight thousand and one, one hundred and eight thousand and two, one hundred and eight thousand and three, one hundred and eight thousand and four, one hundred and eight thousand and five, one hundred and eight thousand and six, one hundred and eight thousand and seven, one hundred and eight thousand and eight, one hundred and eight thousand and nine, one hundred and nine thousand, one hundred and nine thousand and one, one hundred and nine thousand and two, one hundred and nine thousand and three, one hundred and nine thousand and four, one hundred and nine thousand and five, one hundred and nine thousand and six, one hundred and nine thousand and seven, one hundred and nine thousand and eight, one hundred and nine thousand and nine, two hundred thousand, two hundred thousand and one, two hundred thousand and two, two hundred thousand and three, two hundred thousand and four, two hundred thousand and five, two hundred thousand and six, two hundred thousand and seven, two hundred thousand and eight, two hundred thousand and nine, two hundred and one thousand, two hundred and one thousand and one, two hundred and one thousand and two, two hundred and one thousand and three, two hundred and one thousand and four, two hundred and one thousand and five, two hundred and one thousand and six, two hundred and one thousand and seven, two hundred and one thousand and eight, two hundred and one thousand and nine, two hundred and two thousand, two hundred and two thousand and one, two hundred and two thousand and two, two hundred and two thousand and three, two hundred and two thousand and four, two hundred and two thousand and five, two hundred and two thousand and six, two hundred and two thousand and seven, two hundred and two thousand and eight, two hundred and two thousand and nine, two hundred and three thousand, two hundred and three thousand and one, two hundred and three thousand and two, two hundred and three thousand and three, two hundred and three thousand and four, two hundred and three thousand and five, two hundred and three thousand and six, two hundred and three thousand and seven, two hundred and three thousand and eight, two hundred and three thousand and nine, two hundred and four thousand, two hundred and four thousand and one, two hundred and four thousand and two, two hundred and four thousand and three, two hundred and four thousand and four, two hundred and four thousand and five, two hundred and four thousand and six, two hundred and four thousand and seven, two hundred and four thousand and eight, two hundred and four thousand and nine, two hundred and five thousand, two hundred and five thousand and one, two hundred and five thousand and two, two hundred and five thousand and three, two hundred and five thousand and four, two hundred and five thousand and five, two hundred and five thousand and six, two hundred and five thousand and seven, two hundred and five thousand and eight, two hundred and five thousand and nine, two hundred and six thousand, two hundred and six thousand and one, two hundred and six thousand and two, two hundred and six thousand and three, two hundred and six thousand and four, two hundred and six thousand and five, two hundred and six thousand and six, two hundred and six thousand and seven, two hundred and six thousand and eight, two hundred and six thousand and nine, two hundred and seven thousand, two hundred and seven thousand and one, two hundred and seven thousand and two, two hundred and seven thousand and three, two hundred and seven thousand and four, two hundred and seven thousand and five, two hundred and seven thousand and six, two hundred and seven thousand and seven,

Fog on the Bay

Continued from page 21

try any funny stuff. We can't more than they got us for now." killed a man," Joe thought. killed a man last night at the bell headed for the creek. He watched Gerry put his gun Al point his gun toward his. He held the gun in his right hand. His left pulled the coat and he up off his right wrist. "Only," Gerry said, and pushed a hypodermic into Al's wrist. "You're dead the rest before we get out shed, a string of saliva looped from his dropped lower hand, holding the automatic, cruelly poised hammer cocked, ringing. Joe began to cry. "Well," Al said. "The Lone started to weep. You never over no radio, sonny? You heard of no Lone Scout crying. He laughed and was pleased. "Let's see what they got at," Al went on. He started. Joe looked back and saw that they were on in his home. His had probably heard them. The he him calm again. She would strain Mattingly in the police them.

me close to Foley Abell at the. Al climbed forward over the. "You go straight down," Gerry said. "You can put us on those Virginia necks or maybe, to, take us outside and down a coast."

back. "Some boat," he said. "No stove, no nothing. What are these things?" He kicked tongs.

for tonging oysters," Foley

we ain't going to tong no Al said. He seemed in high d laughed as he threw about ars worth of tongs and nippers. "They'll only be in the way into action," Al said.

vent pale. He hadn't made ars profit all last month.

a dirty man, mister," Joe to Al.

p, Joe," Foley Abell said. For me, he was angry.

at them lights," Al said. turned and told Joe to put the. No one spoke for a while at dropped down-river.

ere almost into a flock of ducks e birds got up, winging off with rustle of their wings for sound. "Al said. "Maybe we could e and eat them if we're gonna n this thing for a while."

Gerry said, "we're gonna pick n the air with a gat."

he they got a gun on the boat," "All these guys shoot ducks all nd."

's no shotgun here," Foley said. swered kind of quick," Al said "I better look." He began to e boat.

be foolish," Gerry said. "We nt to do any shooting. Inside he dicks will be out with these that run the patrol boats. We nt any shooting. Not with no "You can hear them things two the river."

oot if I want to," Al said. "I oot."

you're gonna start that stuff Gerry said. "Maybe you'd like ashore when they come after us. m so good."

Al didn't answer. Joe, taking advantage of the others' preoccupation with each other, moved nearer his father. "What do you think, pa?"

Foley Abell shook his head. "Which-ever way the luck runs. Say your prayers, boy."

"What you two whispering about?" Al said.

"We was just wondering where we was on the river," Foley said. He thought, This feller can't swim.

"You mean you don't know where you are?"

"Not in this fog."

Al cursed. Gerry said: "Where do you think we are, Abell?"

"Somewhere in the steamer lane, about mid-river."

"Head for the Virginia shore best you can," Gerry said. "And don't try anything fancy."

Foley didn't speak. Near him, Joe shivered and it bothered the father. If only Joe wasn't such a kid, he thought. It was bad for a kid to go through this.

Al and Gerry were in the stern talking in low tones. The fog was all around the boat, now, seeming almost to press in on it. Foghorns rasped dully from the Virginia shore. Gerry's voice rose momentarily loud enough for Joe and his father to hear.

"... wanta know what we're gonna get by knocking them off..."

FOLEY went cold. Joe whispered: "Shall we try to jump them, pa?"

"Hush, boy."

Al's voice: "... it'll be just two more witnesses against us ... and they got us for plenty now..."

"The kid..." Gerry said. The rest of his words went away.

To stall for time, Foley thought. If the tide changed he could go upriver instead of down; the others would think he was going down. But the tide wouldn't change for two or three hours. He had been gradually edging toward the Virginia shore but now he straightened the boat out down-river again. The longer we can keep off shore, he thought.

Gerry approached Foley, gun in hand. "We ought to be pretty near Virginia now," he said.

"There's towns near the shore here in northern neck Virginia," Foley said. "Thought you might want to go ashore on one of the lower necks, below the Yeocomico River." Gerry hesitated. They don't know nothing, Foley thought, nothing about the river.

"Go away, kid," Gerry said to Joe. "Go up front." Joe went forward. "I'll tell you something, Abell," Gerry said. "Al wants to kill you and the boy. I don't want to. If you set us ashore safe, I'll see to it that you and the boy live. If you try anything funny, I'll kill you myself. Me and Al got nothing to lose."

"I'll do what you say," Foley said.

"Okay."

Foley didn't hear him say the last word. In the fog, Foley had heard the throb of a motor. A few seconds later, reading the sound, he knew it was the police boat, Captain Mattingly's, not Captain Cheseldine's on the lower river. It was early for the police boat to be on the river and that meant only one thing, that Mattingly knew about what had happened and was out looking for them.

Now the others heard the motor, seconds later than Foley heard it. Suddenly they were close to him at the wheel. "Whose boat?" Al said.

"I wouldn't know," Foley told him.

"What's the best thing to do?" Gerry said.

Foley didn't speak. A gun jammed

Bill Yesterday

Bill never gave much of a hoot about what brand of whiskey was served him ... never asked for any by name ... he liked 'em all pretty well. But—

Bill Today

Bill was at a party today ... had a Paul Jones highball. "This," said Bill, "is swell! It's dry—not sweet—nice and zesty ... in fact, it's the best highball I ever had!" So—

Bill Tomorrow

Tomorrow Bill's going to buy some Paul Jones. And will he be surprised! He thinks Paul Jones is expensive! But—in spite of its "expensive" dry tang and rich bouquet, in spite of the fact that it's all whiskey, in spite of the fact that the same Paul Jones used to cost lots more—Bill will find that Paul Jones is now so inexpensive that he'll buy it every time!

TRY
Paul Jones
IT'S DRY... AND WHAT A BUY!

All whiskey. A blend of straight whiskies—90 proof.

FRANKFORT DISTILLERIES, INC., LOUISVILLE & BALTIMORE

Summer Entertaining features "COOLER" made with Wine

LIKE TO SET before your guests a drink that really beats the heat? This "wine cooler" ice cold and tangy in a tall glass...fragrant and colorful...is now rated "tops" by many smart hosts and hostesses. Part of the charm of a wine cooler is that it's on the moderate side. Here's how to make your first wine cooler...

OTHER "COOLER" RECIPES FREE

at the store where you buy the wines of California. California wines are grown to strict standards of quality. True to type. Well developed. Inexpensive. Wine Advisory Board, 85 Second Street, San Francisco

germs cannot penetrate

face combs

BECAUSE THEY ARE GENUINE HARD RUBBER

WANTED: Community Representatives From Coast to Coast!

Independent Agency Division, Desk C-31
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company
250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

PASTE this coupon on a penny postal and learn how you may increase your income as a Community Representative for COLLIER'S. Write now!

Name.....
Address.....
Town.....
State.....

into his ribs hard enough to hurt. "Talk," Al said.

"Cut the motor," Foley said. "Drift with the current." He cut the motor but it was too late.

"What boat's that?" Captain Mattingly called through the fog.

"Keep quiet or you'll get it," Al said to Foley.

The four of them stood, tense and listening. Joe wanted to yell but locked his jaw tight. Gerry held his gun on Joe, Al his on Foley. There was no sound but the throb of the police boat. It was coming near but not at them; it was dropping down the river, parallel to them.

"If that's your boat, Foley Abell, yell out," Captain Mattingly called. "Where be you?" His voice was so close it startled them although they couldn't see the police boat. The muscles on Foley's jaw quivered. Al had started to shake. "Might be they've killed Foley and the boy," they heard the Captain say in a conversational tone.

"Those two would," a strange voice said. "Hail them again."

"What boat goes there?" Captain Mattingly called. By the sound the police boat was even with them now.

"Gerry, gimme that last shot," Al said in a whisper.

"Shut up!"

Al's face contorted.

The strange voice on the police boat said: "Have your mate fire a burst."

"Might hurt Foley and the boy," Captain Mattingly said, "if they're alive."

"Fire it high."

Al yelled. The tension changed him briefly to an animal. He pointed the automatic into the fog toward the police boat and fired three times.

"Give it to them, East!" they heard Captain Mattingly yell to his mate. "They've probably killed Foley."

"Down!" Foley said, instinctively. "They got a machine gun."

The four men in the boat tried to drop behind the gunwale. Al and Joe got down easily, but Foley and Gerry were between the motor housing and the side. They had to turn to stoop. The first burst went astern of the boat, swung toward it, the bullets flickered briefly across it, then swung back astern again... and Gerry lay across the housing, the thick red oozing from one temple, and Foley Abell thrashed on the deck, clutching his right shoulder.

Al had regained a curious, deadly composure. He held the gun on Joe and spoke to Foley Abell: "You keep quiet or I'll kill the kid."

THE chatter of the gun stopped, leaving an almost tangible silence on the river. Fog seemed the body of the silence... Then their ears, briefly deafened by the sound of the firing, picked up the throb of the police boat, already below them and going down-river, perhaps to circle. Al half-crouched, listening. Joe knelt by his father. "You hurt bad, Pa?"

"The shoulder... hurts." Foley closed his eyes, the first pain gone. Al was looking at Gerry. Gerry was dead. "Leave your old man alone," Al said. "Pick that up and throw it over." He jerked the gun at Gerry.

"Maybe he ain't dead, mister," Joe said.

"Do what you're told, kid, or you'll be dead, and your old man with you."

Trembling so that he could hardly manage the stocky body, Joe pulled the shoulders over the gunwale and then began to cry. "I can't do it, mister."

"All right, punk." Still holding the gun toward Joe, Al quickly raised Gerry's feet with one arm and flipped them overboard. The body swirled once, the face turned up into the fog, then was gone.

"Now head for the nearest place in Virginia that ain't got no towns," Al said.

"If you leave my father alone, I will," Joe said.

"And supposing I don't?"

Joe swallowed. "We need him any-ways. I can run the boat, but he got to tell us where to go."

"All right, get going," Al said. The throb of the police boat had died down toward the Chesapeake. Al made Joe help his father to a sitting position on the engine housing after they had started the engine.

"Turn her around, Joe," Foley said. He sat there, white and drawn, but his mind was clear.

"WHAT do you mean, turn her around?" Al said. "We're supposed to be going with the current."

"Tide's changed," Foley lied. "Coming up from the Chesapeake now."

Al looked at them. His features seemed even more crowded together. "If I thought you was kidding me—" he said.

"All right," Foley said, "you tell us what to do."

"Don't be a wise guy, now," Al said. He stood watching them, then said: "All right, punk, do what your old man says."

Joe felt almost happy. They had fooled Al once. He didn't know just what his father planned, but he knew they were going to try for the Maryland shore.

Probably he'll kill us, Foley thought. It seemed to him that his head had never been more clear. There was one chance. "You know where Blackistone's Island is?" Foley asked Al. "Some calls it St. Clement's Island like it was in the old days."

With a little shock, Joe realized his father was talking to him, was talking to him under the talk to Al.

"I don't want to get on no island," Al said.

"I'm not going to put you on one," Foley said. He sat there, his left hand holding his shoulder. "I only asked if you knew where it was."

"No, I don't."

"Well, right across a little channel from it the Virginia shore is pretty wild. No one around. A right deep channel runs between the island and the mainland... I could put you ashore there."

Me, Joe thought, he's talking at me.

"All right," Al said, "but make it quick."

Blackistone's Island, Joe knew, was off the Maryland shore, up in the Seventh District, not off the Virginia shore. Pretty soon, Joe thought, I'll get what pa's driving at. He thought he knew. Probably his father wanted to leave Al off on the island and then come back later and capture him. Al couldn't swim, and there was probably a reward for him. Probably Al wouldn't kill them; he'd be too glad to get set ashore. Joe's boy's mind tried desperately to see the best side of things.

"Get over to the right, you," Al said to Joe. "Don't try to fool me. I know Virginia's on the right."

Going down-river it was, but they were going upriver... Joe at times was close enough to get misty, fleeting glimpses of the shore, so brief and tenuous that only one who knew the land and the river would know that he had seen the shore. Joe felt keen and adventurous; they were running things now, he told himself.

Suddenly Al yelled wordlessly, and began to look frantically around the boat.

"What's the matter?" Joe said, unthinkingly.

"Mind your business or you'll get this!" Al jerked the gun up. His face seemed to be in pain. The pushed-together features were twitching.

He's looking, Joe thought, he's looking for that needle that was in the other feller's pocket. Al was shaking. "Come on, hurry it up!" he said. "The boat can go faster."

He wanted, Foley Abell thought, to use that needle for to get up no guts to kill us. I'll kill him, though. Sitting, wounded, on the motor house. Foley Abell had decided to kill the Al...

"We must be right near there," Foley said in a level voice.

A shore showed dimly in front of him and when he saw the great store of glimmering once in the fog, Joe was Blackistone's Island. "Go to the island, Joe," Foley said, "a can come into the channel and get Al ashore."

Joe swung around the island. Coming back into the channel the boat began to move faster with the current, tide still racing out. A little past the island stood out in front of the rest of the island in the fog. "The mainland, mister," Foley said, pointing the point. He was very white.

Al didn't speak. He still had his slouch hat on. He picked the bag with one hand, and with the automatic the other climbed onto the bow. He the others and was trembling. Looking at his face, even Joe knew what was going to happen. As soon as the boat touched the shore, Al was going to get them.

The boat swung down on the shore at an angle. The water ran deep and right next to the shore. Joe heard his father's voice, sly and full of malice. "Don't hit the shore too hard, Joe, wouldn't want to upset Mr. Al—"

That was it! Joe thought, then he it! He opened the throttle as if it would go, threw the wheel overboard. Al seemed bewildered, turned his head to look at the shore. "Watch it, punk! You're going to get Al began.

THE boat struck at an angle, the force of motor, current and fog behind it. Al screamed once, groined, fell. In the heavy, racing flow of water there was hardly a splash. The gun and bag went into the air, the gunwale and falling into the water. Foley had been knocked off the boat and was rolling in pain on the shore. Joe stood up, not feeling the shock of the boat as the current tried to carry away from the shore. Al stood again above the deep, swift water, then he was gone in the fog. The tide raced, ten feet deep to the shore.

"Pa, he's in!" Joe yelled. "Get him?"

His father didn't answer at first. He turned to him. Foley lay, exhausted from pain, on the deck. He was conscious, though. "Pa," Joe said, "in. We had to do it, didn't we, Pa? Answer me, Pa. We had to do it, wouldn't we? He wanted to do at first was put him on the island so we could get him later a reward. Didn't you, Pa?"

Foley closed his eyes before he assented. Let Joe think that, Foley thought. Later he'll know what it maybe, to have your tools took by someone like that for no good. I hope not, though.

So Foley Abell nodded to his first closed his eyes and said a prayer for the dead.

"Look, Pa, the bag fell in the water. Look, Pa, look at the dough. They to give us some reward, huh."

get new tongs, maybe a new motor.

Foley nodded again from where the boy had raised him. He heard the throb of the police boat coming nearer in the fog.

He had heard it following the last twenty minutes. He was sure if he had a penance to do.

All Ready to Eat

Continued from page 12

half teaspoon of powdered black pepper and a half tablespoons of A-1 sauce, a tablespoon of highly reduced meat stock and one teaspoon of lemon juice. Stir well and serve hot or cold, but never boil—don't put it in the icebox."

Magarrell has given a lot of thought to the right dishes to complete a good steak, and he's narrowed it down to one and only one item, a salad, which is, he says, such a fresh vegetable as lettuce, chicory, water cress, green beans, tomatoes. That goes in a picnic anywhere, and the way to make a salad crisp and fresh is to wash greens with water, mix them in a bowl at home, cover with a cloth, then drain off the water just before you serve it and pour on a French dressing. If you want a dressing that's light, mix the mustard, paprika, pepper and salt while still hot, add the Worcestershire and finally the vinegar and beat with whip.

Magarrell Looks for Ideas

Magarrell has been picking up ideas ever since he left Council Bluffs, as a kid to enter Cornell's hotel administration. That was in 1925, and you can see that he's a comparatively young fellow looking for ideas. He was on a golf club during his first year of college. The accident that led to his so-called bank account and his leaving school. Tackling one manager after another for a job, he landed as an elevator boy in Council Bluffs, soon rose to the rank of chef's assistant.

That the more hotels he worked at the more ideas he might pick up was a circuit covering most of the U.S.A. Back in New York connected with a firm of hotel consultants. His specialty was diagnosing hotel rooms, and by 1936, when the Lines sent for him to solve the problem of serving hot meals on planes, he had worked for over three years in clubs, hotels, restaurants, hospitals and steamship lines. That United Air Lines was paying $150,000 a year for give-away meals recommended that the system be run out of its own kitchens along the line.

The head of the company asked him to recommend a maître d'hôtel, he said it was a job Don Magarrell ought to have.

Further ado, he found himself going out not only what foods to cook and how to prepare them, but also, in a galley three feet square and five feet high, meals for as many as five hungry passengers, along with dishes and utensils, in such a way that the stewardess could serve a hot meal to everybody in a matter of minutes, or about half an hour. It was what led to the pre-cooked dishes that Mr. Magarrell contributed the answer not only for air travel but for outdoor meals anywhere. Mainliner chicken potpie, for instance, outranks them all in popularity with air travelers. Mr. Magarrell says everybody likes chicken, but chicken is better than any other meat, and it doesn't discolor. The trick is to cook the chicken and the vegetables separately. First he cooks gently a five-ounce chicken with two or three stalks of celery, two medium-sized onions, and a few bay leaves. Meantime, the carrots, onions, peas and potato balls are parboiled and the mushrooms are being fried in butter.

Half an hour before plane departure, the chicken is boned and cut into walnut-size pieces, put into individual casseroles along with the vegetables. Over them goes a fricassee sauce simmered from the chicken stock, flour, butter and chicken fat, and a sprig of parsley. The casserole is topped with a piecrust, brushed over with milk, pierced twice with a fork, and baked at 375 degrees until the crust is golden brown. In a thermal jug or, heavily wrapped with paper, the casseroles hold heat for hours, and there's a neat answer, says Mr. Magarrell, to the hot picnic-dinner problem.

Or there's beef tenderloin sauté, which Mr. Magarrell makes by cutting tenderloin ends into thin slices about the size of half dollars, frying them with beef fat over a brisk fire, seasoning with paprika, salt and pepper. When they're browned, he sprinkles the mixture with flour, browns it some more, adds a glass of claret. The sauce is made with sliced mushrooms, chopped onions and diced green peppers braised in butter, then cooked with stewed tomatoes, with brown sauce added at the boiling point. This, in the casseroles with the tenderloin tips, says Mr. Magarrell, gives you something to picnic about.

His navarin of spring lamb, another casserole dish, is something else again. Dice your lamb (from a leg or a shoulder) and brown in a braising pot, add salt, sprinkle with flour and brown, then put in a bay leaf, two cloves, a pinch of whole-grain pepper, some tomato purée. Cover with water, and cook it in the oven. When the meat is cooked, place in casseroles with pre-cooked carrots, peas, string beans, potatoes and small onions, and bake.

You may say these dishes are a bit on the fancy side for picnics. You may have to work up to them gradually, in which case Mr. Magarrell is ready for you with Hamburger on Toasted Bun with Savory Sauce. Of course, he couldn't offer it to air-line travelers, who are a spoiled lot. Like the smarty, for instance, on a plane we once boarded who said to the stewardess, "Sister, this is my birthday, and I hope you didn't forget to bake me a cake."

"I didn't, sir," she said.

Dishes Aloft Are Fancy

She spoke to the pilot who radioed ahead to the next stop, where they smuggled a cake aboard, with candles and "Happy Birthday to Hank" written in frosting. When the dinner was served, she tipped off the other passengers and, as she came down the aisle with the cake, candles burning, everyone sang, to a blushing passenger named Hank Somebody, "Happy Birthday, Dear Hank, Happy Birthday to You!"

In case you want to try Hamburger on Toasted Bun with Savory Sauce, a Magarrell special, here's how to cook it.

To a pound of freshly ground round steak add one egg, a slice of bread (soaked in water and squeezed), salt and pepper, a tablespoon of finely chopped onion sautéed slightly to remove the raw taste. Mix well, make patties, grill until browned, and serve open-faced on toasted bun doused with savory onion sauce. The sauce? Sauté your chopped onions until brown, dust with flour, brown some more, add chicken broth, a dash of maggi sauce, a little tomato juice, stir until it boils.

A plebeian picnic dish, but one fit for a movie star!

CALOX MOVIE QUIZ . . No. 9

Famous for his sparkling CALOX SMILE

WHO IS HE?

Star of
"MY FAVORITE WIFE"
an R. K. O. Picture

CLUES

by Harriet Parsons, Famous Hollywood
Columnist

1. Who is one of the most popular Hollywood bachelors?
2. Who starred in "Gunga Din" with Victor McLaglen?
3. Like many other stars, he uses Calox to help keep that "Hollywood Sparkle." Who is he?

(Check your answer below. Star's name is at bottom of page)

TRY THIS FINGER-NAIL TEST
—PROVE CALOX
POLISHES
SAFELY

Make this easy test: pour a little Calox Tooth Powder on a nail buffer, then rub your finger nails vigorously. Now look at them! See their high polish—proof that Calox contains no harsh abrasives—cannot harm the softest tooth enamel!

Calox Tooth Powder attacks ugly film and surface stains because it has not only 1 or 2, but FIVE CLEANSING AGENTS. You can feel the surging foam of Calox go into split-second action. You can see the new, high polish on your teeth as Calox helps you to win that "Hollywood Sparkle." Brush your teeth with Calox for 30 DAYS! And you'll notice a marked improvement in your smile . . . a smile that mirrors teeth naturally whiter and brighter!

CALOX TOOTH POWDER

Try Calox Antiseptic—Refreshes
the mouth, sweetens the breath.

Helps your "Teeth shine like
the stars" by bringing
out natural lustre

Dot wins romance and a "HOLLYWOOD SPARKLE"!

- 1 Jim: "What's this I hear about one of you girls being promoted up front next week?"
Dot: "Not me. With dull, dingy teeth like mine I haven't a chance."

- 2 Jim: "Be smart, Dot. Try Calox Tooth Powder! Its 5 Cleansing Agents do a swell job on surface stains. You can actually see Calox help you win that 'Hollywood Sparkle'!"

- 3 Bud: "Say! The boss' new secretary has a smile that knocks 'em dead! Wonder if she's dated up tonight?"
Jim: "Don't wonder any more, my boy. She is. With me!"

Lay Off the Italians

EVER since the President accused Mussolini of having stabbed France in the back, feeling has been rising in this country against our approximately 2,000,000 Italian-born people and the larger number of citizens whose parents or grandparents came over here from Italy. You would think from some of the talk in circulation that our Italians were getting ready to carve up our government and hand it to Mussolini on a spaghetti-with-meatballs platter.

The thing is unfortunate and unjustified.

In the first place, with all due respect to the President and all due abhorrence for Mussolini's jackal act as France began to stagger, Mussolini didn't betray anybody. Italy was openly and avowedly allied with Germany for several years preceding this war.

In the second place, it is notorious that Italians in this country are mainly apathetic toward Mussolini or violently opposed to him and the Statist idea which he, Hitler and Stalin represent. Our Italians don't flock home to help Mussolini fight his wars. The Fascist branch organizations that he set up here and elsewhere with so much fanfare soon after his

March on Rome rapidly withered to skeleton outfits—even as the German-American Bund began to do after numerous German-Americans' first flush of enthusiasm for Hitler gave way to some sober thinking about Hitler's way of doing things.

The long and short of it is that Italian-Americans by and large are as good citizens as other racial group by and large, and better some. We move that public uneasiness about them now be turned off. If our Italian population were the only menace we had to worry about, we could all live lives 99% free of

What Broke France?

WE SUGGEST, in all earnestness, that Congress appoint a commission to study the causes of the downfall of the French third republic. This commission should be composed of historians and professional fact-finders, should contain no politicians or ax-grinders, and should report findings within a reasonable time to the American people.

The main reason why we make this suggestion is that the historic tragedy of France—a tragedy whose repercussions all of us now alive will be witnessing for the rest of our lives—is being used just now by politicians and special pleaders in a manner that strikes us as bordering on the scandalous.

Conservatives of various types are trying to tell us that France fell before Hitler's blitz-kriegers and panzer divisions because French working people basely desired shorter work weeks and higher pay, and got both under the Popular Front government of Leon Blum.

Radicals tell us just the opposite—that France didn't go far enough with its New Deal. Both of these groups are trying to prove their own cases in this country by what happened to France, whereas it may easily be that no true economic parallels between the two countries can be traced.

Believers in mechanical warfare, with the human factor largely ignored, keep telling us that the French overthrow means we must shift our factories practically 100% into production of war machines, and waste no worry about where we're to get the men to run the machines. Who really knows how right these people are, or how wrong?

Those who think J. Edgar Hoover and his FBI should be turned into an outfit combining the deadliest features of the OGPU and the Gestapo are telling us that treachery—fifth-column monkey business—was mainly to blame for the Belgians' crackup, the rout through on the Meuse near Sedan, the withdrawal of Allied troops from strongly fortified positions to the open massacre of Flanders.

All this is doing us no good. If we could only find out what really cracked France—the various factors in the smashup and the relative importance of those factors—we might pick up some valuable lessons.

We need to know the whole answer. We need all the pointers we can collect on how a democratic nation can survive in the present day world. A fact-finding commission composed of disinterested, not harried or hurried, but at least silence a lot of nitwits and special pleaders now bedeviling our defense program. It might very easily make heavy contributions of common sense and illumination to the program.

T.B. is on the Run, but-

HAILED as "the major medical achievement of our generation" is the fact that in the last 20 years the United States tuberculosis death rate has gone down 60 per cent—or, stating it in another way, that T.B. in these 20 years has declined from top place to eighth place in diseases causing death in this country.

The thing has been done by remorseless medical crusading against the disease and its contributing causes, by public education, by generous public expenditures for hospitals, sanatoriums, clinics. However, there are a few remaining soft spots. Largest of these is our colored population of about 14,000,000, among whom for some reason T.B. is still between three and four times as prevalent as among whites. T.B. is likewise an occupational disease in certain hazardous jobs; and the disease has a way of hitting far too many young women of child-bearing age.

We want to urge, along with the National Tuberculosis Association, that the government's public health service be given ample funds to carry on the nation-wide campaign against T.B., to the end that the successes of the last 20 years may be maintained and their logical and entirely possible conclusion reached.

That conclusion is expressed in the Tuberculosis Association's slogan: "No tuberculosis (in the U. S.) by 1960." If anybody knows a better national goal to shoot at, we'd like to hear of it.

COLLIER'S

THE NATIONAL WEEKLY

August 10, 1940

5¢ A COPY

DO NOT TEAR OR DEFACE MAGAZINES.

WILLIAM
MUSE LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

RONALD MCLEOD

General de Gaulle—THE
WHO DIDN'T QUIT By QUENTIN REYNOLDS

A 32641
C 1/20X

21040X

PUB LIBR
BURLINGAME
CALIF

Before you could do this,
Western Electric did this

HT poles, trucks, copper, cotton: indeed, more than 100,000 things g into your telephone service. Purchasing is one of the four major ibilities of Western Electric in the Bell System.

MANUFACTURED and assembled 326 pieces to make your telephone.
Western Electric produces 43,000 different designs of apparatus for the nationwide Bell Telephone service.

MADE all these products to your telephone company. The size of ant reel, compared to a flat car, represents the amount of cable shipped to New England to repair the '38 hurricane damage.

INSTALLED telephone central offices, those intricate switching centers containing in a single exchange thousands of miles of wire and millions of electrical connections.

Western Electric ... is back of your Bell Telephone service

WILLIAM L. CHENERY Editor
CHARLES COLEBAUGH Managing Editor
THOMAS H. BECK Editorial Director

WALTER DAVENPORT
AIMEE LARKIN
QUENTIN REYNOLDS
KYLE CRICHTON
KENNETH LITTAUER
JAMES N. YOUNG
MAX WILKINSON

Politics
Drama
Sports
Screen and Theater
Fiction
Fiction
Fiction

WM. O. CHESSMAN
HENRY L. JACKSON
GURNEY WILLIAMS
DENVER LINDLEY
FRANK D. MORRIS
IFOR THOMAS
CLARENCE H. ROY

Art
Fine Feathers
Humor
Articles
Articles
Photographs
Syntax

W. D. COURTNEY
FRANK GERVASI
MARTHA GELLHORN
JIM MARSHALL
WM. HILLMAN
ROBERT MCCORMICK
JOHN T. FLYNN

THIS WEEK

AUGUST 10, 1940

SHORT STORIES

JACK MACMURRAGH

My Friend, Kerry Boyne. He knew what he wanted and how to get it. Page 7

ETHEL LOBAN

Autograph. Love letter written on a bank check. Page 10

THOMAS McMORROW

Friends Needed. In Washington, Smith is a magic name. Page 15

SIDNEY HERSCHEL SMALL

One Thunderous Night. The sea yields up a sinister mystery. Page 20

THE SHORT SHORT STORY

Sharp Traders, by Louis C. Goldsmith. Page 17

SERIAL STORIES

WILLIAM C. WHITE

Occupation: Widow. The sixth of nine parts. Accusation of murder. Page 16

AGATHA CHRISTIE

The Patriotic Murders. The second of nine parts. M. Poirot is perplexed. Page 18

ARTICLES

TEX CARLETON

Pride Pitching. What makes baseball players come back. Page 9

QUENTIN REYNOLDS

The Man Who Didn't Quit. France's General Charles de Gaulle, fighting on. Page 11

RUTH CARSON

We Furnish the Home. Why Collier's House is easy to live in. Page 12

J. BRYAN III

Daily Boy. Don James, master of ballyhoo. Page 14

J. D. RATCLIFF

Tropic Killer. We've got to have quinine—or else. Page 22

FRELING FOSTER

Keep Up with the World. Page 5

EDITORIALS

Our Head-Start on Hitler.

Let the Children In. Success Story. Page 54

COVER

RONALD McLEOD

ANY WEEK

AFTER we're armed within an inch of our life and have found a suitable enemy to try out on, we shall invite the General Staff of the United States Army to spend a morning in these offices. And if they wish to go to war fully equipped with the enemy's secrets, soundly grounded in modern tactics and in complete knowledge of what to do next, they'll accept. As far as we know, no other office in America is so crowded daily with fence-rail field marshals, cigar-store generals and barroom brigadiers. We've just got rid of a mob which included two Germans (one pro- and the other anti-Nazi), an antiappeasement Britisher, a progingo Mexican, a Daladier-hating Frenchman and an assortment of Americans who run all the way up and down from superisolationists to Roosevelt interventionists. They disposed of every major economic political and military problem with finger-snapping ease. However, they dispersed somewhat too rapidly for dignity when we read them a letter we'd just received from a young Negro.

THE letter was inspired by W. B. Courtney's article, "We're Losing No Time Here," explaining the United States Army's air-training program. "I am twenty years old," he writes. "I have completed two years of college work. But I am not allowed to take advantage of this training course because I am a Negro. Negroes may not enlist as flying cadets because one of the requirements is that one must agree to serve three years with an Air Corps unit upon completion of training. As there is no unit in the Air Corps with Negroes in it, Negroes are unable to fulfill this requirement and hence are not accepted. Probably there is nothing you can do about this, but I think it is a problem that deserves some attention. Please do not think me a 'professional' Negro raising the race question. All I ask is that I have the same choice in serving my country as other young Americans have."

WHILE the War Department worries out an answer to that we assume full responsibility for a satisfactory solution of another military problem. Mr. Joseph O. Duncan of Charleston, West Virginia, reports that he will enlist in the United States Army but not in Charleston. He tried there and asked ■ recruiting officer whether it was true that beer-drinking was contrary to Army regulations. Mr. Duncan is fond of beer. The officer told him that he, Mr. Duncan, would be far too busy with patriotic tasks to find time to drink beer. So what to do? It's very simple. Any soldier who can't find beer and the time to drink it has no business being a soldier. We remember— But never mind.

WE HAVE a letter from an American gentleman who, when the Nazis took over Paris, fled to London via Bordeaux. And just in time, too, he says, to save him from "dying of shame for the land of my birth." But alas, his head is hanging low again with mortification. "When I think," writes Mr. William Charles Wagergarth, born forty-eight years ago in Baltimore, Maryland, but a resident in France since 1920, "that the United States, my native land, permitted the country of Lafayette and Rochambeau to fall before the Nazi hordes without raising a finger, I can look no longer in the faces of Frenchmen. And now I find myself unable to look fine Englishmen in the eyes. What am I to tell them as they ask me, 'Where are your fellow Americans? Why are your troops not here fighting for the mother country?'"

FRANKLY, we think Mr. Wagergarth should come home. There are quite a number of things here worth a good head-hanging. For example, we've heard a bit belatedly of the lady who wired Mr. John D. M. Hamilton, chairman of the Republican National Committee, during the recent Republican convention, that every child in her young son's class in school considered "Mr. Hoover to be the hope of the country and the unanimous choice of the rising generation." An hour later Mr. Hamilton received a second telegram. "Pay no attention earlier wire," it read. "Ashamed to say children refer to J. Edgar Hoover."

BY THIS time, we trust, our ubiquitous Mr. Courtney is plunging through the jungles of the upper Amazon or striding across the pampas, the llanos and the selvas of South America. Or maybe he's scaling the Andes. We wouldn't be surprised. Closely following him, we hope, somewhat like a thin, mistrustful Sancho Panza will be his interpreter and photographer, George DeZayas. It is the purpose of these two footsore representatives of this energetic magazine to search out the truth about our Latin-American relations. They are departing with letters of introduction, medical certificates, personal police records and bales of documents which, as we understand it, are letters of marque and reprisal. Anyway, we suggest that you be patient. It will be worth it. This is the first time that Mr. DeZayas has been off city pavements except the time he "went to Mexico City to get born."

AND Mr. Rud Rennie of City reports that a friend of to fly from Miami to New York at the wrong airport—the instead of the commercial Corps sergeant saw Mr. Rennie strolling across a runway and him off. "Hey, you," yelled the giant, "what's the idea? What are you doing here? Who are you?" Rennie's friend, sweating and in no humor to be yelled: "Me, I'm an intern and want to be left alone." The giant halted, saluted and "Sorry, sir. I thought you civilian."

WE'VE just managed to get through this column after Mr. Wendell Lewis Willkie quarters. In our casual way, we merely to drop in, shake hands with the Republican nominee and exchange a few light phrases with him. We dropped in. As we were it was something like dropping meat chopper. Apparently thousands of others had had the idea. We shall now retire for hours to have our coat made back rubbed with arnica and collect our thoughts. The parade of greeters, requesters, aides, autograph collectors, writers, biographers, women's committees, photographers, makers and vigorous voters everybody but Mr. Willkie as the poor fellow tried to get beaten back at the door. delegation of Willkie Demos we got as far as the information where we were embraced by a lady who asked us to remember "God has always sent us an hour in times of crisis." he named them for us—Washington, Theodore Roosevelt, Coolidge, Hoover. She was that she didn't seem to notice her hat was gone. Or maybe it was just that kind of

WHILE we're recovering we forward to a large envelope Ed Wipe of Indianapolis. Says Mr. Wipe: "I'm about a short story for you and from the way I feel now it be a dinger. All set?"

WE'RE prostrate. . . .

UP WITH THE WORLD

By Freling Foster

country, there are at least pure-bred dogs priced approximately fifteen between $5,000 and $10,000 eight valued from $10,000.

machine which manufactures paper boxes for the of such articles as razor and chewing gum, turns outainers—folded, glued and at the rate of thirty a second. Gertrude C. Hobart, New Hampshire.

and no stage play may be until its dialogue has and approved by the lumberlain and no public may be made by the King is been read and approved British Home Office.

th there are fewer lunar or eclipses, more people served the former, for an the sun lasts only a few and is visible from only a th on the earth's surface. of the moon is longer in and may be observed from n half the world.—By Coles, New York, New artificial-limb manufacturing in Minneapolis, all of employees, salesmen as well workers, are physically and wear one or more's artificial appliances.

type of compressed-air sprays molten metal in varying from one ounce to a minute, is used to fill old up dented automobile coat various objects to re, corrosion or contamination, through the use of stenect" signs and decorations. for Birnbaum, Rouses New York.

ate best suited for the of a certain flower is not al- best for the growing of its example, the finest sweet produced in England while sweet-pea seeds are produced in the United States.

To secure new patrons, some American banks now have departments that teach cookery, find jobs for the unemployed, help churches raise money with movie shows and lend bulls to farmers for breeding purposes.

Hit-and-run drivers leave on our streets and highways an average of 386 victims a day.

A method of measurement has been developed that is capable of detecting one atom of the metal cesium in a cubic meter of space—which is comparable to detecting a housefly in a glass bowl the size of the earth.

A certain species of frog, after a heavy meal of fireflies, may be seen in the dark by the light of these insects shining through the walls of its stomach.

Anyone who dies on duty in U. S. military or naval service or has been honorably discharged may be buried free at Arlington.—By Joseph W. Middleton, Muncie, Indiana.

More than 250 public buildings in California are equipped with "earthquake valves" which, installed on the gas mains leading into the structures, automatically shut off the gas at the first tremor of an earthquake to prevent explosion and fire.—By Mary S. Roberts, Encinitas, California.

Custom officers on the American-Canadian border insist upon cattle staying on their own side of the frontier, even when their owner's pasture lies in both countries. When cattle are suspected of having strayed into the "foreign" part of the farm, their tails are doused in a solution of washing soda. If they are Canadian animals, the tails, having been treated with a chemical, turn a bright red.—By Robert B. Rigg, Chicago, Illinois.

Five dollars will be paid for each interesting or unusual fact accepted for this column. Contributions must be accompanied by satisfactory proof. Address Keep Up with the World, Collier's, 250 Park Avenue, New York City. This column is copyrighted by Collier's, The National Weekly. None of the items may be reproduced without express permission of the publisher.

DODGE Job-Rated TRUCKS

Dodge Job-Rated 1 1/2-ton Cab-Over-Engine truck hauls lumber and building material for the North Milwaukee Lumber & Supply Co., Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

Cut your Overhead WITH Trucks that Fit the Job!

BECAUSE HIGH-QUALITY Dodge Job-Rated trucks are priced with the lowest, your investment is low. And, because Dodge Job-Rated trucks are built to fit the job—to save on gas, oil, tires and upkeep—your overhead is low. Study the chart below for the reason why Dodge Job-Rated trucks fit the job better. Note that Dodge uses six different truck engines for different size trucks. And you can get the right truck for your job from a total of 106 standard chassis and body models. Your Dodge dealer will show you the truck that will fit your job and save you money. Ask him about easy budget terms, too.

DODGE DIVISION, CHRYSLER CORPORATION, DETROIT, MICHIGAN

LOOK! COMPARE DODGE WITH THESE "OTHER TWO" LOW-PRICED TRUCKS. DODGE OFFERS FAR WIDER SELECTION

COMPARISON	DODGE TRUCKS	"OTHER TWO" TRUCKS
		TRUCK "A"	TRUCK "B"
Number of ENGINES	6	1	3
Number of WHEELBASES	17	9	6
Number of GEAR RATIOS	16	6	9
Number of CAPACITIES	6	3	4
	1/2 to 3-Ton	1/2 to 1 1/2-Ton	1/2 to 1 1/2-Ton
Number of STD. CHASSIS and BODY MODELS	106	58	42
PRICES begin at	$468	$452	$475 <sup>88</sup>

Prices shown are for 1/2-ton chassis with flat face cowl delivered at Main Factory, federal taxes included—state and local taxes extra. Prices subject to change without notice. Figures used in the above chart are based on published data.

Tune in Major Bowes,
CBS Network, Thursday
9-10 P.M. Eastern Daylight Saving Time.

Priced with the Lowest for Every Capacity

SEE YOUR Dodge Dealer
FOR A GOOD DEAL

DEPEND ON DODGE *Job-Rated TRUCKS

3-2-1 1/2-1-1/2-TON CAPACITIES...106 STANDARD CHASSIS AND BODY MODELS ON 17 WHEELBASES

*Job-Rated MEANS: A TRUCK THAT FITS YOUR JOB

Copr. 1940. H. J. Heinz Co.

THE BAND CONCERT

An Old American Institution

REMEMBER . . . the band concert of a summer's evening in your home town?

You knew the men of the band. They were farmers, carpenters, tradesmen, the newspaper editor, the doctor's son. You knew their "pieces", too. The repertory ran to marches—brisk, loud and stirring. Sousa's Washington Post . . . Ta-Ra-Ra-Boom-De-Ay, heavy with cymbals . . . a Strauss waltz now and then . . . Swanee River . . . In The Sweet Bye and Bye.

NIGHT noises filled the breaks in the music . . . crickets and tree toads like fiddles, far away, the soft cello coo of sleepy doves, and every once in a while a bullfrogs chiming in like a big bassoon. Presently a single star showed up alongside the spire of the Congregational Church.

WHILE radio and automobile have thinned band concert crowds, in many a town the bandstand still remains in the Square, its slender carved pillars and fretwork gray against the evening sky. Birds have nests under the pagoda-like eaves. Children, using the stand as "home" for run sheep run, clatter up the circling stairs. Yet throughout the nation, old-fashioned band concerts still play a part in the lives of kindly towns where folks believe that nothing graces a summer evening quite so well.

GOOD wholesome things, whether they be food or custom, have a way of becoming a permanent part of American life. Long before most of you were born, Heinz foods were lending their goodness to family get-togethers after the band concert. And though Heinz methods and facilities have improved from year to year to keep pace with times and changing habits, Heinz continues faithful to old-fashioned recipes, careful of tradition and well-remembered tastes and flavors.

GENERATIONS of American families recognize the House of Heinz as a fine old American institution—just as they remember the band concert as a "forum", the voices of old America.

MEMORIES of friendly gatherings, snuggles, activities and good food go to make up the pattern of American living—a pattern in which the H. J. Heinz Company has had a part for the past seventy years.

H. J. Heinz Company
An Old American Institution

My Friend, Kerry Boyne

Jack Macmurragh

ILLUSTRATED BY ELMORE BROWN

the town his strongest al-were a girl, a dog, and a
They can be formidable

WHEN the knock came on the front door, the puppy yipped, and my uncle said, "Hell," for he thought it meant that a car was off the track, yardmaster he'd have to go out and put it it was Kerry Boyne, and his voice was too quiet. "Hogan," he said, "can you get couple of wire-passes tonight?"

ought: He's killed somebody with his fists Bidy Burg did, and has to get out of town.

uncle's voice stumbled a bit in surprise. "I maybe," he said. "Where to?"

ago."

u said a couple?"

e for my wife."

me in from the kitchen. "Wife?" I said. "You t a wife."

ry stood outside, in the light from the door.

on a high, stiff collar that made him look eleat his hat was cocked the way he wore it when walking in the middle of the street. "I will when I get on that train tonight, Bum," he said.

speaking to both of us.

uncle said, "Would that be . . . ?" and I said,

Penberthy!"

ry nodded.

l ol' Cap be mad!" I said. Kidlike, I saw only y over her father.

my uncle saw more than that. "An' who'll you carry you without Cap Penberthy says so?"

will, with my five fingers on his neck," Kerry

She'd be in the hammock with the puppy. Kerry would lift his hat, and bow, and she'd look at him, and we'd walk on

I almost went off the roof, and I almost lost the shotgun. But I blew an awful hole in all that noise said, "and he'll come along to the Reverend Brown's, an' be a witness."

"Will you want me or any of the boys?" my uncle asked.

"No," Kerry said. "She'll be scared enough anyway."

It was the last time—though I didn't know it then—that I was to walk up the street with my friend, Kerry Boyne.

I MET Kerry Boyne in the storage yards—where I had no right to be, as my uncle kept telling me.

A mine-run crew was switching out loads on the lead track, and I was trying to make the couplings of the cars they kicked down Number One track. It would have kept my uncle himself busy to make them all. "But I did the best I could."

The new automatic "jenny" coupler was easy; all I had to do was open the knuckles and let the cars come together. But the link-and-pin was different. Because of my size I had to go between the moving cars, guide the link into the slot of the drawbar on the head car, and get out before the cars came together. It wasn't very smart. The link-and-pin was called the killer for good reason.

The man at the switch hollered at me, but I was too busy to pay any attention. I didn't see him running.

A car was lumbering down like some big red animal, and I met it in the middle of the track. Running backward, I shoved the link in the slotted arm, and dropped the pin through to hold it.

And then a tie hooked the heel of the unaccustomed shoes I had to wear climbing cars, and jerked my feet out from under me. I grabbed at the link with one hand, and scrambled at the drawbar with the other, dragging.

I couldn't get any control over my feet. The ties kept kicking them under and up against the axle, and then they'd drop down to be kicked up again. I was afraid they were going under the wheels. I knew I should drop and lie flat between the rails, but I couldn't make my hands let go. Probably because I was afraid that I'd bounce or roll under the wheels, and I'd seen men who had gone under.

I knew, too, that I should shift my grip because when the cars came together my right hand on the link was going to be sheared off. Here's where I get it, I thought. My uncle was right. I'll never be a switchman with only one hand.

In my head I wasn't scared; but my feet were crazy, the way they were kicking.

Then it was that I felt him grab me back of the shoulders, twisting my shirt and overalls, and haul and swing me up on the car, and pull me over to the grab-irons on the side.

I glommed onto safety with everything but my eyelids, and shut my teeth and my eyes against the sickness that emptied me like bleeding.

I used to come full awake at night, sometimes, with the thought of that—and the memory—and every time, kicking my way up out of darkness, it seemed I got the same comforting odor as I did when Kerry held me on the side of the car, pressing me against the rungs, one sweaty leather mitt on the grab-iron before my face, and the feel of him all around me, and the scent of tobacco and soap and sweat and strength. Just before the cars bumped together, his forearms pressed against my sides, as thick and as hard as the side-arms of an engine. . . .

It was the next day that he saw Evangeline Penberthy; and I was with him. At quitting time, I met him coming out of the switch shanty. He said,

"Hiya, Bum?" and I tried to pretend I didn't realize that he'd asked someone my name.

He looked at my bare feet, and then turned me around by the shoulders to see if I had mitts in my overall pocket. "Hot day," he said then. "I'll buy ice cream."

I sat on a cane chair in front of White's Hotel where all the railroad men stayed, while Kerry changed his clothes, and then we headed for Main Street and the candy store.

We were in front of Walter's saloon when someone up at the top of the street hollered. It was a wild, high yell, scared and warning. Then more shouts, all close together.

"A RUNAWAY!"

The iron-ore street was wide and, at supertime, almost empty. We saw a team of blacks coming almost from the top of the hill. And were they coming! Behind the light buggy, the ore-red dust rose so it looked as though they were running out of a wall.

Once every block, somebody'd get out in front of them, waving his arms and shouting, and then he'd made a wild jump out of the road again. Because those horses never slowed or swerved. They were Cap Penberthy's horses, and he always had crazy ones.

Just before they got to the railroad track that ran across Main Street, a little guy waved, and made a grab at their bridles as they ran him down. We learned later it was Mickey Feller, who was kind of a drunk around town. Nobody thought he had it in him, but he got three ribs broke.

If he hadn't slowed them, the bounce over the track would have thrown that buggy higher than Miller's store.

As it was, I thought it was going to jump right over the team. I hollered.

There was a fluttering flash of white the buggy, and Kerry said, "A waaan"

The blacks gave an extra jump and jerked the rig out behind them, and then they came on, their heads stretched out, sweat shining on their big chests, and their polished hooves flying and their polished hooves pounding up and down.

Kerry said, "No use wavin' at those babies!" and then he was down on the sidewalk onto the road.

The first two jumps he got buttoned, and then he tucked his head down and began to run. He thought he was scared to death those blacks came pounding down the center of the road, crazy-mad. Kerry hadn't gone fifty yards when they were right behind him. He never around. He let out another note, swear that for a minute he was with them even.

Then he went into the air like a doubled-up monkey. He hit the horse right in the middle and staggered him against his mate. Kerry hit him while the buggy slewed and and kicked up so much dust I couldn't see anything.

Down through the red cloud the people came, and first of all was the driver in his buggy.

When I got there, Kerry was of the horses, holding their heads.

The doctor climbed into the buggy with Cap Penberthy's daughter. Her hair was all down and her fancy over one eye. I almost laughed. I have, too, if I hadn't been close to see how scared her eyes were. I thought how the day before I had too scared even to hold mine open.

I waited on the sidewalk while he shook Kerry's hand and told him a good thing he had done. V

(Continued on page 50)

the night before Christmas, 1938, that my professional death was announced without warning. The Chicago Cubs released me outright to Milwaukee after seven years in the major leagues. At thirty-two, I was a broken-arm, broken-arm pitcher going to the minors on a one-way contract.

Twelve months later I pitched a no-hit, no-run game against the Cincinnati Reds. In '38, the Cincinnati Reds had licked me seven times in a row. Not only did they beat me, but they beat out my brains. On April 30, 1940, I pitched the same team, now the champions of the National League, and I wasn't even close to a hit off me in nine innings. To me, it was no fluke, I gave the Bees, Reds and Cubs the total of one run in twenty-eight consecutive innings in the early part of this season.

It had happened between Christmas Eve, 1938, and Christmas Eve, 1940? Surely not a miracle. There are no miracles in baseball for a gaffer approaching thirty-four, who has a sore arm four times in his career and who never was a great pitcher.

I was good and lucky—in equal proportion, I hope. But, the important thing was I was a healthy pitcher. And above all, I was a guy whose pride had been outraged.

Newspaper boys have tried to steam up a feud between me and Gabby Hartnett, who gave me my walking papers. I like to be helpful, but I simply cannot co-operate with him. If I blast Gabby, I must condemn the other major-league clubs that passed waivers on me at the time, then did not consider me worth the gamble of the draft price, last winter.

Gabby, perhaps, had every reason for wanting to see me go and stay there. The last time he had put me in as a relief pitcher was a pretty feeble imitation of a major-league pitcher. In the fourth game of the 1938 world series with the Yankees, I had done a very thorough job of messing up their strategy.

The Yankees were leading 4-3 in the eighth inning, when I came out as a relief pitcher. I was a relief only to the Yankees. I unveiled two wild pitches, walked two and gave a double to Myril Hoag. When they finally dragged me out of there, I knew my number was up in Chicago.

Right, I was lousy. Judged by that terrible exhibition, I didn't deserve a job in the majors. But every baseball man knew I had been pitching all season with a sore arm. Other men before me had recovered during the winter. The Cubs might have taken me to training camp in 1939 on a one-year contract before determining my status. The last thing they could have done was to send me to Milwaukee on option, retaining chattel rights to me in case I did come back.

Things That Baseball Bosses Forget

What burned me especially was the fact that with experienced pitchers so scarce every major-league club gave me a chance. It would have been different if I had not demonstrated my ability to win in the majors, but after my first year with the Cardinals in 1932 I had a winning record for six straight seasons in the National League. At that time I played on three championship teams. When clubs ignored six years of good work and remembered only ten minutes of one game.

That's my complaint against baseball. The big brains in long-range planning forget too often that ballplayers are people—proud people who cannot be kicked around callously. In the final analysis, a ballplayer has to peddle but his health and his pride. And of the two, I say pride is the more important commodity.

It starts out believing he is the best kid in his neighborhood. Then, on a grubby minor-league team, he is convinced he is the best prospect on the club. If he has that deep pride of personal achievement he'll be left crushed permanently. When he gets to the majors, he feels he is as good as the rest of the mob making a living from the game. And finally when the physical act of pitching every day becomes a tormenting, exhausting—professional pride alone impels a man to punish himself to the breaking point.

Do you think the desire for more money made Ty Cobb a tremendous player at forty-two? Would you say Cobb was concerned with maintaining his prestige or his bank account when, toward the end, he played on? Is baseball fun for a man once he's passed his early thirties? I don't have to look beyond the Brooklyn club for a good example of what pride can mean to a man and his manager. Freddy Fitzsimmons thought his world had collapsed three years ago when the Giants, the only major-league club he'd ever played with, traded him to the Yankees. Fitz then was thirty-six and was recuperating from an elbow operation. He was a good guy while he had it. The Giants overlooked one important factor—Fitz's pride. For the last few years Freddy has been living and pitching with one all-enveloping ambition in view: To win games in the majors. And so fat Freddy, at thirty-six, is a valuable pitcher. That's what pride does for a pitcher. Without it, I never would have pitched my no-hitter against the Reds. I wouldn't (Continued on page 24)

Pride Pitching

By Tex Carleton
as told to Stanley Frank

PHOTOGRAPH FOR COLLIER'S BY BOB LEAVITT

After six years of good work the big leagues tossed Tex Carleton back to the minors. What had been his crime? Ten bad minutes in a single game. But Tex is top dog again and has a word of advice for managers

Autograph

By Ethel Loban

Facts and figures on the care and feeding of the most glamorous husband that Hollywood has seen

ILLUSTRATED BY WALTER KLETT

SHE was going out to lunch. Her gown was by Adrian, her hat by Bendel, her hair, eyes and mouth by Max Factor. Her soul was her own. Not that she would have admitted it. She would have told you if you caught her in a bitter mood that she had no soul; that in its place was a box office. She would have said that she had no emotions save make-believe ones and that make-believe was the only truth she knew. She would have lied.

Hastily now she signed a sheaf of photographs, a small mountain of bills: Trilby Jamison—Trilby Jamison—how many times had she signed that name, how many thousands of times! It had become a reflex; put a pen in her hand, you got an angular scrawl—Trilby Jamison. A controlled reflex, for the pen stopped at the last bill. That slip of engraved paper she folded and put into her bag. Her secretary did not notice; she had been trained not to notice; she swept everything into a neat pile and went about her business.

The door of Trilby Jamison's study opened, shut, opened again. She looked up from the desk and said, "Yes, Alfredo?"

"Good morning, my love." He kissed her ear where it showed beneath her hat and as always her heart contracted sharply. He stood over her, his eyes laughing, his dark cheeks darkly flushed, his black hair curling crisply around his temples as he smiled at her in mock dismay. "You are going out? Even that Shylock studio gives my Trilby an occasional stingy day but you . . . you are not so merciful."

She said, "I'm sorry, darling. A luncheon, a very dismal one, I fear." She hesitated. "Will you come too?"

"Ah, no, no!" He laughed and she knew that he was not thinking of the bill folded in her bag. "The last lunch you dragged me to. Business . . . business . . . business! No. But when you come home, my sweet, maybe you'll rest a little then?"

"When I grow old I'll be a pussycat and lie in the sun all day."

"Don't grow old." He touched her cheek, his fingers tracing only the clean line of the lower jaw, but the light caress registered in every sensitive nerve center. "Stay as you are. Life holds so much that could amuse you. Cars, for instance. I have been looking at cars."

"Alfredo! Another?"

"But such a little fellow, this one. Yellow. So ridiculous and so cheap." Even through her gown his hand was warm on her shoulder and his laugh was rich and warm and deep. "Could you give me your autograph for that little car, my love?"

Trilby Jamison stood up. She said quickly, "This afternoon, perhaps, Alfredo. It's almost one, now. I mustn't be late for lunch."

He helped her into her silver-fox jacket and fastened the catch at her neck. He said, "Be careful of my Trilby, my busy, small Trilby." He kissed her. Holding her close, "I'll have them send the car and know it will amuse you."

"I'm sure it will." His shoulder broad; his tweeds smelled of turpentine and tobacco. She forced herself from his arms. Breathlessly she said, "I'll sign the check when I come home, Alfredo."

At one o'clock the glittering limousine slid gently to the curb; the door opened and Trilby stepped out. Hardly had her shoe touched the pavement when she confronted a phenomenon. A handful of school children, a lounge lizard, a suddenly converged upon her came a circle, each with a smile and an uncapped fountain pen toward her.

The chauffeur made a gesture to protect her but she said, "It's all right, Joseph, I'd like to, really."

Accepting the nearest pen, she scrawled a huge "Trilby Jamison" on a white page, said gravely, "Imagine why you want it. It's worth the price of old paper in years."

Some one said, "G'wan, you're wowing 'em fifty years from now, Trilby."

Her smile was a familiar, dimple; her voice was sweet as persimmon juice: "I hope you're a dependable prophet."

She faced the restaurant entrance. (Continued on page 40)

Trilby Jamison—how many times had she signed that name, how many thousands of times! It had become

General Charles de Gaulle (center), who is carrying on the war for France from London

The Man Who Didn't Quit

By Quentin Reynolds

"Fall in line with the Bordeaux government and your pensions will be safe." That sensational promise has kept thousands of French officers from joining General Charles de Gaulle and continuing the fight

THE man who didn't quit has a closely cropped mustache and he is tall and straight. When he speaks the words come out sharply and when he talks of the betrayal of his country the words are bits of rounded hail dropping on a tin roof. General Charles de Gaulle, today the mouthpiece and leader of all free Frenchmen, is a very tough citizen indeed.

"France lost the war," he says with the confidence of a man who knows war tactics backwards, "for very definite reasons. These were: First of all, our military system did not bother to develop any mechanized strength in the air and on the ground; second, the panic which gripped our civilian population at the advance of the German mechanized units; third, the tangible effect the fifth column had on the minds of many of our leaders, and fourth, lack of co-ordination between us and our Allies."

In those few sentences de Gaulle told why a great nation was strangled to death in a few weeks. Behind each of his reasons lies one fundamental fault common to all—the horrible inefficiency of the general staff, which still thought of this war in terms of the last war. The general staff was proud of its Maginot Line. Its complacency communicated itself to the civilian population and finally to the Army.

France looked upon the Maginot Line as Americans still mistakenly look upon the Atlantic Ocean. It was a bulwark against invasion. France thought only in terms of defense. France believed that the war would be a war of position as was the last, not a war of movement, of quick, smashing forays by large armies of tanks and motorcycles.

Only de Gaulle saw the handwriting on the military wall. As late as last January he sent a long memorandum to General Gamelin, who was then trying to win the war on blueprints. De Gaulle condemned the policy of passive defense and foretold the disaster it brought about. He pleaded for more, bigger, faster and better-armored tanks; he got nothing but a rebuke for this impertinence.

Unconscious Aid to the Enemy

"Germany can still be beaten, even now," de Gaulle says. "But we must make use of the same weapons which she has used so successfully. Germany won with six thousand tanks and five thousand planes. She must be beaten by twenty thousand tanks and twenty thousand planes."

By a strange paradox the military theories of de Gaulle helped to defeat the French Army in 1934. He published a book on mechanized warfare. De Gaulle was an obscure captain then known only for his personal bravery during the last war, when he was wounded three times. The General Staff frowned on the advanced theories he pronounced in his book. The book itself, Vers l'Armee de Métier, received scant attention except from a few of his colleagues who thought as he did.

But one German read it, the astute General Hauss Guderian, who was just beginning to organize the mechanized forces of the Reich. Guderian made it his bible and when he swept through northern France with his army of twelve tank divisions, he used the paralyzing tactics advocated by de Gaulle.

De Gaulle himself, during May, held command of the French tank army but he had only one division. His tanks performed brilliantly at Abbeville but he was only staving off the inevitable. He himself rode and issued commands by radio from one of the tanks.

He didn't have the enormous sixty-ton tanks used by the German Army. So

(Continued on page 44)

Below: Living room, taken from fireplace. Oak-plywood walls, pine-block floor. Long mahogany table can be made into five. Right: Boy's room. Built-in bunks, portholes, linoleum-topped desk

Below: Girl's room with dressing-table end of desk open. Washable gray wall covering absorbs glare; matches carpet, making room seem larger Above: Master room. Dressing table looks built-in, is actually three separate pieces. Notice reflected in mirror; heading into corner they conserve floor space, make room more usable. Above: Natural cocoa matting on stairs, grass cloth on wall. Redwood poles hung with

PHOTOGRAPHS FOR COLLIER'S
BY SAMUEL H. GOTTSCHO

Furnish Home

Ruth Carson

House of Ideas. Most of the furnishings are designed for double duty and the space thereby saved is yours to enjoy

THIS is the furniture for Collier's House of Ideas. It has been especially designed to be as full of ideas for space-saving, for easy upkeep, for beauty. It is called modern furniture for lack of a better tag; it is actually simple furniture that makes the most of the space and the requirements of this house.

It is so much a part of the house that the architect, Edward Stone, planned the house with furniture locations in mind. The decorator and designer of the interiors, Dan Cooper, consulted with Mr. Stone in turn about woods and wall finishes, and even the plan. Collier's, in the role of client, and M. Bartos, builder of the furniture, who contributed to his own sense of simple design and fine work, joined in the collaboration. For such co-ordination of house and furnishings is the way to achieve a comfortable and workable place in which to live. You don't build a series of boxes, with holes punched for doors and windows, and then move in an assortment of chests, tables, beds and chairs that may be left over. You plan your space for furniture—to be bought ready-made, or built as this was, or already on hand.

Idea Number One for any house building and furnishing. That is Idea Number Two, to Mr. Cooper's mind, is an interior that is simple and casual, rather than studied and carefully matched. He'll mix woods in a room when they look well together—oak, walnut, pine and mahogany in Collier's living room, for instance, proving to you the monotony of only one wood when there is much of it in a room. Or given a curtain material that suits the house, he may use it all through, with a dash of rayon, which he designed himself as he did most of the fabrics in Collier's House. It is dyed different colors for some rooms; left natural and woven with a design for the playroom, appliquéd with a design for the boy's room. Same weave, but raw silk for the master room.

Such relaxed decorating, which suits the house completely, strikes the visitors to Collier's House. They don't go in and say, "Oh, look, it's modern." They say how cool and fresh it is, how comfortable and pleasant a place to live. This effect has been accomplished in other ways besides. By the use of natural materials: Wood, wax-finished to retain its natural beauty; leather, used for the seat of a chair, or laced to make back and seat; copper, to give warmth even to metal accessories; the fresh green of plants in every room; grass cloth on a wall, cocoa matting on the stairs; simple rugs, some of them hand-kindled a warm glow in you. See in the color pictures the mixture of rich wood tones, cool greens and gray, coppery red and yellow and brown and white through the house. There are lighthearted designs: Stubby, yellow animals on the playroom curtains, elephants with waggable tails and ears, appliquéd on those in the boy's room. Butterflies for the girl. Two childish footprints woven into the fireplace rug to beguile you. The plan of Collier's House worked into the other living-room rug, to start the conversation going. Unconventional, intriguing ideas like these to make you wonder why no one ever thought of that before.

But the house owes its fresh appeal to more than color and simple designs and materials. It has a cool, restful, uncluttered look because it actually has very little in it: None of the bedroom suites, the living-room sets, the sideboards and serving tables and cupboards and chests that take up floor space in so many houses.

This is possible because of the furniture itself, and because of the walls. You read in the first article on Collier's House about the wall in the many-purpose room. It's a plywood honeycomb of cupboards that does the storage job of a sideboard and several chests, taking care of all the dining-play- and guest-room supplies for this multiple room. The partition between this room and the kitchen is made up of counter and rolling panel above, the counter making a serving table; and a bar and breakfast ing is a table and some chairs. The table, a solid piece of walnut backed with plywood to match the wall paneling, lets down from the wall when you want it. Makes the room easy to clear for action. Upstairs the walls are storage space, too—closets fitted for hanging space, hat and shoe storage and drawers, eliminating the need for chests in the rooms.

(Continued on page 45)

Left, above: Collier's House of Ideas, Rockefeller Center, New York City. Above: Dining end of many-purpose room, looking into kitchen across service counter. Grass matting on floor. Table folds into window area. Metal-alloy tableware won't scratch or tarnish

BALLY BOY

By J. Bryan III

Hurry, hurry, hurry! Step right up, folks, and hearken to the magic words of Don James, Professor of Ballyhoo

DON JAMES is a talker for the Ringling Brothers-Barnum & Bailey side show. You may call him a "spieler" if you like, but not a "barker." This is an outsiders' term; professionals never use it. The talker's job is important because the gate depends almost entirely on his persuasiveness. A good talker can triple a poor talker's gate.

Don James is a good talker. He is only twenty-four, and this is only his second season with Ringling, but he has been a side-show man for six years. When he was talking for Hennies Brothers Carnival in 1938, he grossed $17,000 in Detroit in sixteen days and $10,000 in Dallas in twelve days. Tickets were a quarter, so he was bringing in close to 4,000 people a day. Any showman will tell you this is pretty near a record.

Old-school talkers resent James' success because his technique is so different from theirs. Where they are raucous, he is sedate, almost prim. They run to flashy suits, awning-striped shirts, violent sleeve-garters. James' clothes might have come from an outfitter to the clergy. His voice is soft, his face ascetic. He is like a young apostle, hushedly, even fearfully, describing a miracle that has been vouchsafed him.

This priestliness is, in his own words, "strictly con—a fakeroo," but James cultivates it because it is excellent box office. It is not so conspicuously flagrant in front of the Ringling side show, which is too inoffensive to be a proper contrast, but in his carnival days pious James unmercifully attracted coins from the best-insulated wallets. The most timid elderly maiden was reassured when he lifted his hand as much in benediction as for silence, and began his bally for the Spieler James introduces Mr. and Mrs. Fish. "Here, ladies and gentlemen, is the tallest married couple in the world. Both are over eight feet tall, and their combined weight is 840 pounds."

Guillotine by asking the men to remove their heads while he offered a prayer for the girl's soul.

Scriptural references studded the bally itself. The bally for the Floating Girl was virtually a petition for her canonization: "Our Saviour, the Carpenter of Nazareth, performed miracles on this earth. He changed water into wine, raised Lazarus from the dead. But this girl, a miracle girl, not with the aid of divine power, but with the aid of science—"

The science was a steel harness attached to a broomstick that supported her.

The fountain of James' devoutness is a huge and overflowing that his slight frame seems a frail vessel to contain it. The crowd pours in eager to join him in a good cry as it is to be amazed. When he was ballying Bertha Hildegard, the headless German girl, only the strength that comes from tenderness sustained him to the end: "Five years ago she gave birth from the right side of her body to a splendid baby boy. But the brutal German government was not satisfied. It wanted to find out what caused these freaks of nature, and enticed Bertha now unhappily widowed, into another marriage. (His voice begins to throb with sympathy.) "Through torture and pain, through a Caesarean operation," he bows his head) "—you mothers will—understand— (he shakes off the agonizing memory and hails a sweet mystery) "she again gave birth—this time from the left side—to a splendid little baby girl!"

Bertha Hildegard was two girls in a chair so contrived that only one body showed.

Serenades for the Heartstrings

The bally for Odette, the Headless Girl, is James' masterpiece, his Hamlet, his Symphonie Pathétique. After sketching in the wreck of the Parisian life in which Odette was decapitated, and Dr. LeBaron's brilliant operation, which succeeded in keeping her body "breathing and functioning," James forces himself to raise the question of whether she is still alive: "Sometimes when you look upon her body, you will quiver and quake as if in pain" (a hand brushes across his eyes). "That famous surgeon will tell you" (an almost inaudible whisper) "that he does—know—"

Odette is a mirror illusion.

James has found that these Serenades for the Heartstrings are particularly effective at the Ringling side show, because Ringling's reputation for volensomeness attracts a large proportion of women. He always finishes a Ringling bally with "Bring them ladies! God bless the ladies! The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world!" The rowdier carnivalesque shows appeal chiefly to men. James is sedate, almost priestly, no matter what the crowd, but if few women are present, he becomes the Militant Missionary instead of the Tender Shepherd, and so checks his sensitiveness to the more vigorous—and more suggestive—form of a shocked distaste.

Ballying the Headless Girl to a masculine crowd at a carnival, he used a passage that he never used with Ringling: "And now I must tell you why she has no clothes upon her body. One night at the Illinois State Fair, people sitting in the grandstand were so far away from her that they thought she was a model, made up for the occasion. Therefore, they came to remove her clothing so that they could see her living flesh." (His distaste begins.) "We even asked them to walk down and feel her pulse" (it has been acute) "and count her heartbeats one by one." (In a righteous warning) "But if you come in to get a cheap thrill, remember that we don't cater to you."

"We present her in this tent but once each week. On account of the air condition of our tent we show her more often. Her body must be kept at the same temperature at all times. The doctor is standing ready to move her now. It will be less than five minutes until she is presented again. At this point, liquid nourishment will be pumped into her body. Every three hours she must be fed. Yield it to yourself, your family, to see her before you leave your city. And there is no charge to see her. It is one of forty attractions.

"And now, gentlemen, if you will do me a favor, I will do you a favor in return. Turn to the woman on your side and ask her if she would like to see the Headless Girl. Maybe she would, maybe she wouldn't, but anyway. And in return for (Continued on p. 15)

PHOTOGRAPH FOR COLLIER'S BY GEORGE DE ZAYAS

Friends Needed

By Thomas McMorrow

ILLUSTRATED BY HARRY BECKHOFF

The love affair of a young man who knew everybody in Washington except the President. But give him time. This boy's going places

SMITH strode down the upper way of the Washington, D. C., apartment house, his blue eyes shining with anticipation.

He was going to meet Dot Mivvle's father, and Dot wouldn't be ashamed of him. He looked pretty smooth. He had been invited to dinner out and a premiere, and he was dressed in a tuxedo. He popped his opera hat and was hoping Dot would open the door.

Dot did; and caught at her father's admiration. She stepped out, and he hugged him. "Oh, Jack! That's a field coat? And tails!"

"Four dollars complete in Levy's," Jack complacently. "I had to buy a shirt and collar I got at an old-laundry store on 9th Street;

"I'll notice," Dot cut in, in case he was going to go into the matter more. "Come in . . . Oh, Jack!"

AUBREY MIVVLE, a gaunt and haggard man with flopping gray hair, was in the living room, sitting erect so as not to buckle his front. He felt low; he didn't want to miss the evening's program, and he couldn't afford it.

Superior in the department had given him four compliments—the world premiere of a new play. Mr. Mivvle was sorry now he had ever accepted them.

"We must dress," decreed Mrs. Mivvle. "Everybody there will be dressed. So we might as well go out to dinner. Dot, ask that Jack Smith that's always calling you up. And where ought we to go to eat, Dot?"

"The Shoreward Park Hotel; cocktails first on the President Roof," said Dot, who knew her smart Washington.

Mr. Mivvle was somewhat cheered when Jack, after being introduced, removed his dress overcoat, showed his tails and shut his hat; he was evidently a nice class of boy, and the evening wasn't sheer waste.

Mrs. Mivvle—short, stout, amiably and aimlessly energetic—also approved of Jack when she came from the elders' bedroom. She gave her husband a bright and secret glance, which approved of Jack and approved too of Mrs. Mivvle's judgment in taking an expensive apartment. She had said to Mr. Mivvle, eight months before, "Aub, Dot is going on eighteen; and I was married at eighteen. I think I'll look around at some nice elevator apartments; a nice class of boy won't walk up four flights."

"Are you in the Government, Mr.

Smith?" asked Mr. Mivvle curiously.

"Oh, Papa's such a cross-examiner!" smiled Dot, nervously.

"Yes, I often say Mr. Mivvle ought've been a lawyer," said Mrs. Mivvle, who was herself curious about the guest. Dot had been vague.

"I'm in General Intelligence, Mr. Mivvle!"

"Secret Service, Mr. Smith? Is it the FBI or—"

"Not exactly, Mr. Mivvle," said Jack rapidly, "though we do work for them too in the way of keeping them informed of what's going on. For instance, Mr. Hoover came up to me on the street last week, and I gave him a lot of stuff he didn't know. Now, this morning Vice-President Garner spoke to me—"

"My! You know those men to talk to, Jack?"

"Oh, yes, Mrs. Mivvle," said Jack modestly. "I don't mean we're personal friends; just business. My work is like a messenger, except that I meet big people personally. Oh, yes, I know senators and judges—"

"How marvelous! At your age. Are you listening, Aub? How did you get such a wonderful situation, Jack? Papa, listen."

"Why, it was more of an accident, Mrs. Mivvle. I really came to Washington last fall for a post as messenger. Congressman Stumbel from out home promised me the post and I came on, but he got in wrong in some way and only skinned in himself and he didn't have much influence, but he got me on with General Intelligence. It's not so much, Mrs. Mivvle!"

"Oh, I think—" began Mrs. Mivvle. "I think, Mamma," interposed Dot, "that we'd better be going."

THEY went down to the Mivvles' car, which was parked in the street day and night. As they neared it, Dot cried out in alarm.

"Oh, Papa, we got a ticket! Didn't you see the sign 'No Parking Between 5 and 7 P.M.'?"

"I thought," said Mr. Mivvle, more depressed, "that it said 'No Parking Except Between 5 and 7.'"

"No, Papa, that was last week on this street." Dot pulled the ticket from under the windshield wiper. "Papa, you should always read the signs. Oh, darn it, stuck for three dollars again."

"They'll cancel it, Dot," Jack comforted her, handing Mrs. Mivvle into the back seat. "Your father must know lots of people."

"That's it, Jack! Papa doesn't."

"Then the police won't cancel it," Jack (Continued on page 42)

Jack led Mr. Mivvle to the senator's table. "Senator, I guess you know me," he said. "Could I introduce a friend of mine?"

Occupation: Widow

By William C. White

ILLUSTRATED BY GEORGE HOWE

The Story Thus Far:

CAROLA DIRLING, a singer at a Berlin night club, marries Paul Lesser who, with Rolf Blaerchen, a Nazi, owns the club. A short time later, her young husband (whom she idolizes) is killed in a mysterious accident.

Heartbroken, and strongly suspecting that the "accident" had been planned by Blaerchen, Carola leaves Berlin. Three years later she is in Rome, when she receives orders from Blaerchen (now a power in the German Foreign Office) to report to him in Berlin. Not daring to resist, she goes back to the German capital, where Blaerchen—giving her an apartment, with a maid (Maria Kunkle, who, in Blaerchen's pay, keeps a sharp eye on her)—sets her to work as a spy.

She has just one friend whom she can trust: Karl Dietrich. Dietrich, once a comedian, has spent three years in a concentration camp. He loathes the Nazis. With a number of fellow conspirators—Hans Klaus, Franz Ranke, one Schebeler (who has a job at the Foreign Office) and others—he is organizing an anti-Hitler group. Because Blaerchen hates him, his meetings with Carola must be surreptitious.

A series of ugly experiences soon convinces Carola that Blaerchen (whose ardent advances she must frequently repel) is a conscienceless scoundrel. In her apartment, Senta Mainescu—once engaged to Blaerchen, and employed by him—makes some indiscreet remarks. A short time later, she is arrested, charged with treason—and executed! Warned by that experience, Carola is not surprised when Blaerchen uses her—a beautiful woman—as bait, in an attempt to blackmail Signor Froschetti, a young member of the Italian embassy. The attempt fails, because Carola, suspecting what is going on, refuses to obey orders.

Nor is Carola surprised when Maria Kunkle—who had been assured by Blaerchen that her soldier-husband would never be sent to the front—tearfully informs her that her husband has been killed at the front! She is astounded, however, when the maid, in a fury, informs her that there is a microphone in the apartment; and that, as she shouts her hatred of Blaerchen, a Nazi agent is listening.

Frightfully shocked, Carola tells Blaerchen that she will work for him no longer. To her amazement, he seems to be rather pleased when she tells him that she will accept the offer of an old friend—Franz Wagner, who is opening a new night club—and go to work for him, as a singer. . . . Meeting Dietrich, she is nervously happy. For she and Karl Dietrich are now well aware that they are in love—and in peril.

VI

IT WAS a bitter thing to be in love, to know it surely and as surely to know it was hopeless, yet through these days Carola was happy. To be free of the fear of some new assignment from Blaerchen was happiness enough; to be closer to Karl, even though she never quite dared ask herself what she could hope for, was happiness added. And there was the world of the cabaret and she was stepping back into it.

She found a new apartment at once, to the north of the Tiergarten. Here she had long practice hours, discussions with accompanists, appointments with a dressmaker and, at least twice a day, a long conversation with Wagner. She would not go to the office and Wagner came to her, his excitement never lessening. He insisted on supervising every detail, from the choice of the exact shade of gray for her dress to the placement of songs on her program. And he repeated again and again, "It will be a sensational opening. Help people forget the war for a little while! They'll appreciate that."

On one visit, as he was thumbing through a pile of Carola's music he asked, "Do you see Karl?"

Carola turned around quickly. "Why should you ask?"

Wagner smiled lazily. "I asked him to help you rehearse and he preferred not to. Strange!"

"I'm doing well by myself, don't you think?"

"Beautifully!"

Carola worried about Wagner's question and even about Wagner. One never knew in Berlin! Karl reassured her. "It was just natural curiosity," he said. On this night the cold had let up and they walked the streets where Carola hummed her songs. "Remember your gesture there—the smile! Then he laughed happily. "Even in this miserable cold it's lovely to have you sing!"

Her days were busy and Karl was waiting each evening. At times there were interruptions. Once Froschetti phoned from the Italian Embassy, "I'm glad you're going back to work." He emphasized the word "work."

"So am I!" Her voice was clear. Any telephone might be tapped.

One afternoon she received a message saying, "Please be at the Café Froschetti at five o'clock today if possible. It is signed by von Maurer. Carola kept the appointment."

He said formally, "I owe you a debt of gratitude for connecting you in any way with Senta's death."

"I never believed you did," he waited for what he would say next.

He said very little and then he was vague. "I have learned much about Senta that I did not know, about her friends and her past activities. I know who is responsible for her death."

Carola could not hold back a cry. "Who?"

"Herself!" Quickly he added, "I can scarcely believe what I have found out. I am still investigating—!"

Obviously, he did not want to say of things that, from his point of view, did not concern an outside woman.

EVERY day, as patiently she waited for him, as oncoming lava, Praut waited for him. He made a game now of her. He would see him, saying, "I'm sure you will have time to see me today!"

"I'm sorry!" That was her only reply but it had a genuine tone. "I'm busy with rehearsals."

"I can't tell you how much I look forward to your opening night," Praut said pleasantly.

Each day Blaerchen telephoned her. One day he invited her to lunch. He seemed concerned with something. After questioning her about her work, he said, "Sometimes it would be better to be out of politics and back in the simpler business of entertainment."

Later, after a pause, he said, "I heard that Karl is working for Wagner. Have you seen much of him?"

She was a good enough actress to conceal her reaction. "I don't go to his office and he does not come to mine. Souci for rehearsals." She asked more questions but he seemed evasive. Then she changed the subject. Praut calls every day as usual.

"And never insists on seeing me?"

"Never!"

Blaerchen frowned. "I should not of a colleague of mine that he is a scoundrel but—!"

He telephoned two days later. (Continued on page 15)

His arm went around her. "I have waited long enough," he said. "I want you, Carola. I can't resist you when I haven't wanted you."

"You may be right," Mason admitted. He took von Lehtoner's glasses, focused, tried to pick up the spot where he had seen movement

Sharp Traders

By Louis C. Goldsmith

Austrian had a bluff, tactless
er. He was positive in every-he said and he had a genius for enjoying, as have so many liver-gentlemen in China.

lost the war," he stated, "on when the German officers were from China."

Japanese bombers were dwin-ward the eastern horizon. They dropped most of their bombs, and American accountant—John Mason it should be safe to return the city. He was sorry he had von Lehtoner's offer of a ride the bomb-threatened city. He py for it now by listening to this had earned the right to be China because he had made a ere.

have pursuit planes concealed pce," von Lehtoner grumbled.
Japanese bombus, unmolested."
were swarming over the air-bow. Some of them worked the bomb craters; others were quirt in woven baskets, to fill the er the harvest was gleaned.
were a hundred of them at least,
them belonging to the same famaccording to that story the American eal.

the military deserted this exfid Wai Wong had leased it for allum. Wai Wong was head of any, which included cousins five oved.

made a good living, collecting from Japanese bombs. They had killful in removing detonators

from unexploded bombs. These duds, with their charges of explosive, brought a handsome price from the Chinese military . . . twenty-five Hong Kong dollars. This was clear profit inasmuch as the bamboo and cotton cloth with which Wai Wong's sons, with the manual ingenuity possessed by all Chinese, duplicated the old World War trick of rigging plane silhouettes to deceive a high-flying enemy, cost nothing.

Von Lehtoner pointed to the slender, drab-colored destroyers anchored in the river below. "The Chinese scuttled some old junks to block the channel. But with those cleaned out the Japanese will land marines right on the Bund." He seemed to be enjoying the thought.

"In some ways," he went on, "the Chinese are much like you Americans."

Mason heard the thin, distant crack of a rifle. His eyes searched the willow growth on the other side of the river.

"In the main they are honest," von Lehtoner conceded, "though close, sharp traders. . . ."

ONE of the Japanese destroyers had swung its turret. The explosion came in a heavy roll of sound, immediately punctuated by the shell's detonation.

"Five-inch gun," the Austrian pronounced authoritatively. He focused handsome binoculars on the opposite shore.

From their elevated position on the hill they could see down into the thick stand of willows. Again Mason's ears caught the brittle snap of a rifle.

"I wonder how much those five-inch shells cost?" he asked, to make conversation.

"Two hundred dollars," the Austrian hazarded. "I think not so much as that. The men and women who make those shells receive less for a year's work than your people get for a week's. They work for the glory of their country. They understand, almost as well as the Germans, that the state is everything, the individual nothing."

Again the heavy thunder of the five-inch gun rolled up to them.

But von Lehtoner was intent on his subject. "Statism against individualism," he mused. "The Chinese are clever, just as you Americans are clever. But it is to make things, always producing, always grubbing for wealth. You are individualists, each man a kingdom of himself. You fail to understand the beauty of state. So they and you and your foolish democracies are doomed."

Mason, listening to the Austrian's words, thought he saw a small movement in the willows. Another rifle shot and the whine of its bullet ricocheting off the turret of the destroyer.

"You may be right," Mason admitted. He took von Lehtoner's glasses, focused, tried to pick up the spot where he had seen movement. "But a nation made up of individuals free to think and express their thoughts, to work and play and worship as they see fit—they should be happier, it seems to me."

Another five-inch shell exploded before he found the place. He could see a coolie boy, lying on muddy ground, yards from the shell crater just made.

The Austrian was hungry for argument. "Happiness, contentment—bah! What did such things bring the Poles, the Finns, the Danes?"

The glasses were remarkably good. Mason could even see a grin on the coolie's face as he slipped another cartridge into his old rifle.

"That may be true," he admitted. "But what happens to people who eat hate and dream it, who think only what and when they are told?"

THE coolie boy had fired. He wriggled up the mud bank, into the shell crater just blasted out. "Good!" Mason spoke, involuntarily. "He understands that heavy guns bracket their targets. Always safe in the last shell hole."

"What do you say? What is it you see over there?" the Austrian demanded.

"Nothing much," Mason told him. "Let's get back to the city."

He saw the tiny figures of Wai Wong's family, working in the happy, haphazard fashion of their kind. They were gathering their harvest of scrap-iron fragments, the rich find of a dud bomb now and then.

The Austrian continued with his triumphant argument. But Mason wasn't listening. He was thinking of that coolie boy on the opposite bank of the river. There was nobody else there. It must be his own idea and he was as happy over it as a kid in a shooting gallery.

Mason smiled. Just a coolie boy with an old rifle, trading three-penny rifle bullets for five-inch shells of the Imperial Navy.

The Patriotic Murders

By Agatha Christie

ILLUSTRATED BY MARIO COOPER

The Story Thus Far:

GLADYS NEVILL informs Henry Morley—a London dentist whose secretary she is—that her aunt, who lives in Somerset, has had a stroke, and that she must go to her at once. She departs, and Morley (suspecting that she is meeting her boy friend, Frank Carter, for a day's outing) goes to his office.

Hercule Poirot, noted Belgian detective, keeps a dental appointment with Morley. Morley checks on his teeth, and, in the course of a rambling conversation, remarks that one of his patients is Mr. Alistair Blunt, head of a great banking firm.

Poirot leaves the office. As he reaches the street, a woman—a "Miss Kirby" it is learned later—drops a shoe buckle, while stepping out of a taxicab. Poirot, always gallant, retrieves the buckle, hands it to the woman with a bow. Whereupon, the owner freezes him, and strides into Morley's office.

A short time later, Inspector Japp, of Scotland Yard, telephones Poirot and gives him some surprising news: Morley has committed suicide, in his office! Losing no time, Poirot joins the inspector, who shows him the body, which, pistol beside it, has not been disturbed.

But why—and the question puzzles both Japp and Poirot—should Henry Morley, with good health, a lucrative practice and no enemies, have killed himself? And when it is learned that Morley had never owned a pistol, Poirot feels sure that he has encountered another murder case.

Suspects? Well, possibly a Mr. Amberiotis, a wealthy Greek, who it would seem was the dentist's last patient. Or a young fellow who had been restlessly awaiting his ordeal, when Poirot had gone to the chair. Determined to check up on everyone who may know anything about Morley, Poirot and Japp start with Georgina, the dentist's sister, with whom he had lived for years. While they are questioning Georgina, Gladys Nevill arrives.

Japp takes the young woman into a near-by room, closes the door. And presently he is listening to an interesting story: In answer to an urgent telegram, Gladys had rushed to her aunt. She had found the lady in excellent health! Japp wants to see the telegram. Gladys says that she had thrown it away. "It just said," she adds, "Your aunt had stroke last night. Stop. Please come at once."

II

YOU are quite sure—well"—Japp coughed delicately—"that it wasn't your friend, Mr. Carter, who sent that telegram?"

"Frank?" Miss Nevill said. "Whatever for? Oh! I see, you mean—a put-up job between us? No, indeed, Inspector—neither of us would do such a thing."

Her indignation seemed genuine enough and Japp had a little trouble in soothing her down. But a question as to the patients on this particular morning restored her to her competent self.

"They are all here in the book. I dare say you have seen it already. I know about most of them. Ten o'clock, Mrs. Soames—that was about her new plate—10:30, Lady Grant—she's an elderly lady—lives in Lowndes Square. Eleven o'clock, M. Hercule Poirot, he comes regularly—oh, of course, this is him—sorry, M. Poirot, but I really am so upset! Eleven-thirty, Mr. Alistair Blunt—that's the banker, you know—a short appointment, because Mr. Morley had prepared the filling last time. Then Miss Sainsbury Seale—she rang up specially—had a toothache and so Mr. Morley fitted her in. A terrible talker she is, never stops—the fussy kind, too. Then 12 o'clock, Mr. Amberiotis—he was a new patient—made an appointment from the Savoy Hotel. Mr. Morley gets quite a lot of foreigners and Americans. Then 12:30, Miss Kirby. She comes up from Worthing."

Poirot said, "There was here, when I arrived, a tall, military gentleman. Who would he be?"

"One of Mr. Reilly's patients, I expect. I'll just get his list for you, shall I?"

"Thank you, Miss Nevill."

She was absent only a few minutes. She returned with a book similar to that of Mr. Morley.

She read out: "Ten o'clock, Betty Heath (that's a little girl of nine). Eleven o'clock, Colonel Abercrombie."

"Abercrombie!" murmured Poirot.

"Eleven-thirty, Mr. Howard Raikes. Twelve o'clock, Mr. Barnes. That was all the patients this morning. Mr. Reilly isn't so booked up as Mr. Morley, of course."

"Can you tell us anything about any of these patients of Mr. Reilly's?"

"Colonel Abercrombie has been a patient for a long time, and all Mrs. Heath's children come to Mr. Reilly. I can't tell you anything about Mr. Raikes or Mr. Barnes, though I fancy I have heard their names. I take all the telephone calls, you see—"

Japp said, "We can ask Mr. Reilly ourselves. I should like to see him as soon as possible."

Miss Nevill went out. Japp said to Poirot, "All old patients of Mr. Morley except Amberiotis. I'm going to have an interesting talk with Mr. Amberiotis presently. He's the last person, as it stands, to see Morley alive, and we've got to make quite sure that when he last saw him Morley was alive."

Poirot said slowly, shaking his head, "You have still to prove motive."

"I know. That's what is going to be the teaser. But we may have something about Amberiotis at the Yard." He added sharply: "You're very thoughtful, Poirot!"

"I was wondering about something."

"What was it?"

Poirot said with a faint smile, "Why Chief Inspector Japp?"

"Eh?"

"I said, 'Why Chief Inspector Japp?' An officer of your eminence—is he usually called in to a case of suicide?"

"As a matter of fact, I happened to be near by at the time. At Lavenham's—in Wigmore Street. Rather an ingenious system of frauds they've had there. They telephoned me there to come on here."

"But why did they telephone you?"

"Oh, that—that's simple enough. Alistair Blunt. As soon as the divisional inspector heard he'd been here this morning, he got on to the Yard. Mr. Blunt is the kind of person we take care of in this country."

"You mean that there are people who would like him—out of the way?"

"You bet there are. The Germans, for one. It's Blunt and his group who are standing solid behind the present government. Good sound, conservative finance. That's why, if there were the least chance that there was any funny stuff intended against him this morning, they wanted a thorough investigation."

POIROT nodded.

"That is what I more or less guessed. And that is the feeling I have"—he waved his hands expressively—"that there was, perhaps, a hitch of some kind. The proper victim was—should have been—Alistair Blunt. Or is this only a beginning—the beginning of a campaign of some kind? I smell—I smell"—he sniffed the air—"big money in this business!"

Japp said, "You're assuming a lot, you know."

"I am suggesting that Morley was only a pawn in the game. Perhaps he knew something—perhaps he told Blunt something—or they feared he would tell Blunt something—"

He stopped as Gladys Nevill re-entered the room. "Mr. Reilly is busy on an extraction case," she said. "He will be free in about ten minutes if that will be all right."

Japp said that it would. In the meantime, he said, he would have another talk with the boy Alfred.

Alfred was divided between nervousness, enjoyment and a morbid fear of being blamed for everything that had occurred. He had only been a fortnight in Mr. Morley's employment, and during that fortnight he had consistently and unvaryingly done everything wrong. Persistent blame had sapped his self-confidence.

"He was a bit rattier than usual, perhaps," said Alfred in answer to a question, "nothing else as I can remember. I'd never have thought he was going to do himself in."

Poirot interposed.

"You must tell us," he said, "everything that you can remember about this morning. You are a very important witness, and your recollections may be of immense service to us."

Alfred's face was suffused by vivid crimson and his chest swelled. He had already given Japp a brief account of the morning's happenings. He proposed now to spread himself. A comforting sense of importance oozed into him.

"I can tell you orl right," he said. "Just you ask me."

"To begin with, did anything out of the way happen this morning?"

ALFRED reflected a minute and then said rather sadly, "Can't say as it did. It was orl just as usual."

"Did any strangers come to the house?"

"No, sir."

"Not even among the patients?"

"I didn't know as you meant the patients. Nobody come what hadn't got an appointment, if that's what you mean. They were all down in the book."

Japp nodded. Poirot asked, "Could anybody have walked in from outside?"

"No, they couldn't. They'd have to have a key, see?"

"But it was quite easy for anyone to leave the house?"

"Oh, yes, just turn the handle and go out and pull the door to after you. As I was saying, most of 'em do. They often come down the stairs while I'm taking up the next party in the lift, see?"

"I see. Now just tell us who came first this morning and so on. Describe them if you can't remember the names."

Alfred reflected a minute. Then he said, "Lady with a little girl, that was for Mr. Reilly and a Mrs. Soap or some such name for Mr. Morley."

Poirot said, "Quite right. Go on."

"Then another elderly lady—bit of a toff she was. As she went out a tall military gent come in, and just after him, you came." He nodded to Poirot.

"Right."

"Then the American gent came—"

Japp said sharply, "American!"

"Yes, sir. Young fellow. He was American, all right—you could tell by his voice. Come early, he did. His appointment wasn't till 11:30—and what's more he didn't keep it—neither."

Japp said sharply, "What's that?"

"Not him. Come in for him when Mr. Reilly's buzzer went at eleven-thirty—a bit later it was, as a matter of fact, might have been twenty to twelve—and he wasn't there. Must have funk'd it and gone away." He added with a knowledgeable air: "They do sometimes."

Poirot said, "Then he must have gone out soon after me."

"That's right, sir. You went out after I'd taken up a toff what come in a big car. Ooo—it was a lovely car. Mr. Blunt—11:30. Then I come down and let you out, and a lady in. Miss Some Berry Seale, or something like that—and then, I—well, as a matter of fact, I just nipped down to the kitchen to get my elevenses, and when I was down there the buzzer went—Mr. Reilly's buzzer—so I come up and, as I say, the American gentleman had hooked it. I went and told Mr. Reilly

"They are all here in the book," she said. "I dare say you have seen it. I know about most of them" about it and he swore a bit, as is his way."

Poirot said, "Continue."

"Lemme see, what happened next? Oh, yes, Mr. Morley's buzzer went for that Miss Seale, and the toff came down and went out as I took Miss Whatsername up in the lift. Then I come down again and two gentlemen came—one a little man with a funny, squeaky voice—I can't remember his name. For Mr. Reilly, he was. And a fat, foreign gentleman for Mr. Morley."

"Miss Seale wasn't very long—not above a quarter of an hour. I let her out and then I took up the foreign gentleman. I'd already taken the other gent in to Mr. Reilly right away as soon as he came."

Japp said, "And you didn't see Mr. Amberiotis, the foreign gentleman, leave?"

"No, sir, I can't say as I did. He must have let himself out. I didn't see either of those two gentlemen go."

"Where were you from twelve o'clock onwards?"

"I always sits in the lift, sir, waiting until the front doorbell or one of the buzzers goes."

Poirot said, "And you were perhaps reading?"

Alfred blushed again.

"There ain't no harm in that, sir. It's not as though I could be doing anything else."

"Quite so. What were you reading?"

"Death at 11:45, sir. It's an American detective story. It's a corker, sir, it really is! All about gunmen."

Poirot smiled faintly. He said, "Would you hear the front door close from where you were?"

"You mean anyone going out? I don't think I should, sir. What I mean is I shouldn't notice it! You see, the lift is right at the back of the hall and a little round the corner. The bell rings just behind it, and the buzzers too. You can't miss them."

Poirot nodded and Japp asked, "What happened next?"

Alfred frowned in a supreme effort of memory.

"Only the last lady, Miss Shirty. I waited for Mr. Morley's Buzzer to go, but nothing happened and at one o'clock, the lady who was waiting, she got rather ratty."

"It did not occur to you to go up before and see if Mr. Morley was ready?"

Alfred shook his head very positively.

"Not me, sir. I wouldn't have dreamed of it. For all I knew the last gentleman was still up there. I'd got to wait for the buzzer. Of course, if I'd knowed as Mr. Morley had done himself in—"

Alfred shook his head with morbid relish.

Poirot asked, "Did the buzzer usually go before the patient came down, or the other way about?"

"DEPENDS. Usually the patient would come down the stairs and then the buzzer would go. If they rang for the lift, that buzzer would go perhaps as I was bringing them down. But it wasn't fixed in any way. Sometimes Mr. Morley would be a few minutes before he rang for the next patient. If he was in a hurry, he'd ring as soon as they were out of the room."

"I see"—Poirot paused and then went on—"Were you surprised at Mr. Morley's suicide, Alfred?"

"Knocked all of a heap, I was. He hadn't no call to go doing himself in as far as I can see—oh!" Alfred's eyes grew large and round. "Oo—er—he wasn't murdered, was he?"

Poirot cut in before Japp could speak.

"Supposing he were, would it surprise you less?"

"Well, I don't know, sir, I'm sure. I can't see who'd want to murder Mr. Morley. He was—well, he was a very ordinary gentleman, sir. Was he really murdered, sir?"

Poirot said gravely, "We have to take every possibility into account. That is why I told you you would be a very important witness and that you must try and recollect everything that happened this morning."

He stressed the words and Alfred frowned with a prodigious effort of memory.

"I can't think of anything else, sir. I can't indeed."

(Continued on page 34)

One Thunderous Night

By Sidney Herschel Small

ILLUSTRATED BY ELMORE BROWN

Death rolling out of a water-front fog hides its clues, except from a man who'd not judge hastily

WHAT Sergeant Lane dismissed as thick weather seemed to Ralph McMasters, the police boat's new engineer, close to storm. The J. A. Barnes, berthed at Sixty-A, lunged uneasily to the increasing thrust of the swells.

"She'll rain," the sergeant said. "The gulls're flyin' down. So it'll blow." He stretched out his legs comfortably, and Ralph knew what was coming; and dark nights such as this, and water-front trouble, and tough beats on the Coast forty years ago, were all involved as the old man's tale meandered along. McMasters appeared to be giving close and dutiful attention. The cabin was warm, the pilothouse brasses shone, and so did Mac's engines, aft.

The sergeant stopped, and it came to Mac that the policeman's water-front years, ending as a sort of instructor in this comfortable cabin, gave him a sense which the statics and kinetics of the atmosphere couldn't teach a man. The silence held; then, without warning, lightning zigzagged through the fog with thunder crackling and braying almost at the same time. The wind slashed rain against the pilothouse windows.

Lightning sizzled again and again, each time leaving bay, fog, wharf, and shore the blacker; wind snarled. In McMasters' head were the things he'd been learning: tides, currents, sirens, diphones, limits of the naval, explosives, and forbidden anchorages, bridge eddies, ferry courses, routes of inbound freighters and outbound liners. As engineer, he was in charge of the Barnes, although actual police work was handled by men detailed from the Harbor station.

The noise softened and blurred finally as the storm moved out to sea, with fog settling tightly down; Lane said, instead of going on with his yarning, "It takes time for reports to come in. I'd like to see ye go out for the first time when it's clear. Experience should come slowly. A black mark, early on a man's record, is not good. I remember—"

The radio said, roughly, "PBP. PBP. Barnes. Ferry Golden West reports sighting body on ferry lane, westbound trip, six minutes half speed from slip. On course. Await detail from Harbor station. PBP. Barnes. Repeating. Ferry Golden West reports sighting body . . ."

McMasters' heart began to pound. When he glanced at the sergeant, already in slicker, his excitement was added to by the older man's somber face; murder, at least, must've happened on the bay, unsolvable for the present.

THINGS went swiftly. Running feet followed the sound of the police car's siren, and, as the ropes were cast off when two detectives jumped aboard, McMasters fought to turn black bay, fog, into something recognizable. The sergeant stood close as the screw churned; spray dashed high over the pilothouse. Whitecapped quartering seas flung the boat nastily shoreward as McMasters cleared the wharves.

The Barnes rolled horribly. McMasters, with Lane and the detectives staring out into what seemed plastic rubber, sent the boat along what should be the north boundary of the ferry lane; the tide was running out, and a body would drift.

"The ferry captain's report," he heard one of the detectives say, "was that the face was bloody, Sergeant."

"Face?" Lane said. "If he saw the face, the body floated face upward, and it'll be a woman's. As to blood, the sea would wash that off." The sergeant began swinging the searchlight back and forth. "When a person is drowned," the old man said, "the cheeks can be red as my geraniums. At first."

Northward, McMasters heard the dismal brooommm-ahr of Alcatraz's siren.

"You're positive it'll be a woman's body, Sarge?" the other detective asked. "I never heard that one. Are you working out on us?"

"I was drinkin' steam beer when you was suckin' your thumb, Harper." McMasters had never heard the old sergeant speak so sharply; but, then, he'd never heard him doubted before. Lane was leaning far out of the window, brushing rain from his eyes; the men in the pilothouse heard him say, "There it is," and McMasters immediately swung the Barnes. He, like the others, saw the body floating in the water, although whether it was face up, or down, he couldn't tell.

The Barnes danced about as McMasters stopped her. As they stepped on deck, Mac reached for the boat hook. Mac's one glance was enough to tell him that it was a man—big, middle-aged, rosy-cheeked—and that, from appearance of the clothing, there had been a terrific struggle before death; clothes were ripped to pieces.

Murder was what he thought; was what he heard behind him waited the order to send the boat to Sixty-A. Out of the excitement, Lane's quick order: "Engineer, get the yacht harbor as fast as ye da"

THE boat took a big sea before the windows could be closed, and cascaded in; the order, McMasters told him he wasn't to head shore and follow the line of wharves but cut diagonally north and west across the bay. The Barnes, right now, was north of the ferry lane, about five minutes ferry half-speed from the North Point Light, flashing white behind; a siren on the transponder Alcatraz always north. His course

Lane was beside him again. "Keep us off Alcatraz, boy. I've got to be laughed at again. In the pocket," the sergeant said, "was from young Marsh Henderson, name ye'll have read in the paper with his big cruiser and his getting tried soon, and the rest of his Henderson wrote he'd pay not more, so there was blackmail, the man was murdered. Maybe the cruiser. 'Tis open and shut. If ye busy," Lane went on, as both detectives returned to the pilothouse, "ye'd have seen he was dead before he hit the water, since there was a weed clutched in his hands, and there was plenty of it, and kelp in the water."

Mac's one glance was enough to tell him that it was a man—big, middle-aged, rosy-cheeked

"Okay, take it easy," Harper said, and McMasters disliked his smartness. "You're under arrest"

What another one like men floating upward, Sergeant?" demanded Harper, "or are you looking for a hidden treasure?"

"I was women who float in that manner," Lane retorted. "Now we'll stop. The engineer's got work."

McMasters had, and it wasn't easy. In Henderson's eye, hard to put aside, was the battle fought on the bay, in storm and with the thunder crashing. It must have taken place at a moment of high tension. Henderson hadn't even stopped to search the dead man's pockets. Then he turned to the sergeant and said, in his ear, "Mallock is a good lad, but the other one's too smart. He'll wisecrack when the newsboys arrive. Keep your mouth shut. You're an engineer. If . . . Port!"

Harper was ahead; the Barnes hesitated in obeying, but McMasters managed to keep the boat from crashing into the last of the barges, although not enough to prevent grazing.

"We're not trying to catch a train," Harper suggested.

The sergeant snapped, "I ordered full speed. And ye might keep this little boat to yourself. . . . Of course, I'll have to report it."

There was a silence. Then the detectives held a conference, in half-whispers;

McMasters couldn't concentrate entirely on the gray wall ahead of him. The detectives believed that the dead man, Dole, had met Henderson, and gone out on the cruiser with him. There the argument, the fight, had taken place; whether Dole was alive or dead on hitting the water was unimportant; autopsy would determine that. The murder had taken place very recently, which was why the Barnes was heading for the yacht harbor where cruisers berthed; it was quite possible that the police boat might arrive before the cruiser.

WESTWARD, as the Barnes' speed increased with the outbound tide and river currents lifting her along, was the booming of the Gate bridge's two-toned horn; McMasters, the Barnes' siren louder nearer the shore, edged the boat closer and closer to the invisible land. When he heard Harper protesting at the boat's speed, something made him raise it a notch, and he heard the sergeant's grunt of approval; then the breakwater lights were like two bits of white fuzz due ahead, and Mac sent the Barnes slicing through the opening between them. "Smart aleck" were the words he heard behind him, and Harper had said that. "I'm an idiot," thought Mac, "but I don't like him. The other's a swell guy." Then, engine beat stilled, he slid the Barnes up to the landing stage without a jar.

Only one cruiser, on this sort of night, showed lights. "Come along," Lane said, as McMasters made the boat fast. "The Barnes won't run away; and ye might as well see how things are done, boy. Ye'll remember to keep your words and ideas to yourself." Mac thought, as he walked beside the sergeant along the float, that the old man muttered something about practicing what he preached. "It is their job," Lane said, "but ye'll observe that contrary to general orders a call has not been sent the department. That will be Harper. He wants to make his pinch first, and be the big cheese."

The cruiser had already docked. The portholes of the Amarylla were round globes of yellow light; then all four men were in the cabin, and young Marsh Henderson was leaping from his folding chair so that it clattered down. A table was set there, and a Chinese servant stood with napkin-covered cocktail shaker. At the table, leaning away from it, and with wide and frightened eyes, McMasters saw a girl; and she, of course, would be the one Henderson was to marry. She was the sort of girl any fellow would want to marry. A big white coat was behind her, something that must have been kept on the cruiser, because she herself was in orange-brown tweed. McMasters caught the glint of an engagement ring. Green. At first it, and her hand, were motionless; then both trembled against her mouth.

IN THAT first moment there was complete silence, as if breaths had stopped; then, before either of the detectives could speak, Henderson said, "He didn't have nerve enough to come with you, did he? Well, it's the same now as it was before. You can all go to hell. So can Dole."

"Okay—take it easy," Harper said, and McMasters disliked his smartness. "You are under arrest for the murder of Ernest Dole—"

It was Mallock who added, "And whatever you say may be used against you."

McMasters thought that the girl was biting at the back of her hand; the only way he could explain this callous preparation for cocktails, dinner, was that the pair hadn't supposed Dole's body would be recovered for days, or weeks, or might be swept out through the Gate and never found, which happened often.

Henderson's hand was shaking as he reached down to the table for a cigarette. "I'm perfectly willing to admit," he said, "that Dole was on the boat. I

(Continued on page 37)

Tropic Killer

By J. D. Ratcliff

War brings not only the menace of death bombs. It also threatens to cut off the supply of quinine—used for the cure and relief of malaria—from our only source, Java in the Netherlands Indies. Here's what's being done about it

A GRIM little drama is being enacted in the marshes around Russia's Black Sea, in river eddies in South China and in the bayous of Louisiana. It has nothing to do with war or international complications, but it spells death for 3½ million human beings in the next twelve months.

In all these places summer has warmed stagnant waters. Minute wrigglers dart to the surface. Soon these wrigglers will become mosquitoes. They will bite men with malaria, absorb the malarial parasite and pass the disease along to others whose blood was previously clean.

Malaria is Killer No. 1 that silently stalks the warm, damp places of the earth. Microbes of this kind sease are responsible for a third of all sickness in the tropics. This year they will kill over a million human beings in India. They will account for thousands of lives in Ceylon, and in our own South the death toll will be about 3,000, and malaria will debilitate people so that they are easy prey for other diseases. It will make the muscles of four million people sag; and generally usurp the subtle parasite time of the Deep South. As a nation we will pay about $500,000,000 tribute to the subtle parasite which produces this great weariness.

Medicine has one principal buttress against this slaughter. It is the miracle drug with a romantic history: quinine. Millions know that their lives depend on it. The unimaginative simply swallow a daily pill to prevent malaria; or gulp great dizzying doses to cure it. Others take it in the form of "gin and tonic water"—seltzer fortified with quinine.

When the poor Southern white notes that his fingernails are turning blue and that he has a teeth-chattering chill, he sends a young one chasing to the store for a bottle of fever medicine—medicine whose efficacy depends on the quinine it contains. All these deaths, all this needless suffering and lost labor, understand, take place when quinine is readily available. Anyone can make a guess as to what would happen if the supply were suddenly cut off. The distinct possibility of this happening is causing a fine case of jitters in the health ministries of most of the world's major countries.

Nearly every ounce of quinine in world-export trade originates at Java in the Netherlands Indies. Hostile submarines could snip this supply line with a few well-placed torpedoes. In terms of human lives the result of such action would be far more devastating than anything Hitler has been able to accomplish with his complete war.

Quinine is derived from the bark of the cinchona—pronounced sin-kó-nah—tree, a native of South America. Long before the white man arrived, Peruvian Indians knew that a bitter tea brewed from this bark would cure malaria. They demonstrated by saving the life of the Countess of Chinchon, wife of the Spanish governor. This word got back to Europe in the 17th century. Not until 1820 did French chemists discover quinine, the life-saving secret held by the bark; and not until 1898 did Sir Ronald Ross peddle the disease as the sinister night rider that Anopheles mosquito as the sinister night rider that chancas of the spread. They found how a lady feasts on a person sick with malaria. Then went on to discover how the parasites worm their way through the walls of the mosquito stomach, get into the salivary glands, and are spat into the next generation of the parasites through the periodic chills blood cells when they can no longer contain their cargo. A single chill represents the liberation of at least 150,000,000 parasites!

While these epochal things were taking place, South American Indians hacked away at forests to provide quinine for the (Continued on page 32)

Below, quinine sulfate obtained by chemical treatment of cinchona bark is purified in hot-water vats. On cooling, it crystallizes and is separated out in centrifuges (center)

COURTESY MERCK AND CO.

Last step in manufacturing pure quinine comes from the

SIMILE: SMOOTH AS A PALL MALL

SOURCE: Good old-fashioned Bulking

● THAT APT PHRASE, "Smooth as a Pall Mall," points up an impressive fact about this distinguished cigarette.

The source of that unusual smoothness is a painstaking, old-fashioned method of working fine tobaccos, revived by Pall Mall, and known as . . . BULKING.

In BULKING, the superb Pall Mall tobaccos are mingled together and allowed to rest in great, fragrant heaps. Unhurried, (the careful, old-fashioned, conscientious ways of working take time), they create their own gentle heat, in which they bask. Subtle changes slowly take place — harsh qualities grow mild; delicate aromas and flavors intermarry and permeate every shred of tobacco. The result is a bland, mellow smoke, a definitely smoother cigarette.

And — a significant fact — with Pall Mall, there is noticeably less finger stain, or no finger stain at all.

Another advantage—the additional length of Pall Mall travels the smoke further, gives you a cooler cigarette.

Yourself, try Pall Mall critically!

"WHEREVER PARTICULAR PEOPLE CONGREGATE"

Pride Pitching

Continued from page 9

even be in baseball today, for my first impulse that Christmas Eve was to chuck the whole business. I had a good offer from KGKO, an up-and-coming radio station in Fort Worth, to broadcast baseball, football and special events. I had done the work, liked it and could make as much, at least, as the salary I would get from Milwaukee.

But I couldn't get the idea out of my head that I was a better pitcher than a third of the fellows still drawing major-league salaries. That conviction grew so strong that I finally reported for spring training a few days before Milwaukee broke camp. At that, I went only after Henry Bendinger, Milwaukee owner and a swell guy, promised to make every effort to sell me to a big-league team. When I was passed up in the draft last winter, I could see myself keeping steady company with a microphone. Bendinger kept his promise, though, and persuaded Larry MacPhail to buy me for $10,000 on a conditional basis. If the Dodgers kept me after the opening of the season, Milwaukee was to get the ten grand. If I failed to show Leo Durocher anything, Milwaukee and Carleton wouldn't get a dime.

I should be the last guy in the world to kick. I'm the luckiest stiff in history, not only because I pitched a no-hit, no-run game, but because I had been given another chance to play in the majors. But I'm popping off because I'm thinking of a thousand other discarded ballplayers who weren't as fortunate as I, who didn't have the glamor of a Dizzy Dean to draw $42,500 for winning thirteen games in two years, who were not carried on full salary for a year, as Carl Hubbell was, while they recuperated from sore arms.

I have in mind the great majority of journeyman ballplayers—call them mugs, if you must—who are always in danger of being released and never missed. Don't think of the great stars when you think of baseball; they're the prize exhibits in the window-dressing of the business. Think of the small army of just-good-enough players; they're the backbone of organized baseball.

Now I don't say that a team should carry indefinitely a ballplayer who is unable to help the club. I do feel, though, that a team for its own protection should stick with a temporarily disabled player, particularly a pitcher with a sore arm, until it is definitely established that his meal ticket is gone. I admit it is difficult under the present rules, but the solution is simple.

Legalize again the sixty-day clause in the voluntary retired list; that will do it. Until two years ago, it was possible for a club to declare an injured player inactive but still on the pay roll for sixty days. In the meantime, he is replaced on the roster with an able-bodied man. When the rosters were raised from twenty-three to twenty-five players in 1938, however, the sixty-day clause was eliminated. The purpose of that was to protect the weak clubs that could not draw upon extensive farm systems for replacements in emergencies, but it has worked the other way around, to the detriment of the ballplayers. Rather than take the risk of carrying an incapacitated man for a couple of months, on full salary, a team in tough financial shape will release the injured fellow and sign a cheaper player.

Bring back the sixty-day clause and you'll see comebacks made by any number of good players. And it can be done at no added expense to the club. This may be in direct contradiction to everything you've ever heard about ballplayers, but I know every man forced to go on the voluntary retired list would be willing to have his salary slashed in half just for the chance to remain in the big leagues.

Any ballplayer worth his salt dreads the thought of stepping down to the minors as intensely as you dread the prospect of going on the WPA. The minors are a vital necessity as the source of players which keep the major-league teams young and vibrant; without the minors, the National and American leagues would wither and die in a few years. The minors are fine when you're on the way up, but they're no place for a man going down.

A man won't starve on the $2,500 or $3,500 he gets in the minors, and he'll provide a decent home for his family. But a former major-leaguer will be penniless if he plays until he's a baseball bum in the lower leagues. A fellow who's been getting pretty good money in the big show for six or seven years probably has saved $15,000. That little nest egg will be dissipated entirely if he tries to hang on the outer fringe of baseball. It would be far better if he made a clean break with the game, once he's had his chance and went to work for a living—as all of us must, sooner or later.

The point is that under the present setup a ballplayer—remember, he still has his pride—refuses to admit he has had that chance. Right or wrong, hot or cold, that's how he feels. Bring back the sixty-day clause and he'll be satisfied that the major-league team tried to give him a fair shake.

You'll also bring back enough sore arms to stock a pennant-winning team. Under the show-or-scam policy now in vogue, the ordinary pitcher is afraid to tell his manager he has a bad flipper. He fears that pink slip like the plague, so he keeps on pitching, ruining his record and aggravating his misery. If he could lay off for two months with the assurance his job would be held open, you'd see miraculous cures effected. After all, a tenor doesn't perform with a bad case of laryngitis, a tap dancer doesn't fill his engagements when he has a bad ankle sprain and a business executive isn't chained to his desk when he has a terrible headache or hang-over.

Arms do come back with rest. That fact was first impressed upon me way back in 1922, when I was a freshman in short pants at North Side High in Fort Worth. Perhaps you remember the strange experience of Jack Scott, a fine National League pitcher for many years. Scott's arm went dead and he was given his unconditional release by the Reds after pitching one game. Scott was not particularly worried, however, and went back to his prosperous tobacco and cantaloupe farm in North Carolina.

A short while after he returned, his tobacco barn burned to the ground with the year's crop. A tough break—he carried no insurance—but he had a large shipment of cantaloupes, to pull him out of the hole. Scott sent his melons to New York, where they were dumped into the harbor during a price war among the commission dealers. A check for $30 was sent to Scott, the only ready money he could expect to see for a year.

Scott went to New York with his shopworn arm, walked into the Polo Grounds and asked John McGraw for a chance. McGraw was in the thick of a fight for the pennant and took a flier on Scott. He joined the Giants in August, won eight games in ten and climaxed his recovery by shutting out the Yankees with four hits in the world series.

Cynics will say Scott had to pitch or starve. I say Scott was able to come back because he didn't worry about his arm for a couple of months. In effect, he was on the voluntary retired list.

There have been any number of instances in which rest completely cured a sore arm. Gabby Hartnett himself, who owned the best throwing arm ever hung on a catcher, was on the shelf for one full year, in 1929, with a bad whip. He did nothing but pinch-hit all that season—and came back with a rifle better than ever. Wes Ferrell, after winning more than twenty games in each of his first four seasons in the American League, was grounded by a sore arm. It was so bad that he tried to play the outfield to stick in the big leagues. That interlude did the trick. Ferrell bounced back with forty-five victories in the next two seasons. Look at Lefty Grove, Carl Hubbell, Bill Lee, Curt Davis, Johnny Allen and Ted Lyons, to mention only a few of the men who have regained the use of ailing arms.

I had two sore arms while I was with the Cubs. In an exhibition at Phoenix, Arizona, in the spring of 1937, something popped in my elbow when I threw a 3-and-2 ball to Luke Sewell with three on base. That put me out for eight weeks, just enough time to recuperate to the extent of winning sixteen games and losing eight for the Cubs.

The funny part of the whole thing is that the very players who need protection are needed by the major leagues. During the last six weeks of the season, when pennant pressure begins to bear down on the contenders, there is frantic scurrying for pitchers who can help the teams shooting for the world-series money. The minor leagues abound with kids who can throw through a brick wall, but who do the embattled teams take? The old wise guys who know the business. They'll do it every time.

"I trust old pitchers," Bill McKechnie says, and that terse sentence sums up everything that can be said. A manager pulling wires for a pitcher who may save a crucial game doesn't ask how many victories the man has scored. He asks one question: Does this guy know how to pitch?

Youth has a definite and important place in baseball—but that place is not in a spot where one bad pitch or a silly mistake can mean the pennant. In a showdown, the manager wants an old, experienced hand in there who has learned the racket the hard way.

The Reds last year were loaded with strong-arm kids like Johnny Vander Meer, Junior Thompson and Whitey Moore. But in the clutch, when McKechnie was trying to stave off the Cardinals' challenge, he bought old Johnny Niggeling, who had been knocking around the American Association for years and years. He picked up Henry Johnson, who was with the Yankees as far back as 1927. He signed Milburn Shoffner and Al Simmons, who were regarded as museum pieces. And he won the pennant.

This may impose a severe strain on the credulity of the customers, but it is quite possible for a man to be a better pitcher in the major leagues than in the minors. The science of pitching goes for Sweeney in some minor-league parks, where you can fool a batter and still see him pump the ball off his fist over ridiculously short fences. My no-hitter against the Reds, pitched in identical fashion in Milwaukee, would have given me nothing more than a 3-3 tie.

In the fourth inning, with Frank McCormick on base through an error, Harry Craft unloaded a long fly which Joe Vosmik caught against the fence. In Milwaukee, where the field wall is only 262 feet from the pitcher's box, Craft's ball would have been a homer.

And in the sixth, Roy Cullen made a swell catch of Lonny Frisbie's foot drive near the screen in right field. One also would've been a count over the 260-foot wall at Milwaukee.

I don't know how many times I made a perfect pitch in the minors. I got the batter to hit the exact spot needed for a double play. "That's dead ducks," I've said to myself. The ball left the bat, then turned around and see a shortstop playing the ball out of position that he didn't even see for the ball.

Hitters in the big leagues are more careful than they are in the minors, where there is a constant turnover in personnel. Up here, you know what a batter will miss; in the minors, what he will miss; in the minors, "book" on a batter is so sketchy. Pitching is largely a matter of guesswork.

A pitcher who has seen the major-league hitters a few times must learn in self-defense to batting strengths and weaknesses. He knows that he can throw a ball over a particular hitter's alley in Boston, Philadelphia or Philadelphia and get a long, loud out, but the identical pitch may be suicide in New York, Chicago or Brooklyn. He begins to observe some hitters never change their stance, whereas cuties like Billy Herman, Dan Danning and Frank McCormick are constantly shifting their feet with every pitch.

The value of experience is emphasized in my no-hitter. The first time Ernie Lombardi went to bat, he hit a terrific "foul" homer over the outfield wall. That pitch was so far inside the ball would have hit Lombardi hadn't hit it. The blast was no more a strike, of course, but Herman's my catcher and a fine young fellow rushed out to the mound hoping for excitement.

"Gee, better not to give this guy another one inside," Franks gasped. "How he teed off on that one."

"Sure, it's the only thing he could do," I answered. "That ball was so high he had to pull it foul behind him. If he had hit it, he would have got all the way around on the left side of the infield. Wait and see."

Lombardi, not expecting me to throw with the same pitch, hit the next ball down to Pee-wee Reese for three easy hops. Another pitcher didn't know big Lombardi as well as I would have been alarmed by screaming foul and probably would have decided a close pitch was a good groove. In that case, he might have ten too much of the plate with the ball—and then Lombardi reached first base. He showed him how to belt a ball over the fence.

I'm not kidding myself. I'll be back to get through another season with the Dodgers. That microphone at KGKO will be paging me this time around. But in the meantime...

Twenty years ago Waite Hoyter's clubhouse serenade, the pun which went, "It's great to be a Yankee." Sure, it's great to I'd give a season's pay, with series share thrown in, to recall stuff I had ten years ago. In the meantime, it's great to be a leaguer. Even on a reprieve.

HURRY UP, DAD—MAKE YOURSELF SCARCE!"

"The boys will be here in a minute, and I'd die if they see you in that funny shirt!"

"Honestly, it's so shrunk-up it makes you look positively pop-eyed!"

"Now listen, girls—"

"Why don't you get your shirts pre-shrunk?"

"No, Anne—you can't depend on that kind. You have shirts that say Sanforized-Shrunk."

"Just a minute, now—"

"What was I reading yesterday about Sanforizing? I read the shrinkage out of a fabric down to 1%, or less, by special tests. They say a Sanforized-Shrunk shirt never goes out of size!"

"Girls, will you hush—"

"Why don't you pay a little more, Dad, and get something that looks decent?"

JEAN: Funny thing is, you don't have to pay more! You can get Sanforized shirts all over town now—all prices, any style you like. Dad's just old-fashioned.

DAD: (Desperately) QUIET BOTH OF YOU! Who's responsible for these gosh-awful shirts I wear? Answer me that!

GIRLS: Why, Daddy!

DAD: Every birthday and Christmas, you girls and your mother keep loading me up with these shrinking shirts that aren't Sanforized!

ANNE: But we didn't know about Sanforizing then!

DAD: Well, I did—but nobody ever listened to me. Now—either you girls get me some decent Sanforized-Shrunk shirts tomorrow—or I'm going to sit here in no shirt next time your company comes!

"SO THE GIRLS KICKED YOU OUT, EH?"

MOTHER: You might just as well get comfortable and read in bed.

FATHER: Dang it all, I'm never comfortable! How can I be, with such strangely shirts, midget-sized shorts, and shrunk-up pajamas?

FATHER: Hey, what's happened? These feel wonderful!

MOTHER: Everything's wonderful! I discovered I could buy Sanforized-Shrunk shirts and shorts and pajamas for you at the same price I've been paying. Now they'll all fit!

MOTHER: I found this out, too! Sanforizing will end shrinking troubles in women's wash dresses, children's clothes, uniforms, slacks and work clothes, even slip covers and drapery material. Just look for the label and you're safe!

PERMANENT FIT... LOOK FOR THE WORDS... SANFORIZED-SHRUNK

OVER THE TOP

BY LAMPLIGHT

TONIGHT, an army of Americans will go into action — by lamplight. Their battle is for Advancement and Success. Their weapons are Ambition, Courage . . . and study courses prepared by the International Correspondence Schools.

For this army knows that its hope for victory lies in TRAINING! These "soldiers of success" are armed with I. C. S. texts so authoritative that 24 State universities have adopted them, and methods proved by 49 years of successful application. Yet the price they pay for I. C. S. training is surprisingly low — this coupon will bring you complete information.

INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS

Box 4069-C, Scranton, Penna.

Without cost to me, please send full particulars about the course marked X:

- |  |   |
|--|---|
| <input type="checkbox"/> Accounting          | <input type="checkbox"/> Commercial             |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Advertising         | <input type="checkbox"/> Diesel Engines         |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Architecture        | <input type="checkbox"/> Electrical Engineering |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Aviation            | <input type="checkbox"/> High School            |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Business Management | <input type="checkbox"/> Radio                  |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Chemistry           | <input type="checkbox"/> Salesmanship           |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Civil Engineering   | <input type="checkbox"/> Welding                |

Name.....Age.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

Present Position.....

Canadian residents send coupon to the International Correspondence Schools Canadian, Limited, Montreal, Canada. British residents send coupon to I. C. S., 71 Kingsway, London, W. C. 2, England.

FOR THE 1 MAN IN 7 WHO SHAVES EVERY DAY

A Special Shave Cream—It's Not a Soap, Needs No Brush!

Daily shaving leaves many men's faces raw, sensitive. This is especially true of the man who, because of his business and social status, must shave every day.

To meet this condition Williams, for 100 years makers of fine shaving preparations, has now developed GLIDER—a special cream for daily shavers. With no soap base, it's a complete departure from ordinary shave creams. No brush. No lather. Not sticky or greasy.

A superabundance of moisture in this rich cream softens each whisker, yet forms a protective layer over your face to keep blade from scraping. Swiftly, gently your razor glides over your skin. Like a cold cream, Glider helps smooth, soften your skin and prevent chapping and roughness.

FREE—tube of Glider. Send name, address today. The J. B. Williams Co., Dept. EG-13, Glastonbury, Conn.

Offer good in U. S. A. and Canada only passed by your house last night and called but you were not at home."

"At what time?" She kept her voice from wavering.

"At seven."

"I just ran out for a bite to eat," she said hurriedly.

"I hoped we might dine together—I had a free evening."

She was more than ever careful the next night as she started to her meeting with Karl. When she changed busses she was certain that no one followed her.

CAROLA rehearsed the next afternoon at the Sans Souci. Painters and decorators were still at work and Wagner jumped from giving orders to Carola's accompanist to fighting with a workman over a shade of paint.

In the late afternoon Karl came in, bringing filters for the spotlights. He seemed surprised to see Carola.

She managed to whisper, "You weren't sorry to come?"

Karl grinned. "Please go on singing. Sing The Fisherman's Wife."

"Just for you, Karl."

He sat a few feet off, his eyes on her lovely face. She began to sing and her voice did not waver. She sang a song of despair, of North Sea fog and the white chill of spray-lashed faces. The song rose slowly, mournfully, a half note at a time, as slowly but as surely as grief rises; then, with the appearance of a familiar sail on the horizon, a sudden transition to the major, a soft, thankful chord, and silence.

She had sung as magnificently as ever, and just for him.

Then Karl heard a voice. "Very lovely indeed, Fräulein!"

There was Blaerchen. He was not smiling.

Karl stammered something.

"Hello, Karl," Blaerchen said quietly, then ignored him. "It's delightful to hear you sing, Carola. I didn't realize how much we had missed it." Then, casually, "Have you forgotten the engagement you and I had this afternoon?"

Her face showed that she knew of no engagement but the implication was obvious. "You'll excuse us, Karl?"

Karl nodded. He wanted to go up and hit Blaerchen but that would be childish. Blaerchen was the stronger here.

"I have my car and chauffeur," Blaerchen said, icy cold. "Can we drop you somewhere, Karl?"

"No, thank you."

He watched Blaerchen help Carola into her coat. He held her arm firmly as they went toward the door, as if leading her to a certain destination which she was loath to reach.

THE uniformed chauffeur sat rigid at the wheel and turned the car out toward the suburbs. In the rear of the car Carola reminded herself to try and keep calm, to wait and let Blaerchen do the talking. After all, this might concern Karl even more than herself.

"Well?" Blaerchen asked carelessly.

"Well?"

"Don't you think you owe me some explanation?"

"About what?"

"For a long time I've wondered about you, Carola. You've acted strangely. You've not always told me the truth."

"I am sorry you think that." She would not let his self-assurance get her down. Outside, the sunset in the west was losing its crimson to gray. Here in this car she was in a little, remote, darkening world.

Blaerchen was in no hurry to continue, not because he was uncertain about what to say, but because he wanted to choose his words carefully.

"There have been so many things in your behavior that could appear suspicious, from the time you made the decision to return from Rome—the way you acted about the Mainescu girl, about Maria, about Froscetti, about being, shall I say, friendly but not too friendly with me."

She did not answer.

"I am sorry you are friendly with Karl after I advised you against it."

"I have loyalties," Carola said sharply. "He was down and out and needed a friend."

"How did you find him?"

Here she would have to shirk the truth. "I met him by chance in Wagner's office. I was glad to meet him."

"Why do you lie, Carola?" Blaerchen asked wearily. "We have an information system in this country that can tell almost everything about anyone at any time." Then he added sternly: "You've made your position here extremely difficult."

"Difficult?" For the first time her courage drooped.

The car was in the country now and the sky was dark.

"Yes, difficult," Blaerchen repeated.

"There are people who suspect your motives, Carola, and those people do not stand for any fooling. This is not a schoolroom where games are played."

She was glad that it was so dark, that Blaerchen could not see how she bit her lip. "Then I have only one choice," she said. "I shall leave Berlin."

"That, I am sorry, cannot be arranged." He had every answer ready. "Passports are not given out like newspapers." He continued: "I heard rumors about you and I would not believe it. I did not think you would deceive me. The Froscetti affair might have been less trusting man suspicious. I came today to discuss those rumors—and Karl with you."

"Helping me rehearse!"

"You could have asked me for I was at the Krokodil, too. I know word of your songs, every gesture made, every look on your face—"

That tone in his voice frightened more than his threats.

THE car turned a curve slowly. "Where are we going?"

"I thought you might like to come my house for a drink."

Carola did not answer. The car stopped at the entrance and Blaerchen helped her up the stairs. A servant took her coat and Blaerchen led her to study off the living room, paneled leather and decorated with some paintings, most of them pictures of meaty Nordic nudes. A servant brought a tray with bottles of liqueur and coffee.

"What will you drink?" Blaerchen asked.

"Coffee, thank you." She felt in this room, cut off from a world outside. She wondered what Karl had done and where he had gone when the car was rated.

The servant gave her coffee and poured a glass of brandy for Blaerchen. Then he withdrew, closing the door.

Blaerchen settled back in a large leather armchair and sighed. "It's good to be in one's home," he said. "Every time I go to my office I find new worries waiting for me. It is as if musing: 'I was glad for you

"It's a neighborhood project; designed to meet the menace of parachute troops, you know" n, Carola, to go back to your old and take up singing again." "Why?" She wanted an answer to and she leaned forward eagerly. "I'll be happier," he said as if he it sincerely. "You'll be a tremendous success." Then as casually and nonchalantly as if he were discussing for a new vegetable garden, he said, "And I shall be proud to have the popular entertainer in Berlin for me."

pite of Maria's warning, Carola nodded. She felt her throat suddenly dry. Then, like a flash, she was aware that he had said it casually so that she might not see the effect on her. As coolly as possible she said, "Really!" She had always hoped for that, Carola.

he would marry someone whom, he said, the Foreign Office suspected! He made a sudden guess that his talk of the Foreign Office suspicion, his own plans, were only steps in frightening her into a trap.

"Is this rather abrupt?" she asked. Assurance was more obvious than the blunt word from her now would be. It was a hurt there, in the most delicate part of his make-up, would be dangerous.

He looked forward to marrying Carola," he was saying. Then he turned to her. "I shouldn't say the idea of you look radiantly happy. Why not?"

"Your death—" she began. "I had no patience with that. 'Be careful, Carola. You have a whole life ahead of you.'"

He was the man responsible for her death now proposing marriage to her. All he had done in the past were to make these recent years sterile and now threatened any hope for the future.

"I've given you plenty of time," he said bluntly. "Now I offer marriage, for your own good." "For my own good?" This was conceited and overblown.

"We are in a difficult position here," he said, slipping into his paternal manner. "Your value to the Foreign Office, the Froscetti affair, was zero. If you go against you increases, there is nothing you can do but await a decision to punish you."

He was startled. "Weren't you my employer at the Foreign Office?"

"Your sponsor," Blaerchen said. "There is a difference."

He asked scornfully, "As your wife I am freed from suspicion?"

"My wife, you would be freed from suspicion. No one could touch you."

"I'd like as possible she said, 'I can't touch you.'"

His face darkened. "Why not?" "Because I don't love you." She could not laugh. "There is a difference between a proposal of marriage and a marriage."

"Words!" He frowned. "There is no other, I'm sure. There is Karl." "I could confess and stop Blaerchen completely but such a confession would concentrate all his vengeance on me."

"You're very beautiful," Blaerchen said suddenly. "You're beautiful when you're happy. You're even more beautiful when you're worried." He stood up and looked at her. Then he sat beside her and put his arm around her. She was away before he could know how she felt.

"Please, please, don't!" "The house was still."

He was after her and his arm went around her again. "I have waited long for you, my dear."

"Please!" "I can't remember you, Carola. I can't remember when I haven't wanted you."

He held her tighter. "All my life, when I have wanted something I have got it."

She was desperate now. It would not help to remind him how he had got some of the things he wanted. Yet there was one way to stop him now, to stop him so that he would fall back, his face redder, his lips even more a knifelike line.

"Carola!" His self-control was going now.

One way to stop him but the consequences would be terrible!

He had almost pushed her off balance.

No matter what the consequences, she had to stop him. Violently she fired a question, "Is this why you killed Paul?"

THE question did stop him. His hold on her relaxed. His self-control was not sufficient to mask a first instinctive reaction and that told her something that she had come to Berlin to find out. No matter what he said, she knew, even though she might never have any further proof.

He stepped back. "What do you mean?"

"Your face shows that you know what I mean!"

Savagely he asked, "What makes you think such a thing?"

"I don't think, I know it. I had a letter from Paul before his death! He suspected you, too."

"Believing that, you came to Berlin?" He began to pace up and down. "You thought that, every time we were together? You are a very skillful actress!"

Carola watched him closely. He was trying to decide what to do. It was too late to take back what had been said. He might consider her too dangerous to him and have her jailed. Yet he made no move and his face gave no sign of any decision. His hesitation could only have one meaning; he was weighing the value of arresting her against the hope of using her.

She expected threats and he made no threats. His silence was more frightening than any threats he could have made.

He turned to the door. "I'll call the car and you can go back to the city."

She followed him, telling herself that she had passed a point where fear would be of any use.

On the porch, he said, "I may have another assignment for you shortly."

That was proof that he had decided to use her somehow, that she need not wait arrest. She would not acknowledge fearing any threat. "I shall do nothing more for you."

"Possibly not! Auf Wiedersehen!" He added craftily: "Remember me to Karl when next you see him!"

She rode back to the city tight-lipped and tense. She had found out what she had wanted to know for three years. It was dreadful knowledge; from the consequences of knowing it there would be no escape.

She looked for Karl at the subway station but he was not there. He had never been late before. Twenty minutes passed, then forty, then an hour while she waited grimly. Trains passed and people streamed by but she did not see them. She waited for one person and he did not come. It was almost as terrifying to think of going to his room, to run into Kreitz or into some other trap. Going to his room might reveal what had happened to him and uncertainty now was worse than any other fear. She left the subway station and ran to a bus.

A knock at Karl's door brought no answer. She knocked again and jumped nervously at a sound. A neighbor's door opened just a little, then quietly and as silently closed. Again she knocked, again the neighboring door opened.

A man looked out. "Who do you

"Picture me playing Cupid!"

1. FOR ONE OF MY AGE, and a wardrobe mistress, it just doesn't happen. But there she was, our beautiful Tanya, not only in tears but wanting to tell me all about it. How she'd lost the one and only Prince Charming because she'd been so terribly rude.

2. THEN—WHAT DO YOU THINK? She breaks down in my arms and says she's been out of sorts for days—dosed up with all sorts of pills and purgatives. If only she knew how to feel better! Well, right then I get an idea.

3. NEXT MORNING, I call by her rooms before she's up and bring her a package of KELLOGG'S ALL-BRAN. "Miss Tanya," I say, "why don't you try preventing your trouble instead of attempting to 'cure' it after it happens? What you probably need is a little more of a special kind of food called 'bulk.' If so, just eat ALL-BRAN for breakfast every day and drink plenty of water."

4. WHAT DO YOU SUPPOSE HAPPENED? Well, she had ALL-BRAN every single breakfast. Loved its crunchy taste, too! Before long she was cheerful as a cricket. And—bless me! Yes—Prince Charming came back with his arms full of orchids.

Join the "Regulars" with KELLOGG'S ALL-BRAN

"Sure the # water's fine

How

... in

The tip that followed the dip:

1. "Lead me to it, friend! If there's that comes in handy on a hot summer long, cool drink of beer. But how can I know so much about the difference

4. "After your dip, there's nothing like beer or ale! And with these Cap-cans you can drink right out of the can, from a protected surface. No returns or de-

CONTINUE

but here's something better!

me beer or ale the way you like it?

sy-to-open CAP-SEALED CANS!"

When you want a swim, you just dive in, don't you? Well, that's the beauty of these Cap-Sealed cans. You can dive right in! No need to wait around for a special opener."

3. "Dad brought along a case. These 12-can cartons are a cinch to stow in the car; half the space and half the weight. Let's put some of them in the water now; they'll chill in a jiffy."

Three steps to the perfect week-end...

Planning to do something this week-end? A picnic, or a trip to the beach? A party at your home? Then try this simple formula for greater week-end pleasure:

Step 1. Serve beer—it's a cool and wholesome summer drink.

Step 2. Serve beer in cans—chills faster, takes less space, no deposits and no returns.

Step 3. Serve beer in CAP-SEALED cans—for that's the can that requires no special opener, and you can drink right out of the can if you wish, from a clean, cap-protected surface.

Cap-Sealed
TRADE MARK REG

Die in, folks! Here's to the Cap-Sealed can!" Because every feature is designed to guard the taste of beer, you get that true brewery flavor also the big, economical quart-size can.)

TWO CONVENIENT SIZES: Regular 12-oz. can and a big quart can (32-oz.).

AN COMPANY New York • Chicago • San Francisco

BETWEEN YOU AND ME—FLEAS AREN'T CHOOSY!

They came early this year. One flea led to another, and they were everywhere. I was Home, Sweet Home for the fleas! Then they spread to my bed, the rugs, and finally the Mistress started scratching. Things began to happen. We got after them with Sergeant's SKIP-FLEA POWDER!

First we got mine. As SKIP-FLEA went on, the fleas gave up. It sure kills 'em! Then the rugs and my bed got Sergeant's Pine Oil Disinfectant—more fleas quit! Get SKIP-FLEA Soap and Powder at drug and pet stores—and the free Sergeant's DOG BOOK. (Or mail coupon below.)

Sergeant's

DOG MEDICINES

Polk Miller Products Corp.
Dept. 2-H, Richmond, Va.

Please send a free Sergeant's DOG BOOK to:

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

Unroll A NEW ROOM THIS FALL

See the smart SANITAS rooms in today's most talked about modern house.
Rockefeller Home Center,
New York

HOUSE OF IDEAS

★ This Fall you can carry out up-to-the-minute decorative schemes with permanently washable SANITAS FABRIC WALL COVERINGS ★ SANITAS is stainproof... successfully makes imperfect (cracked) walls look new. You who know SANITAS will be amazed at its new beauty. Decorator-Styled Colors are featured! See the smart SANITAS Style Book at your nearest wall-covering store.

Sanitas

FABRIC WALL COVERINGS

Standard Coated Products Corp.
40 Worth Street, New York

(810)

Please send True-Scale Reproductions and sample of SANITAS Fabric Wall Covering.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

want?" He sounded frightened, as if he had expected to see something hideous.

"Herr Dietrich."

"He isn't there."

"How do you know?"

In a hushed voice the man said, "The police came a few hours ago and took him away!"

SHE walked toward the stairs like a person dazed by a blow. "The police came and took Karl away!" To break now and let out her feelings in a turmoil of hysteria would not help. To go to a police station, to anyone at random, and ask for Karl would be impossible. The officials would laugh. No one would tell her where he had been taken, why he had been arrested, what was to happen to him. They always chose to keep those things secret, to increase the misery of the prisoner's friends.

Then she remembered that Karl had told her, "In time of trouble, call this telephone number."

She called it, from a booth near Alexanderplatz. A man answered. As she had been told to say, she said, "Cousin Karl is sick."

The man asked, "Can you be at the newsstand downstairs in the Friedrich-strasse station in twenty minutes?"

"Yes." The thought of any sort of help cheered her.

Twenty minutes later two men approached the newsstand. After a moment's hesitation they came up to Carola, the only woman standing there. The younger man spoke to her: "You are from Cousin Karl?" He introduced himself as Dr. Ranke. "This is Herr Klauss."

Then the three walked away, toward Charlottenstrasse.

When Carola had told them what happened, Klauss did not answer. Ranke said, "The police fight us and we do nothing." Klauss did not answer him.

His silence worried Carola but it was encouraging to know that she was with Karl's friends, whoever they might be.

Ranke continued: "Perhaps he will not talk. I'm sure the police will learn nothing about the Underground from him."

Carola could feel Klauss turn to Ranke in the darkness. "Be careful what you say."

Carola showed no surprise at the word "Underground." At times she had been sure that Karl was carrying some sort of secret. Perhaps Blaerchen had not ordered this arrest! If so, Karl's position might be worse. Were Blaerchen responsible, he might somehow be persuaded to relent. If Karl had been arrested for Underground activities, then there was no hope, not even in an appeal to Blaerchen. It was a bitter paradox to have to hope that Blaerchen was responsible.

She asked quietly, "Is that why Karl has been arrested?"

"Is there some reason you know of?" Klauss asked gently.

"Possibly his arrest might be a personal matter, between Karl and Herr Blaerchen of the Foreign Office."

Klauss said, "I don't quite understand—!"

"I saw Blaerchen this afternoon and refused to marry him," Carola explained quickly. "This may be his revenge for my refusal. The arrest comes too soon to be a coincidence." Then, almost crying, "I can't go on, knowing that Karl has been jailed because of me. He's had three years in prison. They'll never let him go this time."

"Cry, my dear," Klauss said. "It may do you good."

Then, as if she had seen something in the darkness, Carola stopped crying.

"What's the matter?" Klauss was concerned.

"Nothing, nothing!" Blaerchen had spoken of a new assignment and she had scorned it. But he could force her to "Do paper hangers drink lemonade?"

PERRY BARN

keep any assignment he wished. Any assignment! Either she did what he wished or Karl stayed in jail. And if Karl were free, then any time that Blaerchen wanted to use Carola, he need only arrest him! "He can make me do anything he wants," Carola said, in slow cadence to her steps. "Anything!"

"Who, my dear, who?"

"Blaerchen!" She knew it made no sense to Klauss. "I must get to a telephone. I must call him."

"Blaerchen?" Klauss asked as if he understood.

"I must call him. No, let me go alone. Thank you both very much!" Half stumbling, half running, she went down the street, bumping several times into pedestrians, wondering frantically where she could find a telephone.

In the lobby of a cheap hotel she awakened the night clerk from an early evening nap. "May I use your telephone?"

"Certainly."

The clerk stood by, pretending not to pay any attention while she called Blaerchen. In a few minutes he answered, "An unexpected pleasure! I thought I should never again have the privilege—!"

Carola cut him off. "Karl was arrested this evening!"

"I'm sorry to hear it." He sounded as if it were news to him.

"Were you responsible?"

"Who knows what a man is arrested for?" Blaerchen was amused. "It might be for any one of a hundred reasons: for listening to a foreign radio station, for hoarding soap—!"

"I'm not joking."

"Neither am I."

Carola had to be as unemotional as possible. Coldly she said, "I can't pretend that my feelings have changed toward you since this afternoon—I am not that much of an actress."

Blaerchen laughed at that. "You underestimate your ability, my dear. You asked me about some assignment," she continued. She hesitated sure that she knew now what the assignment was. By force of will she drove away the memory of his face as he pressed close to her a few hours ago. "You will free Karl at once, I shall do what you wish."

His hesitation, then his pleased utterance made her surer that she knew what he would ask.

But he said, "You must care very much for him."

She would not discuss that. "Karl has suffered enough."

BLAERCHEN hesitated again, making up his mind. "Herr Dietrich has called you frequently, hasn't he?"

"Yes." Her voice faltered.

"You will please accept any invitation he may offer."

"Praft?" That was horrible thought you hated him."

"Not at all. On the contrary, I am very good friends."

That made no sense!

"What invitation will he offer?" Carola asked dully, knowing she had no choice here.

"I'm not at all sure," Blaerchen said pleasantly. "He may take a trip to the land and he might like you to accompany him. Possibly it may just be an invitation to tea."

Carola did not hesitate. "Very well, I shall accept if Karl is freed at once." Blaerchen chuckled. "He will be in the morning."

She leaned against the wall of the little lobby, her knees unable to support her. She shivered and not because the lobby was cold.

"Are you all right?" the clerk asked anxiously.

She nodded. Before her, coming toward her, she could see the face of Praut, and ruttish. She closed her eyes and opened them. The face would be came closer, expectantly, re, not many miles away, was distant as if it were a mile. Never moving from the armchair living room, Carola tried to imagine where he was. The very attempt up with it the knowledge that imagination could she reach Blaerchen kept his word and then any assignment, even Praut, did not matter. Not fall asleep until the dirty, light of a gray dawn showed down. Then she slept, ex- be awakened by the tele- was Karl and she almost telephone in excitement. re you?" ephone booth near Alexan- all right? Come here at e all right for him to come. would do nothing now, hav- an assignment.

arl came she ran to him and him. "I love you so, Karl," olding tightly to him, not o believe that he was there. ou, Carola." ment they were silent and aerchen, assignment and ot exist. Then Carola asked, hey do to you?" "Karl said cheerfully. He a particularly upset. "I sup- est had no particular mean- are the police pick up all es of concentration camps, ad them to be careful. This ey freed me and said, 'Let arning to you!' That's all!" en laugh cheerfully. "Where en take you—what did he w the hesitation on Carola's s the matter? What hap- ant to talk about it now. I'm e're here. I thought I should ou again." She held fast to on the telephone was like and Carola looked nerv- al. e Dirling?" It was a man's vy, greasy voice. "This is e are you, my dear?" ould not answer. o busy these days? I hope ening—!" ould not look at Karl. Here was a decision, neatly offered to her. She could not say "No" curtly. To re- fuse bluntly meant that the police would take Karl again, and not for a few hours.

"I am really very busy—my opening, you know! Rehearsals and appoint- ments!" She put words together at ran- dom, hoping they made sense.

"Of course, I understand." Praut was eager to be pleasant. "But I should like a definite engagement."

"Oh, yes, yes, certainly." She had to say that.

"I'd like to arrange a little party at the Esplanade after the affair at the Sans Souci. There will be just a few of us." He became confidential. "You'll find that by myself I'll be a better audi- ence for you than the whole crowd at the cabaret. May I expect you?"

At least that put it off for a few days. She had to accept.

"I'll be very glad to come, Herr Praut," she said, hoping that she sounded sincere.

Carola looked at Karl as she hung up. "What did Praut want?" Karl stepped forward as if taking over this situation.

Carola tried to restrain herself, but couldn't. "He has invited me to a party after the Sans Souci opening. He prom- ises me his company all to myself."

Karl's face flushed. "You should have shouted, 'No!'"

For a moment Carola was on the verge of tears, then she ran to Karl. In a flood the whole Blaerchen business came out.

"You will have nothing to do with Praut," Karl said firmly.

"What choice have we?"

"Choice? I shall go back to jail, gladly." Karl sounded determined. "I won't have you think of anything else."

"And with you in jail, what shall I do?"

They stood looking at each other, not knowing what to say. Then Karl said, slowly, "There is one thing we can do. You must get out of Germany."

"That's impossible."

"It might be possible to arrange it somehow."

"I wouldn't go without you. I won't leave you here, Karl. Oh, Karl, I love you so!"

"Dearest." He looked perplexed. "But to stay here in the present situa- tion is impossible. We must get out, somehow."

She gestured her helplessness. "If you think we can get out, no matter how dangerous, I'll go anywhere with you, Karl!"

(To be continued next week)

TONY BARLOW

SCHENLEY'S Cream of Kentucky

THE "Double-Rich" BOURBON

Enjoy a Frosty "Double-Rich" MINT JULEP

These are the days you'll relish Ken- tucky's most famous drink, made with Kentucky's most famous whiskey... largest selling straight Bourbon whiskey in the world... Cream of Kentucky!

HERE'S HOW!

In bowl, crush fresh mint covered with powdered sugar and just enough water to melt it. Half-fill glass with shaved ice. Add mint; then fill with ice. Pour Cream of Kentucky to top. Stir till frosted. Garnish with mint, sprinkle with sugar... Serve!

Tropic Killer

Continued from page 22

several hundred million people needing it. When it became apparent that the natural supply of cinchona was about to be exhausted, the Dutch sent out an expedition to collect nursery stock. This was in 1854. In 1865 they made a fortunate purchase of cinchona seeds collected by a Britisher living in Puno, Peru. Seeds and nursery stock went to Java, and the Dutch strangle hold on the quinine market became a reality.

With the exception of a small amount of cinchona grown in India and consumed locally, the Dutch have absolute control of the world supply. They strip about 23,000,000 pounds of bark annually from trees grown on 42,000 acres of plantation.

Trees are ready for harvest after ten years' growth. Javanese laborers dig them up and strip bark from trunk, limbs and roots with curved bone knives. Bark is dried, pulverized and mixed with lime and caustic soda. Mineral oil extracts the quinine from this pasty mixture; and acid in turn extracts the drug from the oil. After several more complicated steps pure white crystals of life-saving quinine sulfate result.

The Kina Bureau of Amsterdam, organized in 1913, determines the amount of quinine that will enter world commerce; and allows release of only an amount that will keep world prices stable at around 60 cents per ounce. Export of trees, seeds or nursery stock is absolutely prohibited.

It's a $15,000,000 industry.

If the Supply Fails—

What would happen to Southern cotton farmers if quinine were suddenly cut off? No one can say positively, but a reasonable guess gives this picture: with nothing to stop their depredations malaria parasites would work their way through the blood stream, destroying enough red cells to produce anemia. Many people would die of complete exhaustion. The bodies of others would be too tired to fight off secondary infections. They would perish of such diseases as pneumonia, tuberculosis, dysentery.

Visions of such a series of events have prompted nearly every country in the world which has pretensions to empire to make an effort to crack the Dutch monopoly. Russia has tried to grow cinchona. The French have tried it in Madagascar, the Japanese in Formosa, the British in the Cameroons and the Germans in Tanganyika. Difficulty in procuring hardy root stock and high-yield grafts to apply on them, as well as difficulty in finding the exact climatic conditions required, have combined to thwart these efforts. So far no one has been able to put an appreciable dent in the Dutch monopoly. Whether the German occupation of Holland will affect the world's supply of quinine is, of course, a matter of conjecture.

The situation has become particularly pressing since the start of the war because malaria can be as terrible as any enemy weapon. During the last World War malaria put 70,000 British soldiers out of the fighting at Salonika; struck down 30,000 in one year in Macedonia, and was similarly devastating in East Africa and Mesopotamia. At one point the situation became particularly difficult. The Dutch threatened to cease co-operating with the Allies. The British rose to the occasion. Either we get quinine, they said in effect, or our navy will see that no one gets it. The Dutch became more tractable.

Malaria is by no means the problem in the United States that it was 50 years ago, when the disease was prevalent in every state east of the Rockies except Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont. Few states had laws requiring doctors to report cases and this allowed statisticians a macabre joke. Year after year they noted that there were more deaths from malaria than cases reported!

Good screening, good drainage and quick isolation of cases—so mosquitoes could not get at them, become infected and pass the disease along—chased the disease south of the Ohio River. But the cotton belt still has an estimated 4,000,000 cases per year. One recent survey, covering 129,000 school children, showed parasites in the blood of nearly 6 per cent of them.

Realizing how absolutely essential quinine is to a large part of the United States, federal agencies have been making every possible effort to prepare for a stoppage of supplies. The Health Service recently dispatched a man to South America to check on productive capacity of natural forests. The word he brought back was none too reassuring. Bolivia malan climate. A great deal of preliminary work with nursery stock has already been done, and plantings on good-sized plots are beginning. As a good-neighbor gesture the federal government has also shipped nursery stock to Brazil.

The United States Department of Agriculture has been working along these same lines in Puerto Rico. Activity centers at the federal experiment station at Mayaguez. Cinchona seedlings grown in Washington are shipped in pots to the Mayaguez station. As many as 3,500 potted seedlings have gone down in one shipment.

A Good Emergency Reserve

After growing for a year or so at the station, they are ready for transplanting. Lacking exact knowledge about the demands of the trees—they seem to like high altitude, tropical sun, and ample rainfall—plantings have been made at various elevations: 1,000, 2,500 and 3,000 feet.

Particular emphasis has been placed sive. Somewhere within this giant molecule, they felt, was hidden the principle—the malaria-killing principle. Their efforts have been directed to finding this magic.

French chemists tried the same. After synthesizing over 700 new substances—any one of which would be the quinine molecule—they gave up. The Germans had more luck. They produced two antimalarial drugs, mochin and atebrin. These drugs are effective and tremendously valuable but they have two big drawbacks. They are expensive and they require much supervision. These two things put them out of the reach of a large proportion of the millions who have malaria, who primarily a poor man's disease.

There are many reasons for this frenzied activity, apart from the fact that 14,000,000 people in the eastern United States live constantly with malaria at their doorsteps. It is quite possible for the disease to spread into regions where it has been barred for decades. Malaria mosquitoes are prevalent in most states. At a person sick with the disease the chain goes. Sporadic outbreaks occasionally occur in the North but are quickly squelched with the aid of quinine. The one a few years ago at Camden, New Jersey, will illustrate.

Cases began to occur in a most unlikely place: in a suburb recently for well-to-do people. A shrewd epidemiologist quickly put his finger on the cause. Mosquitoes by the millions breeding in decorative ponds and All they needed to touch off an epidemic was a source of blood parasites. They were finally furnished by a malaria carrier, a visitor from Costa Rica.

Prevention Comes First

Another factor worrying the Service is the fact that strains of violent malaria are loose within a large range of the United States. Brazil, such a killer, spread by the Anopheles gambiae. This mosquito was brought across the South Atlantic by plane from Africa. This insect has already killed ten per cent of the people in some districts and a heroic effort is under way to exterminate it—history's first example of such a gigantic undertaking.

A similar malaria is rampant on the Burma road which the Chinese constructed as a supply route to the world. Several times this epidemic malaria stopped road construction as the flies fled in terror from "black fever"—the violent malaria in which the microbes explode blood cells.

The U. S. Public Health Service had a three-man commission working on this new international highway—trying the disease and taking preliminary measures to see that it does not board a ship at Rangoon and sail across the Pacific to this country.

Meanwhile, preventive work is proceeding in the southern United States. WPA projects have drained nearly a million acres of swamp and applied a million gallons of spray. Housewives of thousands have been shown how to protect their families. The work has helped the situation but by no means eliminated the No. 1 of the tropics. As long as there are men with malaria to furnish blood to mosquitoes, the disease will be with us. There remains but one tested means of controlling the situation, and that means is quinine going to be difficult to break the monopolistic hold which the Dutch have on this drug. But we are trying

"My daughter's supposed to help me—but she hired the girl to do her share"

ADOLPH SCHUS

and Peru produced a minute amount of quinine, he found, but most of their small production was bought up by the Dutch to strengthen their monopoly.

Word of this situation prompted the Munitions Board to place quinine on its list of strategic materials not available in this country. It earmarked $400,000 for the purchase of 700,000 ounces of quinine sulfate which is safely stowed away in government warehouses. Impressive though this amount appears to be, it represents only a four months' supply! And at best such storage activities represent only temporary solution of the problem.

Efforts leading toward a permanent solution are taking place along several lines. In Guatemala several planters, aided by the United States government and one large manufacturing chemist, have spent several years experimenting with the culture of cinchona. There are 40-odd species of this tree and their barks will yield from 1 per cent to 15 per cent quinine. So the problem has been to find the best producers, and the ones which are best adapted to the Guate-on culture in the Maricao Insular Forest. While the Department of Agriculture hopes that local capital will become interested in large-scale plantation culture, they don't want to bank too heavily on this. Hence the forest plantings. A good stand of trees growing under natural conditions would represent an excellent reserve of vital quinine, which could be drawn upon in times of national emergency.

Research men in Washington are likewise making an effort to save the situation. By a curious coincidence six chemists working for the National Institute of Health, research division of the United States Public Health Service, began looking for new quinine substitutes the day war began.

At the start they realized that it would be virtually impossible to make quinine synthetically. The molecule is large and incredibly complex. To reconstruct it, borrowing atoms of carbon, hydrogen, oxygen and nitrogen from readily available chemicals might be possible; but the steps required would almost surely make the process prohibitively expen-

"Do you remember?" . . . You'll do more than remember —you'll actually see the days again, with all their charm and happiness, if you think to make plenty of snapshots now.

When a snapshot's "life itself," chances are it was made on Kodak Film

MOST of the world thinks alike about film—from experience. People have found that, by loading with Kodak Film, they can go out and get perfectly swell snapshots. So why take chances?

You can bank on the performance of Kodak Film—prove it to your own satisfaction, this coming week end.

If you're using an average camera, Kodak VERICHROME Film will give you best results, day in and day out. It takes care of reasonable exposure errors. It performs brilliantly even when the weather isn't just right. You can count on Verichrome every time.

NEW—An Important Safety Margin: An exclusive "skiving" process provides, in all popular Kodak Film sizes, a safeguard against light leak along the edges of the film—an extra assurance of better pictures with Kodak Film . . . Eastman Kodak Company, Rochester, N. Y.

KODAK'S NEW COLOR SHOW— AGAIN THE HIT OF THE NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR

Last year and this, millions of people have marveled at the beauty and drama of Kodachrome full-color pictures projected on a 187-foot screen, longest in the world. And every day now, in increasing numbers, they're seeing the newer, better show. Also at the Kodak Building—expert advice on picture taking at the Fair. Don't forget your Kodak.

The great snapshots are made on KODAK FILM

Accept nothing but
the film in the familiar yellow box—Kodak Film—
which only Eastman makes.

COWS and LOVERS

by Will Shakespeare, Jr.

Ye breath of cows, 'tis said, is pure and sweet
And cows, you may observe, rub noses when they meet.

Yet breath of man and maid is oftentimes bad
Which maketh rubbing lips occasion rather sad.

But if LIFE SAVERS man and maid both sip
'Tis sweet to play ye game of lip to lip.

For sheer good taste, try COLA, newest of LIFE SAVERS' 14 mint and fruit flavors. It's Cola in candy form—refreshing and tangy. Sold everywhere. 5¢

The Patriotic Murders

Continued from page 19

Alfred's tone was rueful.

"Very good, Alfred. And you are quite sure no one except patients came to the house this morning?"

"No stranger did, sir. That Miss Nevill's young man came round—and in a rare taking not to find her here."

Japp said sharply, "When was that?"

"Some time after twelve it was. When I told him Miss Nevill was away for the day, he seemed very put out and he said he'd wait and see Mr. Morley. I told him Mr. Morley was busy right up to lunchtime, but he said: Never mind, he'd wait."

Poirot asked, "And did he wait?"

A startled look came into Alfred's eyes. He said, "Cor—I never thought of that! He went into the waiting room, but he wasn't there later. He must have got tired of waiting, and thought he'd come back another time."

WHEN Alfred had gone out of the room, Japp said sharply, "D'you think it was wise to suggest murder to that lad?"

Poirot shrugged his shoulders.

"I think so—yes. Anything suggestive that he may have seen or heard will come back to him under the stimulus, and he will be keenly alert to everything that goes on here."

"All the same, we don't want it to get about too soon."

"Mon cher, it will not. Alfred reads detective stories—Alfred is enamored of crime. Whatever Alfred lets slip will be put down to Alfred's morbid criminal imagination."

"Well, perhaps you are right, Poirot. Now we've got to hear what Reilly has to say."

Mr. Reilly's surgery and office were on the first floor. They were as spacious as the ones above but had less light in them, and were not quite so richly appointed.

Mr. Morley's partner was a tall, dark young man, with a plume of hair that fell untidily over his forehead. He had an attractive voice and a shrewd eye.

"We're hoping, Mr. Reilly," said Japp, after introducing himself, "that you can throw some light on this matter."

"You're wrong then, because I can't," replied the other. "I'd say this—that Henry Morley was the last person to go taking his own life. I might have done it—but he wouldn't."

"Why might you have done it?" asked Poirot.

"Because I've oceans of worries," replied the other. "Money troubles, for one! I've never yet been able to suit my expenditure to my income. But Morley was a careful man. You'll find no debts, nor money troubles, I'm sure of that."

"Love affairs?" suggested Japp.

"Is it Morley you mean? He had no joy of living at all! Right under his sister's thumb he was, poor man."

Japp went on to ask Reilly details about the patients he had seen that morning.

"Oh, I fancy they're all square and aboveboard. Little Betty Heath, she's a nice child—I've had the whole family one after another. Colonel Abercrombie's an old patient, too."

"What about Mr. Howard Raikes?"

Reilly grinned broadly.

"The one who walked out on me? He's never been to me before. I know nothing about him. He rang up and particularly asked for an appointment this morning."

"Where did he ring up from?"

"Holborn Palace Hotel. He's an American, I fancy."

"So Alfred said."

"Alfred should know," said Mr. Reilly. "He's a film fan, our Alfred."

"And your other patient?"

"Barnes? A funny, precise little retired civil servant. Lives out in the country."

Japp paused a minute and then said, "What can you tell us about Miss Nevill?"

Mr. Reilly raised his eyebrows.

"The bee-yewtiful blond secretary. Nothing doing, old boy! Her relations with old Morley were perfectly perfect. I'm sure of it."

"I never suggested they weren't, Japp, reddening slightly."

"My fault," said Reilly. "Excuse my filthy mind, won't you? I thought might be an attempt on your part to cherchez la femme."

"Excuse me for speaking your language," he added parenthetically to Poirot. "Beautiful accent, haven't I?"

Japp disapproved of this flippancy. He asked, "Do you know anything about the young man she is engaged to? His name is Carter, I understand. Is it?"

"Morley didn't think much of him," said Reilly. "He tried to get la vieillesse to turn him down."

"That might have annoyed Carter?"

"Probably annoyed him frightfully," agreed Mr. Reilly cheerfully.

He paused and then added: "Excuse me, this is a suicide you are investigating, not a murder?"

Japp said sharply, "If it were a murder, would you have anything to suggest?"

"Not I! I'd like it to be Georgina. One of those grim females with temper on the brain. But I'm afraid Georgina is full of moral rectitude. Of course, she could easily have nipped upstairs and shot the old boy myself, but I didn't. In fact, I can't imagine anyone wanting to kill Morley. But then I can't conceive of his killing himself."

He added—in a different voice: "As a matter of fact, I'm very sorry about it. . . . You mustn't judge by my manner. That's just nervousness, you know. I was fond of old Morley and I shall miss him."

JAPP put down the telephone receiver. His face, as he turned to Poirot, was rather grim.

He said, "Mr. Amberiotis isn't finding very well—would rather not see a doctor this afternoon. He's going to see a friend and he's not going to give me the address either! I've got a man at the Savoy to trail him if he tries to make a getaway."

Poirot said thoughtfully, "You mean Mr. Amberiotis shot Morley?"

"I don't know. But he was the last person to see Morley alive. And he left Morley alive and well at twelve five minutes past twelve. That may be true or it may not. If Morley was alive right then we've got to reconstruct what happened next. There were still five minutes to go before his next appointment."

Did someone come in and see him during that five minutes? Carter, said Reilly? What happened? Depend on it, by half past twelve, or five minutes to one at the latest, Morley was dead—otherwise he'd either have sounded his buzzer or else sent a word to Miss Kirby that he would see her. No, either he was killed, or somebody told him something which set the whole tenor of his mind, and took his own life."

He paused.

"I'm going to have a word with the patient he saw this morning. I the possibility that he may have something to one of them that will be on the right track."

Alistair Blunt said he could give him minutes at four-fifteen. We'll see first. His house is on Chelsea Embankment. Then we might take the young Seale woman on our way to Poirot. I'd prefer to know all we are tackling our Greek friend. That, I'd like a word or two with the American who, according to you, is like murder."

Poirot shook his head. "Murder—toothache."

The same, we'll see this Mr. Blunt. His conduct was queer to say the least of it. And we'll check up on the vill's telegram and on her aunt's young man. In fact, we'll be on everything and everybody!"

AIR BLUNT had never loomed in the public eye. Possibly because he was himself a very quiet and unassuming man. Possibly because for many years he had functioned as a Prince rather than as a king.

Rebecca Sanseverato, née Arnholt, was a London a disillusioned woman of five. On either side she came of a family of wealth. Her mother was a member of the European family of the Reins. Her father was the head of the great American banking house of J. P. Morgan & Co. Rebecca Arnholt, owing to the untimely deaths of two brothers, was a rich woman in an air accident, was sole heiress to an immense wealth. She married a young aristocrat with a famous title, Prince Felipe di Sanseverato. A few years later, she obtained a divorce from him. The child of the marriage, a boy, died. She spent two years of wretchedness in a well-bred scoundrel whose conduct was notorious. A few years later she died.

After her sufferings, Rebecca Sanseverato turned her undoubted brains to the business of finance—the aptitude for which she had inherited from her father in banking. Her death she continued to be a prominent figure in the financial world with her immense holdings. She came to be known—and a junior partner of the firm—house was sent to Claridge's to be with various documents. Six years later the world was electrified to learn that Rebecca Sanseverato was married to Alistair Blunt, a man nearly ten years younger than herself.

But she was the usual jeers—and Rebecca, her friends said, was an incurable fool where men were concerned! First Sanseverato—now this Alistair Blunt. Of course he was only married to her for her money. She was in for a disaster! But to everyone's surprise, the marriage was a success. People who prophesied that Alistair Blunt would spend her money on other things were wrong. He remained devoted to his wife. Even after ten years, when as in her vast wealth he might have been supposed to cut loose, he did not marry again. He lived the same quiet and simple life. His genius for finance had been no less than his wife's. His judgments and dealings were sound—his integrity above question. He dominated the vast Arnholt and Rotherstein interests by his sheer ability.

He went very little into society, had a house in Kent and one in Norfolk where he spent week ends—not with gay parties, but with a few quiet, stodgy friends. He was fond of golf and played moderately well. He was interested in his garden.

This was the man toward whom Chief Inspector Japp and Hercule Poirot were bouncing along in a somewhat elderly taxi.

The Gothic House was a well-known feature on Chelsea Embankment. Inside it was luxurious with an expensive simplicity. It was not very modern but it was eminently comfortable.

Alistair Blunt did not keep them waiting. He came to them almost at once.

"Chief Inspector Japp?"

Japp came forward and introduced Hercule Poirot. Blunt looked at him with interest.

"I know your name, of course, M. Poirot. And surely—somewhere—quite recently—" he paused, frowning.

Poirot said, "This morning, Monsieur, in the waiting room of M. Morley."

Alistair Blunt's brow cleared. He said, "Of course. I knew I had seen you somewhere." He turned to Japp. "What can I do for you? I am extremely sorry to hear about poor Morley."

"You were surprised, Mr. Blunt?"

"Very surprised. Of course I knew very little about him, but I should have thought him a most unlikely person to commit suicide."

"He seemed in good health and spirits, then, this morning?"

"I think so—yes." Alistair Blunt paused, then said with an almost boyish smile: "To tell you the truth I'm a most awful coward about going to the dentist. And I simply hate that beastly drill thing they run into you. That's why I really didn't notice anything much. Not till it was over, you know, and I got up to go. But I must say Morley seemed perfectly natural then. Cheerful and busy."

"You had been to him often?"

"I think this was my third or fourth visit. I've never had much trouble with my teeth until the last year. Breaking up, I suppose."

Hercule Poirot asked, "Who recommended M. Morley to you originally?"

Blunt drew his brows together in an effort of concentration.

"Let me see now—I had a twinge—somebody told me Morley of Queen Charlotte Street was the man to go to—no, I can't for the life of me remember who it was. Sorry."

Poirot said, "If it should come back to you, perhaps you will let one of us know?"

Alistair Blunt looked at him curiously. He said:

Obviously different Hot weather
Tough on batteries too

Replace
with a DELCO
battery

When the thermometer's high—and the battery's low—that's the time to avail yourself of Delco dependability. To save trouble—it would be a good idea to get a Delco battery today. There is a Delco battery dealer nearby to serve you with exactly the proper type and size Delco battery to fit your car.

Delco batteries are original equipment in all General Motors cars. Be sure to register your new battery with your car dealer or Delco battery dealer. Delco batteries are distributed nationally under the direction of United Motors Service.

Delco-Remy

World's Largest Manufacturer of Automotive Electrical Equipment

High-Pressure Salesman

CROCKETT JOHNSON

COWS and I

Pepsodent with Irium Cleans Away Dingy Surface-Stains that Hide True Beauty of Teeth

Official Dental Opinion, representing 47,000 dentists, declares Pepsodent Safe, Effective, Truthfully Advertised . . . so you can trust it fully to remove Surface-Stains that make teeth look discolored.

THE beauty of teeth . . . their clear, clean, undulled luster, accents your personal charm. To keep teeth beautiful, remove the Surface-Stains that hide their brilliance. But be sure you do it safely.

You can depend on Pepsodent for the utmost in safety and effectiveness in cleaning away these ugly Surface-Stains. Of all tooth pastes and tooth powders, Pepsodent alone contains Irium, known to dentists as Purified Alkyl Sulfate. Take the advice of the official spokesmen for 47,000 dentists who say Pepsodent is safe, effective, truthfully advertised.

So, you see, you can trust Pepsodent with Irium. You can have complete confidence in what you read in Pepsodent advertisements like this. Switch to Pepsodent with Irium today. See how much brighter your teeth will look when Surface-Stains are gone.

Pepsodent
TOOTH PASTE

PEPSODENT contains IRIUM for greater cleansing power

This Seal is Proof
PEPSODENT is ✓ Safe ✓ Effective
✓ Truthfully Advertised

"I will—certainly. Why? Does it matter?"

"I have an idea," said Poirot, "that it might matter very much."

They were going down the steps of the house when a car drew up in front of it. It was a car of sporting build—one of those cars from which it is necessary to wriggle from under the wheel in sections.

The young woman who did so appeared to consist chiefly of arms and legs. She had finally dislodged herself as the men turned to walk down the street.

The girl stood on the pavement looking after them. Then, suddenly and vigorously, she ejaculated, "Hi!"

Not realizing that the call was addressed to them, neither man turned. The girl repeated: "Hi! Hi! You there!"

They stopped and looked round inquiringly. The girl walked toward them. The impression of arms and legs remained. She was tall, thin, and her face had an intelligence and aliveness that redeemed its lack of actual beauty. She was dark with a deeply tanned skin.

She said, addressing Poirot, "I know who you are—you're the detective man, Hercule Poirot!" Her voice was warm and deep, with a trace of American accent.

Poirot said, "At your service, Mademoiselle."

Her eyes went to his companion.

Poirot said, "Chief Inspector Japp."

Her eyes widened—almost it seemed with alarm. She said, and there was a slight breathlessness in her voice, "What have you been doing here? Nothing—nothing has happened to Uncle Alistair, has it?"

Poirot said quickly, "Why should you think so, Mademoiselle?"

"It hasn't? Good."

Japp took up Poirot's question:

"Why should you think anything had happened to Mr. Blunt, Miss—"

He paused inquiringly.

The girl said mechanically, "Olivera. Jane Olivera." Then she gave a slight and rather unconvincing laugh. "Sleuths on the doorstep rather suggest bombs in the attic, don't they?"

"There's nothing wrong with Mr. Blunt, I'm thankful to say, Miss Olivera."

She looked directly at Poirot.

"Did he call you in about something?"

Japp said, "We called on him, Miss Olivera, to see if he could throw any light on a case of suicide that occurred this morning."

She said sharply, "Suicide? Whose? Where?"

"A Mr. Morley, a dentist, of 58 Queen Charlotte Street."

"Oh!" said Jane Olivera blankly. "Oh!—" She stared ahead of her frowning. Then she said unexpectedly, "Oh, but that's absurd!"

And turning on her heel, she left them abruptly, and without ceremony, running up the steps of the Gothic House and letting herself in with a key.

"Well!" said Japp, staring after her; "that's an extraordinary thing to say."

"Interesting," observed Poirot mildly.

Japp pulled himself together, glanced at his watch and hailed an approaching taxi.

"We'll have time to take the Sainsbury Seale on our way to the Savoy."

MISS SAINSBURY SEALE was in the dimly lit lounge of the Glen-gowrie Court Hotel having tea.

She was flustered by the appearance of a police officer in plain clothes—but her excitement was of a pleasurable nature, he observed. Poirot noticed, with sorrow, that she had not yet sewn the buckle on her shoe.

"Really, Officer," fluted Miss Sainsbury Seale, glancing round, "I really don't know where we could go to be private. So difficult—just teatime—perhaps you would care for some and—and your friend?"

"Not for me, madam," said Japp.

"This is M. Hercule Poirot."

"Really?" said Miss Sainsbury Seale. "Then perhaps—you're sure—you either of you have tea? No. Well, perhaps we might try the drawing room."

She led the way to the comfortable seclusion of a sofa and two chairs in an alcove. Poirot and Japp followed the former picking up a scarlet handkerchief that Miss Sainsbury Seale had shed en route.

He restored them to her.

"Oh, thank you—so careless of me. Now, please, Inspector—No, Chief Inspector, isn't it?—do ask me what you like. So distressing, the whole business. Poor man—I suppose something on his mind? Such times we live in!"

"Did he seem to you worried, Miss Sainsbury Seale?"

"Well—" Miss Sainsbury Seale hesitated, and finally said unwillingly.

"I can't really say, you know. But then perhaps I should not—under the circumstances—afraid I'm rather a coward, you know. Miss Sainsbury Seale giggled and patted her curls.

"Can you tell us who else was in the waiting room while you were there?"

"NOW let me see—there was a young man there when I came. I think he was in pain because he was muttering to himself and looking wild and turning over the leaves of a magazine just anyhow. Then suddenly he jumped up and went out. He had a very acute toothache he must have had."

"You don't know whether he was in the house when he went out of the house?"

"I don't know at all. I imagined just felt he couldn't wait any longer and must see the dentist. But it must have been Mr. Morley he was in because the boy came in and spoke up to Mr. Morley only a few minutes later."

"Did you go into the waiting room again on your way out?"

"No. Because, you see, I'd been put on my hat and straightened myself up in Mr. Morley's room. Some of the people went on Miss Sainsbury Seale, to her subject, "take off the hat downstairs in the waiting room. I never do. A most distressing thing happened to a friend of mine who did. It was a new hat and she put it on carefully on a chair, and when she came down, would you believe it, a cat sat on it and squashed it flat. Absolutely ruined!"

Japp said, "Then this young man with the toothache was the only patient you noticed at 58 Queen Charlotte Street?"

"A gentleman came down to see me and went out just as I went up to see Mr. Morley—oh! and I remember a peculiar-looking foreigner came to the house just as I arrived."

Japp coughed. Poirot said, "That was I, Madame."

"Oh, dear!" Miss Sainsbury Seale peered at him. "So it was! Do you see how short-sighted—and very distressing—isn't it?"

She trailed off into irrelevance. "And really, you know, myself that I have a very good face. But the light here is so bad. Do forgive my mistake!"

They soothed the lady down. Japp asked, "You are quite sure Mr. Morley didn't say anything such as—instance—that he was expecting an interview this morning? Anything of that kind?"

"No, indeed, I'm sure he didn't. He didn't mention a patient by the name of Amberiotis?"

(To be continued next week)

One Thunderous Night

Continued from page 21

agree to meet him. He made an effort for silence, involving something I did years ago. I told him there was nothing doing. I'll admit I was so glad that I put him in the tender and hoped he'd be swamped. I didn't know that. He's good on the water." "Suppose," Harper said next, "that Chinaman overheard what you said in the boat, and knew Dole rowed long was at the wheel. I don't know much he saw, or what he heard." "Person said, 'Quong, did you see the boat get into the tender?'"

Chinese said, "Too damn' much me thundeh, too much fog." He held the ice in the shaker. "Dlink no now. I catch new one."

McMasters was puzzled by Henderson because it seemed to the engineer the man's words were honest and actions normal. Harper, of course, was convinced that Henderson was just as was the other detective. Two more added to four. Mac guessed that the presence of a pretty girl had something to do with his own feeling; her eyes left Marsh Henderson's face.

Harper dialed headquarters, and, as reported, McMasters saw, first, a comical disbelief on Henderson's face, and then rising anger. Lastly, McMasters noted that Henderson was truly, deeply frightened. Again, Mac felt that reactions could be those of an innocent man who was telling the truth, or of a man who was lying. He was amazed at an accusation, and gentle enough to understand what it meant.

"He recovered the body," Harper said. "No. Not just a floater. Murder, plain. No question. Blackmail, plain. And we've got the man who did it." The detective gave names, details. "Thank you, sir," he said, while Lane grumbled with the realization that Harper was taking all credit. "Mighty near didn't. We ran into a barge."

"He would tell it," the sergeant muttered. "Why could not Mallock do the talking? Now, Mac, you've your first black mark, undeserved."

Sara Hallam said fiercely, "I was with Mr. Henderson every moment. I saw Mr. Dole get into the tender. I heard what was said. I—"

"Don't, Sally," said Henderson. "Don't say anything."

The girl was on her feet. McMasters liked the way she paused, lips tight, as if she wanted to obey Henderson's admonition, and yet as if she couldn't obey. How she came to the man's defense, McMasters felt, would determine, for him, Henderson's innocence or guilt. It came to him, watching her, that if she took the blame for what had happened in any way upon herself, Henderson was probably guilty.

WHEN she began to speak, it seemed as if this was what she intended, for she said, "Mr. Henderson wasn't being blackmailed. I was. Mr. Henderson told Dole to go to the devil, and Dole said we weren't dealing with just one man. That's why Marsh said what he did when you came." Her fierceness was gone; she was in deadly earnest. "They had words. Marsh refused to pay. I didn't want him to. Don't you see? Marsh told him to get off the Amarella. That's the last we saw of him. I tell you that Marsh didn't touch him."

"Then how were his clothes ripped off?" Harper asked. "And he didn't punch himself on the nose, did he?"

Here's a deliciously different NEW FORM OF BRAN

Check its Advantages

- ✓ helps relieve constipation caused by too little bulk
- ✓ furnishes significant amounts of Phosphorus and Iron and is a rich source of Vitamin B<sub>1</sub>
- ✓ double-milled — made by an improved process
- ✓ 100% Whole Bran
- ✓ accepted by the Council on Foods of the American Medical Association

New DOUBLE-MILLING process refines texture of NATIONAL BISCUIT 100% BRAN

YOU may be one of the many people who feel that bran can be helpful in relieving that common type of constipation which is due to lack of sufficient dietary bulk.

Yet you may have hesitated to eat it because it didn't please your taste—or because you considered it "harsh."

Now you will be glad to learn that the new National Biscuit 100% Bran, made by an improved process of Double-Milling, is delightfully different in both flavor and texture.

This modern Bran is the result of over two years' testing. The new process of Double-Milling to which it is subjected, further breaks down the bran fiber making it less likely to be irritating. National Biscuit 100% Bran is highly absorbent. It frequently assists in forming a large, soft mass in the intestines and aids elimination.

Eat National Biscuit 100% Bran regularly, as a cereal and in delicious bran muffins (there's a wonderful recipe on the package!) You can buy it at your food store. We know you will enjoy its delightful flavor. If your constipation is not helped in this simple manner, consult a competent physician.

PRODUCT OF NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

"You said I could put the head on it!"

GEORGE PRICE

Steaming, Hot Feet Lead to ATHLETE'S FOOT

● Summer "dog days" make your feet perspire excessively. And as they steam in hot, damp socks the skin is irritated—especially between the toes. Often it cracks wide open, exposing raw tissue to an attack of the painful skin disease, Athlete's Foot!

CRACKS between your toes WARN YOU

Athlete's Foot fungi grow twice as fast when they feed on extra perspiration and dead skin. When the skin between your toes cracks open they get under the skin and spread beneath the tissues. Your toes redden and itch. Skin flakes off in dull white patches. Athlete's Foot has taken hold!

Drench those cracks TONIGHT

Don't take chances with Athlete's Foot. At the first sign of a crack between the toes, drench the entire foot with Absorbine Jr. full strength, night and morning.

1. Absorbine Jr. is a powerful fungicide. It kills the Athlete's Foot fungi on contact.
2. It dissolves the perspiration products on which Athlete's Foot fungi thrive.
3. It dries the skin between the toes.
4. Soothes and helps heal broken tissues.
5. Relieves itching, pain of Athlete's Foot.

Guard against reinfection. Boil socks 15 minutes. Disinfect shoes. In advanced cases consult your doctor in addition to using Absorbine Jr. $1.25 a bottle at all druggists.

ABSORBINE Jr.

Kills Athlete's Foot fungi on contact!

Fungi growing fast
Photomicrograph of Athlete's Foot fungi. This parasitic plant life burrows under the tissues, attacks delicate nerve endings. No wonder Athlete's Foot causes such severe pain!

Fungi dead
Photomicrograph showing that Absorbine Jr. kills Athlete's Foot fungi on contact—they can't grow and cause you pain and misery.

Sample
Bottle
FREE

Also QUICK RELIEF for:

Sore, aching muscles • Tired, burning feet • Sunburn • Bites of mosquitoes and other small insects.

W. F. Young, Inc., 201R Lyman St., Springfield, Mass. Send me sample bottle of Absorbine Jr. FREE.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

"I assure you, madam, that isn't necessary!"

"Marsh didn't touch him!" Henderson said he was being blackmailed. You say you were." Harper turned to Mallock. "The old story. Each wants the blame to save the other."

Mallock said, "Mr. Henderson, all we want to do is find out what happened. Can you account for the way Dole seemed to have been in a fight?" McMasters wondered if the detective didn't feel sympathy for the man and girl now standing close together. "It would help us all if you could. You see, we don't think Dole was drowned, although we can't tell until an examination. But he didn't have seaweed in his hands, and his face wasn't placid; but if he just rowed off, and was swamped, he'd have been drowned." Mallock's mild voice cut through Harper's protests at such relating of what the detectives knew: "If you can help us, Mr. Henderson, you'll help yourself and the lady."

"It is the blackmailing that makes it bad, Mr. Henderson," he continued soberly. "Sooner or later, the details will come out. If you wish to tell us, it might help. I mean if it would lead to anything. Or wait, if you wish."

"I wish we'd told you sooner. A week ago. Then this wouldn't have happened." He glanced at the girl, who nodded instantly; and then McMasters heard a story of how Sara Hallam, a year ago, on another boat, had been both silly and indiscreet, and how Dole, who'd also been on the boat, had taken the announced engagement as opportunity for blackmail. "She'd told me about it before," Henderson said. "Today, he gave her an ultimatum. I told her to tell him she was afraid to meet him where anyone'd see, but that she had the key to the Amarylla, and this would be a place to meet secretly. I was here when he came."

"And so you all went out for a ride in a storm," said Harper.

"I don't know why," Henderson said miserably. "I wish we hadn't. There was no reason for doing it." That, McMasters knew, was damaging. Premeditation. Go out on the bay, in fog and storm, get rid of the man by letting his body be washed through the Gate, swept beyond the Heads. But if Henderson was pilot enough to go out, cruise around, give the wheel to a Chinaman and then return without difficulty to yacht harbor, he'd know enough to take the body from the Amarylla where the current was stronger, the outboard motor flowing more swiftly. "There was a reason," Henderson said. "Perhaps I want," he added slowly, "to thrash him without interruption. I did not, can you don't believe me."

"Hooked," whispered Lane. "The jury'll believe that." He said, "That's no foghorn. It's the woman's siren," and the men from headquarters arrived. McMasters saw the sheen of ery on Sara Hallam's face, the warden's tightened. Harper, quick to take the explanation into his hands, reporting it to the lieutenant. Lane said, "If you're not needing the Barnes, and if you'll have the body recovered, we'll run her back. That is, if she after the bad accident reported by detective Harper, involvin' a squall of paint. It took a detective," the man said sourly, "to know we so nearly grazed a barge."

Harper said, "It wasn't the engine fault, Lieutenant, that he was taking chances. The sergeant was a idiot."

McMasters' mouth was open, but the sergeant said, "Shut up. Nothing you'll want to be a detective, we go, sir?"

"TAKE the boat back, yes." The tenant spoke to two of the men who left to remove the body of Barnes. "Report to headquarters first, engineer. And you made good getting here."

McMasters knew, from the last near-accident was unimportant to the lieutenant, although how it appear on the record might be a matter. He had a final look at the girl; the former's face was the girl's defiant from fear. Because what had happened? Or because would happen to Henderson? It might be either. Mac didn't know.

All he had to do, after sending the police boat out of the yacht harbor edge along beyond the wharves and his eyes open. It was far simpler cutting diagonally across the bay,

The fog conjured up images to McMasters; he could fairly see the two men standing on the Amarylla, with thunder and lightning crackling, making the deadly struggle a shadow show, white and fierce, now obliterated in darkness. Whether the girl saw the end of the struggle, he couldn't know. The old love in her eyes in the cabin as the police were there; what, then, she have felt on the bay? And why didn't it leave a mark on her? It didn't make sense to McMasters. Had she helped Henderson? Had she taken the beating and smashed Dole, a man who wished to hurt her also? Had the girl? One of the three, unless Henderson's fragile story were true, had she the blackmailer.

SAID suddenly, staring straight ahead, "If Dole's clothes were ripped apart, why weren't Henderson's? Was it a one-sided fight? Or did Henderson just sort of hammer him down, for a time, when Dole wasn't looking, then beat him up? But Dole'd have been in his guard. And—"

Next thing," snorted Lane, "ye'll be a slave. If it were not such an open-cut case, boy, I'd like to fix Harper. Even his mates like him, but it was a risk to be sent out on routine, like being a floater, and come up on the page, picture an' all. Now do you attention and forget the crime. I'm tellin' why you're to go to headquarters, which is so you'll be able to exactly concernin' Dole's appearance when we picked him up."

"He would be a defense, Lane said, would have Henderson relate a story and fall, in which Dole struck his forehead before reaching the water. Dole, really, would have tried to use a gun: and the Chinese would so testify, to make it appear self-defense. But it wouldn't serve. "What hurts Henderson, boy," said the sergeant, "is that the blackmailer was dead before hittin' the bay. That's bad."

The old sergeant was talking either because he hoped something would mess up Harper's case, or because he was trying to make the return journey as ordinary as if the weather were clear. The fog wasn't bothering McMasters. What did trouble him was the man and girl's situation, and he had to get over that sort of thing if he were to be a proper member of the department. He wouldn't think any more about it. Then, because all of his training had been as exact as mathematics, and he didn't like having an answer without knowing how it'd been computed, he said, "When a man is first drowned, sir, you said that his face could be red. Dole's was."

"I said . . . well, I said it. Harper'll never let that be forgotten. You see, boy, he was on a case, and in kindness I told him something from my experience. He acted on it. I was wrong. He's never forgiven me, believing it was intentional. Now he will rub this in." Lane shrugged. "Do ye stick to your engines, and some day maybe you'll have charge of the department's mechanical units, which is how a good engineer can be promoted. Leave detectin' alone." He frowned at McMasters, and then he said slowly, "But the man's face was red. It was so, and I saw it." Lane sighed. "So will mine be, when Harper finishes jokin' at my expense."

"I wish we could make a monkey out of him."

"What you've been wishin'," the sergeant said, "is that something could be done to save a man and a girl, and that's a good way for an officer to feel. But do not be figurin' what happened on the Peggy Moran, featured in the New Universal picture, "Slightly Tempted", is a flying enthusiast. She is . . .

. . . pictured here with Dorothy Travis, Chief Stewardess, in a Chicago and Southern Air Lines' plane. For the safe lubrication of its new fleet of . . .

. . . 21-passenger Douglas planes, Chicago and Southern uses Sinclair Pennsylvania Motor Oil exclusively. This is the same quality motor oil sold . . .

. . . by your nearby Sinclair Dealer. To make driving safer, reduce wear, ask your Sinclair Dealer for Sinclair Pennsylvania or Sinclair Opaline Motor Oil. These oils last so long they save you money.

"I give her fifteen dollars a week, Thursdays off, and privilege of listening in on the phone extension!"

BARBARA SHERMUND

YOU'RE THERE WITH A CROSLEY

CROSLEY RADIOS

The Crosley radio line for 1941 runs from $7.95 to $149.95. It includes table models, consoles, radio-phonograph combinations with and without automatic record players, home recording devices, portables and auto radios . . . The model illustrated has

Your favorite chair is a ring-side seat for the blow-by-blow descriptions of the big fights.

American broadcast and international short wave bands, personal tone control, five tubes and ballast, for A. C. or D. C. and is priced at $19.95. Prices slightly higher in the far West and South.

Visit the Crosley Building at the New York World's Fair

THE CROSLEY CORPORATION • Powel Crosley, Jr., President • CINCINNATI, OHIO

THE HOME OF WLW, THE NATION'S STATION—70 ON YOUR DIAL

Mows and Trims Lawns in One Simple, Easy Operation

Save Time and Labor with a MONTAMOWER

Tired backs and aching arms just don't happen to users of Montamower. All the drudgery and noise of lawn mowing is done away with. No dead weight to push and pull. Instead, just 7 pounds of live mechanism that first gathers then cuts the grass closely, smoothly, and to the correct height; no matting; no streaking; no clatter; no rattles. Cuts a 16" swath through long grass, dandelions, spike grass and weeds. Cuts right up to walls, fences, trees or posts; leaves no fringes to be trimmed by hand. Cutters are self-sharpening. Built to last many years. Many thousands in use. Sold direct from factory. Costs little. Write at once for guarantee information and literature.

MONTAMOWER DISTRIBUTING CO.
323 HOUSEMAN BLDG. GRAND RAPIDS, MICHIGAN

Aids in the Relief of HAY FEVER Dr. Weaver's Original NASAL FILTER

Nothing else "Just as good"
COMFORTABLE — SCARCELY VISIBLE
How It Works

More Than 30,000
in Use

Fitted by leading Physicians
Supply Houses in 600 cities.
Ask for demonstration or write
The Nasal Filter Co., Dept. C, Columbus, O.

P. F. Collier & Son Corporation
250 Park Avenue, New York City

I am interested in receiving by mail, free and without obligation, your valuable booklet, "Fifteen Minutes a Day," describing the famous library, Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books (The Harvard Classics) and the beautiful brochure, the "Men Behind the Classics."

436 HICE

Mr. _____
Name Mrs. _____
Miss _____
Address _____

Their First Investment—

What should a family's very first investment be? Bonds? A home? Insurance? There is one thing even more vital than these. Their future success depends principally upon his and her mental growth.

Will their social acquaintances find her interesting, or mentally commonplace? Will men in business be impressed with his capacity to think straight and talk well?

More than 400,000 families have found the answer to these questions with the help of

Dr. Eliot's
Five-Foot Shelf of Books
(The Harvard Classics)

GARAGE

"Really, lady, you don't save a bit of gas by removing three spark plugs" cruiser. One of the three slugged him, an' with good reason. If it was the Chinaman, the girl would not be so worried. So it was Henderson. Dole is dead, boy, and he was well beat up."

FRANK BEA

McMasters said, "It still doesn't add up right, sir. You said Dole's face was red. Is that the way a man appears when he's been beaten?"

"There are things you will learn with experience," Lane said, "and one is that a black eye, a pair of them, do not mean a man has been struck there. It is a sign of violence, of beating. Did Dole have black eyes? He did. But his face . . . was . . . red. You are right. It does not make sense. We will leave it to headquarters. There are but three ways in which a man dies violently, boy. Suicidal death, homicidal death, accidental death. It was not the first. It was the second. So—"

McMasters said, "Or it was the third." The engineer said, "A lot's happened since we took the Barnes out, hasn't it, sir? One minute we were at Sixty-A, and there was thunder and lightning, and the rain came down; and then we got the report over the radio, and . . . and . . ."

"Well? What're you thinking, boy?" McMasters said, "If I tell you, and anyone wants to know if I did, you'll be laughed at pretty badly, sir. But you said this was an open-and-shut case. In that sort, there's not too much checking, is there? So . . . you wait until I come back from headquarters," Mac said, "and then I'll let you laugh at me."

The Barnes was docked, secured; McMasters left the old sergeant making coffee. The others, including the three prisoners, were at headquarters long before him; all were in the lieutenant's office, with newspapermen waiting in the corridor. McMasters was ordered down to a cold tiled room, and, while he needlessly refreshed his memory as to what had been taken from the water, heard that death had resulted from a series of blows, and that Dole had been dead before immersion. Merciless beating, he heard, and compound fracture.

Then, with medical opinions in his ears, he went back to the lieutenant's office, although his heart was beginning to beat quickly. Probably he was wrong. But if being laughed at would be the only penalty, he didn't much care. He had nothing on which to base his guess save what Lane'd said; but he was right he could prove it, prove nobody would think of. And all because two and two didn't add correctly.

The newspapermen were in the room now, filling it; Harper was talking to them and unfolding the story. McMasters didn't listen. He saw, first, Hallam and Marsh Henderson, the man sitting beside the lieutenant's desk; and if both were white-faced they weren't afraid any more. Their hands were not joined, as if they no longer needed contact to keep them together; McMasters' own were sweating.

He waited a moment, during which he saw the uninterested Chinaman, before speaking to the lieutenant; and the request didn't need to be made. From the desk he saw what'd been taken from Dole's clothing. The letter, smeared out and dried. A few coins. A soldier's wallet, contents beside it. A key ring!

WAS he right? He'd soon know. His disgust at Harper's antics, obviously also displeasing to the lieutenant, his wish to help two trapped prisoners, were only part of the reason for his curiosity. It had risen because there should be anything doubtful in a problem when a man's life was involved in the figuring. It wasn't just a matter of one and two; it was an experiment in which you took everything you knew and proved it, and then you went after the unknown. What'd he have? A red-dead man. A compound fracture. A lack of sympathy. And he'd find out well, what hadn't happened, maybe.

There was a pen, tray, with rings and bands and clips on it. McMasters the lieutenant frowning at him, reached across the desk and took one of the. Then, uncertainty gone, he placed a clip an inch from the key ring. He saw his fingers off the clip; and, clicking the clip was against the key ring.

The lieutenant, only, had seen what McMasters had done. Harper was explaining the open-and-shut nature of the case. But McMasters spoke to the lieutenant and could question him, him to keep his hands off: "Pull that away, sir," Mac said unevenly. His eyes were on man and girl, as if he were them that their world wasn't as solid as it seemed. "You see?" said McMasters. "I reached over and, as the lieutenant picked up the clip, he held the key ring. I was separated unwillingly. As Mac picked up another clip, and the performance repeated, he said, low, 'The key is magnetized, sir. You've seen. It's magnetized. Maybe that's accidental. Or maybe it was all accidental. I'm sure if a man has been struck by lightning, metal on his person frequently becomes magnetized.'"

The lieutenant's eyes widened. He picked up the key ring and clip again. "I'll be right back," he said, and, glancing to where Harper was holding forth, picked up the telephone. He spoke even lower than McMasters had. "Dr. Thompson," he said. "What happens when a man's struck by lightning? No, I'm serious. I see. Livid face?" He turned toward Harper, making McMasters certain the story on Lane, concerning the shooting, had already been told. "Much to be determined by post-mortem. Wouldn't be discovered that without something else? The cause could have been caused by it? The clothing partially ripped off? How about burns? None? Not a scratch, eh? Well, suppose a metal object were magnetized? Oh. Best of Thanks, Doctor."

McMasters felt hot and cold at once. He heard the lieutenant ask what'd happened to him on this track. "Everybody is satisfied with the answer, sir," Mac said. "I couldn't seem to forget that the fellow was really innocent he'd have as much as Henderson did. I guess I was a bit of a fool for him, sir. For the girl. Are you sure, sir?"

"Enough," the lieutenant said, "to begin a bit of deflation." He listened to Harper's explanation of the way the Hallam woman and Henderson had acted when the police burst was the word he used—into the cruiser's cabin, and the callous way the pair were drinking. Then the lieutenant turned in his chair, and though he didn't raise his voice, Harper stopped speaking, and the newspapermen looked toward the desk.

"Mr. Henderson," the lieutenant said, "I would not under any circumstance build up your hopes and then shatter them. I'm very glad to tell you that the worst you have been guilty of was misjudgment in setting Dole afloat in the tender. He never reached shore, but it wasn't your act that prevented it. I am trying to say," the lieutenant went on gently, "that Dole was killed in the tender, and that you are no longer under suspicion. Your story was true."

McMasters saw the girl, so brave before, crack now. Henderson's arm circled her; Henderson's face had come alive. Along with the girl's first sob, McMasters heard, in the breathless office, the booming of a foghorn, and from the tone of it, guessed it was on the Point. There was a shore light there, too, flashing every two seconds, visibility fifteen miles in clear weather; and light, lightning, had flashed when Dole had died, probably lifting him up, hurling him back against the tender.

Harper saw McMasters; he blurted, "What fool tale'd Lane have the engineer bring you, Lieutenant? Why, that doddering old—"

"Jackass?" the lieutenant asked. He leaned back in his chair. "Engineer," he said, "the newspaper boys will want details. By the time you've cleared things up for them, I'll have the report from Dr. Thompson, but there's not any doubt as to what the report will contain. So go ahead, engineer."

McMasters said, "Well," and then he knew Sara Hallam and Marsh Henderson were handclapped, and that both were staring at him. He felt grand. The office was very still; the mooooo-ooooom! that cut through the Point siren must be the transport dock diaphone, and there was strong current there, almost a clockwise eddy. Boy, but he liked his job. He couldn't help grinning. He said again, "Well," and, as he began to speak, he wished the sergeant could've been there, to see Sara Hallam and Henderson smiling, and the way Mallock was smiling, and the way Harper wasn't. The old boy would've enjoyed it.

"Don't you like to think sometimes that we're all of us just moonbeams dancing through life—you and me and everybody except that louse in the shipping department?"

GARDNER REA

TOO PLUMP TO BE A BEAUTY ON THE BEACH? TRY THIS SIMPLE RY-KRISP REDUCING PLAN

If bumps and bulges keep you from looking alluring in a bathing suit, try losing excess weight the Ry-Krisp way. See if you don't feel better, look younger, get more fun out of life. The Ry-Krisp plan calls for no drastic diet, no exhausting exercise.

Just 3 Rules to Follow

A. Eat sensibly. With the Ry-Krisp booklet as a guide, a normal person can enjoy delicious meals and lose about 7 to 8 pounds a month.

B. Exercise moderately... just to help keep skin and muscles firm.

C. Enjoy 2 or 3 Ry-Krisp wafers as bread at each meal. Only 20 calories per wafer yet Ry-Krisp is a source of energy and supplies bulk to help stimulate natural elimination.

Ry-Krisp is so appetizing and such a perfect flavor-companion for any food, many families enjoy these wafers as an every-meal bread.

Important: Ry-Krisp comes in the red-and-white checkerboard box, has the name baked into every wafer. Served in restaurants, on trains and planes. Always order Ry-Krisp by name.

Filling... not fattening
Hamburger patties, beans, corn, tomatoes, toasted Ry-Krisp... also beverage, salad and dessert are included in this Ry-Krisp meal. Booklet gives portions and wide variety of everyday foods you may enjoy while reducing.

FREE REDUCING BOOKLET

Complete plan for losing 7 to 10 pounds a month. Offer good only in U. S. and Canada. Fill in coupon.

Ry-Krisp, 716 F Checkerboard Sq., St. Louis
Please send free reducing booklet

☐ for men ☐ for women

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

Memo to Readers of This Magazine

NO MATTER where you live or how busy you are with your regular duties, you may increase your income as a Community Representative for COLLIER'S and the other popular Crowell-Collier Publications. Just accept this cordial invitation to write for our free booklet, "Six Plans for Building Extra Income." No coupon is necessary. Write a letter or simply address a penny postal to—

Independent Agency Division, Desk C-32
The Crowell-Collier Publishing Company
250 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Friends Needed

Continued from page 15

spread on bread, hot biscuits and toast . . . and as a tasty seasoning for hot vegetables.

as a "flavor" shortening for making delicious cakes, pies and cookies.

used for pan frying. He says it adds flavor to fried foods.

Because it tastes so good!

Made by the Makers of Miracle Whip

CONTAINS VITAMIN A (8000 U.S.P. units per lb.)

DURHAM BLADES are tops in shaving!

Perhaps "bargain" blades or the wrong razor make your beard seem tougher than it really is. The hollow-ground blade and diagonal shaving stroke of Durham Duplex Safety Razor make the wiriest beards behave. With this razor you can't help shaving diagonally—the most comfortable way. While Durham is different, you'll get the knack quickly.

SHAVE KIT $1.00

Compact soft roll case with Durham Razor, pkg. 5 blades, stropping device . . . Money back guarantee . . . At dealers or order direct.

COMPARE! Durham Blades are heaviest made (15/1000th gauge) selected Swedish steel. Hollow-ground. Leather-stropped. Hair tested. Rigorously inspected. Cost more per blade (5 for 50c) but less per shave. More shaves in every blade.

DURHAM DUPLEX
DURHAM DUPLEX RAZOR CO., Mystic, Conn.

Proud

OF HIS HAIR! TREATS IT THIS MEDICINAL WAY. DO YOU?

When you treat your scalp with Glover's Mange Medicine and massage, you stir up circulation and give it the kind of MEDICINAL help that's mighty good for it. How good it is, is proved by its effectiveness in helping check excessive Falling Hair, Dandruff and Itching Scalp. Ask your Barber—he KNOWS! Shampoo with Glover's Medicated Soap for best results. Get both at your Druggist's today!

GLOVER'S
MANGE MEDICINE

sympathized. "The law is the same for everybody if they don't know anybody. I might know somebody, Mr. Mivvle."

"Something ought to be done," said Mrs. Mivvle decidedly. "It's the same with everything. . . Aub, did you speak to the policeman about the chimney over there that smokes into our windows?"

"Now, Angel, that chimney is smoking into everybody's windows, isn't it?" argued Mr. Mivvle, starting the car.

"That's the way with Mr. Mivvle, Jack," said Mrs. Mivvle to the guest beside her. "He is so honorable he gets all the worst of it. It is the same in the office; he knows the department from A to Z, and does twice the work, but he doesn't get ahead because he doesn't know anybody. I often say to him, 'Papa, why don't you do something!'"

"Are you new in Washington, Mrs. Mivvle?"

"New! We are here in the Government since before I had Dot! But Mr. Mivvle comes home from the department and reads the newspaper and plays himself the radio and—Aub, did you do something about the gyp delicatessen that sold me a pound of butter and it was only three quarters?"

"Now, Angel, if he sold it to you he sold it to everybody else, didn't he? As Jack says, the law is the same for everybody. Write Mrs. Roosevelt."

Mr. Mivvle had been twenty years in the Government and had risen to assistant chief of section at thirty-four hundred per annum, and he knew to what he owed his success. To hard work and knowing the job, of course, but also to avoiding responsibility and quarrels in the Government or out.

Take these battles that Mrs. Mivvle was always urging him to start—against rich owners, against public utilities, dairy companies, and the police—how long would he last? Until somebody put in a quiet plug against him. A man in the Government wants to watch his step. It wasn't as if he had big friends; then he would have some fat appointive sinecure such as the chief of section. That post was vacant now too. Bending over his wheel, Mr. Mivvle wondered who would be the new chief of section and draw the nice salary while Mr. Mivvle did the work as usual.

"The President Hotel—quick, Papa, there's a car pulling out!"

MR. MIVVLE grabbed the lucky parking spot; they entered the hotel and rode up to the roof, which was an early evening port of call for many smart and important people.

"Make mine the same," ordered Jack, lying back in his chair.

He sat up, grinning gratefully; he had been recognized at once, to the right and to the left. "Hello, Congressman! Good evening, Judge!"

"Look at Jack—he knows everybody!" said Mrs. Mivvle, her eyes shining. "Jack, tell me—who's that distinguished-looking big man by himself, crossing his legs and a Western hat on the table? He looks awfully familiar—don't he to you, Papa?"

"That's Senator Breathitt, Mrs. Mivvle. . . Hello, Senator!"

"Papa, that's Senator Breathitt from our state! You ought to know him, Papa. Jack, please introduce Mr. Mivvle to Senator Breathitt."

Jack had to try. He led Mr. Mivvle to the senator's table.

"Senator, I guess you know me—Jack Smith? Could I introduce a friend of mine—Mr. Aubrey Mivvle? From your state, Senator."

The senator offered his hand—wondering what particular Jack Smith this was. He knew Jack, but couldn't place him. He knew several Jack Smiths Senior, any one of whom might be this boy's dad.

"Hello, Jack, delighted to see you again. Delighted, Mr. Mivvle—from the old home state, sir? Visiting Washington?"

"Oh, no, Senator, I've been here twenty years. I'm in Mr. Woodhull's department, sir."

"That so? May I call on you when I have business there? You do the same, sir, without hesitation; anything I can possibly do for you. . . Glad to see you again, Jack—Mr. Mivvle!"

There was color in Mr. Mivvle's lank cheeks and a new set to his shoulders as he returned with Jack to the table. . . Breathitt was a big man. Nice man too; right friendly. Good man to know.

"HELLO, Jack Mivvle! How's Jack Mivvle?"

Jack did not recognize the portly gentleman with the gurgling voice who rose in his path, caught his hand and wrung it. It was a Mr. Podhunter, a legislative agent—lobbyist—of the objectionable sort who was stalking the powerful senator and had observed his reception of Jack and Mr. Mivvle. Mr. Podhunter would be a friend of the senator's friends; but he had got the names jumbled.

"I am Mr. Mivvle, sir," said Dot's father.

Mr. Podhunter grasped Mr. Mivvle's hand.

"Podhunter is the name. Fine boy you have here. You can be proud of him, but you never can deny him—he's every inch a Mivvle."

"You got us wrong, sir," said Jack, embarrassed for this kind gentleman. "Mr. Mivvle is not my father. My name is Smith."

"Ha, ha, ha," laughed Mr. Podhunter, carrying it off. "Must have been two other fellows, eh, Jack?" He sat down, disgusted.

"Do you know what I think, Jack?" whispered Mr. Mivvle as they moved on. "He didn't know you from Adam."

It seemed to Mr. Mivvle that Dot's boy friend must be some punkins. Nice boy too, and no coffee-cooler; he had said that his place didn't amount to any more than a messenger.

The Mivvle party had like experiences in the Shoreward Park Hotel, where they went for dinner.

The huge Shoreward Park houses a galaxy of legislators, jurists and bureau chiefs and is a "must" stop for a smart evening.

Jack introduced Mr. Mivvle to several men of mark, selected by Mrs. Mivvle, who wanted her husband to know people. The notable gentlemen were cordial, with a look of secret thought, trying to place Jack.

An exception was Hugh Blackstone, justice of the U. S. Supreme Court. The eminent jurist was sitting against a pillar in a side gallery, leafing through the evening newspaper. At Jack's respectful hail, he glanced, nodded curtly, returned to his reading; but Jack didn't pop into his own file in the jurist's orderly mind. He looked again, remembered, smiled; amused, admiring.

He saw Jack leading toward him an undistinguished gray-mustached gentleman who was ill at ease, awed. Judge Blackstone went grave and attentive at once, rose, was gracious to Mr. Mivvle.

"Ps-st! Ps-st!" signaled Mrs. Mivvle from the background.

The summer drink
that's safe
and sound!

● Here's one you can drink your heart's content and be safe—grapefruit juice, that delicious Florida canned grapefruit juice with the distinctive tangy flavor. It's good for you, too—in a dozen different ways. That's why it's fast becoming America's favorite "cooler." Buy from your grocer.

FLORIDA
CANNED
GRAPEFRUIT JUICE

FLORIDA CITRUS COMMISSION, LAKE LAND, FLA.

REWARD! For a little of your spare time as a special Subscription Representative. WRITE TODAY. Independent Agency Division. THE CROWELL-COLLIER PUBLISHING CO. 250 Park Ave. New York.

HAY FEVER
MINIATURE RESPIRATOR

New DUPOR No. 1 keeps irritating POLLENS and NUISANCE DUSTS out of nose. Convenient — does not interfere with eating, sleeping, smoking, talking — all you need do is breathe through nose as nature intended. Wear while sweeping, dusting, cleaning. Farmers use for grain dusts. Industries use for nuisance dusts, lint, etc. Weight 1 ounce. Literature FREE. H. S. COVER Dept. C South Bend, Ind. PIONEER RESPIRATOR DESIGNER SINCE 1894

For RELIEF OF

Sunburn
MENTHOLATUM

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE - WITHOUT CALOMEL

—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pints of liquid bile onto the food you swallow every day. If this bile is not flowing, your food may not digest. You get constipation, feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Pills to get these two pints of bile flowing to make you feel "up and up." Amazingly increasing bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Pills by name. 10¢ and 25¢. Stubbornly resist anything else.

ery Morley Woodhull, Cabinet and head of the department
Mr. Mivvle, had just passed Mivvle did not note the Securry or his expression of ill-

Ps-st! Ps-st!" she signaled.
ard. "Oh, good evening, Mr.
! Might I—"

now, young man," said the brushing him off. He halted to the doorman, pointed to the arty, hurried out.

ed no time, Jack?" asked Mrs.
coming up. "What a shame.

Mr. Mivvle knows him in a not to speak to, like you do.
al you see him again, Jack?"
ldn't know, Mrs. Mivvle. It months."

ould phone him, or write him
ack. . . . Dot, stay here with n't let him wander. . . . Come minute, Jack."

Jack into a writing room.

write Mr. Woodhull a nice lete! I can tell you what to write;
ceptionist in the department et Mr. Mivvle and I know what Won't you, please?"

Mivvle dictated and Jack wrote:

Secretary:

ucing Mr. Aubrey Mivvle, as-ief of section in the depart-a very dear friend of mine.
ious to be of greater service ing you entrust him with will ged to utmost satisfaction and em it a personal favor.
going to present Mr. Mivvle but I was in conference with ackstone.

ing you of my continued es-support and with kindest perards,

"(signed) JACK SMITH."

Mrs. Mivvle—

said Mr. Mivvle, reading the er satisfiedly, "is what they see he gets it. Thanks, Jack!
y."

is in haste to get to the world but they lost another minute porway of the writing room.
e intercepted by a tall gentlenner dress—a house detective oke suavely.

Woodhull was hissed out here said the tall gentleman. "As is Secretary Woodhull's home, ot permit for a moment any ations, political or otherwise."

ld hope not!" agreed Jack.

ne theater lights went on again,
world première was world
ne Mivvle party went to their you home, Jack?" offered Mr.

lk from your place, sir! . . .

ing at the Ambassadorial Club

achusetts, Mrs. Mivvle."

in the back with Dot.

Jack, if they ever find out,"

Dot, snuggling.

sweetie, they're bound to.

get sore?"

ub," said Mrs. Mivvle in the et, "wouldn't it be nice if you

Secretary instead of Mr.

He's not so popular with

he might think: a gentleman

oreward Park was telling me

him. . . . Aub, stop somewhere butter. If there's anywhere hour except that gyp place; I go there again if I never ate not?" said Mr. Mivvle rug-

Here's the place, Angel, and in and get a pound of butter

an a pound of butter!"

ted the car, strode into the nd of butter."

The proprietor, a stout man with a cream-cheese complexion and a half-round smile, tossed out a package. "And now what else?"

"And now," blustered Mr. Mivvle, "a quarter pound for nothing that you short-weighted me out of last time!"

The delicatessen man's half-round smile turned upside down. "Wise guy, eh?" he sneered. "Give me that butter and take your money."

"This package," proclaimed Mr. Mivvle, "is going down to the Bureau of Standards if it is short. I'll make an issue out of this! And Judge Blackstone is a personal friend of mine, if you want to know it."

"You mean," said the proprietor, his smile turning up again, "it was some mistake? Sam, give this customer a pound frankfurters we give a customer catches us in a mistake! And a quarter pound butter with our compliments."

Mr. Mivvle strode out with his butter and his pound of blackmail, which was

was in the kitchen putting on the kettle;
she heard a spaced plop!—plop! coming down the public hall. She hurried to the apartment door.

Jack was coming, but not in his topper or Levy's Chesterfield and tails. He wore an old sweater and shapeless pants, and on his head was a high stack of morning newspapers; he reached up for a newspaper, folded it, tossed it —plop!

To kiss a girl ardently while balancing fifty morning newspapers on one's head takes practice; but Jack had it, and he did it. Dot withdrew into the Mivvle apartment; Jack went on plopping papers.

HAVING completed his route he hurried to the Ambassadorial Club on fashionable Massachusetts Avenue for his breakfast.

The Ambassadorial was one of the city's biggest and better boarding-houses. Jack got two meals and a cot in the cellar in return for some dishwashing and tending the furnace and continuous hot water. His cellar quarters were short on all modern improvements but he got square on the delicious home-cooked food.

He ate a breakfast in the Ambassadorial kitchen, did his trick at the sink, and took the bus to his newsstand on First Street by East Capitol.

Jack's newsstand was not on a busy thoroughfare, but the passers-by were likely to be important people. Only five buildings fronted on that length of First Street but they were the Capitol, the Library of Congress, the House and Senate office buildings and the U. S.
Supreme Court.

Jack owed his pitch on First Street to political influence.

He had not come to Washington to distribute General Intelligence; he had come on a campaign promise of a Government job. His patron congressman was unable to deliver, being in wrong with the Administration; the best he could wangle for Jack was leave to use the top of a low wall on First Street as a newsstand. The wall was Government property, and Jack's legal status was that of a tenant on sufferance, liable to be bounced out any time.

Jack put the personal touch into selling his papers and magazines. He paced the top of the wall, greeting pedestrians, soliciting trade.

"Morning, Judge!—Piece about you in the World yesterday, sir—saved you a copy . . . Morning, Senator! . . . Morning, Congressman!"

He had learned when. He waited till the prospect gave a glance or smile or nod. Perceiving moods is a gift and the ungifted are not salesmen. The ruddy, smiling youngster on the First Street wall had a tiny niche in the memories of many prominent Washingtonians.

JACK was on the watch particularly this day for the dozen affable gentlemen who had shaken his hand the night before; he would show them special attention. Shortly after four in the afternoon he saw the very nice stout man who had seized his hand out of simple kindness and without knowing him from Adam.

Legislative agent Podhunter was coming from the Senate offices. His interview with some senator had been no use; Mr. Podhunter looked ill-humored.

"Hello, Mr. Podhunter! Nice day,
sir! May I offer you the three-star edition with closing Wall Street prices?"

Mr. Podhunter glanced, halted, stared, said slowly and sourly, "Well, I'll be—"
It was the exasperating little squirt whose acquaintance he had falsely claimed on the President roof. A newsboy!

Mr. Podhunter moved on, holding Jack transfixed by his stare. He snapped

How to Build AIRPOWER

Collier's aviation authority, returned from study of German, British and French air forces and organizations, tells how our air force can be brought to full strength and hitting power.

An article by
W. B. COURTNEY

IN NEXT WEEK'S COLLIER'S

duly exclaimed over. He drove back to their apartment, found a parking spot three blocks from home. A policeman appeared, strolling.

"Your name Saunders, officer?" called Mr. Mivvle. The name was on his notice of parking violation. "It is? Then you're the man gave me this ticket."

"So what?" said the policeman indif-ferently.

"Now, Officer, I didn't mean to violate the law, and I did no harm. The sign was new and was far from the car—"

"I can't do anything about it," shrugged the policeman.

"Oh, you can't?" Mr. Mivvle's voice swelled. "And perhaps you can't do anything about that infernal chimney up there that's been smoking into everybody's windows all winter, all spring!
Why don't you enforce the law? And if I can't get action, maybe my friend Senator Breathitt can!"

"You didn't see that sign 'No Parking?'" said the policeman considerably.
"Shucks, let me have that ticket and forget about it. And I'll give the janitor of that big house a summons first thing tomorrow."

"What's got into papa?" whispered Mrs. Mivvle to Dot, thrilled. "Isn't he the lion tonight. . . . Good night, Jack!
So lovely to have met you!"

At 6:30 the following morning, Dot

FOR THIS DOLLAR A MONTH*

I GET A FINE BUY

Thousands of Motorists use Mobil Upperlube for Smooth Engine Performance

IT'S FUN to drive when your car acts alive and eager—when your engine purrs and gives you everything it's got.

Motorists everywhere are using Mobil Upperlube—regularly. It goes in the tank with the gasoline—reaches the upper cylinders, valves, and piston rings as a vapor. Its special ingredient impregnates the metal surfaces and is ready to supply instant lubrication even when starting.

Drivers who use Mobil Up-perlube say their engines are quieter and more powerful—that they are saving money on repairs because engine wear is less.

Try Mobil Upperlube. It's a contribution to fine motoring.

• Many dealers are equipped to supply the Mobil Upperlube Tonic Treatment. This is designed as an initial treatment for your car.

*Based on average consumption of 50 gallons of gasoline per month.

MOBIL

UPPERLUBE

OTHER MOBIL SPECIALTIES—Mobilgloss
Mobilwax • Mobil Stop-Leak • Mobil Handy Oil
Mobil Radiator Flush • Mobil Window Spray
Mobil Hydrotone • Mobil Spot Remover

AT MOBILGAS AND MOBILOIL DEALERS

his stare away, strode purposefully down First Street.

"He didn't know me again," murmured Jack regretfully.

A half hour later he received evidence that Mr. Podhunter had known him again. There came the deputy superintendent of the public building on whose grounds Jack was conducting business.

"Jack," said the deputy, "you have to clear out. Somebody's kicked on you. I don't know who, and it doesn't matter, as anybody could. You have to clear out now and not come back."

"Who—what can I do, Mr. Conklin? Who can fix it?"

"Congress," said the deputy. "Get an Act of Congress—though the Supreme Court might declare it unconstitutional. This is government property! . . . Sorry, Son. Get going right away and don't come tomorrow."

AT 5:30 P.M. Jack approached the Ambassadorial Club.

In a club window commanding a view of the cellar entrance sat a large-bodied and long-necked lady. She was the proprietress of the Ambassadorial. She raised the window as Jack neared.

"Good evening, Miss Collick!" called Jack, cheery for politeness' sake only; he was feeling glum. "Almost like summer, isn't it?"

"It is almost summer, Smith," said Miss Collick. "We don't need the furnace going any more."

"Shall I let it go out?"

"No, Smith, I'll let it go out. You get your things and go out, too."

"You mean—you're letting me go?"

"I'm letting you go, Smith," said Miss Collick. "Whether them that are waiting for you will let you go I can't answer. Whatever you are up to by night you can't be up to it here. This is a respectable house, Smith, and I don't want any double-lifers in my cellar. I saw you going out yesterday and you didn't look like a furnaceman or newsboy. Go!"

Jack slunk into the Ambassadorial cellar.

The situation was becoming a bit thick. He had blown most of his capital on his evening out; he had lost his place of business; and now he had lost his home. The eighty cents he averaged from his morning delivery route wouldn't keep him in breakfasts.

He had lost all, practically—except Dot. He managed a ghostly smile on that.

He still had Dot. . . . And then, suddenly, he wasn't sure even of Dot. He had rounded the folding screen in the cellar—and there, sitting on Jack's cot, was Mr. Mivvle.

MR. MIVVLE raised a hand.

"No explanations are needful, Smith. You deceived me—and not only me but my dear little girl, and not only her but Mrs. Mivvle—and Mr. Woodhull! I have been sitting here in agony of mind.

Are you a Secret Service man that Mr. Hoover goes to for information, as you intimated? No, you are a newsboy. Are you stopping here? No, you tend the furnace. I have had a talk with the lady upstairs, Smith. My poor Dot!"

"Oh, Mr. Mivvle, Dot knows all about me!"

"Dot does? You didn't palm yourself off as a rich young clubman? She knows you deliver our newspaper? . . . Then it's not quite so bad—but that's not the half of it, Smith. Did you write to Mr. Woodhull?"

"Oh, Mr. Mivvle! Did he get it? Oh, gosh."

"Yes, Smith. Or somebody of his staff got it, at any rate. And, Smith, here meaning to thank you!"

"Oh, Mr. Mivvle. But—than—" "This morning, Smith, our chief of division sent for me. The secretary had asked him to talk to me and we've known each other for years. He wasn't hopeful at first; he seemed to have had the false impression that I am just a yes-man, no executive personality. I can say I agreeably surprised him as we discussed the work section. And this afternoon, Smith, on order from the Secretary's office, I pointed me acting chief of section for permanent appointment and salary follow if my work justifies."

"Oh, Mr. Mivvle!"

"Smith"—the work-worn old man's voice shook—"it's what I've done for of. I've been doing the work of political appointees for years. I think them the best job was ever done in the department!—if I have a right to place. But have I? Was I appointed under false colors? Does the Secretary think he is obliging some big boy? That's the position you've put me in, Smith, do you think that damage to yours did me any good?"

"BUT of course not, Mr. Mivvle. The Secretary knows me from selling papers on First Street. I didn't mean to lieve I was somebody big; I just—oh, what they all say. Maybe he gave him a laugh—or just reminded me of you as the best man—or maybe he saw my letter at all!"

"You think so?" Mr. Mivvle breathed deeply. "Yes, Smith, I say you're right. Better let them rest. You're selling papers on First Street? No? What are you going to do?"

"I don't know, sir."

"Suppose you come to the house for dinner," suggested Mr. Mivvle. "I wouldn't say anything to Mrs. Mivvle about selling papers for the present. Jack, as chief of section I have a messenger appointment at fourteen hundred per annum—want it?"

"Oh—Mr. Mivvle!"

"Tut, tut, my boy—thank me for being hard and faithful work! That's the way to succeed in the Government, know by my own experience and let anybody tell you different. Later!"

The Man Who Didn't Quit

Continued from page 11

confident was Guderian of the success of these tanks that many of them were armored only in front. From the beginning the Germans fought an offensive war with the possibility of retreat ruled out.

Today de Gaulle is the only articulate voice the free Frenchman has. Each day hundreds of weary French who managed, by some miracle, to escape from the cataclysm that engulfed their country go to his dingy suite of offices in St. Stephens house on Victoria embankment, asking to join his forces, pleading for a chance to strike a blow that might by some miracle breathe life into the corpse that is France. Within two months de Gaulle may be a half-forgotten name but if the miracle should happen he will emerge as the greatest and most patriotic of the French generals, the one man who refused to be a stooge for the miserable set of leaders who figured in the betrayal at Bordeaux. If de Gaulle's past is to be believed it is difficult to think that his future will be sterile.

In the beginning his career followed the military pattern. He graduated from St. Cyr as a lieutenant. He fought in the last war under the then Colonel Henri Petain. He was wounded twice but each time returned to his regiment. Then, during the Verdun battle, he was wounded badly and taken prisoner by a German patrol. He made five abortive efforts to escape and each time had to endure the penalties for such failure.

His military career after the war was active except for a stretch at teaching in the military college at St. Cyr. During recent years his radical military theories received support from only one man in a high place, Paul Reynaud. During the first week of June he was recalled from the front by Reynaud to join the cabinet as Undersecretary of State for War. Reynaud felt that his colleagues were weakening under the pressure of both German military and fifth column strength; he wanted one additional strong voice to overcome the babble of the incompetent and the senile who through no fault of his had been put into the cabinet which he headed.

De Gaulle's tenure as a member of the cabinet was short-lived. When Reynaud was deposed at Bordeaux and Petain put in, de Gaulle knew that it was all over but for the division of spoils. He hurried to London where he sent out an appeal to colonial generals for help.

One inducement was offered to French officers who fell in line with the Bordeaux government. The Germans promised them that their pensions would be safe if they behaved well. They held the safety of their families over their heads as another blackjack. Thousands of French officers made their choice. They picked what they thought would be financial security and continued health for their families. They threw in their lot with the Bordeaux group which, day by day, becomes more of a puppet government.

Blame the Men on Top

De Gaulle, with the reticence of a professional soldier, refuses to condemn or even comment upon the action of his fellow French officers. He condemns the politicians and the general staff bitterly, but he has not reproached the men who fought so brilliantly with him at Abbeville and at Cambrai during the nightmare of May. De Gaulle would rather discuss the lessons this war has taught the military world today. No country can say that distance protects it from the mechanized forces of another nation. He says,

"To date the war has taught us we must have a real military revolution. I, as an American I would take these lessons to heart. America must be ready at any time with the necessary weapons to meet a modern attack, with means of forces of air, land and sea. If I were an American I would take for my motto 'We should do our utmost to secure safety in this world by all means and at any cost.'"

De Gaulle stood erect and straight, his face showed nothing but confidence. He terminated our talk with a short but a strong handshake.

Outside, in the badly lighted hall and women were waiting to see him. There were two small ante-rooms. One a bespectacled lieutenant named names of the callers, in another Colonel answered a telephone. The shabbiness of the uncarpeted room, the derelict furniture, dimly lit by uncertain bulbs, seemed a poor preparation for bright dreams. But General de Gaulle, the man who didn't come out of the shabbiness of his office building to make the dream of hundreds of thousands of free men come true.

We Furnish the Home

Continued from page 13

can be few pieces of furniture many of them are built to work. The beds, for instance, made couches in the daytime. You worry about spoiling your bed on it, either, for every mattress house is built with special strips of steel over the inner springs that make for a resilient but firm bed with no danger of springs working through.

Bed-couch in the many-purpose house is a special trick besides. With a special covered mattress and long springs across the back, it's a trim-looking couch in the daytime. It slips part into a pocket in the wall, to leave a comfortable sitting depth; and to get proper pitch to the seat the cushions are longer than the back ones. The mattress is also a little thicker at the front edge. When you want to use it as a bed, pull it out from the wall and flip the mattress over. The springs go back to counteract the weight, giving you a level sleeping surface. The upstairs rooms are small, Mr. Stone is not furnished them like bedrooms. To that, with beds sticking out from the wall, a chest here and a dresser there, and a chair or two stowed away, what have you? A place to move around, or to sit and read a book or write a letter in the daytime. The rooms have been designed for quarters by day as well as for quarters at night. Beds, which are like couches as we have seen, against the wall, astonish you for the resulting space.

In a girl's room you see a table-top extending out from the window. At the end away from the window, you can open it up like a book, to find work surface and space for beauty gear. A mirror in the place and there you are—evening, in a room that is not as fresh but still as feminine as you wish with its soft, light colors and furniture.

Plenty of Versatility

In the master room, the dressing table has the advantages of built-in furniture—saves space by hugging the wall, and the birchwood closet door is a mirror between the windows. The trim, part-of-the-room look of the furniture, too, that gives an impression of uncluttered spaciousness. The furniture is not anchored to the wall. It is two separate cabinets and a table, ready for a different arrangement in another room—an idea you can use in all built-in furniture.

A upholstered chair here has a built-in bench in the dressing corridor—these can be put together in a long line. The back of the chair is so that a man can throw his coat over it, and have them creased in the places in the morning; might as well make use of everything.

How many of the chairs in the house are similar to the dining room chairs. You could bring them all to the playroom for movie-party and you'd have a very harmonious room; yet they are different enough in design and upholstery so that you are reminded of a regiment.

Mr. Cooper has made a special point of the few tables in the house big enough to set things on. Notice the dining table at the head of the beds in the master room, big enough to hold all the books, magazines, thermos jugs, clocks, jigsaw puzzles, soothing sirups and what not you might require in the course of any night. Notice the oak coffee table in the living room, with man-sized removable metal ash trays sunk in either end; the mahogany tray table in the same room, lacquered in a design of smoking pipes and a sprig of leaves. Lift the tray off by its pigskin-covered handles.

But the prize table is the long, narrow one against the living-room wall, which is actually five tables. Each end is Mr. Cooper's idea of a nest of tables—two sturdy, squarish tables so beveled at the edges that one can stack solidly on top of the other. Lift them easily apart, and you have four extra tables when buffet suppers spread into this room. The center section now left behind is in two parts that can be fitted together side by side instead of end to end, and clamped in place to form the steadiest, handsomest bridge table you have ever seen.

Comfort Needn't Mean Bulk

The upholstered furniture in Collier's House is another demonstration of Mr. Cooper's practical ideas. Why overstuffed things that are all out of scale with the room? he wants to know. Why overstuffed things, anyway, that are elephants to move around? Why squashy couches that are mussed-looking when you get up from them? He gives you comfort without all this padding in upholstered chairs that are easy to handle; in sofas with removable cushions, like the two-seater at the fireplace. The cushion, which forms seat and back, is easy to flip off to the upholsterer, come re-covering time, and stout enough to look orderly after a sitting session.

We could go on and on like this. There are curtains that draw over onto the wall, blocking no light in the daytime; unlined, for more light and cheer. There is the great beauty of fine cabinet-work. There are pieces of sculpture through the house, and paintings on the walls, reproductions of the work of modern masters from the museum of modern art, of a kind that are fast taking their places in the hearts and homes of America, at a cost within reach of many pocketbooks.

This mixture of common sense and beauty and usefulness didn't just happen. It's not the misguided modernist's idea of sweeping out the past and starting new, with cold, stern lines to show he'll have no fripperies and nonsense. Mr. Cooper has decorated in all styles. He has done great houses in the grand manner, and simple ones like his own Virginia farmhouse. He knows furniture and periods so well that he can forget them, and concentrate on the fundamental reasons why we furnish houses at all—for comfort and use, and beauty, too. He has a sense of the suitable that makes him know what furniture to use and how—and how to eliminate it, also, which is the final essence of good decorating.

In the next article you will read about the lighting of Collier's House, done by experts working with Mr. Stone and Mr. Cooper, to give you more new ideas for making your house a pleasant place in which to live.

A booklet containing many more details about Collier's House of Ideas is now available. To obtain one, send ten cents to Mr. E. K. Simpson, Rockefeller Center, 630 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Everybody writes the same P. S.

[Preeminently Smooth]

to a drink of ## NATIONAL'S EAGLE

"The King of Blends"

If you want a mild and gentle drink, try National's EAGLE. And then compare this magnificent whiskey in value, in flavor, body and bouquet with any blend you know at any price!

National Distillers Prod. Corp., N. Y.—90 Proof. 40% straight whiskey, 60% grain neutral spirits.

Autograph

Continued from page 10

abruptly her knees felt like water; her courage was so much ooze. She said sharply, "Come with me, Joseph."

Inside it was cool and dark, and for the moment peaceful. She put a hand on his arm. "Please, Joseph, François is coming . . . get between us . . . just a minute . . . until I get my breath." Trilby turned away. Her violet-gloved hands trembled noticeably. She pressed them together, straightened her shoulders, threw back her head, tweaked her huge bunch of purple violets, touched her perky hat, turned back, said, "One hour, Joseph."

Of François, she asked, "Is Miss Littlefield here?"

"Miss Littlefield is waiting, Miss Jamison."

Trilby sighed. Her feet were silent on the soft rugs, her manner subdued. Diners caught sight of her and silence filled the great room, silence drawn suddenly taut. Trilby, her little head held high, followed François.

"Miss Jamison," he said at last, "Miss Littlefield." The silence ran away in a soft susurrus of sound. Trilby's head hurt. She forced her mind to register a window, a table, and in the other chair a pretty girl with a gentle mouth and great brown eyes.

Trilby held out her purple glove. "I hope I haven't made you wait."

"Not at all." The girl's soft hand was limp in Trilby's.

"Pretty," said Trilby.

Miss Littlefield was mute.

"Shall we order? I'm very tired and everyone is curious and, undoubtedly, hopeful."

"Hopeful?" Wide-eyed, the girl glanced about. People were staring. Whispering and staring. She shuddered.

WHEN the waiter was gone, Trilby said, "I asked you to lunch because I'm not working today. But you are wondering why I asked you at all?"

The girl drew one hand through the other. She was nervous but she was no coward. She could not quite control the tremble in her voice. "I imagine you want to talk about Prince di Traggioni."

"Gossip," Trilby counseled, "is still the second commodity of Hollywood. Everyone knows that I'm Alfredo's wife. The newspapers have been advertising that you are his current 'heart.' So smile, please. Don't think that I have any idea of being troublesome. I haven't." She spooned into the bouillon the waiter set before her.

Sheila said, "I'm glad you asked me, Miss Jamison. I—"

"My dear, don't explain. Love is very arbitrary. Without a by-your-leave it moves into our hearts and—" She spread her hands in a Gallic gesture.

"Oh," gratefully, "you are understanding."

"It's a trait one develops living with Alfredo." Trilby salted her soup. "I'm very fond of Alfredo."

A trace of defiance in her soft voice, Sheila said, "I'm fond of him, too."

Trilby thought, "Fond! Alfredo would snap you up whole and spit out your bones."

Sheila proffered the rolls but Trilby shook her head. Two women, passing the window, glanced in; one touched the other's arm and pointed. Instinctively Sheila drew back but Trilby, eating soup, said smoothly, "If you marry Alfredo, you'll get used to a canary-on-a-perch existence."

"It's not because of him! It's because you're Trilby Jamison."

"Maybe." Both women were silent while the waiter removed the soup plates and brought the main course. Boiled spinach was still boiled spinach for Trilby, even in a covered silver dish; Sheila had a chop and baked potato. "The thing is," Trilby said, "I'm all Alfredo has to look out for him. He's charming, lovable, extremely naïve and quite broke."

Sheila flushed. "We've never discussed money."

"A VULGAR subject," Trilby conceded. "With the habit of the vulgar—it pops up." She worried her spinach with her fork, exploring delicately. "I suppose your intentions are honorable?"

"Honorable!"

"Matters of this sort present twin solutions. If you do not intend to marry Alfredo," she shrugged, "it's simple. Although I think it's only right to say that I will not be saddled with the expenses of an affair—"

"Miss Jamison!"

A shadow fell across the table. "Will you?" a breathless youngster pleaded. "Will you, please?" She extended a book and fountain pen.

Determinedly Trilby bent the cor-you want it, twelve hundred dollars' worth. Maybe you don't. If you do, very well. If you do not, return it. You will understand, I'm sure, that I don't wish to pay for it."

"But—but Alfredo . . ."

"He selected it. With Alfredo, it's the thought that counts. Not that he expected the bill to come to your attention. He signed for it and Alfredo is convinced that when he signs for anything, the transaction is complete."

Sheila crumbed a roll. In a small, dead voice, she said, "You make him sound very—very helpless and—and irresponsible."

"Not helpless, Miss Littlefield."

After a moment the girl said, "I shall, of course, return the bracelet."

Inexorably Trilby moved on: "Alfredo will want an allowance. But I've found that doesn't work. An understanding with tradespeople that his credit be cut off at a fixed amount is best. However, I have no wish to meddle and you may—"

The girl interrupted: "That lies with my father. I—I am dependent upon him."

"O-oh," Trilby's sudden overwhelminsults. Very impersonal insults, big, fine offices. Leeringly, person suits in the cheap ones.

"Now Alfredo costs me twenty sand dollars a year and to me worth it. I don't feel horrid about I think I'm rather fine. After all his wife. And according to the we are proof that marriage in I wood can be successful. But even I'm not going to stand in your way not sue for alienated affections. a divorcee I'll sacrifice a little some Cinderella will lose a bit of her pride and the loss will reflect in the office. But I love Alfredo. So best for him I'll give him to you. don't expect him prepaid!"

"I don't expect him at all," the said. "I comprehend, as you expect to. He is a luxury far beyond You're trying to soften the blow by ing me that he is vicious and low. you are cheap and vulgar. Well, are! I hope that I never see you Or Alfredo either!"

"You mean that?"

"I do. Oh, indeed, I do!"

"Alfredo," Trilby dipped a spoon in her orange ice, "is as God as his mother made him. Maybe I am and vulgar but I don't honestly believe that I am. It's only—with all my grace I still haven't found a soft way to tell hard truths. I'm sorry you like me because I like you." She said, "You have more beauty and brains than the usual run of Alfredo's loves. Can I believe me, I'm not being flippant. I could I be?" She held out her hands.

Sheila smiled, a hard, forced smile and cut into her ice cream.

"It's a whim of mine—I always invite one guest at random from the telephone book"

RICHARD TAYLOR

ners of her lips upward the while she scribbled her name.

"Thank you." The child skipped back to her table, the book, like treasure-trove, hugged to her bosom.

Trilby stared after the small departing back. She wished Alfredo had not sucked her dry of emotion. She wished she wanted to create a scene instead of being so desperately anxious to avoid one. She wished she felt something more than a vague sympathy for the girl across the table. For one dangerous, wistful moment, Trilby dallied with truth. She said, "That means a great deal to me, Miss Littlefield, that child's eagerness, her belief . . . in me . . . in romance . . . in princes on white chargers."

Trilby sighed. "The fact that this is to be—well—kosher—makes what I have to say difficult." She paused; she seemed to gather courage as a concrete substance by a determined physical effort of her expressive hands. Smartly she said, "The expenses of Alfredo's divorce and your courtship should, I think, be borne by you."

The girl said, "Ah!" sharply, like a heart stabbed. Trilby hurried on: "This morning there was a statement from my jeweler. The purchase was described as a diamond-and-emerald bracelet. Maybe ing emotion was more relief than triumph. "Maybe I should speak—"

"No!"

"You must keep after Alfredo to write to his mother. The old lady gets abusive if she misses his weekly letter. He has three brothers, too, charming boys, all of them. They are at school here and during vacations they move in on you. Of course, you could refuse to accept them, but I wouldn't." Trilby made a slight deprecating gesture. "It isn't that Alfredo's grasping, exactly. He simply lacks a comprehension of finance."

Sheila said, "And people call you romantic!"

"I EARN my living by romance."

Trilby went on doggedly. "If you didn't intend to marry Alfredo, expenses could be kept to a minimum: dinners, theaters, concerts, corsages. Moreover, when an affair wearies one—poof!" Her hands disposed of wearying affairs.

"Oh!" Sheila cried. "You're horrid! You make everything sound beastly!"

"I'm neither horrid nor beastly. I'm trying to help both of you. If I talk about money, it's because I respect it. Every dollar I spend is a dollar I've earned. I know what it is to be hungry. I know what it is to ask for work and get

WHEN they had finished, the waiter brought the check and, smiling in a stale pleasantry, said, "Your autograph, Miss Jamison?" Trilby signed the check, shook hands with Sheila Littlefield, pulled on her purple gloves. Admiring glances followed her from the corner ruefully admiring glances from the columnists at a corner table who suspected that once again Trilby Jamison had robbed them of a story. Outside the Hollywood sidewalk performed the current miracle of yielding autograph hunters from every crack. She scribbled in their books and crept in the car.

"Home," she ordered. She said, "The long way, Joseph."

Joseph drove through the park. The car stopped after a long time. The door opened its door. He said, "Madame."

She wiped her eyes. She twined her hat.

She stepped from the car, straightened her shoulders, tightened her jaw, and went up the shallow steps. The house door swung open. Alfredo had been waiting for her in the hall.

He crooked an arm around her. "Darling, you look tired. Are you a bore?"

She leaned against him, savoring the strength of his well-kept body. Bore. But difficult . . . difficult.

His lips teased hers with a harshness. His voice was gay. "Forget it, my I, Alfredo, command it! Come." He led her to a window. "There it is, the little yellow car."

She laughed. "Alfredo, it's prepaid." And here's the check, darling, held out a slip of crisp paper. "It's out to save you trouble." She capped a fountain pen and scribbled her face up like a little boy's. "Please, Jamison—your autograph."

Thrilling MYSTERY NOVEL

Complete IN THIS ISSUE

Even a blank check, signed by one of the richest men in America, couldn't pay Jim Steele for the terror and danger he and his lovely young wife encountered when he took on the fantastic Kinsolving case. Dana Chambers' exciting mystery, "She'll Be Dead By Morning," is not a serial, but complete in this issue—just a small part of the superb show the September American Magazine brings you for 25¢.

THE TRUTH ABOUT Co-eds

More than 200,000 girls this fall, facing their first breath-taking days at college, are wondering: How much should I spend for clothes? What about shorts and slacks? Should I concentrate on studies—or dates? The American Magazine brings them the answers, after quizzing thousands of co-eds.

The Time of Your Life for 25¢

OWN WITH this exciting new novel, so exciting we hadn't the heart to run it as a serial. Complete in the September American, you can enjoy it all in a single evening; then for the next issue to finish it... Then take your pick of the short stories. Start with SAVAGE SERENADE, a dramatic story of Venezuela that's exhilarating as a ride to the tropics. Eleven stories and novels in all in the September issue—and you'll enjoy every one of them.

Have fun with the articles too, but far more than mere fun, for here's a magazine that gives you life as America really lives it—zestful, absorbing, thrilling. And the price is only 25¢ for your entire family. Don't miss the September issue; out today.

160 Exciting Pages To Enjoy and Profit By

EVER YOU turn to first you're sure to find lively, interesting reading. Here is just part of the September issue:

REBRAND: When a congressman is defeated in election and subsequently plastered with felony charges he is considered politically dead. But when a master befell Maury Maverick of Texas, the corpse leaped from the coffin and turned the town into a triumphant parade. Now, as clean-up in San Antonio, Maury is giving the old town the life of a new man. Article by Beverly Smith.

MUCH OF A GENTLEMAN: The dusty stranger who possessed a secret worth millions. Surprising happened when he passed that secret along. Story by Willard Robertson.

THE BILL COLLECTOR: Leaves from the diary of a nobody who wants to meet—and tips on how to deal with him if you have to. Article by John Somers.

THE PROUD MERCHANT PRINCE: Scattergood Baines, beloved old busybody and dictator of Coldriver, kicks his old friend Sam upstairs to save him from bankruptcy and smooth the course of Sam's granddaughter's romance. Short story by Clarence Budington Kelland.

CRAZY LIKE A FOX: Meet Jim Moran, the super-stunt man who actually sold a refrigerator to an Eskimo and found a needle in a haystack, all at a profit. Article by John D. Greene.

REGARDS TO OLD MAN TROUT: Jonathan was an elderly and respected trout whom no one ever thought of capturing, until the Duke of Kilshire blundered along and took Jonathan—with a worm! Only the love of a beautiful girl saved the Duke from something worse than hanging. Short story by Edmund Gilligan.

AND an Ogden Nash poem, cartoons by Steig, Soglow, and others; a fable from Munro Leaf—and lots more! Forty-six "time of your life" features in this issue.

The September American Magazine is on sale now at your favorite newsstand. Get your copy today.

FIGHTING FOREIGN Spies on the AIR WAVES!

Federal sleuths are on the trail of the radio spies who transmit by short wave messages too hot for cables or diplomatic pouches. Donald Keyhoe and John Daly tell an amazing story of present-day espionage and the successful fight Uncle Sam is waging to catch up with foreign agents who use our air waves to report abroad and receive their orders.

NOW
ON SALE

30¢ in Canada

Every Boy a SOLDIER

Young soldier-Senator Henry Cabot Lodge believes universal military training highly beneficial for young America and vital for national defense. And gives the arguments, not of a politician but of a hard-boiled realist, to prove his point.

JUDITH wasn't the OUTDOOR TYPE

And when she made a play for the great big out-doors man from Patagonia, Michael knew he would have to spoil her act even though she was the cleverest actress on Broadway. Besides, he loved the girl. A light-hearted romance of a playwright and his star, "Between Acts"—by Josephine Bentham, one of eleven fiction treats this month.

Bally Boy

Continued from page 14

that favor, I will reduce the price so low that even a tiny little Scotchman could reach into his wee pocket, pull out his tiny pocketbook, and say, 'We can afford to go in!' That price will be children's prices to everyone—PROVIDED you reach the cashier in three minutes time. If you are not in line, the price will automatically go back up."

James has never studied mass psychology. He says he knows nothing about it beyond what he has learned from experience, and then he knows only the facts, not the explanations. For instance, he knows that if his crowd is scattered—his "tip," in show parlance—he can usually collect it by saying, "Step out of the gutter and come up close!" or "Gather down close like a bunch of bananas, because the banana away from the bunch always gets skinned!"

Sometimes he plays a primitive trick—tells them to come up and watch him put a fifty-cent piece into a pop bottle, or burn up a ten-dollar bill—and then, when the tip is gathered, he either seems to forget about the trick or brushes it aside with the remark, "I got into a crap game with the boss last night, and if that's not burning up ten bucks, I don't know what is!"

If they listen to his talk but hesitate to buy tickets, he gives them the Punk Needle. A "punk" is anything young; in this case, it's a small boy. James picks one, invites him to look under the teaser cloth—a canvas screen at the entrance to the side show—and asks him to tell what he has seen.

The small boy always answers, "I see a girl without any head!" and, says James, "the whole tip bangs for the ticket box."

Head-Office Censorship

A crowd represents to James only so many potential quarters in the damper. In his carnival days, when he was working on percentage, the more quarters the bigger the bonus. Sometimes he made as much as $500 a week. Ringling pays him a straight salary of $40 a week and keep, including transportation, but James feels that the prestige makes up the difference. Ringling men command a lot of respect in show business.

Otherwise, the advantage and disadvantages of the job about balance. Talking for the carnival was much more competitive. Rival shows were lined along the midway, and a talker had to gather the tip coming out of the show before his and grind it in before it drifted past him. Ringling has only the one side show. On the other hand, James was a platform talker in carnivals, whereas now he has to work from a ticket box and make change.

Ringling also censors him to a certain extent. He has to keep his talk clean and stick pretty close to the facts. James resents this only when he reflects what a talk he could make for the Siamese twins, if Ringling would give him a free hand, and—of course—if their father weren't one of the ticket takers. "Whom God hath joined together" would certainly be part of it, he says—"it's a line that's got everything!"

Don James's name is legally Jean O. Boutz. His father was a Swiss who had settled in Portland, Oregon; neither parent had any connection with show business. Don was born in Portland, but grew up in Hoxie, Kansas, where his mother took him to live with her family after her divorce.

His first interest was athletics. He was captain of the high-school track team, made two letters in football, and won the state amateur 135-pound wrestling championship. His second interest was medicine. His grandfather believed he had the makings of a great surgeon, and gave him $1,500 for his education at the University of Kansas. He was just past his sixteenth birthday when he enrolled in the fall of 1931. Almost immediately he discovered a third interest: girls. He blew the $1,500 in four months.

A job as a bellhop in a hotel at Lawrence, the seat of the university, kept him going until the summer of his sophomore year, when a bet in a wheat pool brought him enough money to quit work. He continued his courses through the following spring, but just before the examinations he was assailed by doubts that medicine was his proper field.

they learn to talk?" He regretted leaving the university until somebody told him that left-handed men didn't make good surgeons anyhow.

This first walkathon gave him a new name as well as a new career. The promoter happened to object that "Jean O. Boutz" didn't sound romantic enough at a moment when Boutz happened to be thinking of a friend named James MacDonald, so he twisted the name into "Don James" and adopted it.

As soon as one walkathon was over, James jumped to the next one. All were managed alike and all were "gaffed," he says. Part of the gaff was the title "walkathon." You didn't have to walk; you merely had to stay on the floor, lifting an arm or wiggling a foot. Theoretically, you did this for forty-five around forty dollars, made up from money, salary from sponsors, and from spectators who called upon him. He has a poor singing voice; he knew only two songs, Love Neighbor and The Little Dutch Man. The money and the chance to sing were the important things; he minded his voice if the spectators d

James says he rather enjoyed his work with the walkathons, and he might have kept on in the same line if he hadn't been "duked." The duking took place in the 619th hour of a walkathon in Mandan, North Dakota, in the fall of 1935. Only twenty-six couples had entered, and the town's slight original interest soon dwindled away entirely. At midnight the walkers came out of the midnight doze to find that the promoter had packed up all their "flash"—banners, photos, floodlights and announcements—and had blown town, taking the cash box with them.

A Star Finds His Orbit

James, broke, was debating what to do when one of the contest promoters introduced himself as a former professional wrestler, and said he thought he could get jobs for both of them with the F. & M. Brothers Carnival, which was coming over at Bismarck. They got the better of the alligator wrestler as an inside turer, James as a ticket seller. That night they joined, the dwarfs in the American Pigmy Village struck because the sienna make-up powder had run out and lampblack was the only available substitute. James still laughs at his recollection of eight naked, bearded little men cursing in Polish and Bohemian as they tried to scrub lampblack off their faces.

James' employer was a man named Red Scott, who owned an illusion booth. Scott could glance at an illusion and never seen before, solve it, and give a duplicate. When he had built a booth or so, he would book them with a carnival, which would furnish transportation, lights and a banner line in return for 50 per cent of the gross profit. Scott started James at five dollars a week and keep. After three weeks, he raised to ten dollars, later to twenty. He finished out the 1935 season at Bismarck and left with a contract for the following year.

The $700 he had saved would have seen him through the winter if he hadn't taken up with a French girl he had met at Port Arthur. The story was a repetition of his freshman year. This time his job in a transients bureau, at fifty dollars a week, tided him over until April when Scott went on the road with the F. & M. Brothers again.

James was still a ticket seller. Scott occasionally asked him to come along as inside lecturer and manipulator of the illusions. The most spectacular were the Blade Box (false paper box), the Egyptian Torture Cabine (false spikes), the Guillotine (false guillotine) and the Pigeon Vanish (false pigeon). Since his ticket box was outside, James had never had a chance to the patter, so he had to make his own when he took over. It should now be remembered what an amateur he was when he began.

Inside lecturing, or "making the pitch," is far below outside talking. "making the opening," in the parlance of the side show, and James had never made an opening. One reason for Scott's talker, Preacher Monro, was probably the best business. Talkers usually would

In November of that year he spent an evening at a dance hall. He remembers its name—The Ritz—but he doesn't remember the name of the girl he met there.

He is sure she was attractive, though, because she persuaded him to sign up as her partner for a walkathon contest beginning on Monday. She had already arranged for a sponsor. The White Palace Restaurant would pay them $25 a week for wearing white sweaters with a slogan.

The team breezed along for the first month, but then the girl began to get tired. She gave up at 900 hours. He walked the next twenty-four hours alone and automatically won third prize of $500, which he split with her.

The $250 seemed such easy money for five and a half weeks' work that he decided to stay in the business. He was in it for a year. "Don't all infants," he argues, "have to learn to walk before minutes in every hour and rested for fifteen. Actually, you walked only thirty-five minutes, because three minutes were allowed for the lavatory and seven for seeing the doctor. James remembers getting a doctor to lance sixteen boils for him one afternoon, before his system became adjusted to the life.

You could skip this time-out if you wanted to, and add the ten minutes to your rest periods until you had saved enough for a good sleep. All the contestants slept in their clothes with their feet above their heads for the sake of circulation. They were fed seven times a day, but they were never given sugar or butter. They got so that three teaspoons of sugar would make them drunk, and butter was too fattening. Even without it, James would put on fifteen pounds in the month that a walkathon usually lasted.

His average weekly income was of the gate; the average is cent, though some get as little cent. Preacher Monroe got at, the highest rate on record.

on still recite his ballys veraccompany them with his estures.

Preacher's greatest feat was gathp and grinding it in without word. He did it one Fourth of when he suddenly "blew his James says, after leather-lung-without a microphone. The the show was the Head Withy (no relation to the Headless the Preacher got the idea
he tip by running up the steps platform, grabbing himself neck, sticking his tongue out, eyes, and running down again.
doesn't know what else he did,
shows that the tip stamped

Break from the Preacher

es indebted to the Preacher for opportunity to make an open-as dozing in his ticket box one he heard the Preacher break and announce, "The Floating ting in the air now, and I must of the hoops. My assistant will he description of the marvels t you." He pointed to the and stepped down. Panicky, umbled a few words, and the e Preacher had already gathd up to buy tickets. Red Scott
e to stroll past at the moment;
culated James on his talk.

ed of each season found him
e put in the first winter at a shop in Carruthersville, Mississippi, a new set of illusions sold to Scott for $400 the next second winter, he worked as an of spinach cutters at Musahoma, seeing that they didn't their baskets with rocks.

ese seasons had been so unthat he decided to quit show for good and hitchhike west.
driver who gave him a lift was ger of the Mayflower Hotel in es. James talked himself into bartender, although he knew out it, and saved up enough to buy a car for a tour of the past. The tour ended at Ta-collision. When he had paid damage to the other car, just oney was left for his fare to n, North Dakota, where he om Billboard that Red Scott was now working with the Fairley & Little Shows.

Scott gave him his old job of manipulating the illusions, but James had lost the knack in his long layoff. A few days after he joined, he boggled the Guillottine and dropped the real blade on the girl's neck. The blade was dull, so she was merely stunned, but James leaped off the platform, plunged through the crowd, and caught the first train out.

Hennies Brothers, he learned from Billboard again, was playing Columbus, Ohio, with an illusion show managed by Skeeter Lorow. The morning James reached Columbus, Lorow's regular talker had a heart attack, and James was hired to fill in. That day, he grossed $300, a new high for the show, and next day Lorow gave him a contract at 10 per cent of the gross and 25 per cent of the Blade Box. It was under Lorow that James hung up his all-time records of $300 in one hour at Dallas and $2,000 in one day at Detroit.

Figures like that get around the carnival world fast. When Hennies Brothers ended its season, Royal American,
the biggest carnival in the country,
snapped up James for the winter fairs on the southern circuit. He was talking for Royal American at the Sarasota Fair in January, 1939, when Clyde Ingalls, the manager of the Ringling side show, asked if he would like to sign with them that year.

Working for Ringling, James averages six hours a day in the box, seven days a week. He reports for work soon after ten in the morning, sees that his box is set up, that his mike is connected, and that he has five dollars in change. At 10:30 he makes his first opening, and talks off and on until 3:30, when the matinee has absorbed the last of the come-ins. From then until 4:45 the side show is closed, unless the "lot lice" are people who haven't enough money for admission to the big show; they are especially thick in New Orleans and Montreal.

The come-out from the matinee is the biggest crowd of the day, so James talks fairly steadily from 4:45 until 5:45, when the side show closes again until the evening come-in starts at 6:30. If Ringling is playing a one-night stand, the side show closes for good at 9, since its equipment has to go out on the first of the four trains. Otherwise, it stays open until midnight, to catch the evening come-out.

On an average day, James makes about half the total of sixty openings, divided half and half between come-ins and come-outs. An opening for a comein lasts 3½ minutes, and about half as long for a come-out (come-outs are impatient to get home), so he figures that his Ringling microphone carries more than 10,000 words a day, or 2,100,000 a season—"each one different," he likes to boast, "each one strange and beautiful."

The Ringling season begins early in April and runs into November. James lays off from then until early January, when he joins Royal American for six weeks. This gives him a working year of around thirty-six weeks and a total salary of around $1,600, plus keep and transportation. His total income, however, is around $2,000. The difference is made up by "walkaway money" left by forgetful ticket buyers. Carnival talkers don't have this bonus, because they don't double as ticket sellers, as Ringling requires James to do.

There's Gold in Those Walkaways

Ringling prides itself on being an honest show, and James makes an honest effort to give every customer his money.
He has never deliberately short-changed anyone. He puts a man's change on the shelf in front of him, but he counts a woman's into her hand. Before he learned to do this, there was hardly a day when some woman didn't complain that she had been gypped, and tie up the whole line while she was finding out that she hadn't been. Walkaways, though, simply don't wait for their change; they grab their tickets and beat it for the entrance.

A favorite trick of the carnival gyps was to sell a ticket to a shill and yell after him, when he was fifty yards away,
"Hey, mister! You forgot your change!"

James doesn't yell after walkaways.
All he does is rap on the shelf. He says he keeps a special sponge to rap with.

His greatest windfall was at Fort Francis, Canada, in his first year with Hennies Brothers. A customer shouted for five tickets, handed him a bank note and a quarter, and rushed off. Not only was the note a twenty—it had another twenty stuck to it, and James was $39 ahead on the sale. Last year he had five walkaways from tens, but not one from a twenty.

He might be more protective toward walkaways, he thinks, if it weren't for his tendency to give too much change instead of too little. Shortages have to be filled from his own pocket, and he has cost himself as much as six dollars a day.

James hasn't seen his parents or his sister and brothers for six years. Until he married a girl from a Tampa beauty shop a few months ago, he was tempted to quit show business out of plain loneliness. Freaks are chummy among themselves, but they are reserved with ordinary people, and the turnover in the administrative staff is so high that they never have a chance to become intimate with one another. More to pass the time than anything else, James makes a hobby of devising new illusions. He spent nearly two years planning a Long-necked Girl only to discover that someone had beat him to it. At present he is devoting himself to a Girl With Two Heads, but he admits that he hasn't gotten very far with it.

If he ever settles down to a regular life, he'd like to live in Houston, which he considers just a big country town,
"full of happy gillies." His ambition is a job as an announcer at a Houston radio station.

The only thing that worries him is his absent-mindedness. He's afraid that he'll be introducing some famous actress and absently slip into his bally for the Headless Girl: "Her body must be kept at the same temperature at all times.
The doctor is getting her ready now. In just three minutes, liquid nourishment will be pumped into her veins. . . ."

The new champion waved me aside. "A speech?
Nothing doing! I'm just a tennis player." . . . "Wait!" I ask. "You've won the tennis cup, now you've got to tell them how you did it. Here—settle yourself with a stick of Beeman's. The flavor's great and that tang—"

"You win!" says the champ. "Gotta hand it to Beeman's—it's got what it takes. A fresh taste that's doubly refreshing. A dash and tang. A flavor that's too good to last—yet does."
He laughed. "Sure I'll make a speech!
It'll be good, too—if you'll just keep that package of Beeman's on tap!"

BEEMAN'S
AIDS DIGESTION

SEE COLLIER'S HOUSE OF IDEAS

The newest wrinkles in home building, furnishing, lighting, home enjoyment are brought together in Collier's House of Ideas.

Drop in when you visit New York. It's on the North Terrace of

RADIO CITY'S INTERNATIONAL BUILDING

My Friend, Kerry Boyne

Continued from page 8

came, we walked up to Pinterelli's candy store and sat down at one of the marble-topped tables.

I said, "She didn't even thank you, did she, the stuck-up snob?"

"She didn't have a chance," Kerry said.

A little while later, though, she thanked him, I guess. At least, he said they'd danced together a lot at the Mason's summer dance.

But I didn't even know about it until the day after Cap Penberthy tried to bulldoze Kerry in Walters' saloon.

Kerry never would tell me much about that. But I heard from other people. Nights in bed I used to lie and think about it, and wish I'd been there. That was the only time, they said, that Cap Penberthy had ever been told off.

First, it is necessary to understand that Cap Penberthy was the superintendent of mines for the International Steel Company, and in those days that meant that everybody in town worked for him, either directly or indirectly. He was a good superintendent; he'd come up through the ladder-roads. He got the ore out. That was the best I could say for him.

Kerry Boyne was a railroad man, a boomer. All railroad men were toughs in those days, and the boomers were the worst. Of course, I knew what kind of a man Kerry was, and today I know that Evangeline Penberthy did, too. But who else?

So maybe Cap had some right to get huffy. He came into Walters' saloon that night and saw Kerry at the bar. "Hey, you," he said. "You the one who stopped my girl's runaway?"

"Yes," Kerry said.

Penberthy was a little man. He always wore a gray suit and a gray cap pulled over one eye. He had a deep, big voice. "That's all very well," he said, "all very well. But I don't want you hangin' around my daughter. Understand? I'm grateful, an' all that. If you'll drop around at the minin' office sometime, I'll see there's a check for you. I've already taken care of the other one, the one who got hurt."

KERRY put his glass down on the bar and turned around slow. "Aren't you gettin' a little big-headed?"

Cap swelled his chest. "Big-headed? Big-headed? Because I don't want riff-raff callin' on my daughter socially?"

Kerry said, "If you were twenty years younger and twenty pounds heavier, I'd slap that mouth of yours down to your size."

Big Dick Davis, the Cousin Jack wrestler, was there. The Cornish were top dogs in the mining country then. And they were clannish. Besides, Cap Penberthy was the biggest dog there was.

"Ere," Dick said. "Ere. 'Oo the bloody 'ell they booger think 'e is? They booger can't talk Cap..."

He stepped in front of Penberthy and held his arms out as though he were reaching for a hold. He wasn't expecting any trouble, really, I guess.

Kerry sloughed him square in the face.

Davis went backward, knocking Cap staggering into a corner. They tell me that room full of men might have been frozen there.

Kerry walked across and picked Cap up by the front of his coat. He put him on his feet, and pulled his cap from over his eyes where one of Davis' flopping arms had knocked it. "Look," he said, and pointed to the wrestler on the floor, his nose mashed flat and his front teeth gone. "That's what you'd get if you weren't an old man." Then he walked out.

But that wasn't the end of it. To begin with, Cap blamed Walters for letting Kerry get away with it, and six months later Walters sold out his stock and what was left of his good will, and left town.

And then, for two weeks someone or other was always taking a crack at Kerry, figuring the man who licked him would be sitting pretty with Cap. It got so he wouldn't walk anywhere but in the middle of the street after dark.

That's the way it was all summer. As far as I know, Kerry never spoke to her again until the day they were married. But every evening he would come out of White's Hotel and light his cigar at the corner of Main Street. Then he'd walk slow up the hill, up and around by Penberthy's. And if she was in the hammock in the front yard, he'd tip his hat and bow, and walk on around and back by the school, standing empty and lonesome in the warm night.

I know because I used to walk with him.

ONE night he said, "You want to do a little stealing, Bum?"

I had to laugh at that. Kerry Boyne stealing. "Sure," I said.

So after we'd made our walk, we got Satan, the best horse in the livery barn, and a buggy, and headed out toward the Christian Mine. "What're we goin' to do, Kerry?" I said.

"Steal a dog."

That was different, and no harm in it—like stealing apples. There was only one man out this way who had a dog worth stealing, and that was Fat-stuff Royce, a fancy-man. He had a bull bitch who was a beauty and meaner than a weasel. He thought more of that dog than he did of any of his girls.

I said, "That guy'll shoot you, Kerry." He would, too, though he was a big blow.

"I'll do the stealing, Bum. You hold the horse."

We blew out the dash lamps, and turned down a back road, and then Kerry slipped off through the woods.

I waited, and pretty soon Kerry came back and jumped into the buggy. He didn't say a word, just jerked the whip from the socket and hit Satan a lick that sent him twenty feet in the first jump.

"Feel here," Kerry said.

I ran my hand inside his coat and hit something smooth and warm. The funniest little snarl came out.

"You got one!"

"Got two of 'em. One for you."

"How'd you ever do it, Kerry?"

"The old dog was tied to a post, and I just let her chase me around and around until she was snubbed short. Then I took my pick of the pups."

"Your pick?"

"Lit a match. You didn't think after all that trouble I was goin' to take a chance on a runt?"

We laughed together. That was the best I'd ever heard.

"Won't Royce be mad, though!" I said.

"Oh, I'll pay him. Good enough for him if I didn't though—refusin' to sell just because he doesn't like me."

Back in town he drove all the way up the hill and stopped. "Here. Take this pup, and give it to Miss Penberthy personally." He was smiling, looking awfully pleased, his gold tooth shining in the light of the dash lamps. "I heard almost a month ago that she wanted a dog, an' there ain't any better dog in the country than these pups."

"The senator would never let a crowd like that get away!"

THURSTON GENTRY

It seemed an awful waste to me if that's the way he wanted it.

"The ol' man'll be down to the of aldermen's meeting. Make sure give it to her personally."

I tucked the puppy in my shirt and went up the walk. I knocked and she came to the door herself, the shining fuzzy through her hair. "Something for you," I said, and the puppy at her, and ran.

So we used to walk around the nings, and she'd be there in the mock with the puppy. And Kerry lift his hat, and bow, and she'd him, and then we'd walk on.

But one night, just before we Penberthy's, Paddy Burg, the marshal, stepped out from behind He was, perhaps, the only fighti

Kerry hadn't tangled with. He'd a man once with his fists. "I go to keep you away from here," I

I could feel Kerry beside me though you couldn't see it. "How's the livery barn?"

"All right," Paddy Burg said. on."

We went to the barn. My chest so tight and my heart so swollen I know if I'd have breath enough to it without resting. We went down alley so no one would see I stopped just inside the back run

Kerry took off his coat and shirt and handed them to me. Paddy Burg did the same. They walked between the horses together, the der-shirts white in the gloom.

I sat on the oat bin with me around those big heavy clothes started sweating. I heard their slow and steady down to the ot of the barn. I heard the door of stall slam, where they doctor horses. Then silence, except the sounds of the livery horses, and they were lighting the ceiling lar

Then I heard them fighting—at plain.

I sat there, I don't know how wanted to go to the door of the and listen, but I couldn't move. I sat there and listened to the stamp of their feet, and the way the stall shook when they slammed against the wall, and I could hear the whistlings and their unconscious voices coming wild and far away from up in their heads.

How long it lasted I don't know. There was some light when we went but it was pitch-dark when it was

I HEARD the stall door open and a man walked toward me, slow and I stared and stared, but I couldn't say anything. I opened my mouth, but words wouldn't come. The feet stopped for seconds, and I thought my heart too. I tried and tried, and finally I said, "Who is it?"

"It's me, Bum," he said, and he came to cry.

He came over and sat down beside me and put an arm around me and me close to his chest. I smelled sweat and the blood, and I cried more than ever. He was the only man I ever saw me cry.

Kerry washed his face, and then in the dark we walked by Penberthy's of the house, Kerry lit his cigarette quickly, so she'd just recognize me not see how his face was all battered. We heard her there in the hallway, and he went back to the take care of Paddy Burg.

I didn't see him again until the noon on my way home from school.

"He'll run the Spots off You"

Mileage, pep, power, and pick-up! The Flying Red Horse is your guide to great gasoline!
Drive in today—fill up with Mobilgas and its mous teammate, Mobiloil!

HAVE YOU STOPPED at the Flying Red Horse Sign recently? If so, you have been convinced that the friendly little dog is right—

...you can't beat Balanced Mobilgas for mileage and power!

That's because Mobilgas is made for today's sensitive engines. It atomizes instantly; fires evenly; sends full, clean charges to every cylinder every time. You enjoy a smooth, steady flow of power on hills or highways...no stall, no sputter in traffic.

Drive in today at the Red Horse Sign. Fill up with Mobilgas for "Balanced Performance":

1. Quick starts despite cool engine.
2. Fast warm-up—rapid acceleration.
3. Freedom from vapor-lock—no stalls.
4. Minimum crankcase oil dilution.
5. High anti-knock value.
6. Cleanliness—freedom from gum.
7. Full, smooth power under all conditions.
8. Long mileage—economical operation.

SOCONY-VACUUM OIL COMPANY, INC.
AND AFFILIATES
Magnolia Petroleum Co.—General Petroleum Corp. of Calif.

SHE DIDN'T MARRY HIM FOR HIS MONEY

IT'S NOT HOW OLD you are, but how young you look that counts! If you'd like to smooth a couple of years off your chin and jowls, get yourself a Barbasol Face. Modern Barbasol is more than kind to your skin. Containing soothing, beneficial oils, it protects against razor irritation while you shave—and leaves your face feeling soft as satin, after you've shaved!

HOW TO SAVE MONEY ON EGGS: Get him a tube of Barbasol, lady; it's the quickest shave in the world. Then he'll surely be able to get downstairs before the eggs are cold and have to be thrown away.

HEY, BROTHER! If you're trying to improve your appearance, we've got a better idea. Try shaving with Barbasol for ten days and see how much younger you look. It's 25¢, 50¢, and 75¢ at all drugstores. Barbasol Blades, 5 for 15¢.

ore season was almost over, and every so often there'd be a day when he didn't work. "How's the pup?" he said.

Cap Penberthy drove up behind those blacks of his. He pulled up close to the walk, and leaned out of the buggy. "Hear you whipped Paddy Burg the other night."

Kerry's face was still swollen and battered. He grinned a little bit. "Yeah," he said.

"We got a custom around here," Cap said, "that whoever licks the marshal takes his job."

"I don't want it," Kerry said.

Cap kind of smiled.

"You stiffened him up, you oughta help him with his work. There's a dog up in front of my house, clutterin' up the street. I want you to go up and take care of it."

Kerry didn't say a word. The skin stretched over his face. All battered and bruised, he looked horrible. Even when Paddy Burg had stepped up to him he hadn't looked like that.

IT WAS the pup, the little fat brindle thing. He was lying on the grass between the road and the sidewalk.

Evangeline Penberthy came out of the house. She was wearing a gray dress, and her hair was held up with a blue ribbon.

I left them there together.

That evening Kerry came down to the house and asked my uncle to get him wire-passes.

We walked together up the hill. When we got to the front porch of Coles, the county clerk, we heard the kids squabbling at the supper table. They shut up when Kerry knocked. Then they started again, and Coles opened the door. His black hair hung down over his eyes and his shirt was bulging out of his waistband.

"I want a wedding license," Kerry said.

The county clerk swore. "Come around in the mornin'," he said. "I gotta right to some peace."

He made as if to shut the door, and Kerry grabbed a handful of the front of his shirt and jerked him out on the porch. "If you want a full set of teeth," he said, "you change your tune."

"Kerry Boyne!" Coles said. "I didn't recognize you. I thought . . . I'll get my hat and coat."

"Change that shirt, too," Kerry said. "You're goin' to be a witness, an' I want no dirty shirts at my wedding."

We waited on the porch. "Bum," Kerry said, "walk over to the courthouse with us, and then go down to the barn and get a rig, will you?"

Coles came out and we walked back down the hill with the plank walk plunking under our heels.

When they turned into the courthouse, I ran down to the livery stable. "I want Satan and a buggy," I told Joe La Fave who was sitting in the office.

I followed him back into the barn, and while he was downstairs I found the buggy I wanted. It was as good as any Cap Penberthy had, if not as stylish as his carriage.

While Joe harnessed Satan, I picked out the best robe they had, and I was in the buggy, ready to go, when Joe passed me the lines.

We dipped down the incline to the street, and trotted up the hill, around by the courthouse.

Kerry and Coles were just coming out. The county clerk was scared now that he knew who the girl was, and it had shrunk him.

"I got that new buggy," I said to Kerry. "I didn't get a carriage because they use them at funerals more than at weddings."

"You're a man to tie to, Bum," he said. "You've got a head."

My heart swelled so it hurt my jaws and I had to clamp my teeth together. Evangeline Penberthy was sitting in the Browns' front room. She was happy I could see.

Kerry went right up to her and kissed her. "This is Bum Hogan," he said. "He's my best friend, and he's going to be the best man."

Evangeline Penberthy said, "How do you do, Bum?"

She'd been crying. Her crying made her eyes bigger and her mouth softer.

Kerry said, "Number Seven's due of here in thirty minutes."

The Reverend Brown said as though he hated to, "Don't you think it would be wiser, Mr. Boyne, if we not Captain Penberthy. . . ."

Kerry said, "We're doin' things our way now."

Evangeline Penberthy got up and stood beside him in front of the Reverend Brown.

"Stand alongside me, Bum," Kerry said, and I did, conscious of my clothes because even the county clerk had a clean shirt on.

Kerry gave me a ring, and when he nudged me, I handed it back to him, and that was all except for signing my name.

When it was over, Coles ran out a good way from us.

Kerry said, "You drive, Bum." He put Evangeline Penberthy between us, and I helped him tuck the robe around her.

Down at the depot, the express car and the mail car were drawn up at the platform, but the train wasn't ready yet. The passenger car hadn't been hoisted up yet. Kerry went into the depot and the passes my uncle had wired for no Evangeline Penberthy and I sat there.

When Kerry came out he said to me, "Your father called up."

Her breath sucked in over her teeth. "What did he say?"

"Nothin'. Just asked if I was tired and when they said yes, he hung up."

We sat there for quite a while, no one saying anything; I was feeling awfully lonesome. And then suddenly I was conscious of a sound up the hill. It was like a parade without music. "Listen," said Kerry. "What is it?"

That noise made me itch. "I've got to go see," I said, and climbed out of the buggy.

It was a block to Main Street, and the noise was growing all the time. At the corner I saw what it was: better than halfway up the hill was a bunch of men. I could see the blob they made, and the light from the saloons and the stores on their faces.

They swarmed under the suspended arc light, then, and right in the middle of them was Cap Penberthy. I watched, a man I knew was a shift boss at one of the mines led a bunch of inland miners out of Autinen's saloon.

THAT was enough for me. I drove between the buildings and came out in the alley. Then I ran through the dark for White's Hotel.

Munson and Old Man White were playing cribbage in the lobby. "Kerry just married Evangeline Penberthy," hollered. "An' ol' Cap and a gang on their way to the depot."

Old Man White said, "I'll get my gun."

"No, you old rooster!" Munson said. "Roust out that freight crew up there. Tell 'em there's brake clubs at the freight house. Kid, you tell Boy hang on. I'm goin' over town and I got friends."

I tore for the depot. In the office was an old muzzle-loading gun that some agent had kept to protect the money. I whipped in the back, grabbed the shotgun, and out I climbed one of the boxcars on the then jumped to the roof of the and Evvie were standing in the rway of the mail car. There ve been thirty men hollering der the platform lights, throw-shadows in sprawling chunks.

enberthy was right under a king his fist at his daughter and llering about an annulment.
le was on the platform with ub in his hand, madder than a h a bee in his underwear.
married, you dumbheads," he ting. "Don't you understand?
married!"
as screaming, "Never mind ver mind him! Get Boyne!"

wd was edging up to the mail nobody was anxious to get I saw Kerry take a kick at y's face, but the guy ducked.
ped the gun against my leg, hat it would go off without p, pulled a hammer back with o, and let her flip.

st went off the roof, and I althe shotgun. But I blew an e in all that noise.

the silence, Cap said, "Who
? What is it?"

It's me, up here with a double-shotgun. Get away from that ne movement, their faces all

o. But I was in the dark above
s and they couldn't see me.
ve one approving, triumphant
laughter.

at kid," Cap screamed. "Some-ot him. He's dangerous."

y had a gun, and everybody got n the mail car.

five men from the hotel, with White in the lead, came running along the platform from the freight house, and each of them carried a three-foot brake club. Jerking lanterns from the roundhouse told me that the swipes were on their way, and I knew that every one was swinging a wrench or a club or something.

And then the whole mob was stilled by the light of the engine bringing up the passenger coach. It showed Munson loping down at the head of four or five friends. Behind them came Paddy Burg, trying to shed his coat on the run.
"Hang tough, Boyne," he was hollering.
"Hang tough, Kerry."

My uncle hollered, "Hold it boys! No fightin' except to keep the peace."

KERRY jumped down from the mail car and lifted his wife down to him.
She walked beside him with her head up, holding to his arm. They stopped just under me, and Kerry turned his face up to me. "Come down, Bum. The best man always kisses the bride."

"I'll stay up here," I said. "I've got another barrel left if you need it."

I didn't want to kiss her. He knew how I felt. She did, too, but it didn't make so much difference about her.

They got on the train, and just before it pulled out, Kerry came out on the coach platform. "Thanks, boys," he said.

The conductor—I don't remember who it was—swung a go-ahead sign at the engineer and hollered, "'Booooooard."

Kerry looked up to where I was in the dark on the roof. "Goodby, Bum—and thanks," he said, and gave me that casual, friendly little wave of his.

I waved back—but with my left hand.
for my right arm and leg felt like I'd been kicked by a horse instead of a shotgun. They had to get a ladder to get me down.

But that was after Kerry had gone.

What's that got to do with me, Pop? I want to be a businessman"

A JOHN KAUNUS

1 "Help! Help!" screamed Toto, rushing up to the animal trainer who was enjoying a TEN HIGH highball after his act. "Give me a drink—quick! That big lion of yours just tried to bite me."

2 "He was only yawning! And anyway, he has no teeth," laughed the trainer. "Oh, I knew that all the time!" said Toto, sipping his TEN HIGH. "But I also knew this whiskey of yours has No Rough Edges—and I was in a hurry to Double My Enjoyment of the raise the boss just gave me!"

GET THAT TEN HIGH SMILE

SAY! THEY WEREN'T FOOLING!
THIS RICH-TASTING,
LOW-PRICED
TEN HIGH IS THE WHISKEY WITH
"NO ROUGH EDGES"!

90 proof
Hiram Walker & Sons Inc.
Peoria, Ill.

STRAIGHT BOURBON WHISKEY • STRAIGHT RYE WHISKEY

Double your enjoyment with
TEN HIGH

Our Head-Start on Hitler

SHIVERS dip down a lot of American business backs every time a news story floats in about how German salesmen are offering steel and various manufactured goods for October delivery in South America at prices far below United States prices.

It sounds like a popular American nightmare coming true already—the nightmare of Hitler bossing a slave-labor population around, and forcing it to turn out goods that can undersell goods produced in the United States by free and well-paid labor. If that nightmare does come true, our foreign markets will be in jeopardy.

Maybe it will come true sometime. But it hasn't yet.

And remember, United States industry, by and large, is far and away the most efficient in the world. That means that United States labor can turn out manufactured goods or processed materials at far less per-unit cost than can the less efficiently equipped and trained labor of any slave state now functioning. Yet because of this low per-unit cost, United States labor can be well paid.

The key factor in all this is our immense superiority in electric-power production and in mechanized production. Where Hitler, Stalin and Mussolini leave off with a lot of human slaves operating comparatively inefficient machines or making things by hand, we begin with a lot of free working people driving millions of electric-horsepower slaves which neither eat, sleep, suffer nor plot rebellions against their masters.

True, we suffer large-scale unemployment from time to time because of this plethora of electric-horsepower slaves and for other reasons. True, too, the slave states will undersell us on some items in some countries and will unquestionably make an effort to do so in all.

But the net of all these truths appears to be this: that our low per-unit costs are going to give us a head-start in any trade war Mr. Hitler and his comrade dictators may feel like waging against us, and they will be a long and weary time overcoming that head-start if they ever do overcome it. We are economically best equipped in this struggle.

It looks as if the main thing we have to worry about just now is not totalitarian competition in world markets, but defenses sufficient to keep the dictators from trying to grab the vast treasure house which is the United States. Get that national defense problem under control, pronto, and we'll have a wall behind which we can work out our other problems in our own way, and most likely with maximum success.

Let the Children In

LET'S give the green-light and the signal to all the bona fide movements in this country to bring in child victims of Europe's war and find homes for them.

We mean, specifically, let's all contribute whatever we can to these organizations every American family that can do so to take in or more of these sufferers from a war never made . . . AND let Congress go ahead and slash the immigration quota and other tape which at this writing hampers and this child-rescue work.

England alone, beginning mid-June, took the task of rushing about 1,000,000 children out from under the German bombs.

Famine is already setting in in several parts of Europe; and according to Walter Lippmann's recent report in Collier's based on the Hoover relief organization, conditions reminiscent of the Middle Ages are in evidence in Europe this winter.

Of all the victims of war and famine, children are the most tragic, the most piteous. They didn't start the war, they couldn't have stopped it, what it was all about, they can't fight back, and their survival as adults can. Children take war consequences on the chin, and their consequences are small and weak.

We know, of course, about the German children taken in after the World War I, the Belgians and Hollanders, only to turn out as fifth columnists or parachutists or pilots when this war's fury cut loose.

That's a chance that any country receiving refugees in large numbers must take. We must take it ahead and take it. The immediate tragedy we can alleviate though we cannot prevent it—is that a generation of European children suffering atrociously and undeservedly. We're sentimental enough to surmise that though the bread those Norwegians and others cast on the running waters will many, many days returning to them, it will turn some day in some way.

If you want information on any practical aspect of this subject, write to the U. S. Department of Immigration, Washington, D. C.

Success Story

A recent United Press news item:

TOPEKA, Kan.—Mrs. Marshall Becker, 40, Topeka, runner-up for the women's state golf championship, began playing the game to keep from being a "golf widow."

"It was either learn the game or sit at home while my husband played," she explains, "and I decided to learn the game over after he came home."

This is what is meant by all the advice about how to adjust yourself to a happily married and stay that way.

We recommend Mrs. Becker's example to all wives who think they're neglected, misunderstood, and to all husbands who want comradeship and give-and-take at more fair chance before you hop off.

August 17, 1940

5¢ A COPY

Collier's

SURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Berkeley, Cal.

DO NOT CUT. TEAR OR DEFACE BOOKS OR MAGAZINES

How to Build Airpower By W. E.

THE CROWELL-COLLIER PUBLISHING COMPANY—PUBLISHERS OF COLLIER'S—THE AMERICAN MAGAZINE

X02/1
C 22641
A

21040X

COLLIER'S
CALIF
SURLINGAME

ing sun parches your hair
es it dry and lifeless.

increases harm, and washes
he remaining scalp oils.

N AFTERNOON of invigorating exercise under the summer sun does wonders for your health. But what a toll can take of your hair! For the fiery rays of the sun bake your hair—make it dull and brittle. Then a swim or shower adds to the damage—drenches your hair—washes away needed scalp oils!

Protect your hair with Vitalis and the famous "60-Second Workout". Massage Vitalis briskly onto your scalp. Feel the pleasant tingling as circulation increases. Your parched scalp loses its tightness—becomes supple. Then the pure vegetable oils of Vitalis supplement the natural scalp oils—give your hair a rich, handsome lustre! See how easy it is to comb your hair—how neatly it stays in place. There's no "patent-leather" look either!

Get a bottle of Vitalis today at your druggist's. Let Vitalis and the "60-Second Workout" keep your hair attractive—despite sun and water.

AUG 28
AUG 31

Baking Sun-Drenching Water

leave your Hair parched and lifeless!

Protect Your Hair with VITALIS and the "60-Second Workout"

1 50 Seconds to Rub—Circulation quickens—flow of necessary oil is increased—hair has a chance!

2 10 Seconds to Comb and Brush—Hair has a lustre—no objectionable "patent-leather" look.

alish and the "60-Second Workout"
helps keep Hair Healthy and Handsome

WARNING—For your protection in the barber shop genuine Vitalis comes only in the sanitary, individual Seal tubes—sold by barbers who display this seal. Accept no substitutes. Insist on Seal tubes!

WILLIAM L. CHENERY Editor
CHARLES COLEBAUGH Managing Editor
THOMAS H. BECK Editorial Director

WALTER DAVENPORT
AIMEE LARKIN
QUENTIN REYNOLDS
KYLE CRICHTON
KENNETH LITTAUER
JAMES N. YOUNG
MAX WILKINSON

Politics
Distaff
Sports
Screen and Theater
Fiction
Fiction
Fiction

WM. O. CHESSMAN
HENRY L. JACKSON
GURNEY WILLIAMS
DENVER LINDLEY
FRANK D. MORRIS
IFOR THOMAS
CLARENCE H. ROY

Art
Fine Feathers
Humor
Articles
Articles
Photographs
Syntax

W. B. COURTNEY
FRANK GERVASI
MARTHA GELLHORN
JIM MARSHALL
WM. HILLMAN
ROBERT McCORMICK
JOHN T. FLYNN

Medi
Sca
Th
D
E
W
A
E

THIS WEEK

AUGUST 17, 1940

SHORT STORIES

HENRY ANTON STEIG

The Big Dough-Re-Mi. When a girl knows she's good, look out! Page 9

MARTIN KNAPP

The Man Who Wanted War. A Hero grows up. Page 11

DONALD HOUGH

The Tune I Know. Dude girls and cowboys don't mix. Page 14

FREDERICK NEBEL

A Girl Must Be Sure. Especially about detectives. Page 18

THE SHORT SHORT STORY

Parting Shot, by Frederick Skerry. Page 21

SERIAL STORIES

AGATHA CHRISTIE

The Patriotic Murders. The third of nine parts. Exit one suspect. Page 12

WILLIAM C. WHITE

Occupation: Widow. The seventh of nine parts. A plot set to music. Page 23

ARTICLES

ROBERT A. "RED" ROLFE

More Than Base Hits. Inside stuff as practiced by the Yankees. Page 13

W. B. COURTNEY

How to Build Airpower. Germany shows the world the way. Page 16

FRANK CONDON

No Mothers Wanted. If you've a little Shirley Temple, keep her home. Page 20

HANNAH LEES

Don't Worry About It. How to enjoy your high blood pressure. Page 22

FRELING FOSTER

Keep Up with the World. Page 6

EDITORIALS

"Our Daily Bread."
Soldiers of Misfortune.
Good Luck, General.
Defense and the WPA.

Page 58

COVER

E. M. JACKSON

ANY WEEK

SEVERAL agitated citizens have written us that something should be done about what happened on a recent Sunday in Detroit, Michigan. Until then we had the idea that anything happening in Detroit on Sunday would be gratefully hailed. As usual we were wrong. On this particular Sunday three fellows who do not love this country enough to enjoy its errors as well as its virtues were exhorting audiences to vote Red. One was Mr. James W. Ford, a Negro who yearns to be Vice President on the Communist ticket. The second was a much more interesting office seeker—Mr. John W. Aiken, who is running somewhat slowly for President on the Socialist-Labor ticket. The third was a personable young man who aspires modestly to Congress as a Communist—Mr. Thomas X. Dombrowski. We've never heard Mr. Aiken nor Mr. Dombrowski, but we have listened to Mr. Ford and found him pretty dreary. We wouldn't have mentioned this at all had not Mrs. Irene Hoblaz of Detroit, who heard Mr. Aiken, written to say that she didn't mind so much for herself but shuddered to think "what such dreadful slanders against our government did to the minds of little children, several of whom were present unattended by their parents."

FRANKLY we think that a pretty dreadful situation. The little ones should be looked to at once. Children who would spend time listening to any political exhortation—red, white or blue—instead of running around getting into interesting trouble are not normal. We suspect too that the ministrations of a capable psychologist might benefit adults who go in too seriously for public oratory. "Why is it," demands Mr. William V. Nombest of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, "that almost all the mugs who are trying to talk us into what's left of the European war are either so old that they have moss on their ears or too fat to get into any army but the Salvation? Or is that the only way they can work up any excitement for themselves? Maybe they're just trying to get rid of the young fellows and think the women will rally around them in desperation."

IT WAS while we were brooding over the question that we were almost run over by a motorcar that announced on its rear window that next November this country would decide between "Public Utility and Public Futility." We continued more carefully and were rewarded by a picture in a shop window. The picture was of a large, vigorous gentleman striding across the sky, carrying the Stars and Stripes. The picture had a caption: "The Willkie Way." We were pretty glad to get home.

WE'RE sorry to learn that the Canadian army will be without the services of Mr. Roy McDarmaid for a while. Mr. McDarmaid not only lives near Windsor, Ontario, but has done so very successfully, being immensely popular among the lads and having just married a highly delectable young woman. It is of Mr. McDarmaid's wedding that we write. After a two-day honeymoon, Mr. McDarmaid was to have donned the uniform, shouldered the rifle and been off for camp. But the lads attending the festivities after the wedding had decided, rather belatedly, to give him a shower. The shower consisted of such durables as a few horse shoes, boots, kettles, frying pans and oddments of the sort. And instead of showering him sweetly as the girls had long ago linen-and-kitchen-showered his bride, they let him have it from the roof of the porch. In the ensuing misunderstanding which took place around and upon the prostrate body of Mr. McDarmaid, several of the guests were pretty badly used up. But fortunately the police arrived with an ambulance as well as the paddy wagon and, according to Mr. Sam John Dillon of Windsor, Mr. McDarmaid will live to become a hero and several of the wedding guests will be out of jail before September.

WE WERE talking to Mr. Gerald G. Quimball of Minneapolis, Minnesota, and the subject was modern warfare. We got along nicely, agreeing with monotonous regularity, until we happened to mention parachute troops. There, we felt sure, was something the United States knew nothing about. Moreover, it would take months to train soldiers to leap from planes and land behind enemy lines intact. "Nonsense," said Mr. Quimball, "if the United States Army needs parachute troops they can call on the Forest Service. We send foresters out in airplanes, spot the smoke, drop the fighters, and a couple of million feet of timber are saved. The smoke jumpers are equipped with trick extinguishers and fireproof uniforms. Our lads can land on a cigarette butt."

THE trouble with talking to people you don't know is that you're bound to meet somebody smart. We were ripe for a defeat when we took on a Japanese gentleman named Koshomino. Mr. Koshomino took us off guard by launching into a defense of the Monroe Doctrine and hoping with the solemnity that only a Japanese can achieve that the United States defend it at all costs. We shook with Mr. Koshomino. "You think a good policy?" he asked. We said indeed. "Then you cannot with your countrymen who think not good for Japan too?" We hands solemnly again with Mr. Koshomino.

LATER Mr. Lew Burlingame of Ohio, told us that he'd been told that Washington, D.C., had made the largest population gain of any American major city during the past years. This didn't open our pores wide and we said so. "Okay," said Mr. Burlingame. "Anyway our national capital gained thirty-six per cent population, most of it since 1930. I wanted to tell you is that it won't. This guy Willkie will attend to pretty quickly."

